I have received your letter, wherein you tell me that, 'you had persuaded yourself, you should never have had occasion to complain of being marked out as the subject of my railleries.' I must assure you, in return, that I do not well understand to what you allude. I suspect, however, you may have been informed of a speech I lately made in the senate, wherein I took notice there was a considerable party amongst

The person here alluded to, is Quintus Metellus Caeli- lus Nepos, at this time a tribune of the people. He had lately attempted to procure a law for recalling Pompey out of Asia, pretending that his presence was necessary in order to carry on thecommotions in the East. The real view was to destroy the great credit and authority which Cicero now possessed, by throwing the whole power into Pompey's hands. Cato, who was likewise tribune at the same time, most unsriendlyly opposed this design of his colleagues; and the contests that arose between them, upon this occasion, were attended with great and dangerous disturbances. Metellus, however, being at length obliged to desist, retired in disgust with his complaints to Pompey. After he had thus withdrawn himself, it was proposed, that the consulship of the senate should be passed upon his turbulent conduct, as also that he should be deposed from his office; and it was these proceedings, together with the fact that Metellina Celer supposed Cicero to have born in him, which occasioned the warm remonstrances of the letter before us. Plutarch asserts it was owing to the pru- dence and moderation of Cato, that the motion against Metellus Nepos was not carried. Suetonius, on the other hand, expressly says that he was actually suspended; and indeed the following answer of Cicero renders it extremely probable that some decree of that kind had been voted, and afterwards repealed.—Plut. in Vit. Caton.; Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cens. 16.

Within the space of twelve years, there had been no less than twelve of this family who were either censored, or distinguished with the honours of a triumph.—Veil. Pat. ii. 11.

us, who regretted that the commonwealth should have owed its preservation to my hands. I added, I confess, that, in compliance with the request of some of your relations, whose desires you could by no means refuse, you surrendered the applause with which you intended to have honoured me in that illustrious assembly. I mentioned, at the same time, that we had shared between us the glory of having saved the republic: and that whilst I was protecting Rome from the wicked designs of her intestine enemies, you were defending Italy from the open attacks and secret conspiracies of those who had meditated our general ruin. But that some of your family, nevertheless, had endeavored to weaken this our illustrious association, and were unwilling you should make any return on your part, for those high honours with which you had been distinguished on mine. As this was an open confession how much I was mortified in not receiving the applause I expected, it raised a general smile in the house: not indeed at you, but at myself, for ingenuously acknowledging my disappointment. And surely what I thus said cannot but be considered as highly to your credit; since it was an evidence that, amidst the highest honours, I judged the applause my country must have, without the occurrence of your approbation.

As to what you mention concerning a mutual affection, I know not what you may esteem as a mark of that disposition. But, according to my apprehension, it consists in an equal return of those good offices which one friend receives from another. If, as a proof of this gratitude on my part, I were to tell you that I gave up my pretensions to your present government, you might well suspect my veracity. The truth is, I renounced it as being inconsistent with that plan of conduct I had laid down to myself: and I find every day more and more reason to be satisfied with having taken this resolution. But this, with strict sincerity, I can affirm, that I no sooner relinquished my claim to your province than I considered how to throw it into your hands. I need not mention the management which was employed in order to secure the lot in your favour; but you have been surprized, that I hope you do not imagine the part my colleague acted in that affair was, in any of its circumstances, without my privity and consent. Let me desire you to recollect with what expedition I assembled the senate immediately after the balloting was over, and how feebly I spoke upon that occasion in your applause. Accordingly you then told me that I had not only paid a high compliment to yourself, but at the same time cast a very severe reproach upon your colleagues. I will add, that so long as the decree shall subsist, which the senate passed at that juncture, there will not be wanting a public and conspicuous monument of my good offices towards you. Remember likewise the zeal with which I supported your interest in the senate; the encomiums with which I mentioned you in the assemblies of the people; and the affectionate letters I wrote to you after your departure. And when you have laid these several circumstances together, I may safely leave it to your own determination, whether your behaviour to me, upon your last return to Rome, was suitable to these instances of my friendship. However, I know not what you mean by our reconciliation: an expression, it should seem, which cannot, with any propriety, be applied where there never was any formal rupture.

With respect to your relation, whom I ought not, you tell me, to have persecuted so severly in resentment of a single expression, I have this to say: In the first place, I most highly applaud the affectionate disposition you discover towards him; and, in the next, I hope you would pardon me, if that duty which I owe my country, and to which no man is more strongly devoted, had, at any time, obliged me to take his measures. But if I have only defended myself against his most cruel attacks, have you not reason to be satisfied that I never once troubled you with my complaints? On the contrary, when I perceived he was collecting the whole force of his tribunitial power in order to oppress me, I contended myself with endeavouring to divert him from his unjust purpose, by applying to your wife and sister; as the latter had often indeed, in consideration of my connexions with Pompey, exerted her good offices in my behalf. Nevertheless (and I am sure you are no stranger to the truth of what I am going to say) upon laying down my consular office, he prevented me from making the usual speech to the people: and thus, what had never been denied to the lowest and most worthless of our magistrates, he most injuriously refused to a consul who had preserved the liberties of his country. This insult, however, proved greatly to my honour; for as I was only subjected to the oath, I pronounced the sincerest and most glorious of assertions with an uncommon exertion of voice; and the whole assembly of the people as loudly called the gods to witness, that what I had sworn was most religiously true. But though I received this signal affront from your cousin, yet I had the very same day sent an amicable message to him by our common friends, with the hopes of persuading him into a better temper. The answer he returned was, that all applications of this kind were now too late.

He had, indeed, asserted, some days before, in a speech which he made in a general assembly of the people, "that the man who had punished others without suffering them to be heard, ought to be denied the privilege of being heard in his turn." Excellent and judicious patriot indeed! to maintain that the same punishment which had been decreed, and with the approbation too of every honest man in Rome, to those rebels and incendiaries who had attempted to involve their country in the most dreadful calamities, was due to him who had preserved the senate, the city, and all Italy in general from destruction. These were the provocations that induced me to oppose your cousin openly and before his face: and accordingly in a debate on the first of January concerning the state of the republic, I thought proper to let him see that he had declared war against a man who did not want resolution to return his attack. In a speech which he made a few days afterwards, he was pleased to throw out several menacing expressions against me; and it was evidently his determined purpose to effect my ruin, not by bringing my actions to a fair and impartial trial, but by the most illegal methods of violence. Had I not acted then with spirit in opposition to his ill-considered measures, would not the world have thought (and thought too with reason) that the courage I exerted in my consulate was merely accidental, and not the result of a steady and rational fortitude? If you are ignorant of these instances of your cousin's deportment, he has concealed a very material article of his conduct. On the other hand, if he apprised you of them, you have reason to look upon me as having acted with great temper and forbearance in never interrupting you with your expostulations. In a word, you will find my complaint against him was not founded on a single expression, as you call it, but on a continued series of maledictions. Let me now, therefore, show you that my conduct in return was influenced by principles of the greatest good-nature: if good-nature it may be deemed, not to exact or receive any resentment against injuries of so atrocious a kind. The truth is, I never once made a motion in the senate to his prejudice; on the contrary, as often as any question arose in which he was concerned, I always voted on the most favourable side. I will add

(though it is a circumstance, indeed, in which I ought not to have concurred myself) that I was so far from being displeased with the decree which passed in his favour, that, in consideration of his being related to you, I actually promoted it to the utmost of my power.

Thus you see that, far from being the aggressor, I have only acted a defensive part. Nor have I, as you accuse me, betrayed a capricious disposition with regard to yourself: on the contrary, notwithstanding your failure in some amicable offices on your side, I have still preserved the same unvariable sentiments of friendship on mine. Even at this very instant when I have before me, I had almost called it your threatening letter, yet I will tell you that I not only excuse, but highly applaud the generous warmth you express in your cousin's behalf; as I know, by what passes in my own breast, the wonderful force of family affection. I hope then you will judge of my resentment with the same candour, and acknowledge that if, without the least provocation on my part, I have been most cruelly and outrageously treated, by any of your relations, I had a right, I will not only say to defend myself, but to be supported in that defence if it were necessary, even by your whole army. Believe that I have ever been desirous of making you my friend; as I have endeavoured to convince you, upon all occasions, that I was entirely yours; sentiments which I still retain, and shall continue to retain just as long as you desire. To say all in one word, I am much more disposed to sacrifice my resentment against your cousin to my friendship towards yourself, than to suit the former, in any degree, to impair my parental affection.

Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Caius Antonius, Imperator

I had determined not to trouble you with a letter, unless of the recommendatory kind: not that I had not reasons to expect my confidants would have weight with you; but as being unwilling it should appear to those who might apply for them, that any coldness had arisen between us. However, as our common friend Atticus, who has been a particular witness of the warmth with which I have ever promoted your interest, is coming into your province, I cannot forbear conveying a letter to you by his hand; especially as he very strongly importuned me for that purpose.

Were I to claim even your highest services, the demand could by no means be thought unreasonable, after having contributed everything on my part for the advancement of your ease, your interest, and your honours. But I may safely appeal to your own conscience, whether you have ever made me the least return; so far from it, indeed, that I have heard (for I dare not say I have been)

The person to whom this letter is addressed, was uncle to the celebrated Mark Antony. He had been at the year before with Cicero, and was now governor of Macedonia.

The consulate, at the expiration of their office, used to draw lots to which of the provinces they should respectively succeed the governors. This which Antonius possessed, one of the most desirable in all the Roman empire, having fallen to Cicero, he resigned it to his colleague.
deeply involved in debt as to be full ripe, you must know, for a plot, if any malcontent will be so charitable as to admit me into one. But the misfortune is, this sort of patriots are all disposed to exclude me from their society: and whilst I am the aversion of some of them, as the avowed avenger of conspiracies; others suspect that I only plead poverty with a view of gaining their confidence, in order to betray them. They think it incredible, indeed, that the man who redressed the wrongs of all the users in Rome from a general attack, should ever be in distress for money? The truth of the matter is, there is enough to be raised at six per cent, and I have gained the means by the services I have done my country, that I am considered by your money-lenders as a good man.

I do not forget to mention that I have lately looked over your house and buildings, and am much pleased with the improvements you are making.

Notwithstanding all the world is sensible that Antonius has, by his means, acted towards me with the gratitude he ought, yet it did not prevent me from being his advocate lately in the senate: when, by the influence of my authority, and the force of what I said, I greatly disposed the house in his favour. I will only add my wishes that you would write to me oftener. Farewell.

had written an invective against some person whose interest he had occasion to make use of in the affair of his restoration. This piece of satire had stolen into the world, it seems, without his knowledge; but as he never had any formal quarrel with the man against whom it was levelled, and as it was drawn up in a style by no means equal to the usual correctness of his performances, it might easily, he tells Atticus, be proved not to have come from his hand:

I: put o poos prober soli esse med. The truth of it is, since I am not in the habit of being the ventris upon which Cicero was very solicitous of establishing his character.

This is a great assurance to us, that Cicero having made a speech in public, full of the highest encomiums on Crassus, he did not scribble a few days afterwards to reverse the panegyric, and represent him before the same audience in all the darkest colours of his invective. Cicero being reminded, upon this occasion, of his former barangious reply, very gravely replied, "it was only by way of an oratorical exercise, and in order to try the force of his eloquence upon so bad a subject."—Anl. Geil. xi. 12; Life of Cicero, p. 68; Ad Att. i. 19; Plut. in Vit. Clee.

This gives us some notion of the men of the same desperate fortunes as himself: Qui se bona patria inventat, says the historian of this age, qui enim numquam ex grande confusione, varit et delecti, Cicero in this ineffable manner lived, as usual, the pretence, the motive of their taking up arms was, in order to make war upon their creditors.—Sallust, Bell. Cat. 14.

The question in this debate probably turned on the recall of Antonius—a question which seems either to have been carried in his favour, or to have been dropped during a considerable time. For it appears, by a letter to Atticus, written two years after the date of the present, that Antonius was still in his government: and Dion Cassius assures us, that he was not brought upon his trial till the consulate of Caesar; that is, not till the Year of Rome 664. He was then arraigned for his ill-conduct in Macedonia, and as being concerned likewise in Catiline's conspiracy. This last article of the impeachment could not be proved, but the truth of it, nevertheless, was generally believed: however, he was convicted of the former, and condemned to perpetual banishment. Cicero appeared as his advocate upon this occasion; and it was an occasion which contributed more, perhaps, than any other, to his future misfortunes. For, in the warmth of his speech, he indirectly threw some reflections upon Caesar, which, although

LETTER VI.

To Terentia, to my dearest Tullia, and to my Son.

If you do not hear from me so frequently as you might, it is because I can neither write to you, nor a. c. 685. read your letters, without falling into a greater passion of tears than I am able to support; for though I am at all times, indeed, completely miserable, yet I feel my misfortunes with a particular sensibility upon those tender occasions.

Oh! that I had been more indifferent to life! Our state would then have been, not wholly unacquainted with sorrow, yet by no means thus wretched. However, if any hopes are still reserved to us of recovering some part, at least, of what we have lost, I shall not think that I have made altogether so imprudent a choice. But, if our present fate is unalterably fixed—ah! my dearest Terentia, if we are utterly and for ever abandoned by those gods whom you have so religiously adored, and by those men whom I have so faithfully served; let me see you as soon as possible, that I may have the satisfaction of breathing out my last departing sigh in your arms.

I have spent a fortnight at this place, with my friend Marcus Placcus. This worthy man did not scruple to exercise the rites of friendship and hospitality towards me, notwithstanding the severe penalties of that iniquitous law against those who should venture to give me reception. May that great master of his passions did not think proper at that time openly to resist, it is probable he never forgave. Dion Cassius, at least, informs us, that it was upon this account he secretly instigated Clodius to those violent measures which soon afterwards terminated in Cicero's exile.—Ad Att. i. 2; Dio, xxxvi. See rem. a on the preceding letter.

There is an interval of two years between the date of this and the foregoing letter; the correspondence which Cicero carried on during the intermediate period being entirely lost, except that which he held with Atticus. The following letters to Terentia, were written in our author's last days in Rome, and will prove, either that Cicero was a philosopher only in speculation, or that philosophy itself pretends to more than it has power to perform. Perhaps, they will prove both; for, as on the one hand they discover the most unmanly dejection of spirit; so it is certain, on the other, that much injury may have been done by the want of a due allowance of better principles, to support with fortitude far severer trials. Those in which Cicero was at present exercised, were occasioned by Clodius, who procured himself to be elected tribune with the single view of destroying this his avowed adversary. It has already been observed in rem. p, on the third letter of this book, that Cicero, in his consulate, had put to death some of the conspirators concerned with Catiline, without any formal trial, and upon no other authority than a decree of the senate. And it was upon this charge that Clodius founded his impeachment. Cicero's conduct upon this occasion, has also been arraigned by a late very accurate and judicious historian; and it must be acknowledged that, as far as we can be competent judges of it at this distance from the time and scene of action, it seems to have been attended with some circumstances not easily reconcilable to the principles either of justice or good policy.—Hooke's Roman History, vol. iii. p. 316.

Brundisium: a maritime town in the kingdom of Naples, now called Brindisi. Cicero, when he first withdrew from Rome, intended to have retired into Sicily, but being denied entrance by the governor of that island, he changed his direction, and came to Brundisium, in his way to Greece.—Pro Piae, 40, 41.

But after Cornelia's visit to my wife, and the discourse which I had myself with Cornelia, I could no longer retain a doubt of the change in your inclinations: and accordingly I never failed to attend in your behalf, at every subsequent occasion, in the affair of your freedom; however, did not come on till January last, when we carried it without much opposition; though I found some difficulty in persuading Quintus Fusius, and the rest of your friends, to whom you had written upon this subject, to believe me rather than your own letters.

* This alludes to an expression which Cicero had often occasion to employ in the affair of Catiline's conspiracy. As his principal intelligence arose from some of the conspirators themselves, who communicated to him, from time to time, the designs of their associates, he was obliged to concern himself in the discovery of these designs: and, therefore, in laying his allegations before the senate or the people, he was under the necessity of speaking only in general terms, and of assuring them that he had been informed of the particular articles he mentioned. But though the event proved that his information was correct, and in general, this method of accession was extremely odious, and of dangerous example. Cicero's enemies, therefore, did not fail to take advantage of this popular objection, and were perpetually repeating the phrase, I am informed, whenever they were disposed to reproach his conduct in this transaction.—See Mongault, rem. 19, on the 19th letter of the first book to Atticus; Plut. in Vit. Cic.; Salust; Declam. in Cic. 2.

* A report was of a very unfavourable kind indeed; for it charged Cicero with having a share in the money which Antonius raised by his exactions on the unhappy people of his province. The very judicious French translator of the epistles to Atticus, seems to imagine there was some foundation for this report; as in one of these letters, he quotes Cicero as having said that the amount of these exactions was so large that he had agreed to pay Cicero a certain sum in consideration of having relinquished to him the government of Macedonia: but this is a conjecture altogether unsupported by any evidence. Thence much, however, is certain; in the first place, that Cicero had some demands upon Antonius, of a nature which he did not choose should be known; and, whenever he hints at them to Atticus, it is always in a very dark and enigmatical manner: and, in the next place, that he sacrificed his own judgment and the good opinion of the world, in order to support Antonius in his present government. From which facts the reader is left to draw the conclusion that he shall judge reasonably.—Ad Att. xii. 15, 14. See the following remark.

* Pompey had declared his intentions of very strenuous measures against Antonius, and that he would withdraw him from the government, in order to give an account of his administration: which, it seems, had been extremely oppressive. It was upon this occasion that Cicero promised him his service: and it seems, by the following letters, that he kept his word. But as he had lost, his honour, perhaps, would not have been the more questionable for it appears, from a letter to Atticus, that Cicero could not undertake the defence of Antonius without suffering in the opinion, not only of the populace, but of every worthy man in Rome.—Ad Att. i. 12. See rem. on the following letter.

mend him to yours. I am well persuaded, indeed, that his own interest with you is his best advocate; however, if you desire any remaining affection for me, be not myetics to show it (and it is the most obliging manner in which you can show it) by your services to my friend. Farewell,

LETTER V.

To Publius Sestius, Quaestor.

I could scarce credit your freedman Decius, as highly as I think of his fidelity and attachment. A. c. 692. to your interest, when he requested me, in your name, to use my endeavours that you may not at present be excelled. Remembering, indeed, the very different strain in which all the letters I had before received from you were written, I could not easily be induced to think that you had so greatly altered your mind. But after Cornelia's visit to my wife, and the discourse which I had myself with Cornelia, I could no longer retain a doubt of the change in your inclinations: and accordingly I never failed to attend in your behalf, at every subsequent occasion, in the affair of your freedom; however, did not come on till January last, when we carried it without much opposition; though I found some difficulty in persuading Quintus Fusius, and the rest of your friends, to whom you had written upon this subject, to believe me rather than your own letters.

I had not agreed with Crassus for his house, when you wished me joy of the purchase; but I was as much encouraged by your congratulations, that I soon afterwards bought it at thirty-five hundred thousand sesterces. I am now, therefore, so

*Every proconsul, or governor of a province, had a quaestor under him, who acted as a sort of paymaster to the provincial forces, and as superintendent and likewise of the public revenues. Sestius was at this time exercising that office under Antonius, in Macedonia. Some account will be occasionally given of him in the progress of these remarks.

*One of the tribunes of the people.

* About 28,000l. Cicero, it is said, borrowed a large part of this sum from a man whose name he undertook to defend. But dissolution was not yet pro- voked, and Cicero was probably engaged in a proceeding dishonourable for an advocate, not only to receive reward, but even a loan of his client. Cicero, therefore, being publicly reproached with this transaction, most probably denied the charge; declaring at the same time that he had not the least intention of making such use of it. However, he soon afterwards completed his bargain, being taxed in the senate with this unworthy act, and endeavoured to laugh it off, by telling his enemies that "they must know very little of the world indeed, if they imagined any prudent man would use his fortune in Cicero's life-time. As every reader of taste and learning must well see the moral character of so invaluable an author as Cicero, one cannot but regret that neither with regard to truth, nor the plea of his ingenuity, it is ever seem sufficient to discredit this piece of testimony. That Cicero was capable of denying facts, where it was not for his advantage they should be discovered, will appear, perhaps, beyond controversy in the progress of these remarks. In the meantime a very strong instance of this may be produced from one of his letters to Atticus.
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

I one day have it in my power to make him a return to those generous services, which I shall ever most gratefully remember.

I am just going to embark, and purpose to pass through Macedonia, in my way to Cyzicus. And now, my Terentia, thus wretched and ruined as I am, can I entreat you, under all that weight of pain and sorrow with which, I too well know, you are oppressed, can I entreat you to be the partner and companion of my exile? B'tt must I then live without you? I know not how to reconcile myself to that hard condition; unless your presence at Rome may be a mean of forwarding my return, if any hopes of that kind should indeed subsist. But should there, as I sadly suspect, be absolutely none, come to me, I conjure you, if it be possible: for never can I think myself completely ruined, whilst I shall enjoy my Terentia's company. But how will my dearest daughter dispose of herself? A question which you yourselves must consider: for, as to my own part, I am utterly at a loss what to advise. At all events, however, that dear unhappy girl must not take any measures that may injure her conjugal repose, or affect her in the good opinion of the world. As for my son—let me not, at least, be deprived of the consolation of holding him for ever in my arms. But I must lay down my pen a few moments: my tears flow too fast to suffer me to proceed.

I am under the utmost solicitude, as I know not whether you have been able to preserve any part of your estate, or (what I sadly fear) are cruelly robbed of your whole fortune. I hope Piso will always continue, what you represent him to be, entirely yours. As to the manumission of the slaves, I think you have no occasion to be uneasy. For, with regard to your own, you only promised them their liberty as they should deserve it: but, excepting Orpheus, there are none of them that have any great claim to this favour. As to mine, I told them, if my estate should be forfeited, I would give them their freedom, provided I could obtain the confirmation of that grant: but, if I preserved my estate, that they should all of them, excepting only a few whom I particularly named, remain in their present condition. But this is a matter of little consequence.

With regard to the advice you give me of keeping up my spirits, in the belief that I shall again be restored to my country, I only wish that I may have reason to encourage so desirable an expectation. In the mean time, I am greatly miserable, in the uncertainty when I shall hear from you, or what hand you will find to convey your letters. I would have waited for them at this place, but the master of the ship on which I am going to embark, could not be prevailed upon to lose the present opportunity of sailing.

For the rest, let me conjure you, in my turn, to bear up under the pressure of our afflictions with as much resolution as possible. Remember that my days have all been honourable; and that I now suffer not for my crimes, but for my virtues. No, my Terentia, nothing can justly be imputed to me, but that I have suffered the loss of my dignities: However, if it were more agreeable to our children that I should thus live, let that reflection teach us to submit to our misfortunes with cheerfulness; insupportable as upon all other considerations they would undoubtedly be. But, alas! whilst I am endeavouring to keep up your spirits, I am utterly unable to preserve my own!

I have sent back the faithful Philetærus, as the weakness of his eyes made him incapable of rendering me any service. Nothing can equal the good offices I receive from Sallustius. Pescennius, likewise, has given me strong marks of his affection: and I hope he will not fail in his respect also to you. Sica promised to attend me in my exile, but he changed his mind, and has left me at this place.

I entreat you to take all possible care of your health, and be assured, your misfortunes more sensibly affect me than my own. Adieu, my Terentia, thou most faithful and best of wives! Adieu. And thou, my dearest daughter, together with that other consolation of my life, my dear son, I bid you both most tenderly farewell.

Brundisium, April the 30th.

LETTER VII.

To Terentia, to my dearest Tullia, and to my Son.

Imagine not, my Terentia, that I write longer letters to others than to yourself: I am, at least, if ever I do, it is merely because those I receive from them require a more particular answer. The truth of it is, I am always at a loss what to write; and, as there is nothing in the present dejection of my mind that I perform with greater reluctance in general, so I never attempt it with regard to you and my dearest daughter, that it does not cost me a flood of tears. For how can I think of you without being pierced with grief, in the reflection, that I have made those completely miserable whom I ought, and wished, to have rendered perfectly happy? And I should have rendered them so, if I had acted with less timidity.

Piso's behaviour towards us in this season of our afflictions, has greatly endeared him to my heart; and I have, as well as I was able in the present discomposure of my mind, both acknowledged his good offices and exhorted him to continue them. I perceive you depend much upon the new tribunes; and if Pompey perseveres in his present disposition, I am inclined to think that your hopes will not be disappointed; though I must confess I have some fears with respect to Crassus. In the meanwhile I have the satisfaction to find, what indeed I had reason to expect, that you act with great spirit and tenaciousness in all my concerns. But I lament it should be my cruel fate to expose you to so many calamities, whilst you are thus generously endeavouring to ease the weight of mine. Be assured it was with the utmost grief I read the account which Publius sent me, of the opprobrious manner in which you were dragged from the temple of Vesta to the office of Valerius.

4 Terentia had taken sanctuary in the temple of Vesta.

Tullia was at this time married to Cn. Piso Frugi; a young nobleman of one of the best families in Rome. See rem. on letter 9 of this book.

Cicero's son-in-law, mentioned in the last note.
Sad reserve indeed! that thou, the dearest object of my fondest desires, that my Terentia, to whom such numbers were wont to look up for relief, should be herself a spectacle of the most affecting distress! and that I, who have saved so many others from ruin, should have ruined both myself and my family by my own indiscretion!

As to what you mention with regard to the area belonging to my house, I shall never look upon myself as restored to my country, till that spot of ground is again in my possession. But this is a point that does not depend upon ourselves. Let me rather express my concern for what does, and lament that, distressed as your circumstances already are, you should engage yourself in a share of those expenses which are incurred upon my account. Be assured if ever I should return to Rome, I shall easily recover my estate: but should fortune continue to persecute me, will you, thou dear unhappy woman, will you fondly throw away, in gaining friends to a desperate cause, the last scanty remains of your broken fortunes! I conjure you then, my dearest Terentia, not to involve yourself in any charges of that kind: let them be borne by those who are able, if they are willing to support the weight. In a word, if you have any affection for me, let not your anxiety upon my account injure your health: which, alas! is already but too much impaired. Believe me you are the perpetual subject of my waking and sleeping thoughts: and as I know the assiduity you exert in my behalf, I have a thousand fears lest your strength should not be equal to so continued a fatigue. I am sensible at the same time that my affairs depend entirely upon your assistance: and therefore that they may be attended with the success you hope and so zealously endeavour to obtain, let me earnestly entreat you to take care of your health.

I know not whom to write to unless to those who first write to me, or whom you particularly mention in your letters. As you and Tullia are of opinion that I should not retreat farther from Italy, I have laid aside that design. Let me hear from you both as often as possible, particularly if there should be any fairer prospect of my return. Farewell, ye dearest objects of my most tender affection, Farewell! Thecassonias 1 Oct. the 5th.

LETTER VIII.

To Terentia, to my dearest Tullia, and to my Son.

I learn, by the letters of several of my friends as well as from general report, that you discover the greatest fortitude of mind, and that you solicit my affairs with unwearied application. Oh, my Terentia, how truly wretched am I to be the occasion of such severe misfortunes to so faithful, so generous, and so excellent a woman! And my dearest Tullia too!—That she who was once so happy in her father, should now derive from him such bitter sorrows! But how shall I express the anguish I feel for my little boy! who became acquainted with grief as soon as he was capable of any reflection. Had these afflictions happened, as you tenderly represent them, as the unavoidable fate, they would have sat less heavy on my heart. But they are altogether owing to my own folly in imagining I was loved where I was secretly enslaved, and in not joining with those who were sincerely desirous of my friendship. Had I been governed indeed by my own sentiments, without relying so much on those of my weak or wicked advisers, we might still, my Terentia, have been happy 2. However, since my friends encourage...

1 Cicero's son was at this time about eight years of age.—Manutius.

2 The persons to whom he alludes are, Hortensius, Arrius, and others of that party; who (if we may believe Cicero's complaints to Atticus) took advantage of his fears, and advised him to withdraw from Rome on purpose to ruin him. But persons under misfortunes are apt to be suspicious, and are frequently therefore unjust: as Cicero seems to have been with respect to Hortensius at least, who, in the preceding year, wrote an apology for him. —Ad Att. iii. 9, 14; Ad Quint. Frat. i. 3. See Mongault, remarks, vol. ii. p. 44.

—Cicero is perpetually reproaching himself in these letters to Terentia, and in those which he wrote at the same time to Atticus, for not having taken up arms and resolved upon a manly resistance. He had heard, it is true, of the contemplated violence of Clodius. He afterwards, however, in several of his speeches, made a merit of what he here so strongly condemns, and particularly in that for Sextius, he appeals to Heaven, in the most solemn manner, that he submitted to a voluntary exile in order to spare the blood of his fellow-citizens, and preserve the public tranquillity. "Te, te, patria, tutor, (says he) et vos penates patrissi Di, me vesterum, sedem templorumque causa, me propter salutem meorum civium, quae mibi semper fuit mens carius vita, diminutionem casuque etiam invidiosae fortunae meae, qui me moveret ad resolucionem, meae,atonin quod si resolvam se, mea olim in an fossa posita mentis, ad quod adhiberi, mea si quisque, si quisque mea, si quisque mea..." [Ad Att. iii. 15.] Dion Cassius asserts, that Cicero, notwithstanding this unexpected desertion of Pompey, was preparing to put himself in a posture of defence; but that Cato and Hortensius would not suffer him to execute his purpose: ορθολόγων μην υπάρχαι, καλοθείς δέ εἰς τον Κάνωνα καί τον Αρχιγράφον, σ. c. i. xxxviii. Perhaps this author may be mistaken as to his having actually made any formal preparations of this kind: but that he had it in his intentions seems clear beyond all reasonable contradiction. The French historian of our author's banishment has relied, therefore, too much upon Cicero's pompous professions after his return, when he maintains that nothing could be farther from his thoughts than a serious opposition. [Hist. de l'Exil de Cicé. p. 148.] The contrary appears most evidently to have been the case; and that the public measures which he so often assigns in this subsequent orations for leaving his country, was an after-thought, and the plausible colouring of artful eloquence. Why else, may he asked, is there not the least hint of any such generous principle of his conduct in all me to hope, I will endeavour to restrain my grief, lest the effect it may have upon my health should disappoint your tender efforts for my restoration. I am sensible, at the same time, of the many difficulties that must be conquered ere that point can be effected; and that it would have been much easier to have maintained my post than it is to remove it. Nevertheless, if all the tribunes are in my interest; if Lentulus is really as zealous in my cause as he appears; and if Pompey and Caesar likewise concur with him in the same views, I ought not, most certainly, to despair.

With regard to our slaves, I am willing to act as our friends, you tell me, advise. As to your concern in respect to the plague which broke out here, it is entirely ceased: and I had the good fortune to escape all infection. However, it was my desire to have changed my present situation for some more retired place in Epirus, where I might be secure from Piso and his soldiers

But the obliging Plancius was unwilling to part with me; and still indeed detains me here in the hope that we may return together to Rome. If ever I should live to see that happy day; if ever I should be restored to my Terentia, to my children, and to myself, I shall think all the tender solicitations we have suffered, during this sad separation, abundantly repaid.

behaviour towards every one of us: and I wish he may receive from it as much satisfaction, as I am persuaded he will honour. I was far from intending to blame you with respect to my brother: but it is much my desire, especially as there are so few of you, that you should live together in the most perfect harmony.—I have made my acknowledgments to the letters he wrote during this period: Why else is he perpetually reproaching his friends for having suffered him to take that measure? And why, in a word, does he call it, as in the passage above cited, turpissimum constitu, the effect of a most ignominious resolution? But were it to be admitted that he went to his country determined him to withdraw from it; still, however, he could not, with any degree of truth, boast of his patriotism upon that occasion; for the most partial of his advocates must acknowledge, that he no sooner executed this resolution, than he heartily repented of it. The truth is, he unwilling sever he might be to hazard the peace of his country in maintaining his post, he was ready to renounce all tenderness of that kind in recovering it; and he expressly desires Attius to raise the mob in his favour, if there were any hopes of making a successful push for his restoration:—"Oro ut si quae speis orit possis studiis honorum, anest policy, multitudine comparata, rem confici, des epanem ut uno impetu perfingatur."—Ad Att. III. 25.

Lucius Calpurnius Piso, who was consul this year with Galba; they were both the professed enemies of Cicero, and supported Clodius in his violent measures. The province of Macedonia had fallen to the former, and he was now preparing to set out for his government, where his troops were daily arriving. Cicero had delineated the caution which he thought necessary in several of his orations: but he has, in two words, given the most odious picture of them that exasperated eloquence, perhaps, ever drawn, where he calls them duo republica portantia ab providentia; an expression for which modern language can furnish no equivalent. De Prov. Consul.—See rem. on letter 17, book II, and rem. on letter 3, book VII.

Plancius was, at this time, quasator in Macedonia, and distinguished himself by many generous offices to Cicero in his exile.—Pro Flaco. passim. See rem. on letter 2, book VIII.

Cicero's son-in-law.
could have been more unworthy of my character, or more pregnant with misery, than the scheme I have pursued. It is from overreaching, therefore, not only with sorrow but with shame: yes, my Terentia, I blush to reflect that I did not exert that spirit I ought for the sake of so excellent a wife and such amiable children. The distress in which you are all equally involved, and your own ill state of health in particular, are ever in my thoughts; as I have the mortification, at the same time, to observe, that there appear but slender hopes of my being relieved. My troubles are many; while those who are jealous of me are almost innumerable: and though they found great difficulty in driving me from my country, it will be extremely easy for them to prevent my return. However, as long as you have any hopes that my restoration may be effected, I will not cease to co-operate with your endeavours for that purpose; lest my weakness should seem, upon all occasions, to frustrate every measure in my favour. In the meanwhile, my person (for which you are so tenderly concerned) is secure from all danger: as, in truth, I am so completely wretched, that even my enemies themselves must wish in mere malice to preserve my life. Nevertheless I shall not fail to observe the caution you kindly give me.

I have sent my acknowledgments by Decippos to the persons you desired me, and mentioned, at the same time, that you had informed me of their good offices. I am perfectly sensible of those which Piso exerts towards us with so uncommon a zeal: and indeed it is a circumstance which all the world speaks of to his honour. Heaven grant I may live to enjoy, with you and our children, the common happiness of so valuable a relation!

The only hope I have now left arises from the new tribunes; and that too depends upon the steps they shall take in the commencement of their office: for if they should postpone my affair, I shall give up all expectations of its ever being effected. Accordingly I have despatched Aristocrates, that you may send me immediate notice of the first measures they shall pursue, together with the general plan upon which they propose to conduct themselves. I have likewise ordered Decippos to return to me with all expedition, and have written the llevar that may best be written: and in particular the subsequent information in what manner affairs proceed. It is with a view of receiving the earliest intelligence from Rome, that I continue at Dyrrachium: a place where I can remain in perfect security, as I have, upon all occasions, distinguished this city by my particular patronage. However, as soon as I shall receive intimation that my enemies are approaching, it is my resolution to retire into Epirus.

In answer to your tender proposal of accompanying me in my exile, I rather choose you should continue in Rome; as I am sensible it is upon you that the principal bl turbine of my affairs must rest. If your generous negociations should succeed, my return will prevent the necessity of that journey: if otherwise—but I need not add the rest. The next letter I shall receive from you, or that your subsequent one, will determine me in what manner to act. In the meantime I desire you would give me a full and faithful information how things go on: though indeed I have now more reason to expect the final result of this affair than an account of its progress.

Take care of your health I conjure you; assuring yourself that you are, as you ever have been, the object of my fondest wishes. Farewell, my dear Terentia! I see you so strongly before me whilst I am writing, that I am utterly spent with the tears I have shed. Once more, farewell.

Dyrrachium, Nov. the 20th.

LETTER X.

To Quintus Metellus Nepos, the Consul.

The letters I received both from my brother and my friend Atticus, strongly encouraged me to hope that you were not discarding me: Atticus hopes your colleague to favour my recall. In consequence of this persuasion, I immediately wrote to you in terms suitable to my present unfortunate circumstances; acknowledging my grateful sense of your generous intentions, and entreat ing your future assistance. But I afterwards learned, not indeed so much by any hint of this kind from my friends, as from the report of those who passed this way, that you did not continue in the same favourable sentiments: for which reason I would

* See rem. on the preceding letter.
* He had the great misfortune to be disappointed of this wish: for Piso died soon after this letter was written. Cicero mentions him in several parts of his writings, with the highest gratitude and esteem. He represents him as a young nobleman of the greatest talents and application, who devoted his whole time to the improvement of his mind, and the exercise of eloquence: as one whose moral qualifications were no less extraordinary than his intellectual, and, in short, as possessed of every accomplishment and every virtue that could endear him to his friends, to his country, and to the public.—Pro Nexi. 31; De Clar. Orat. 571; Ad Quirites, 3.
* The troops of Piso. See rem. on the former letter.
* This great man, who had been the saviour of his country, who had feared, in the support of that cause, neither the insults of a desperate party, nor the daggers of assassins: when he came to suffer for the same cause, sunk under the weight. He distinguished that banishment which indulgent Providence meant to be the means of rendering his glory complete. Uncertain where he should go, or what he should do, he found himself as a woman, and forward as a child, he lamented the loss of his rank, of his riches, and of his splendid popularity. His eloquence served only to paint his misery in stronger colours. He wept over the ruins of his fine house, which Clodius had demolished; and his separation from Terentia, whom he repudiated not long afterwards, was, perhaps, an affliction to him at this time. Everything becomes intolerable to the man who is once subdued by grief. He regrets what he took so much pleasure in enjoying, and, overloaded already, he shrinks at the weight of a feather. Cicero's behaviour, in short, was such, that his friends, as well as his enemies, believed him to have lost his senses. Caesar beheld, with a secret satisfaction, the man, who had refused to bo his lieutenant, weeping under the rod of Clodius. Pompey hoped to find some excuse for his own ingratitude in the contempt which the friend, whom he had abandoned, exposed himself to. Nay, Atticus judged him too nearly attached to his former fortune, and reproached him for it. Atticus, even Atticus blushed for Tully, and the most pliable man alive assumed the style of Cato.—Bolingbroke, Reflections on Exile, p. 533.

not venture to importune you any farther. My brother, however, having transmitted me a copy of the speech you lately made in the senate, I found it animated with such a spirit of candour and moderation, that I was induced to write to you once more. Let me earnestly request you then to consider rather the interests than the passions of your family, lest, by falling in with their unjust and cruel opposition to me, you shall open a way by which they themselves may be oppressed in their turn.

Is it possible, indeed, that you, who gained such a glorious conquest over yourself, as to sacrifice your own private enmities to the welfare of the republic, should be prevailed upon to add strength to a resentment in others, which evidently tends to its destruction? If you think proper then to afford me your assistance in this conjuncture, you may, upon all occasions, depend on my utmost services in return. On the other hand, should that lawless violence, which has wounded the commonwealth through my side, be suffered still to prevail, it imports you to reflect, whether, if you should hereafter be inclined to recall the opportunity of preserving our general liberties, you will not have the misfortune of finding it much too late. Farewell.

LETTER XI.
To Fabius Gallus.

I have been attacked with a disorder in my bowels, which continued with great violence during ten days; but as it was not attended with a fever, I could not persuade those who had occasion for my services, that I was really indisposed. In order, therefore, to avoid their views to procure his restoration, Ciclius was opposing their designs by every method of artifice and violence in which he was protected by Metellus, notwithstanding he had given intimations of a disposition to favour Cicero's interest. — Life of Cicero, p. 108.

Clodius was elected to Metellus.—Post Red. in Sen. 10.

The first time the Lentulus took when he entered upon the administration of his office, was to move the senate that Cicero might be recalled. Upon which occasion, his colleague Metellus made the concession to which Cicero seems here to allude, declaring that he was willing to sacrifice his private resentment against Cicero to the general inclinations of the senate and the people. Nevertheless, he still continued to support Clodius, as has been already observed in the note above.—Pro Sext. 32; Post Red. in Sen. 4. See rem. v on letter 17, book II.

Notwithstanding that Pompey, Caesar, and indeed all the principal persons of the republic now concurred in favouring Cicero's return, yet the practices of Clodius prevented a decree for that purpose, till the first of June. Nor was it till the 4th of August following, that this decree passed into a general law: in consequence of which, Cicero soon afterwards made his triumphant entry into Rome. Metellus joined in procuring this decree; a change of sentiments which Cicero imputed to a most pathetic speech which Servilius Iauriculus delivered in the senate upon this occasion, and which so softened Metellus, it seems, that he melted into tears. But the true cause is more probably to be ascribed to the influence of Caesar and Pompey: who, in order to mortify Clodius, whose power now began to be troublesome to them, thought it convenient, for their purposes, that Cicero should be restored.—Pro Sext. 31. 62; Ad Quinirres, 7.

Gallus is only known by three or four letters which Cicero has addressed to him: from which, however, nothing particular can be collected concerning his history or character.

I importunities, I retired to Tusculanum; having observed so strict an abstinence for two days before, as not to have tasted even a drop of water. Reduced then, as I am, by my illness and my fasting, I had more reason to hope for a visit from you, than to imagine you expected one from me.

Distempers of every kind I greatly dread, but particularly of that sort for which the Stoics have cursed your favourite Epicurus, where he complains of being violently afflicted with the dysentery and the strangury; as the former, they assert, is the consequence of table indulgences, and the latter of a more shameful intemperance. I had, indeed, great reason to apprehend a dysentery; but whether it be from change of air, or a relaxation from business, or that the distemper had almost spent itself, I know not, but I am somewhat better since I came hither. You will wonder, perhaps, what excesses I have been guilty of, to bring upon myself this disorder. I must inform you then, that I owe it to the frugal regulations of the sumptuary law. The products of the earth being excepted out of the restrictions of that act; our elegant eaters, in order to bring vegetables into fashion, have found out a method of dressing them in so high a taste, that nothing can be more palatable. It was immediately after having eaten very freely of a dish of this sort, at the inauguration feast of Lentulus, that I was seized with a diarrhœa, which has never ceased till this day. Thua you see, that I, who have withstood all the temptations that the noisetest lampreys and oysters could throw in my way, have at last been overpowered by paltry beets and mallows: but it has taught me, however, to be more cautious for the future. As Anicius found me in one of my sick fits, you must undoubtedly have heard of my illness; I was in hopes, therefore, you would not have contented yourself with inquiring after my welfare, but would have given me the satisfaction of a visit. I purpose to continue here till I shall have re-established my health, for I am extremely weakened and enfeebled. But if I can once get the better of my disorder, I hope I shall find no difficulty in recovering all the rest. Farewell.

LETTER XII.
To Publius Lentulus, Proconsul.

I find it much easier to satisfy the world than myself, in those sacred offices of friendship I exert in your behalf. Numberless, indeed, are the obligations you have conferred upon me, and as you persevered with unwearied zeal till you were during his last sickness; a translation of which is given us by Cicero, in his treatise De Finibus, ii. 31.

Manutius conjectures, that the law alluded to is one which is ascribed by Aulus Gallus to Marcus Licinius Crassus, and which passed in the year of Rome 643. By this law the expenses of the table were regulated both in the public entertainments, and in the private, with an exception mentioned by Cicero in the next sentence, concerning the article of vegetables.—Aut. Gell. ii. 24.

He was son of Publius Cornelius Lentulus, one of the consuls of the present year, to whom the next letter and several of the following ones in this and the subsequent book are written. He gave this entertainment on occasion of his being chosen a member of the college of augurs.

Manutius.

Publius Lentulus was consul together with Quintus and had effected my recall from exile. I esteem it the greatest mortification of my life, that I cannot act in your affairs with the same success. The truth is, 'Ammonius, who resides here as ambassador from Ptolemy, defeats all my schemes by the most shameless and avowed bribery, and he is supplied with money for this purpose, from the same quarter as when you were in Rome. The party in the king's interest (though their name, it seems he owned, is inconsiderable) are alldevices that

Metellus Nepos, A. U. 696, the year before this letter was written. During his administration of that office, he distinguished himself by his zeal in promoting Cicero's recall from banishment; which, after many difficulties thrown in the way by Cædites, he at length effected. At the expiration of his consulship, he succeeded to the government of Cilicia, one of the most considerable provinces in Asia Minor, now called Armenia; and the following correspondence was carried on with him whilst he continued in that province. Cæsar had, upon many occasion, given him very signal instances of his friendship, particularly in gaining him an entrance into the pontifical college: in procuring him the province of Lower Spain, after he had passed through the office of proconsul by assisting him in obtaining the consulship. Yet these obligations were not so powerful in the sentiments of Lactancius, as to supersede those more important ones which he owed to his country. Accordingly he opposed the illegal and dangerous device of this secret war, which was carried on against his master, by the senate; and, upon the breaking out of the civil war, joined himself with Pompey. He steadily persevered in following the cause and the fortune of that unhappy chief, notwithstanding Cæsar generously gave him his life and his estates, as well as all his other personal property, hisbackwardness to his surrender of Corfinium. For it appears, by a letter in this collection, that he was afterwards at the battle of Pharsalia, from whence he fled with Pompey to Rhodes, and this is the farthest we can trace him. He is mentioned by Cicero among the celebrated statesmen of his age; though his merit of this kind was, it seems, more owing to his acquired than his natural talents.—Cass. De Bell. Civ. i.; Plut. in Vit. Jul. Cass.; Clc. Rsp. Fam. xii. 14; Clc. De Opt. Gen. Die. 1. King of Egypt, and father of the celebrated Cleopatra. He was a great admirer of the arts, and was very fond of music. He is supposed to have been the inventor of the Autolute, a musical instrument, which was called by the Greeks Aulos. The title of this prince to his throne being precarious, he found means, by the interest of Cæsar and Pompey, to be declared an ally of the Roman republic, about two years before the date of this letter, for which piece of service they were to receive no less a reward than one million one hundred sixty-two thousand five hundred pounds. The heavy taxes Ptolemy was obliged to impose in order to raise this immense tribute, together with other acts of tyranny and oppression, occasioned such a general discontent among his people, that they took up arms and drove him out of Egypt. In this exigency he had recourse to the republic, in virtue of the alliance just mentioned. His subjects likewise sent an embassy to Rome, composed of an hundred of their principal citizens, to plead their cause before the senate; but Ptolemy having notice of this deputation, procured part of them to be assassinated on their way hither; others were seized as they arrived; and the rest he silenced by proper applications for indemnity, and their tax was remitted. This, together with his immense and open profusions among the venal part of the republic, rendered him generally detested at Rome; insomuch that notwithstanding he was zealously supported by Pompey, who actually obtained a decree in his favour, yet the objection was so strong, that the senate, after various debates, thought proper to let the affair wholly drop. His last resource, therefore, was to apply himself to Gaius, proconsul of Syria. Accordingly, Gaius, upon the promise of 10,000 talents, and at the recommendation of Pompey, boldly undertook, and effected his restoration, without being authorised by any legal commission for that purpose.—Dio, xxxix.; Liv. Epit. 195; Clc. Orat. in Pison. See Rem. 4, p. 583. Pompey may be employed to reinstate him in his dominions. The senate, on the other hand, fell in with the pretended oracle, not, indeed, as giving any credit to its predictions, but as being in general ill-inclined to this prince, and detesting his most corrupt practices. In the meanwhile, he omit no opportunity of bringing his interests in Ptolemy, with great freedom and adorning him not to act such a part in this affair, as would cast the deepest stain upon his character. I must do him the justice, at the same time, to acknowledge, that so far as his own conduct is concerned, there does not appear the least foundation for any remonstrances of this sort. On the contrary, he is perpetually expressing the highest zeal for your interest: and he lately supported it in the senate, with the utmost form of eloquence, and the strongest professions of friendship. Marcellinus, I need not tell you, is a good deal displeased at your soliciting this commission; in all other respects, I dare venture to say he will very strenuously promote your interest. We must be content to take him in his own way, for I per ceive it is impossible to dissuade him from proposing that the injunctions of the oracle shall be complied with. And, in fact, he has already made several motions on this subject. I wrote this early on the 13th, and I will now give you an account of what has hitherto passed in the senate. Both Hortensius and Lucullus agreed with me in moving, that the prohibition of the oracle should be obeyed; and, indeed, it does not seem possible to bring this matter to bear upon any other terms. But we proposed, at the same time, that in pursuance of the decree which was

1 Caius Cato, a relation of the celebrated M. Porcius Cato, who killed himself at Utica, was in the number of those who most strenuously opposed the restoration of Ptolemy. He was a young man of a turbulent and enterprising disposition, which he supported with some degree of eloquence. This, at least, is the character which Fenestella gives of him, as that annalist is cited by Nonius; but if he was never engaged in an opposition less reasonable than the present, history has not done him justice. Among other expeditious which he employed to obstruct the designs of those who favoured Ptolemy, he had recourse to a prophecy which he contrived to have found in the Sybilian books, and which contained a severe denunciation against the state, if the Romans assisted a king of Egypt with their troops in recovering his throne. This had, in some measure, the desired effect; for the senate (which in general was in the same sentiments, as to this point, with Cato) voted it dangerous to the interests of the republic, to employ any force in favour of Ptolemy. The Sibyls were certain supposed prophetesses, concerning whom there is a great variety of opinions, historians being by no means agreed as to their number, their country, or the age in which they lived. Those who are inclined to read a very ridiculous story, may find an account in Aulus Gellius, of the manner by which the Romans are said to have possessed themselves of these oracular writings. Three pieces were carefully deposited in the Capitol, and consulted upon certain extraordinary occasions. There are some ancient writings still extant which pass under the name of the Sibylline oracles; but these oracles seem to have been all, from first to last, and without any exception, mere inventions. Fest. P. L.; 1. Est. R.; 1. Jul. Gell. l. 19; Jortin, Remarks on Eccles. Hist. p. 294. 1 One of the present consuls. 2 Before Lentulus sat out for his government, the senate had come to a resolution of assisting Ptolemy with a body of troops; and (as has already been observed) a decree had actually passed for that purpose. It was voted at the same time that the consul, whose lot it should prove to administrate the province of Cilicia, should be charged with this made on your own motion, you should be appointed to re-establish Ptolemy in his kingdom; the situation of your province lying so conveniently for that purpose. In a word, we consented that the army should be given up, in deference to the oracle; but insisted, nevertheless, that you should be employed in effecting this restoration. Cassius, on the other side, was for having this commission executed by three persons to be chosen from the more inclined general, and consequently he did not mean to exclude Pompey. Marcus Bibulus joined with him as to the number, but thought that the persons to be nominated should not bear any military command. All the rest of the consuls were in the same sentiments, except Servilius, Afranius, and Volcatius. The first absolutely opposed our engaging in Ptolemy's restoration upon any terms whatsoever: but the two last were of opinion, that agreeably to the motion of Lupus, this commission should be given to Pompey. This circumstance has increased the suspicion concerning the real inclinations of the latter, as his most particular friends were observed to concur with Volcatius. They are labouring this point with great assiduity, and I fear it will be carried against us. Libo and Hypsaeus are openly soliciting for Pompey; and, in truth, the conduct of all his friends at this juncture makes it generally believed that he is desirous of the office. Yet the misfortune is, that those who are unwilling it should fall into his hands, are not the more inclined to place it in yours, as they are much displeased at your having contributed to the late advancement of his power. For myself, I find I have the less influence in your cause, as it is supposed that I am solely governed by a principle of gratitude; at the same time, the notion which prevails that this affair affords an opportunity of obliterating Pompey, renders my applications likewise not altogether so effectual as they might otherwise prove. It is thus I am labouring in this perplexed business, which the king himself, long before you left Rome, as well as the friends and dependants of Pompey, had artfully embarrassed. To this I must add the avowed opposition of those who represent our assisting Ptolemy with an army, as a measure that would highly reflect upon the dignity of the senate. Be assured, however, I shall employ every means in my power of testifying both to the world in general, and to your friends in particular, the sincerity of that affection I bear you. And, were there any honour in those who ought to have shown themselves influenced by its highest and most refined principles, I should not have so many difficulties to encounter. Farewell.

To Quintus Valerius Orca.
You remember, I doubt not, that when I attended you on your way towards your province, I took occasion, in the presence of Publius Cuspius, to desire you would consider every friend of his whom I should recommend to you, as in the number of my own; and that I afterwards repeated this request in the strongest manner. You then assured me, with great generosity and politeness, and agreeably to that affectionate regard with which you have ever distinguished me, that you would comply with my request. I am to inform you, then, that Cuspius, having been twice in Africa during the time that he had the direction of the affairs of the company which farms the revenues of that province, contracted some acquaintance in that part of the world whom he greatly loves: and, as no man is more zealous to serve his friends, he very warmly espouses their interest. I am always ready to assist him for that purpose, to the utmost of my credit and influence: which I mention as a reason for my recommending his African friends in general to your protection. For the future, therefore, I shall only acquaint you that the person in whose behalf I may happen to write, is a friend of Cuspius; and then add the distinguishing mark we agreed upon. But my present recommendation is of the strongest kind: as it is in compliance with the most earnest desire of Cuspius, that I entreat your good offices to Lucius Julius. If I were to request them in the terms that are usually employed in the sincerest solicitations of this nature, I should scarcely satisfy, I believe, the zeal of my friend. He requires something more new and singular in the manner of my present address, and imagines I am master of a certain art that renders me extremely well qualified for the task. I promised, therefore, a He had been praetor the year before, and very instrumental in procuring Cicero's recall from exile. At the expiration of his praetorship, he obtained the government of Africa; and this letter seems to have been written to him soon after his arrival in that province.—Pliny. Annal. H. 384.

b To distinguish those recommendations which were written merely in compliance with solicitations he could not refuse, from others that were the sincere expression of his heart.
to recommend his friends to you, by all the most skilful and insinuating methods of persuasion. But as I find myself incapable of executing this promise, I can only entreat you to give him reason to imagine, that I am writing wonderfully efficacious letters. Now this he will certainly suppose if you exercise towards Julius every generous act that your politeness and your station enable you to confer; not only by distant services, but by your personal notice and distinction; for you cannot imagine, as you have not been long enough in your post to know it by your own observation, how great an advantage it is to a man to have the countenance of the governor of his province. I am persuaded that Julius well deserves every mark of your friendship upon his own account; not only because Cuspius has assured me that he does, (which of itself, indeed, would be a very sufficient reason for my thinking so) but because I know the great judgment of the latter in the choice of his friends.

Time will soon discover the effects which this letter shall produce; and they will be such, I confidently trust, as to demand my acknowledgments. In the mean while, you may depend upon my best services here, in every instance wherein I shall imagine you would desire them. Farewell.

P.S.—Publius Cornelius, the bearer of this letter, is one whom I likewise recommend to you at the request of Cuspius; and how much I am bound, both by inclination and gratitude to do everything for his sake that is in my power, is a circumstance of which I have already sufficiently informed you. Let me entreat you, therefore, that he may very soon and very frequently have the strongest reasons to thank me for this my recommendation of his friend. Farewell.

LEtTER XIV.

To Publius Lentulus, Proconsul.

The senate met on the 13th of January, but came to no resolution; the greatest part of that day having been spent in some warm contests which arose between Marcellinus, the consul, and Caius, one of the tribunes of the people. I had myself also a very considerable share in the debates; and I represented the zeal you have always shown towards the senate in terms that influenced them, I am persuaded, much to your advantage. The next day, therefore, we thought it sufficient briefly to deliver our opinions; as I perceived, not only by the favourable manner in which I was heard the day before, but also by inquiring into the sentiments of each particular member, that the majority was clearly on our side. The business of the day opened with reporting to the house the several opinions of Bibulus, Hortensius, and Volcatius. The respective questions therefore were, in the first place, whether three commissioners should be nominated for restoring the king, agreeably to the sentiments of Bibulus; in the next, whether, according to those of Hortensius, the office should be conferred upon you, but without employing any forces; or, lastly, whether, in conformity to the advice of Volcatius, this honour should be assigned to Pompey. The points being thus stated, it was moved that the opinion of Bibulus might be referred to the consideration of the house in two separate questions. Accordingly, as it was now in vain to oppose his motion, so far as it related to paying obedience to the declaration of the oracle, the senate in general came into his sentiments; but as to his proposal of deputing three commissioners, it was rejected by a very considerable majority. The opinion next in order was that of Hortensius: but when we were going to divide upon it, Lupus, a tribune of the people, insisted that, in virtue of his office, he was entitled to speak prior to the consuls, and therefore demanded that the voices should be first taken upon the motion he had made in favour of Pompey. This claim was generally and strongly opposed; as, indeed, it was both unprecedented and unreasonable. The consuls themselves, however, did not greatly contest that point, nor did they absolutely give it up: their view was to protract the debates, and they succeeded accordingly. They perceived, indeed, that notwithstanding the majority affected to appear on the side of Volcatius, yet, upon a division, they would certainly vote with Hortensius. Nevertheless, several of the members were called upon to deliver their opinions, though, in truth, much against the inclinations of the consuls, who were desirous that the sentiments of Bibulus should prevail. These debates continuing till night, the senate broke up without coming to any resolution. I happened to pass the same evening with Pompey; and as I found that day affected his cause in the senate with more than ordinary success, I thought it afforded me the most favourable opportunity of speaking to him in your behalf. And what I said seemed to make so strong an impression, that I am persuaded I have brought him wholly over to your interest. To say the truth, whenever I hear him mention this affair himself, I entirely acquit him of being secretly desirous of this commission. On the other hand, when I observe the conduct of his friends of every rank, I am well convinced (and indeed it is now evident likewise to the whole world) that they have been gained by the corrupt measures which a certain party, with the consent of Ptolemy and his advisers, have employed. I write this before sunrise on the 16th of January, and the senate is to meet again on this very day. I hope to preserve my authority in that assembly, as far at least as is possible amidst such general treachery and corruption which has discovered itself upon this occasion. As to what concerns the bringing this matter before the people, I think we have taken such precautions as will render it impracticable, unless by actual violence, or in direct and open contempt both of our civil and religious institutions. For this purpose, a very severe order of the senate (which I imagine

q When an opinion was proposed to the senate which was thought too general, and to include several distinct articles, it was usual to require that each part might be pronounced and voted separately. Thus Bibulus moved, that they might submit to the Sibyline oracle, and appoint three private senators to restore the king. But the house required that they might vote separately upon these two questions; and the event was, they unanimously agreed to the former, but rejected the latter. — Ross, Remarks on Cic. Famili. Epist. vol. i. p. 348.

r When an act passed the senate in a full house, held according to the prescribed forms, and without any opposition from the tribunes, (who had the privilege of putting was immediately transmitted to you) was entered yesterday in our journals, notwithstanding the tribunes, Cato, and Caninius, interposed their negatives.

You may depend upon my sending you a faithful account of every other occurrence which may arise in this affair: and be assured I shall exert the utmost of my vigilance and my credit to conduct it in the most advantageous manner for your interest. Farewell.

LETTER XV.
To the same.

Aulus Trebonius, who is an old and intimate friend of mine, has some important affairs in your province, which require immediate despatch. His own illustrious character, together with the recommendations of myself and others, have, upon former occasions of this kind, obtained for him the indulgence of your predecessors. He is strongly persuaded, therefore, from that affection and those mutual good offices which subsist between you and me, that this letter will not prove a less effectual solicitor in his behalf: and let me earnestly entreat you not to disappoint him in this his expectation. Accordingly I recommend his servants, his freedmen, his agents, and in short his concerns of every kind, to your patronage: but particularly I beg you would confirm the decree which Titus Ampinis passed in his favour. In one word, I hope you will take all opportunities of convincing him that you do not consider this recommendation as a matter of common and unmeaning form. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.
To the same.

When the senate met on the 16th of this month, your affair stood in a very advantageous postime. We had succeeded the day before against the motion of Bibulus for appointing three commissioners, and had now only to contend with Volcatius; when our adversaries prevented the question from being put, by artfully protracting the debates. For they saw we had, in a very full house, and amidst great variety of opinions, carried our point, to the considerable mortification of those who were for taking the king’s affairs out of your direction, and transferring them to another hand. Curio opposed us upon this occasion with extreme warmth, while Bibulus spoke with more temper, and indeed seemed almost inclined toavour our cause. But Cato and Caninius absolutely refused to suffer any decree to pass till a general assembly of the people should be convened.

By the Papian law, as you well know, there cannot be another meeting of the senate till the first of February; nor, indeed, throughout that whole month, unless all the foreign ambassadors should have received, or be refused, audience. In the mean while, a notion prevails among the people, that your adversaries have insisted upon this pretended oracle, not so much with an intent of obstructing your particular views, as in order to disappoint the hopes of those who may be desirous of this expedition to Alexandria merely from the ambition of commanding an army. The whole world is sensible, indeed, of the regard which the senate has shown to your character: and it is notoriously owing to the artifices of your enemies, that the house did not divide upon the question proposed in your favour. But should the same persons, under a pretended zeal for the public, (though, in fact, from the most infamous motives,) attempt to bring this affair before a general assembly of the people, we have concerted our measures so well, that they cannot possibly effect their designs without having recourse to violence, or at least without setting the ordinances of our country, both civil and religious, at avowed defiance. But I will neither extenuately display my own endeavours to assist you in this conjuncture, nor dwell upon the unworthy treatment you have received from others. What merit, indeed, can I then claim to myself, who could not acquit half the obligations I owe you, were I even to sacrifice my life to your service? On the other hand, what avails it to disquiet my mind with complaining of those injuries which I cannot reflect upon without the deepest concern? I will therefore only add, if methods of violence should be employed, I cannot pretend, in this general contempt of all legal authority, to answer for the event. In every other respect, I will venture to assure you that both the senate and the people will pay the highest attention to your dignity and character. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.
To the same.

There is nothing I more ardently wish than to convince both yourself and the world with how much gratitude I retain the remembrance of your services. I cannot, however, but extremely regret that your affairs should have taken such a turn since your absence, as to give you occasion of trying the affection and fidelity of your friends. You are sensible, as I perceive by your last letter, that you have been treated with the same insincerity by those who ought to have concurred in supporting your dignities, as I formerly intended.

I was at no very difficult matter for the contending parties in the republic, when they were disposed to obstruct the designs of an opposite faction, to find an expedient for that purpose. One cannot but wonder, indeed, that any public business could be carried on, when nothing more was necessary to embarrass the proceedings, than to procure some tribune to interpose his negative, or any magistrate to observe the heemona. This latter was a species of divination practised among the Romans, in order to determine whether any schemes under deliberation would be prejudicial or advantageous to the state. It consisted in remarking certain appearances in the heavens, or particular modes in the voice or flight of birds, which were supposed intimations of good or ill success. While this ceremony was performing, no assembly of the people could be legally held, nor any act pass into a law. To both these methods, it is probable, Cicero here alludes.
experienced from some of my pretended friends in the affair of my banishment. Thus, whilst I was exerting the utmost efforts of my vigilance, my policy, and my interest, in order to serve you in the circle relating to Ptolemy, I was unexpectedly alarmed in a point of much more important concern, by the infamous law which Cato has lately proposed to your prejudice. Where affairs are thus embroiled, everything is undoubtedly to be feared; yet my principal apprehension, I confess, arises from the treachery of your false friends. But however that may be, I am earnestly endeavouring to counteract the malevolent designs of Cato.

As to the Alexandrian commission, both yourself and your friends will, I trust, have abundant reason to be satisfied with my conduct. But at the same time I must say, I greatly fear it will either be taken out of your hands, or entirely dropped; and I know not which of these alternatives I should least choose. However, we have another expedient in reserve, which (should we be driven to it) neither Selcius nor myself disapprove. By this scheme we shall, on the one hand, prevent the senate from refusing to assist Ptolemy, and, on the other, remove all appearance of our being disappointed, if that person should be employed, who, it is more than probable, will now obtain this commission. To be short, I shall take such precautions that, should our designs fail, you may not seem to have suffered the disgrace of a repulse; yet, at the same time, I shall remit nothing of my best efforts to support your claim so long as there shall be the least prospect of success. But which ever way this point may finally be determined, it will be agreeable to those wise and elevated sentiments you possess, to consider the true glory of your character as resulting entirely from the dignity of your actions and the virtues of your heart. And should the perfidiosity of a certain party deprive you of some of those honours which fortune has conferred upon you, be assured it will cast a much darker shade on their characters than on yours. In the meanwhile, your affairs are the constant subject of my thoughts; and I neglect no opportunity of acting in them for your best advantage. I concert all my measures for this purpose with Selcius; as indeed I know not any one of your friends who has a greater share of good sense, or a more affectionate zeal for your service. Farewell.

LETTER XVIII.

To the same.

You are informed, I imagine, by many hands, of what passes here: I will leave it therefore to your other friends to supply you with an account of our transactions, and content myself with only sending you my conjectures. To this end I must previously acquaint you, that, on the 6th of February, Pompey made a speech in a general assembly of the people in favour of Miletus;

w Caius Cato, in order to cut off all hopes at once from Lontuius of being employed in this contested commission, proposed a law to the people for recalling him from his government.—Ad Quint. Frat. 1. 3.

x The two former letters are blended together in the common editions, but they are here separated upon the authority of Manuthius and Gramovius.

during which he was insulted with much clamour and abuse. Cato afterwards inveighed in the senate against Pompey with great acrimony, and was heard with the most profound silence and attention; both which circumstances seem to have affected him very sensibly. Now from hence I surmise, that he has entirely laid aside all thoughts of being employed in the Alexandrian expedition. That affair remains as yet entirely open to us; for the senate has hitherto determined nothing to your prejudice but what they are obliged, in deference to the oracle, to refuse to every other candidate for this office. It is my present hope, therefore, as well as endeavour, that the king may throw himself into your hands, when he shall find that he cannot, as he expected, be restored by Pompey; and that unless he is replaced upon his throne by your assistance, his affair will be entirely dropped. And this step he will undoubtedly take, if Pompey should give the least intimation of its being agreeable to him. But I need not tell you of the difficulty of discovering the sentiments of a man of his reserve. However, I shall omit no method in my power to effect this scheme, as I shall easily, I trust, be able to prevent the injurious designs of Cato.

I do not find that any of the consuls are in your interest, except Hortensius and Lucullus: all the rest of that rank either openly, or in a more concealed manner, oppose your views. Nevertheless, my friend, be not discouraged; on the contrary, let it be still your hope, notwithstanding the attempts of the worthless Cato, that you will again shine out in all your former lustre.

Farewell.

LETTER XIX.

To the same.

You will receive a full account from Pollio of all that has been transacted in your affair; as he was not only present, but a principal manager. Believe me, I am much concerned at the unfavourable aspect of this business. However, it affords me a very sensible consolation that there is strong reason to hope the prudence of your friends will be able to elude the force of those iniquitous schemes which have been projected to your prejudice. Even time itself will, probably, contribute to this end; as it often wears out the malevolence of those who, either professedly, or in a disguised manner, mean one ill. I am yet farther confirmed in these pleasing hopes, whenever I reflect upon the faction that was formerly raised against myself; of which I see a very lively image in the present opposition to you. In the latter instance, indeed, the attack is by no means so extensive, or so dangerous, as that which was made upon me: nevertheless, there is, in general, a strong similitude between the two cases: and you must pardon me, if I cannot fear, upon your account, what you never thought reasonable to be apprehensive of on mine. But whatever may be the event, convince the world that you are influenced by those principles for which I have admired you from your earliest youth: and believe me, my friend, the malice of your enemies will only serve to render your character so much the more illustrious. In the mean time, do me the justice to hope, from my affection, whatever the warmest friendship can effect; and he assured, I shall not disappoint your expectations. Farewell.

LETTER XX.

To Lucius Lucceius.

I have frequently had it in my intentions to talk with you upon the subject of this letter; but a certain awkward modesty has always restrained me from proposing in person, what I can, with less scruple, request at this distance; for a letter, you know, spares the confusion of a blurt. I will own, then, that I have a very strong, and, I trust, a very pardonable passion of being celebrated in your writings; and though you have more than once given me assurance of your intention that I remain, yet, I hope you will excuse my impatience of seeing your design executed. I had always, indeed, conceived a high expectation of your performances in this kind; but the specimen I have lately seen of them, is so far superior to all I had figured in my imagination, that I have fired me with the most ardent desire of being immediately distinguished in your glorious annals. It is my ambition, I confess, not only to live for ever in the praises of future ages, but to have the present satisfaction, likewise, of seeing myself stand approved in the authoritative records of my ingenious friend. I am sensible, at the same time, that your thoughts are already deeply engaged in the prosecution of your original design. But, as I perceive you have almost completed your account of the Italic and Marian civil wars, and remember you proposed to carry on the remainder of our history in a regular series, I cannot forbear recommending it to your consideration, whether it would be best to weave the relation of Catullus's death into the general texture of your performance, or cast it into a distinct work. It is certain, several of the Greek historians will justify you in this latter method. Thus Callisthenes wrote a narrative of the siege of Troy, as both Timaeus and Polybius did of the Pyrrhic and Numantine wars, in so many detached pieces from their larger histories. As to the honour that will arise to me, it will be much the same, I must own, upon whichever scheme you may determine; but I shall receive so much the earlier gratification of my wishes, if, instead of waiting till you regularly advance to that period of our annals, you should enter upon it by this method of anticipation. Besides, by keeping your mind attentive to one principal scene and character, you will treat your subject, I am persuaded, so much the more in detail, as well as embellish it with higher grace. I must acknowledge, it is not extremely modest to imposition a task upon you which your occupations can well justify you in refusing; and then to add a further request that the many actions with your applause: an honour, after all, which you may not think perhaps they greatly deserve. However, when a man has once transgressed the bounds of decency, it is in vain to recede; and his wisest way is to push on boldly in the same confident course, to the end of his purpose. I will venture, then, earnestly to entreat you not to confine yourself to the strict laws of history, but to give a greater latitude to your encomiums than, possibly, you may think, my actions can claim. I remember, indeed, you declare, in one of your very elegant prefaces, that you are as inexpressible to all the pleas of affection as Xenophon represents Hercules to have been to those of pleasure. Let me hope, nevertheless, if friendship should too strongly recommend my a It is very little that is known of Lucceius, more than what the following letter informs. Cicero, in one of his orations, speaks of his moral character with the highest applause, representing him as a man of the greatest humanity, and of the most unblemished honour. All that has been transmitted down to us of his public transactions is, that he was joint candidate with Caesar in soliciting the consulship, in opposition to Bibulus: in which, however, he did not succeed. Civil civil wars broke out, he took part with Pompey, if not actively, at least by his good wishes and advice: for it appears, by a passage in Caesar's Commentaries, that the former was wholly guided by his counsels. It is unnecessary to mention the high reputation he had gained by his literary abilities, as this part of his character will be sufficiently laid open to the reader in the present letter.—Orat. pro Callo; Sust. in Vit. Jul. Cas. 19; Cas. De Bell. Civ. ii.

b The Italic war, which broke out an. Urb. 653, owed its rise to a rejected claim of the Italian provinces to be admitted into the freedom of the city. It employed the arms of the republic for more than two years, and occasioned greater bloodshed and devastation than those wars in which she had been engaged with Hannibal and Pyrrhus. Towards the close of it, Cicero, who was at that time about eighteen years of age, served as a volunteer under the father of Pompey the Great. [Flor. iii. 18; Phillip. xii.]. The Marian civil war immediately succeeded the Italic, and was occasioned by the intractable ambition of Marius. This haughty Roman, envying Sylla the honour of leading the army of the republic against Mithridates, to which he had been appointed by the senate, procured a law for divesting him of that command, and transferring it into his own hands. This war was carried on between the two contending parties and their adherents with various success, and the most unparalleled cruelty on both sides, till it terminated in the perpetual dictatorship of Sylla.—Flor. iii. 21; Plut. in Vit. Mar. et Syll.

c The story to which Cicero here alludes is this: Hercules, when he was yet a youth, as Proclus relates the tale, reduced to slavery, returned, after a few years' absence, to determine, with himself, what course of life he should pursue. Whilst he was in the midst of his contemplations, Pleasure and Virtue appeared to him under the figures of two beautiful women, and each accosted him in her turn. He heard their respective pleas with great attention; but Virtue gained her cause, and entirely won the heart of the future hero. If the English reader is disposed to know this story in all its circumstances, he will find it wrought up actions to your approbation, you will not reject her generous partiality; but give somewhat more to affection than rigorous truth perhaps can justly demand.

If I should prevail upon you to fall in with my proposal, you will find the subject, I persuade myself, not unworthy of your genius and your eloquence. [The entire period from the rise of Catiline's conspiracy to my return from banishment, will furnish, I should imagine, a moderate volume. It will supply you likewise with a noble occasion of displaying your judgment in politics, by laying open the source of those civil disorders, and pointing out their proper remedies, as well as by giving your reasons for approving or condemning the several transactions which you relate.

And should you be disposed to indulge your usual spirit of freedom, you will have an opportunity of pointing out, at the same time, with all the severity of your indignation, the treachery and perfidiousness of those who laid their ungenerous snare for my destruction. I will add, too, that this period of my life will furnish you with numberless incidents, and many reasons to draw from it a very agreeable manner: as nothing is more amusing to the mind than to contemplate the various vicissitudes of fortune. And though they were far, it is true, from being acceptable in experience, they cannot fail of giving me much entertainment in description: as there is an inexpressible satisfaction in reflecting, at one's ease, on distresses we have formerly suffered. There is something likewise in that composition, which arises from reading an account of the misfortunes which have attended others, that casts a most agreeable melancholy upon the mind. Who can persuade the relation of the last moment of Epaminondas at the battle of Mantinea, without finding himself touched with a pleasing commiseration? That glorious chief, you may remember, would not suffer the dart to be drawn out of his side till he was informed that his shield was safe from the hands of his enemies; and all his concern amid the anguish of his wound was, to die with glory. What can be more interesting, also, than the account of the flight and death of Themistocles! The truth of it is, a mere narrative of general facts affords little more entertainment to the reader than he might find in a very beautiful poem by the Rev. Mr. Lowth, and inserted in Polydectis, p. 135.

Epaminondas headed the forces of the Thessalians in a battle which they fought with the Lacademonians at Mantinea, a town in Arcadia. The Thessalians gained the victory, but lost their invaluable commander: whose death was attended with the circumstances which Cicero here mentions.—Justin, vii. 7, 5.

Thucydides, having distinguished himself among his countrymen, the Athenians, by his military virtues, particularly in the wars in which they were engaged with Xerxes, had rendered himself so popular, that it was thought necessary to remove him: and accordingly he was obliged to withdraw from Athens. As the historians mention nothing of his return, Mansius proposes an emigration, suggested to him by one of his friends, who imagined, that instead of reditu se should be read interitu. This would agree very well with the account which is given of his death: for having been received in his exile by Artaxerxes, he was appointed to command a body of forces in an expedition which that prince was preparing against the Grecians. But Themistocles, rather than turn his arms against his country, chose to put an end to his life by a draught of poison.—Plut. in Vit. Themistocles.

perusing one of our public registers. Whereas, in the history of any extraordinary person, our fear and hope, our joy and sorrow, our astonishment and expectation, are each of them engaged by turns. And as a result of all this, he can conclude with some remarkable catastrophe, the mind of the reader is filled with the highest possible gratification. For these reasons I am the more desirous of persuading you to separate my story from the general thread of your narration, and work it up into a detached performance; as, indeed, it will exhibit a great variety of the most interesting and affecting scenes.

When will you it is my ambition to be celebrated by your pen, I am by no means apprehensive you will suspect me of flattery. The consciousness of your merit must always incline you to believe, it is envy alone that can be silent in your praise: as, on the other side, you cannot imagine me so weak as to desire to be transmitted to posterity by any hand, which could not secure to itself the same glory it bestowed. When Alexander chose to have his picture drawn by Apelles, and his statue formed by Lysippus, it was not in order to ingrate himself with those distinguished artists: it was from a firm persuasion that the works of these admired geniuses would do equal credit both to his reputation and their own. The utmost, however, that their art could perform, was to perpetuate the persons only of their celebrated contemporaries: but merit needs not any such visible exhibitions to immortalise its fame. Accordingly, the Spartan statues, even of such a picture or statue of him to be taken, is not less universally known than those who have been most fond of having their persons copied out for posterity. The single treatise which Xenophon has written in praise of that renowned general, is more to his glory than all the pictures and statues of all the artists in the universe. It would be a much higher satisfaction to me, therefore, as it would be a far greater honour, to be recorded by your hand than of that of any other; not only because your

These registers, in the later ages of the republic, were much enlarged, and contained a sort of journal of the most memorable events, both civil and religious, that happened in every year.—Liv. i. 19, 30; Dissert. sur les Fastes par Conduire, dans les Mem. de l'Acad. de B. 4 Agasias, king of Sparta, was one of the most considerable persons of his age, both for civil and military virtues; inasmuch that he justly acquired the appellation of Agasias the Great. But though nature had been magnificently liberal to him in the nobler endowments of the mind, she had treated him very unfavourably in those of the body. He was remarkably low of stature, had one leg shorter than the other, and so very despicable a countenance, that he never failed of raising contempt in those who were unacquainted with his more intellectual excellences. It is no wonder, therefore, that he was unwilling to be delivered down to posterity, under the disadvantages of so unpromising a figure.—Plut. in Vit. Agasile. Corn. Nep. in Vit. Agasile. 8.

1 The works of Timaeus are lost.
2 Timoleon is one of the noblest characters in all antiquity, and distinguished not only by his private virtues, but by approving himself, upon every occasion, the great dispenser of public liberty. He was employed by the Corinthianas as general of those forces which they sent to the relief of the Syracusans, against the execrable tyranny of Dionysius. He executed this commission with great honour and success; for having driven Dionysius out of Sicily, and restored the inhabitants to their rights and privileges, he resigned the supreme command. He continued, however, to live among the Syracusans as a private man, enjoying, as Flutarch observes, the glorious satisfaction of seeing so many cities owe their ease and happiness to his generous and beseque labours.—Plut. in Vit. Timol.

5 Alexander being appointed commander-in-chief of the confederate troops which the Grecians sent against Xerxes, crossed the Hellespont with his army, and landed at Sigium, a promontory near Troy, where he visited the tomb of Achilles. Upon this occasion, he is said to have broken into the following exclamation: "Oh happy youth! in having found a Homer to celebrate thy virtues."—Plut. in Vit. Alex.; Cic. pro Arch. Poet.
6 A dramatic poet who died at Rome An. Urb. 550, about 300 years before the Christian era; some fragments of his works still remain. The sentiment here quoted from him is truly noble; as there is not, perhaps, a more certain indication of a low and little mind, than to be elevated by undistinguishing applause, or depressed by vulgar censure. Trophies of honour, or monuments of disgrace, are not the works of every hand. Some men are incapable of blasting a reputation, but by approving it; and are never satirists, but when they mean to be panegyrist.

LETTER I.

To Quintus Anæarius, Proconsul.

I recommend the two sons of my very excellent friend Aurelius as well deserving your esteem.

a. c. 699. They are educated, indeed, with every polite and valuable qualification; as they are in the number, likewise, of those with whom I most intimately converse. If ever then my recommendation had any weight with you (and much, I think, it ever had), let it prevail, I conjure you, in the present instance. And be assured, the honours with which you shall distinguish them, my friends, will not only indissolubly unite to you two excellent and grateful young men, but, at the same time, confer a very singular obligation upon myself. Farewell.

LETTER II.

To Publius Lentulus, Proconsul.

I have received your letter, wherein you assure me, that the frequent accounts I send you of your affairs, together with the convincing proofs I have given you of my friendship, are circumstances extremely agreeable to you. I should ill deserve, indeed, those singular favours you have conferred upon me, if I were capable of refusing you my best services: and nothing is more pleasing to me, in this long and very distant separation, than thus to converse with you as often as possible. If you do not hear from me as frequently as you wish, it is solely because I dare not trust my letters to every conveyance. But whenever I shall be able to put them into hands upon which I may safely rely, be assured I shall not suffer the opportunity to slip by me.

It is not easy to give a satisfactory answer to your inquiry concerning the sincerity of your professed friends, and the disposition of others in general towards you. This only I will venture to say, that a certain party, and particularly those who have the strongest obligations, as well as the greatest abilities, to distinguish themselves in your service, look upon you with envy; that (agreeably to what I have myself experienced upon a different occasion) those whom, in justice to your country, you have necessarily offended, are your avowed opposers; as others, whose interests and honours you have generously supported, are much less inclined to remember your favours than to oppose your glory. These are circumstances, indeed, which I long suspected, and have often intimated to you, but of which I am now most thoroughly convinced. I observed upon the same occasion (and I believe I told you so in a former letter), both Hortensius and Lucullus to be extremely in your interests; as among those who were in the magistracy, Lucius Rutilius appeared very sincerely and affectionately to espouse your cause: but, excepting the two former, I cannot name any of the consuls who discovered the least degree of friendship towards you when your affair was before the senates. As for my own endeavours, they might, perhaps, be generally considered as flowing rather from those singular favours I have received at your hands, than from the uninflected dictates of my real sentiments. With regard to Pompey, he seldom attended the house at that season: but I must do rows take their flight, I look upon them with the contempt they deserve; and am very willing he should cease to act as a relation, since I have the pleasure to see you assume that character in his stead. To say the truth, notwithstanding I had formerly so much regard for him as to have twice preserved him, even in spite of himself, I should now be glad to forget there is such a person in the world.

That I might not trouble you too frequently with my letters, I have written to Lollia concerning my affairs, who will let you know what measures I am desirous may be taken in regard to the accounts of this province*. If it be possible, let me still enjoy a place in your affection. Farewell.

It was probable that he had appointed Claudius his heir—a circumstance utterly inconsistent with the supposition above-mentioned. The same letter may be produced as an evidence, likewise, that, whatever were the good offices which Metellus here acknowledges, they did not proceed from the suggestions of Cicero's heart; for he speaks of him to Atticus as of one whose character and conduct he greatly disapproved.—Ad Att. iv. 7.

4 Quintus Anæarius was tribune An. Urb. 694, when he distinguished himself by his resolute opposition to the fatal measures of his colleague Vatinius. In the year 697, he was chosen praetor; and, at the expiration of that office, he succeeded Piso in the government of Macedonia, in which province this letter is addressed to him.—Orat. pro Sext. 53; in Pisc. 36; Deo, Remarque sur l'Epiст. of Cio.

him the justice to say, he often takes an opportunity, without my previously leading him into the subject, of discoursing with me concerning your affair, as well as very willingly enters into the conversation whenever I start it myself. Your last letter, I perceived, was written with such a degree of admiration and pleasure, the polite and most judicious manner in which you addressed him.
Before he received this letter, he seemed a little inclined to suspect, that the notion which some had taunted of his inclination to be your competitor, had alienated you from him. But you have now wholly fixed that excellent man in your interest; who, in truth, had all the antecedent reasons for bening so, that an intimate intimacy with those the highest services could possibly give him. I must confess he always appeared to me, even when the conduct of Caninius had raised the strongest suspicions of the contrary, to favour your views. But I can now assure you, that I found him, after he had perused your letter, entirely disposed to promote whatever may contribute either to your interest or your honours. You may consider then what I am going to offer as his immediate sentiments and advice, as indeed it is the result of frequent and serious con- siderations. For Accordingly we are of opinion that it may be proper for you to consider whether any advantages may be derived from your being in possession of Cilicia and Cyprus. For if there should appear a sufficient probability of being able to make yourself master of Alexandria and Egypt, we think it equally for your own honour and that of the republic* to

* See rem. *, p. 345.

It was a usual artifice with Pompey to employ his friends in soliciting those honours in his behalf, to which he affected to appear himself perfectly indifferent, or even averse. This was his policy in the present instance; and at the same time that he pretended to serve Lelantus in this affair, his creature Caninius, a tribune of the people, was posted, I perceived, was extremely aggrandising this commission for Pompey. "And though Cicero," as Mr.
Ross observes, "either out of a tenderness for Lelantus, or out of an apprehension of displeasing Pompey, to whom he was at this time making his court, represents him in this place as not an honest and friendly person in a letter to his brother, where he may be supposed to deliver his real sentiments, he speaks quite differently—— nam quod de Pompeio Caninius agit, sane quam relictus: neque enim seme probatur: et Pompeius moeret in umbricis L. Lelantii vilipetatur, et hercle non est idem." [Ep. vi. L. 6.] The truth of the case is this, when Pompey found it was impossible for him to procure this commission, he pretended a friendship for Lelantus, and joined with Cicero in giving the advice which makes a great part of this letter.

A general sketch of Ptolemy's character has already been given in the notes on the preceding book; and it appears from thence, that nothing could be less to the honour of the commonwealth, than to interpose in the behalf of this justly-rejected monarch. Cicero himself represents him like a man in his honours, as unworthy of the crown he wore:——"Eun," says he, "neque enim neque animo regis cas, inter emes fore video convenit." [In Rull. i.] But what is still more extraordinary, Cicero makes the very measures which he here so strongly recommends to Len-tulus, an enemy to and against Antony. It was by the persuasion of the latter that Galibus undertook (as has already been observed) the restoration of Ptolemy:
and Antony commanded the Roman cavalry in that expedition. This affords a topic of great indignation in consequence of the Philippiack; and Cicero's views on this transaction (as he ought always to have spoken of it) as an most impudent violation of all authority both sacred and march thither with your army, supported by your fleet; having first left the king at Ptolemais, or some other convenient place in that neighbourhood. By these means, when you shall have quieted the disturbances in Alexandria, and secured yourself by the application of forces, Ptolemy may safely take possession of his kingdom. Thus he will be restored by you, as the senate had once decreed; and restored too without an army, agreeably to the sentiments of those who insist upon observing the injunctions of the oracle. We are the rather confirmed in recommending this measure, as there is no decree of the senate subsisting which particularly prohibits you from replacing Ptolemy on his throne. As to the order which absolutely forbids all assistance whatsoever to be given to him, you know it was not only protested against when it was voted, but is generally looked upon rather as the warm dictates of an exasperated faction, than as having the full authority of a decree of the senate. However, we deem it necessary to add, that we are sensible the world will judge of the propriety of this scheme entirely by the event. Should it succeed as we wish, your policy and resolution will universally be applauded; and otherwise, we should consider it, not only an object of ill-considered and unwarrantable ambition. How far this enterprise may be practicable you, who are situated almost within view of Egypt, are the most competent judge. But if, therefore, you are well satisfied of being able to render yourself master of that kingdom, we are clearly of opinion you should delay your march one moment; but, if you are doubtful of the success, it is our advice that you by no means make the attempt. This I will ventures to assure you, that, should you execute this project in the manner we wish, there will be a very considerable party to give it applause, even during your absence, as all Rome will unite in the same approbation the moment you shall return amongst us. Nevertheless I am persuaded if this scheme should not take the desired effect, it may be attended with very disagreeable consequences to yourself, not only on account of that order of the senate which I just now mentioned, but likewise to regard to the oracle. When, therefore,
I recommend such measures as you shall have full assurance will terminate in your glory, I must at the same time strongly dissuade you from engaging in them, if you should have the least reason to apprehend an opposition. For (repeat it again) the world will be determined in their opinion of this whole transaction, not as it is reasonable, but as it shall prove successful. If the method here proposed should appear too dangerous to be hazarded in your own person, we think it may at least be advisable to assist the king with a number of your forces, provided he shall give sufficient security to your friends in the province, for repaying them the money they have advanced in support of his civil——"Inds hor," says he, "ad Alexandriam contra consensus et rectum, contra republicam et religiones." [Philip.

ii. 19.] But what opinion must every unprejduced reader conceive of our author, when he thus finds him condemning and approving the same transaction, and advising his friend to pursue a step which he afterwards condemned and justly reproached in his adversary?—See cause. And, indeed, the circumstances and situation of your government render it extremely easy either to promote or obstruct his restoration as you shall see proper. After all, you are the best judge what method will be most expedient to pursue; I thought it my part, however, to inform you of these our concurrent sentiments.

You congratulate me on the prosperous situation of my affairs in general, and particularly on the friendship of Milo, together with the vain and ineffectual schemes of the worthies Clodius. It is no wonder, when so distinguished a man is disposed to imitate the effects of your own amicable offices. But to say truth, such an incredible perverseness (not to give it a more severe appellation) prevails amongst a certain party, that they rather choose to alienate me by their jealousies from the common cause, than to retain me in that interest by their favour and encouragement. I will own to you, their malice has almost driven me from those principles which I have so long and so invariably pursued. At least, if they have not provoked me so far as to make me forget the dignity of my character, they have taught me that it is high time I should act with a view likewise to my own security. I might, consistently with the strictest duties of patriotism, reconcile both these distinct ends, were there any honour or fortitude in those of consular rank. But such a meaness of spirit prevails in general among them, that, instead of applauding the resolution with which my actions have been ever uniformly directed in the cause of the commonwealth, they look with envy upon those dignities to which my public services have advanced me. I rather mention this as it is to you that I am principally indebted, not only for the happiness of being restored to my country, but almost for my very first successful steps in the paths of patriotism and of glory. I perceive this opposition does not proceed (as I formerly suspected) from my not being of noble birth, since they were actuated. I have observed, by the same malignant spirit against yourself, who are confessedly descended from one of the first families in Rome. Accordingly, though your enemies are contented to see you among those of principal rank in the republic, they will by no means suffer you to soar higher. I rejoice that the parallel between us extends no farther; and though we have met with an equal degree of malice from the world, that the respective consequences, however, have proved extremely different. For a wide difference there surely is between suffering some diminution in point of honours, and being abandoned to total ruin. If I have not greater reason to lament this cruel outrage of my adversaries it must be attributed to your generous interposition, as it was by your means it proved, in the final event, of far more advantage to my reputation than of prejudice to my fortunes. Suffer me, therefore, in principle of gratitude as well as affection, to exhort you earnestly to pursue the dictates of that well-regulated ambition with which you were inflamed from your earliest youth; nor let any injurious treatment depress that heroism of your mind which I have ever admired and valued. The world, believe me, entertains the highest opinion of your merit, and loudly proclaims that enlarged and generous spirit which animates all your actions; and it particularly remembers, to your immortal honour, the paragon of your illustrious consulship. You are sensible, therefore, how much the least additional glory, which shall accrue to you from your civil and military conduct in the government of your province, will increase and strengthen this general lustre of your reputation. But let me express my wishes at the same time, in the first place, that you would not engage in any enterprise with your army without having long and maturely examined it in all its consequences, nor without being sufficiently prepared to carry it into execution; and in the next, that you would be persuaded, of what I doubt not you are already sensible, that you will find it extremely easy to continue in the possession of that pre-eminence amongst your fellow-citizens to which you have always aspired. That you may not imagine, however, I am offering the idle tribute of unnecessary advice. But add, that I could not without thinking it proper to exhort you well to consider, for the future, on whom you repose your confidence.

As to your inquiry concerning the situation of public affairs, there are great divisions amongst us; but the zeal and prudence of the several parties are by no means equal. Those who enjoy the largest share of wealth and power, have gained a superiority of credit likewise, by the folly and instability of their antagonists; for they have obtained from the senate, with very little opposition, what they had no hopes of receiving, even from the people, without raising great disturbances. Accordingly the House has voted Caesar a sum of money for the payment of his army, together with a power of nominating ten lieutenants: as they have also, without the least difficulty, dispensed with the Sempronian law for appointing his successor. I do but slightly touch upon these

Cicero, at this time, acting a part which gave great and just offence to those who were in the true interest of their country, for he was falling in with the measures of Catiline. He endeavoured, therefore, to palliate this unworthy conduct as well as he could; but as he enters more fully into the motives of this step, in the 17th letter of this book, the reader is referred to the observation upon that subject.

Nobility among the Romans was considered (as Manu- tusius observes upon this passage) not in opposition to the plebian rank, for many plebian families were noble, but in contradistinction to those whose ancestors had not borne any of the honourable magistracies in Rome. And of this number was Cicero.
particulars, as I cannot reflect on our affairs with any satisfaction. However, I mention them as suggesting a useful caution to both of us, to preserve a proper balance between our interest and our honour, and not to advance one by an undue depression of the other. A maxim which I have learned, not so much from my favourite philosophy as from sad experience, and which I would recommend to you, are you are taught it by the same unpleasing method of conviction. Your congratulations on my daughter's marriage with Crassipes are agreeable to your usual politeness: I hope and believe this alliance will yield me great satisfaction.—Your son is a youth of so promising a turn, that I cannot forbear conjuring you to train him up in those refined arts which have ever been your peculiar taste and study; but chiefly in that best and noblest discipline, the imitation of your exalted virtues. Believe me, I greatly love and esteem him, not only in return to the singular affection he has ever shown me, but particularly as he is the son, and the worthy son, too, of my valuable friend. Farewell.

LETTER III.
To Fabius Gallus.

I RECEIVED your letter immediately upon my return from Arpinum, together with one likewise a. u. 639, from Avianus b, in which he very generously offers to give me credit as long as I shall require. Now, let me dares you to imagine yourself in my situation, and then tell me whether I can, with a good grace, ask him to allow me even the least time for the payment of this money, much less above a year? Indeed, my dear friend, I should not have been in this difficulty, if you had not exceeded the limits of my commission, both in the particular and the sum. However, I am not only willing to ratify the agreement you have made for the statues you mention, but am likewise much obliged to you for the sentiments I have expressed, that in the zeal of your friendship you have purchased for me what pleased your own eye, and what you imagined would be worthy of mine; and I always considered you as a man of the most judicious and elegant taste in every kind. Nevertheless, I shall be extremely glad if Damasippus should continue in the resolution of taking these figures off my hands; for, to own the plain truth, I have no sort of inclination to them myself. As you were not apprised of my intentions, you have actually consented to pay more for these four or five pieces of sculpture c than I would have given for all the statues in the universe. You compare the images of the priestesses of Bacchus to those of the Muses, which I bought of Metellus. But surely, my friend, the two instances are by no means parallel. For, in the one case, indeed, the Muses have condemned me, if I had ever rated them at so extravagant a price: and in the next, I purchased the figures you mention as bearing an allusion to my studies, and affording a suitable ornament to my library. But where can I, with any propriety, place these Bacchanals? That they are, as you assure me, extremely beautiful, I know full well; for I have frequently seen them, and, therefore, I should particularly have named them to you, if they had suited my purpose. The purchases which I usually make of this kind are such only as are proper to embellish my Palestra b in the same manner as the public gymnasium is generally decorated. But would it not be absurd enough, my good friend, if I, who upon all occasions, you know, have distinguished myself as the friend of peace, should erect a statue of the god of war? It is well there was not a Saturn, too; for how could I have expected to have been out of debt, whilst I had lived under the aspect of two such unlucky divinities d? Mercury would have been a much more welcome guest; for I should have hoped, by his influence, to have made a more advantageous bargain e with Avianus: As to the figure designed for the support of a table, which you intended to reserve for your own use, you shall have it, if you still remain in the same mind; if not, I am ready to take it myself. Upon the whole, however, I had much rather have employed this money in the purchase of a little lodge at Terracina f, that I might not always trouble my friend and host. But this mistake is partly owing to the carelessness of my freedman, in not observing the instructions I gave him, and partly also to Junius, whom I suppose you know, as he is a particular friend of Avianus. As I have lately built some additional apartments to my little portico at Tusculanum g, I c Tullia, when she married Crassipes, was the widow of Pisone, renowned for eloquence, of whom an account has been given in the notes on the former book. This second match did not prove so satisfactory as Cicero here promises himself; for Crassipes soon took a disgust to Tullia, which ended in a divorce. As he is very seldom and but slightly mentioned in Cicero's writings, all that we know of him is, that he was a nobleman of the first rank.

d The same person to whom the 11th letter of the foregoing book is written.

e He seems to have been the proprietor of the statues mentioned below.

f Damasippus was a celebrated virtuoso of these times, who, after having ruined his fortune by his extravagance for antiques, turned Stoic. Horace has ridiculed his character and his conversation with great humour, in one of his satires.—Erat. Sat. ii. 3.

8 These statues appear, by what follows, to have been three Bacchanals, a Mars, and some figure designed for the support of a table.

b The Palestra was properly a part of those public buildings which the Greeks (from whom the Romans took them) called Gymnasia, which were originally designed for exercises of various kinds, and in which, in after-times, the philosophers, likewise, held their schools. What Cicero here calls his Palestra, seems to be the same building which, in a letter to Atticus, he terms his Academia, and which appears to have been some apartments, or, perhaps, a distinct building, of his Tuscanian villa, appropriated principally to the purposes of study, but adapted also to those bodily exercises which the ancients seldom passed a day without practising. Ad Att. ii. 18. 9 k Alluding (as Manilius observes) to the notions of the judaical astrologers, who pretended that Mars and Saturn were unlucky planets.

l Mercury was supposed to preside over commerce, from whence it is probable that the Mercureiares, mentioned in a letter of Cicero to his brother, were a company of merchants.—Ad Quint. Frat. ii. 5.

m It is now called Terracina, a town in the Campagna di Roma. It lay in the road from Rome to Cicero's villa at Formiae.

n Cicero, if we may credit the invective ascribed to Sat. ii. 2 was desirous of adorning them with a few pictures; for if I take pleasure in anything of this kind, it is in paintings. However, if I must have these statues, let me know where they are, when they will arrive, and by what conveyance you propose to send them. For, if Damasippus should change his intentions of buying them, I shall find, perhaps, some pretender to his taste who may be glad of the purchase, and I should be willing to part with them even at a loss.

When I received your first letter concerning the house you want to take, belonging to Cassius, I was just setting out from Rome, and therefore I left your commission with my daughter. However, I took an opportunity myself of talking upon this affair with your friend Nicia, who, you know, is very intimate with Cassius. At my return hither, and before I had opened your last letter, I inquired of Pullus what she had done in this matter. She told me she had applied to Licinia to speak to her brother Cassius; but I believe he is not upon very good terms with his sister. The answer which Licinia gave my daughter was, that her husband being gone into Spain, she durst not remove in his absence and without his knowledge. "I am greatly obliged to you for being so desirous of my company as to be impatient to get into a house where you may not only be near me, but actually under the same roof. But assured I am no less desirous of having you for my neighbour; and as I am sensible how much it will contribute to our mutual satisfaction, I shall try every expedient for that purpose. If I should have any success, I will let you know; in the mean while, I beg you would return me a particular answer to this letter, and tell me, at the same time, when I may expect to see you. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Publius Lentulus, Proconsul.

Marcus Pletorius will fully inform you of the promises we have received from Pompey, together with every other circumstance that has been either attempted or effected in your favour. He was not only present, but, indeed, a principal agent throughout the whole proceedings, and he acted in every article of your concerns agreeably to what might be expected from a judicious, a vigilant, and an affectionate friend. To him, likewise, I must refer you for an account of public affairs, not well knowing what to say of them myself. This much, however, I can assure you, that they are in the hands (and in the hands they are likely to remain) of our professed friends. As for myself, both gratitude and prudence, together with your particular advice, have determined me, as they ought, to join in his interest, whom you were formerly desirous of associating with you in

Just, expended immense sums in this his favourite villa, which, probably, was a very fine one when it came into his possession, as it originally belonged to Sylla the dictator. Some considerable remains of it are still shown at Crota Pfortari.—Sallust. Declam. in Cicero. 62; Plin. Hist. Nat. xxii.

But to return to what more immediately relates to your own private affairs;—Pompey is extremely your friend; and, by all that I can observe, you may obtain anything you shall desire during his consulship. At least I shall solicit him very strenuously for that purpose; and you may rely upon my most active offices in every instance where you are concerned. I am well persuaded my assiduity upon this occasion will not be disagreeable to him: on the contrary, he will receive it with pleasure, were it for no other reason than as affording him a proof of my grateful disposition. In the mean time, I entreat you to believe, that whatever bears the least connexion with your interests is of more importance to me than my own. From these sentiments it is, that I despair not only of being able to return, but even sufficiently to acknowledge, the infinite obligations I owe you; though, at the same time, I am conscious of having exerted upon all occasions the most unwearied endeavours in your service.

It is rumoured here that you have obtained a complete victory, and we impatiently expect an express with the confirmation of this agreeable news. I have already talked with Pompey upon this subject, and as soon as your courier arrives, I shall employ my utmost diligence in conveying the senate. In fine, were I to perform much more for your interest than lies within the compass of my present power, I should still think I had fallen far short of what you have a right to expect. Farewell.

LETTER V.

To Marcus. Marius.

If your general valetudinary disposition prevented you from being a spectator of our late public entertainments, it is more to fortune than to philosophy that I am to impute your absence. But if you declined our party for the senate, and gave Caesar an opportunity of establishing an interest with the former, which, at that juncture, he found necessary for his purposes. Accordingly, being soon after elected consul, he procured a law from the people to ratify those acts.—Suet. In Vit. Jul. Cae. 19.

The farmers of the public revenues, who were composed of the principal persons among the equestrian order, having, as they pretended, rented some branch of the finances at too high a rate, applied to the senate for relief. Their demands, it seems, were unreasonable: however, in the situation wherein public affairs then stood, it was thought prudent by the more moderate party not to disoblige so considerable a body of men. But Cato obstinately opposed their demands; and, by his means, the senate, after keeping them in suspense for several months, at length rejected their petition. But Caesar, who knew how to turn every incident to his advantage, took up the interests of these knights; and, in his consulship, obtained from the people a remission of one-third of the stipulated rates. (as one of the Greek historians observes) gave him a more considerable accession of power, even than he had before acquired by means of the people, as it gained over a much more important order to his party. —Ad Att. II. 1; Suet. In Vit. Jul. Cae. 20; Appian. De Bell. Civ. II.

Pompey and Crassus were at this time consuls.

The person to whom this letter is addressed, seems to have been of a temper and constitution, that placed him far below the ambition of being known to posterity. But no other reason than as holding in just contempt what the generality of the world so absurdly admire, I must at once gratulate you both on your health and your judgment. I say this upon a supposition, however, that you were enjoying the philosophical advantages of that delightful scene, in which I imagine you were almost wholly deserted. At the same time that your neighbours probably were nothing over the dull humour of our trite farces, my friend, I dare say, was indulging his morning meditations in that elegant apartment, from whence you have opened a prospect to Sejanum, through the Stabin hills. And whilst you are employing the rest of the day in those various polite amusements which you have the happy privilege to plan out for yourself, we, alas! had the mortification of tamely enduring those dramatic representations to which Marius, it a private letter from Cicero's hand has been sufficient to dispel the obscurity he appears to have loved, and to render his retirement conspicuous.

They were exhibited by Pompey, at the opening of his theatre, one of the most magnificent structures of ancient Rome, and so extensive as to contain no less than 80,000 spectators. It was built after the model of one which he saw at Miletus, in his return from the Mithridatic war; and was adorned with the richest ornaments of statuary and painting. Some remains of this immense building still subsist.—Liv. xxxix.; Plin. Hist. Nat. vii. 3; Plat. in Vit. Pompe.

Sejanum (if that be the true reading, for the MSS. differ extremely) is found in no other ancient author. Stable was a maritime town in Campania, situated upon the bay of Naples, from whence the adjoining hills here mentioned took their name. One may figure the philosophical Marius as looking down upon the world from this his delightful retirement, with reflections of the same kind as those in which the poet has so exquisitely imaged, in the following beautiful lines:

Here, on a single plank, thrown safe on shore,
I hear the tumult of the distant throng,
As that of seas remote, or dying storms,
And meditate on scene and scene again.
Here, like a shepherd gazing from his hut,
Touching his reed, or leaning on his staff,
Eager ambition's fiery clas' I see;
I see the hunting king of noble men
Burst law's enclosur, leap the mounds of right, Pursuing and pursued; each other's prey;
As wolves for rapine, as the fox for wiles:
Till death, that mighty hunter, earths them all!—Young.

This person is supposed, by the commentators, to be the same to whose judgment Horace advises the Fates to refer their poetical compositions:—

—Si quid tamen olim Scirpseris, in Marti descendent judicis aures.

De Arte Poet. 389.

But the compliment paid in these lines to the taste of Marius likely refers to the contemplative manner in which Cicero here speaks of Pompey's Dramatic Censor. It appears by an ancient scholiast on Horace, that Augustus instituted a kind of poetical court of Judicature, consisting of five judges, the chief of which was Marius Tarpa, mentioned above as thrusting away such poems as Pompey. The haughty assembly in the temple of Apollo, and no poet was permitted to bring his play upon the stage without their approbation. Demitian seems to have improved upon this establishment, and extended it into an academy that he might contribute to those who excelled, not only in poetical but prose compositions. We have seen societies of this sort formed among our neighbour nations, with good effect: and, perhaps, if, in this instance, as well as in some others, we were to follow their example, it might prove a means, not only of refining our language, and encouraging a spirit seems, our professed critic, had given his infallible sanction! but as you will have the curiosity, perhaps, to require a more particular account, I must tell you, that though our entertainments were extremely magnificent indeed, yet they were by no means such as you would have relished: at least if I may judge of your taste by my own experience of those actors who had formerly distinguished themselves with great applause, but had long since retired. I imagined, in order to preserve the reputation they had raised, were now again introduced upon the stage, as in honour, it seems, of the festival. Amongst these was my old friend Esopus, but so different from what we once knew him, that the whole audience agreed he ought to be excused from acting any more; for when he was pronouncing the celebrated oath—

the poor old man's voice failed him, and he had not strength to go through with the speech. As to the other parts of our theatrical entertainments, you know the nature of them so well, that it is scarcely necessary to mention them. They had less, indeed, to plead in their favour than even the most ordinary representations of this kind can usually claim.

The enormous parade with which they were attended, and which, I dare say, you would very willingly have spared, destroyed all the grace of the performance. What pleasure could it afford to a judicious spectator, to see a thousand mules prancing about the stage, in the tragedy of "Clytemnestra"; or whose regiments were introduced in better order, as Cicero that of the "Trojan Horse"? In a word, what man of sense could be entertained with viewing a mock army drawn up on the stage in battle array? These, I confess, are spectacles extremely well adapted to captivate vulgar eyes; but undoubtedly would have had no charm in yours.

In plain truth, my friend, you would have received more amusement from the dullest piece that Protagonist could be of polite literature, but of calling off our minds from those political speculations, which, though the privilege, indeed, are not always the happiness of every able Briton.

He excelled in tragedy, and was the most celebrated actor that had ever appeared upon the Roman stage. Cicero experienced the advantage of his friendship and his talents during his exile, for Esopus being engaged in a part upon the stage, wherein there were several passages that might be applied to our author's misfortunes, this excellent tragedian pronounced them with so peculiar and affecting an emphasis, that the whole audience immediately took the allusion; and it had a better effect, as Cicero acknowledged, than anything his own eloquence could have expressed for the same purpose. But it is not in this instance alone that Cicero was obliged to Esopus, as it was the advantage of his precept and example, that he laid the foundation of his oratorical fame, and improved himself in the art of elocution. The high value which the Romans set upon the talents of this pathetic actor, appears by the immense estate which he acquired in his profession, for he died worth two millions, 300,000, sterling. He left a son behind him, whose remarkable extravagance and dissipation were recorded by the Roman satirist. This youth having received a present from a favourite lady of a pearl out of her ear, worth a million of sesterces, or about 8,000l. of our money, dissolved it in a liquid, and guzzled it down off to the health, we may suppose, of his generous mistress. Pliny the naturalist, who likewise mentions this story, adds, that he presented, at the same time, to each of his guests, a cup of this same valuable ingredient.—Orat. pro Sext. 50;

possibly have read to you (my own orations, however, let me always except) than we met with at these ridiculous shows. I am well persuaded, at least, you could not regret the loss of our Ossian and Grecian farces. Your own noble senate will always supply you with dramas of the former kind; and as to the latter, I know you have such an utter aversion to everything that bears the name of Greek, that you will not even travel the Grecian road to your villa. As I remember you once despised our formidable gladiators, I cannot suppose you would have looked Pluto in Vit. Cion.; Macrob. Saturn. li. 10; Hor. Sat. ii. 3, 230; Plin. Hist. Nat. x. 61.

a It was usual with persons of distinction among the Romans to keep a slave in their family, whose sole business it was to read to them. Protagonist seems to have attended Marius in that capacity.

b The Ossian farces were so called from the Oeci, an ancient people of Campania, from whom the Romans received them. They seem to have been of the same kind with our Bartholomew drools, and to have consisted of low and obscene humour. As to the nature of the Greek farces, the critics are not agreed. Most men suppose they differed only from the former, as being written in the Greek language. But it does not appear that Greek plays were ever represented upon the Roman stage; and the most probable account of them is, that they were a sort of pantomime, or imitation of those on the Grecian theatre.

The municipal or corporate towns in Italy were governed by magistrates of their own, who probably made much the same sort of figure in their rural senate, as our burgesses in their town-hall. This, at least, seems to have been the case in that corporation to which Marius belonged, and to have given occasion to our author's raillery.

c Perhaps the Grecian road might be much out of repair, and little frequented at the time when this letter was written: and on that circumstance Cicero, it is possible, may have founded his witicism. Among the many instances of Roman magnificence, that of their public reads in particularly observable. They were formed at an immense expense, and as Cicero has related in a letter to a friend, the first of these stages, which could be erected at the sides of the city, Lipsius computes the Appian way at 350 miles, some part of which still remains as entire as when it was first made; though it has now subsisted above 1800 years. It is twelve feet broad, and chiefly composed of blue tiles and a kind of lime and a kind of lime, and a kind of lime, the quality of a less atrocious sort were generally employed in those useful works: and, perhaps, it might be well worthy the consideration of the legislature, whether punishments of this kind in delinquencies of the same nature, might not, in all respects, be of more advantage to the public, than that which seems to have so little effect in restraining the violence that are daily committed among us.—Lips. de Magnif. Rom.; Burnet's Trav. let. iv.; Plin. Epist. x. 35.

The first show of gladiators exhibited in Rome was given by the Brutii, in honour of their father's obsequies; about 200 years before the date of this letter. Originally the unhappy wretches who were exposed in this manner were either prisoners taken in war, or public criminals; but in process of time it grew into a profession, and there were men who hired themselves out for this purpose. Atticus, who seems to have been a just and a good judge, no opportunity of improving his finances, had a band of gladiators which he let out on public occasions, to those who were not rich enough to maintain them at their own expense. The passion for these contests became at length so immoderate, that it was usual to exhibit matches of gladiators at their private entertainments, and not only men of the first quality, but even women, entered those lists. Reason, most unof it is, I began to grow weary of this employment, even at a time when youth and ambition prompted my personal action; and I will add, too, when I was at full liberty to exercise it in defense of those only whom I was inclined to assist. But, in my present circumstances, it is absolute slavery. For, on the one side, I never expect to reap any advantage from my labors of this kind; and, on the other, in compliance with solicitations which I cannot refuse, I am sometimes under the disagreeable necessity of appearing as an advocate in behalf of those who ill deserve that favor at my hands.

For these reasons I am framing every possible pretext for leaving Greece, according to my own taste and sentiments: as I highly both approve and applaud that retired scene of life which you have so judiciously chosen. I am sensible, at the same time, that this is the reason you so seldom visit Rome.

However, I the less regret that you do not see it oftener, as the numberless unpleasing occupations in which I am engaged would prevent me from enjoying the entertainment of your conversation, or giving you that of mine: if mine, indeed, can afford you any. But if ever I should be so fortunate as to disentangle myself, in some degree at least, (for I am outwitted not to be wholly released,) from these perplexing embarrassest, I will undertake to show, even my elegant friends, wherein the truest refinements of life consist. In the meantime, continue to take care of your health, that you may be able, when that happy time shall arrive, to accompany me in my journey to my several villas.

You must impute it to the excess of my friendship, and not to the abundance of my leisure, that I have lengthened this letter beyond my usual extent. It was merely in compliance with a request in one of yours, where you intimate a desire that I would compensate in this manner what you lost by not being present at our public diversions. I shall be extremely glad if I have succeeded; if not, I shall bear the satisfaction, however, to think that you will find it future be more inclined to give us your company on these occasions than to rely on my letters for your amusement. Farewell.

LETTER VI.

To Quintus Philippus, Proconsul.

THOUGH I am too well convinced of your friendship and esteem, to suspect that you are unmindful of my former application in behalf of my friends Oppius and Egnatius; yet, I cannot forbear again recommending their joint affairs.

Cicero was now wholly under the influence of Pompey and Caesar; but the particular instances of his unworthy submission to which he here only alludes, are mentioned more fully in a subsequent letter to Lentulus, and will be considered in the remarks on that epistle. See letter 17 of this book, rem. v. 4, and 1.

The person to whom this letter is addressed, and the time when it was written, are equally unknown. Fighting for the interests of Asia, in the year of Rome 708.

But, in this instance, the usual accuracy of that laborious annalist seems to have failed him. Per it appears, by a letter of congratulation which Cicero writes to Philippus upon his return from the province, he has been proconsul at some period previous to the civil war: Gratulator tibi (says he) quod ex provincia salutem ad te suscepistis incolam in fama et republica. Ep. Fam. xiii. 73. See letter 22 of this book.
to your protection. My connexion, indeed, with the latter, is of so powerful a kind, that I could not be more solicitous for my own personal concerns. I entreat you, therefore, to give him proofs of my enjoying that share of your affection, which I persuade myself I possess; and he assuredly cannot show me a more agreeable instance of your friendship. Farewell.

LETTER VII.

To Marcus Licinius Crassus.

I am persuaded that all your friends have informed you of the zeal with which I lately both defended and promoted your dignities: as, indeed, it was too warm and too conspicuous to have been passed over in silence. The opposition which the consul1 from the consuls, as well as from several others of consular rank, was the strongest I ever encountered, and you must now look upon me as your declared advocate upon all occasions where your glory is concerned. Thus have I abundantly compensated for the interference of those good offices which the friendship between us had long given you a right to claim; but which, by a variety of accidents, have lately been somewhat interrupted. There never was a time, believe me, when I wanted an inclination to cultivate your esteem, or promote your interest. Though, it must be owned, a certain set of men, who are the bane of all amicable intercourse, and who envied us the mutual honour that resulted from ours, have, upon some occasions, been so unhappily successful as to create a coolness between us.2 It has happened, however, (what I

1 He had been twice consul in conjunction with Pompey, and was at this time governor of Syria: to which province he succeeded at the expiration of his second consulate, the year preceding the date of this letter. He was esteemed among the considerable orders of the time, and that his principal distinction seems to have been his immense wealth, the greatest part of which he acquired by sharing in the confiscated estates of those unhappy victims who fell a sacrifice to the cruel ambition of Sylla. In his first consulate he gave a general treat to the people upon ten thousand tables, and, at the same time, distributed to them a largess of three months' provision of corn.—Plut. in Vit. Crass. Dio, xxxix.

2 Crassus accepted the province of Syria merely with a design of making war upon the Parthians: for which, however, there was no other pretence than what his boundless avarice and ambition suggested. Accordingly, some of the tribunes endeavoured to obstruct his levies for this expedition; and when that attempt failed, Ateus, one of their number, had recourse to certain superstitious ceremonies of their religion, and devoted him in former to destruction. It was a general persuasion that none ever escaped the effect of these mysterious exorcisms: and, in the present instance, the event happened to correspond with this popular belief. For Crassus, together with his army, perished in this enterprise. The judicious Marcellus conjectures, that after Crassus had left Rome, some motion was made in the senate for recalling him, which gave occasion to Cicero's services and to the present letter. This supposition, however, though indeed highly probable, is not supported by any of the historians.—Plut. in Vit. Crass. Dio, xxxix.; Vell. Pat. B. 46.

3 The consul of this year was L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and Appius Claudius Balbus. How effectually sover Cicero might have served Crassus upon the occasion to which this letter relates; it rather wished than expected) that I have found an opportunity, even when your affairs were in the most prosperous train, of giving a public testimony by my services to you, that I always most sincerely preserved the remembrance of our former amity. The truth is, I have approved myself your friend, not only to the full conviction of your family in particular, but of all Rome in general. In consequence of which, that most valuable of women, your excellent wife, which is in many illustrious minds a virtue and filial piety, your two amiable sons, have perpetual recourse to my assistance and advice; and the whole world is sensible that no one is more zealously disposed to serve you than myself.

Your family correspondents have informed you, I imagine, of what has hitherto passed in your affair, as well as of what is at present in agitation. As for myself, I entreat you to do me the justice to believe, that it was not any sudden start of inclination, which disposed me to embrace this opportunity of vindicating your honour; on the contrary, it was my ambition, from the first moment I entered the forum, to be ranked in the number of your friends. I have the satisfaction to reflect that I have never, from that time to this hour, failed in the highest sentiments of esteem for you; and, I doubt not, you have always retained the same affectionate regard towards me. If the effects of this mutual disposition have been interrupted by any little suspicions, (for suspicions only I am sure they were,) be the remembrance of them for ever blotted out of our hearts. I am persuaded, indeed, from those virtues which form your character, and from those I am desirous should distinguish mine, that our friendly union, in the present conjuncture, cannot but he attended with is most certain his good offices did not proceed from a principle of friendship. It is extremely probable, indeed, that his supporting the cause of Crassus in the senate is one of those instances of our author's subject, of which he complains in the preceding letter; and that it was entirely in compliance with the inclinations of Caesar and Pompey, with whom Crassus was now united. The coolness, here mentioned, seems to have been adopted ever since the death of Catiline; in whose conspiracy, as one of the witnesses examined upon that occasion deposed, Crassus was concerned. There were few, indeed, who gave credit to this evidence, and the senate, upon the motion of Cicero, ordered it to be executed. But Crassus, in his letter to Atticus, assures us (as that historian declares) that this affront was thrown upon him by the artifices of Cicero himself. But whether Crassus had any just ground for this suspicion, or whether it was suggested to him by the false insinuations of those to whom Cicero here alludes, is a question by no means capable of being determined by any circumstance in the history or character of the two men. It is certain that Crassus, from this time, conceived a strong and lasting aversion to our author; as on the other hand, that Cicero, after the death of Crassus, published an oration in which he expressly charged him with being engaged in this conspiracy. However, a formal reconciliation had lately passed between them, and when Crassus set out for his Eastern expedition, they parted with all the exterior marks of a sincere friendship.—Ad Att. Iv. 13; Sallust. Bell. Cat. 49; Plut. in Vit. Crass.; Ep. Fam. i. 9.

a This lady's name was Tertulla; and, if Suetonius may be credited, she was better acquainted with some of Caesar's talents than was altogether consistent with her being (what Cicero himself calls he temper?) the most valuable of all women.—Suet. in Vit. J. Cas. 50.

b Crassus was almost ten years older than Cicero; so that when the latter first appeared at the bar, the former had already established a character by his oratorical abilities.
equal honour to us both. What instances you may be willing to give me of your esteem, must be left to your own determination; but they will be such, I flatter myself, as may tend most to advance my dignities. For my own part, I faithfully promise the utmost exertion of my best services, in every article wherein I can contribute to increase yours. Many, I know, will be my rivals in these amicable offices, but it is a contention in which all the world, I question not, and particularly your two sons, will acknowledge my superiority. Be assured I love them both in a very uncommon degree; though I will own that I feel it in my father’s name, my infamy, indeed, he discovered a singular regard to me, as he particularly distinguishes me at this time with all the marks even of filial respect and affection. Let me desire you to consider this letter, not as a strain of unmeaning compliment, but as a sacred and solemn covenant of friendship, which I shall most sincerely and religiously observe. I shall now persevere in being the advocate of your honours, not only from a motive of affection, but from a principle of constancy, and without any application on your part, I shall, in every opportunity, every opportunity, wherein I shall think my services may prove agreeable to your interest, or your inclinations. Can you once doubt, then, that any request to me for this purpose, either by yourself or your family, will meet with a most punctual observance? I hope, therefore, you will not scruple to employ me in all your concerns, of what nature or importance soever, as one who is most faithfully your friend: and that you will direct your family to apply to me in all their affairs of every kind, whether relating to you or to themselves, to their friends or their dependants. And be assured, I shall spare no pains to render your absence as little uneasy to them as possible. Farewell.

To Julius Caesar.

I AM going to give you an instance how much I rely upon your affectionate services, not only towards myself, but in favour also of my friends. It was my intention, if I had gone abroad in any foreign employment, that Trebiatus should have accompanied me: and he would not have returned without receiving the highest and most advantageous honours I should have been able to have conferred upon him. But as Pompey, I find, defers setting out upon his commission longer than I imagined, and I am apprehensive likewise that the doubts you know I entertain in regard to my attending him, may possibly prevent, as they will certainly at least delay, my journey, I take the liberty to refer Trebiatus to your good offices, for those benefits he has received from mine. I have ventured, indeed, to promise him that he will find you as well-disposed to advance his interest, as I have always assured him he would find me; and a very extraordinary circumstance occurred, which seemed to confirm this opinion I entertained of your generosity. For, in the very instant I was talking with Balbus upon this subject, your letter was delivered to me; in the close of which you pleasantly tell me, that "in compliance with my request you will make Ordsius king of Gaul, or assign him over to Lepta, and advance any other person whom I should be inclined to recommend." This had so remarkable a coincidence with our discourse, that it struck both Balbus and myself as a sort of a happy omen, that had something in it more than accidental. As it was my intention, therefore, before I received your letter, to have

Caesar was at this time in Gaul, preparing for his first expedition into Britain, which, as Tacitus observes, he rather discovered than conquered.

2 See an account of him in the following letter.

A law had lately passed, by which Pompey was invested with the government of Spain during five years; and it was upon this occasion that Cicero had thoughts of attending him as his lieutenant. Pompey, however, instead of going to his province, demanded him, and it seems to have amused Cicero with a notion of his intending the contrary. For it appears, by a letter to Atticus written towards the latter end of this year, that our author had fixed the day for his departure.—Plut. in Vit. Pompt.; Ad Att. iv. 18.

Among the various kinds of omens observed with much superstition by the Romans, that of words happening to coincide with any particular subject under consideration, was esteemed of singular regard. A remarkable instance of this sort is recorded by Livy. After the learning of Rome by the Gauls, it was debated whether the capital city should not be removed into the country of the Veii. This point was long and warmly discussed, till, at length the question was decided by an officer of the guards, who, accidentally passing by the senate-house with his command, called out to the ensign, Signifer, status signum: hic man¬nibus optime. These words being heard by the fathers in council, were considered as a divine intimation: and it was immediately and unanimously agreed to send the colony on its former site. Caesar, of all the Roman his¬torians, has most avoided the marvellous of this kind: and it is observable, that he does not mention a single prophecy throughout his whole Commentaries, except in his relation of the battle of Pharsalia. Upon that occasion, indeed, he very artfully falls in with this popular superstition, and gives an account of many predictive intimations of that day’s important event. And nothing, in truth, could be more to his purpose than this indirect manner of per-transmitted Trebatius to you, so I now consign him to your patronage, as upon your own invitation. Receive him then, my dear Caesar, with your usual generosity, and distinguish him with every honour that my solicitations can induce you to confer. I do not recommend him in the manner you so justly rallied when I wrote to you in favour of Orfus: but I will take upon me to assure you, in true Roman sincerity, that there lives not a man of greater modesty and merit. I must not forget to mention also (what, indeed, is his distinguishing qualification) that he is eminently skilled in the laws of his country, and happy in an uncommon strength of memory. I will not point out any particular piece of preferment which I wish you to bestow upon him: I will only, in general, entreat you to admit him into a share of your friendship.

Nevertheless, if you should think proper to distinguish him with the tribunate or praetorship, or any other little honours of that nature, I shall have no manner of objection. In good earnest, I entirely resign him out of my hands into yours, which never were lifted up in battle, or pledged in friendship, without effect. But I fear I have pressed you farther upon this occasion than was necessary; however, I know you will excuse my warmth in the cause of a friend. Take care of your health, and continue to love me. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

To Trebatius.

I never write to Caesar or Balbus without taking occasion to mention you in the advantageous terms you deserve; and this in a style that evidently distinguishes me for your sincere well-wisher. I hope, therefore, you will check this idle passion for the elegancies of Rome, and resolutely persevere in the purpose of your journey, till abating his countrymen that the gods were parties in his cause—Liv. v. 65; Cæs. De Civ. iv. 85.

The profession of the law was held among the Romans, as it is with us, in great esteem; but this body of men seem in general to have acted rather in the nature of our chamber council, than as advocates at the bar. The law was properly the work of those whom they called their avatores; and for which every man of good sense, a ready utterance, and a general knowledge of the constitutions of his country, was thought qualified.—Cæs. De Offic. ii. 19; De Orat. 85, 86.

The military tribunes were next in rank to the lieutenants or commanders-in-chief under the general; as the praefectus legionte was the most honourable post in the Roman armies after that of the military tribunes. The business of the former was, among other articles, to decide the controversies that arose among the soldiers; and that of the latter was to carry the chief standard of the legion.

This is the same person in whose behalf the foregoing letter to Cæsar is written, and which seems to have had so good an effect, that we find him mentioned by Suetonius as in the number of Cæsar’s particular favourites. He appears, in this earlier part of his life, to have been of a more saucy and indelicate disposition than is consistent with making a figure in business; but he afterwards, however, became a very celebrated lawyer; and one of the most agreeable satires of Horace is addressed to him under that honourable character. If the English reader is desirous of being acquainted with the spirit of that performance, he will find it preserved, and even improved, among Mr. Pope’s excellent imitations of Horace—Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cæs.; Hor. Sat. ii. 1; Pope’s Poems, vol. ii. p. 109.

your merit and assiduity shall have obtained the desired effect. In the mean time, your friends here will excuse your absence, no less than the ladies of Corinth did that of Medea in the play, when she artfully persuades them not to impute it to her as a crime that she had forsaken her country. For as she tells them,

"There are who distant from their native soil, Stilf for their own and country’s glory tell: While some, fast rooted to their parent spot, In life are useless, and in death forgot."

In this last inglorious class you would most certainly have been numbered, had not your friends all conspired in forcing you from Rome. But more of this another time: in the meanwhile, let me advise you, who know so well how to manage securities for others, to secure yourself from the British charioteers. And since I have been playing the Medea, let me make my exit with the following lines of the same tragedy, which are well worth your constant remembrance:

"His wisdom, sure, on folly’s confines lies, Who, wise for others, for himself’s unwise.”

Farewell.

LETTER X.

To the same.

I take all opportunities of writing in your favour: and I shall be glad you would let me know with what success. My chief reliance is on Balbus: in my letters to whom I frequently and warily recommend your interest. But why do you not let me hear from you every time my brother despatches a courier?

I am informed there is neither gold nor silver in all Britain. If that should be the case, I would Medes being enamoured of Jason, assisted him in obtaining the golden fleece, and then fled with him from her father’s court. He afterwards, however, deserted her for Cœsars, the daughter of Cœsus, king of Corinth, whom Medes destroyed by certain magical arts. Ennius, a Roman poet, flourished about a century before the date of this letter, formed a play upon this story; from which performance the following lines are quoted.

The armies of the ancient Britons were partly composed of troops who fought in open chariots, to the axletrees of which were fixed a kind of short scythe—Cæs. De Bell. Gall. iv. 29; Sir William Temple’s Introduction to the Hist. of England.

A notion had prevailed among the Romans, that Britain abounded in gold and silver mines; and this report, it is probable, first suggested to Cæsar the design of conquering our island. It was soon discovered, however, that these sources of wealth existed only in their own imagination; and after twenty years of plunder in the little advantage they could make by the sale of their prisoners. Cicero, taking notice of this circumstance to Atticus, ridicules the poverty and ignorance of our British ancestors; which gives occasion to the ingenious historian of his life, to break out into the following pertinent and useful observations: "From their ruffianly of this kind (says Dr. Middleton) one cannot help reflecting on the surprising fate and revolutions of kingdoms: how Rome, once the mistress of the world, the seat of arts, empire, and glory, now lies sunk in sloth, ignorance, and poverty; enslaved to the most cruel as well as to the most contemptible of tyrants, superstition and religious imposture: while this remote country, anciently the jest and contempt of the polite Romans, is become the happy seat of liberty, plenty, and letters, flourishing in all the arts and refinements of civil life; yet running perhaps the same course advise you to seize one of the enemy's military cars, and drive back to us with all expedition. But if you think you shall be able to make your fortune without the assistance of British spoils, by all means establish yourself in that pursuit. To be serious; both my brother and Ballius will be of great service to you for that purpose: but, believe me, your own merit and assiduity will prove your best recommendation. You have every favourable circumstance indeed for your advancement that can be wished. On the one hand, you are in the prime and vigour of your years; as on the other, you are serving under a commander distinguished for the generosity of his disposition, and to whom you have been recommended in the strongest terms. In a word, there is not the least fear of your success, if your own concurrence be not wanting. Farewell.

LETTER XI.

To the same.

I have received a very obliging letter from Caesar, wherein he tells me, that though his numberless occupations have hitherto prevented him from seeing you, as often as he wishes, he will certainly find an opportunity of being better acquainted with you. I have assured him in return, how extremely acceptable his generous services to you would prove to myself. But surely you are much too precipitate in your determinations: and I could not but wonder that you should have refused the advantages of a tribune's commission, especially as you might have been excused it seems from the functions of that post. If you continue not to act thus indifferently, I shall certainly exhibit an information against you to your friends Vercellus and Manlius. I dare not venture, however, to lay the case before Cornelius: for as you profess to have learned all your wisdom from his instructions, to arraign the pupil of imprudence would be a tacit reflection, you know, upon the tutor. But in good earnest, I conjure you not to lose the fairest opportunity of making your fortune, that probably will ever fall again in your way.

I frequently recommend your interests to Precilius, whom you mention; and he writes me word that he has done you some good offices. Let me know of what kind they are. I expect a letter upon your arrival in Britain. Farewell.

LETTER XII.

To the same.

I have made your acknowledgments to my brother, in pursuance of your request: and am glad to have an occasion of applauding you for being fixed at last in some settled resolution. The style of your former letters, I own, gave me a good deal of uneasiness. And which Rome itself had run before it; from virtuous industry to wealth; from wealth to luxury; from luxury to an impatience of discipline, and corruption of morals; till, by a total degeneracy and loss of virtue, being grown ripe for destruction, it falls a prey at last to some hardy oppressor, and, with the loss of liberty, losing everything else that is valuable, sinks gradually again into its original barbarism."—Ad Att. iv.; Life of Cicero, p. 157.

allow me to say, that in some of them you discovered an impatience to return to the polite refinements of Rome, which had the appearance of much levity; that in some I regretted your indolence, and in others your timidity. They frequently, likewise, gave me occasion to think that you were not altogether so reasonable in your expectations as is agreeable to your usual modesty. One would have imagined indeed you had carried a bill of exchange upon Caesar, instead of a letter of recommendation: for you seemed to think you had nothing more to do than to receive your money and hasten home again. But money, my friend, is not so easily acquired: and I could name some of our acquaintance who have been obliged to travel as far as Alexandria in pursuit of it, without having yet been able to obtain even their just demands. If my inclinations were governed solely by my interest, I should certainly choose to have you here: as nothing affords me more pleasure than your company, or more advantage than your advice and assistance. But as you sought my friendship and patronage from your earliest youth, I always thought it incumbent upon me to act with a disinterested view to your welfare; and not only to give you my protection, but to advance by every means in my power, both your fortunes and your dignities. In consequence of which I dare say you have not forgotten those unsolicited offers I made you, when I had thoughts of being employed abroad. I no sooner gave up my intentions of this kind, and perceived that Caesar treated me with great distinction and friendship, than I recommended you in the strongest and warmest terms to his favour, perfectly well knowing the singular probity and benevolence of his heart. Accordingly he showed, not only by his letters to me, but by his conduct towards you, the great regard he paid to my recommendation. If you have any opinion therefore of my judgment, or imagine that I sincerely wish you well, let me persuade you to continue with him. And notwithstanding you should meet with some things to disgust you, as business perhaps, or other obstructions, may render him less expeditious in gratifying your views than you had reason to expect; still however persevere, and trust that Caesar, at length, will hear you, for your interest and your honour. To exhort you any farther might look like impertinence: let me only remind you, that if you lose this opportunity of improving your fortunes you will never meet again with so generous a patron, so rich a province, or so convenient a season for this purpose. And (to express myself in the style of your lawyers) Cornelius has given his opinion to the same effect.

I am glad, for my sake as well as yours, that you did not attend Caesar into Britain; as I am not only saved you the fatigue of a very disagreeable expedition, but me likewise that of being the perpetual auditor of your wonderful exploits. Let me know in what part of the world you are likely to take up your winter-quarters, and in what post you are, or expect to be, employed. Farewell.

* This alludes to those who supplied Ptolemy with money when he was soliciting his affairs in Rome; an account of which has already been given in the notes on the foregoing book.—See rem. i., p. 364.

LETTER XIII.
To the same.

It is a considerable time since I have heard any ting to you. As for myself, if I have not written these three months, it was because,

after you were separated from my brother,
I never knew where to address my letters, nor by what hand to convey them. I much wish to be informed how your affairs go on, and in what part of the world your winter-quarters are. I have fixed. I should be glad they might be with Caesar:
but as I would not venture, in his present affdiption trouble him with a letter, I have written upon that subject to Balbas. In the meantime, let me treat you not to be wanting to yourself: and for my own part, I am contented to give up so much more of your company, provided the longer you stay abroad the richer you should return. There is nothing I think particularly to hasten you home, now that Vacerra is dead. However you are the best judge, and I should be glad to know what you have determined.

There is a queer fellow of your acquaintance, one Octavius or Cornelius (I do not perfectly recollect his name) who is perpetually inviting me, as a friend of yours, to sup with him. He has not yet prevailed with me to accept his compliment:
however, I am obliged to the man. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.
To Munatius.

LUCIUS LIVINNIUS TAPYHO is the freedman of my very intimate friend Regulus: and though the misfortunes of the latter cannot raise him higher in my affection, they have, however, rendered me more assiduous to testify it in every instance wherein he is the least concerned. But I have still a farther reason for wishing myself in behalf of his freedman, as I experienced his services at a season when I had the best opportunity of proving the sincerity of my friends. I recommend him therefore to your protection with all the warmth of the most sensible gratitude; and I shall be extremely obliged to you for showing him that you place to your own account those many dangerous winter voyages he formerly undertook upon mine.
Farewell.

6 Caesar about this time lost his daughter Julia, who died in child-bed. She was married to Pompey, who was so passionately fond of her, that she seemed, during the short time they lived together, to have taken entire possession of his whole heart, and to have turned all his ambition into the single desire of appearing amiable in her eyes. The death of this young lady proved a public calamity, as it dissolved the only durable bond of union between her father and her husband, and hastened that rupture which ended in the destruction of the commonwealth. It is in allusion to this that the elegant Patroculus calls her mother "Vesta cohorsis in Fompeium et Cassarem concordiar pigna"—But in Vit. Pomp. et Cres.; Vell. Pat. i. 47.

7 The person to whom this letter is addressed is unknown, as is the precise time, likewise, when it was written. It seems probable, however, not to have been very long after Cicero's return from banishment. For by the expression, his nostris temporibus, he undoubtedly alludes (as Mr. Ross observes) to the misfortunes which were brought upon him by Clodius.

LETTER XV.
To Trebatius.

I PERCEIVE by your letter, that my friend Caesar looks upon you as a most wonderful lawyer; and are you not happy in being thus placed in a country where you make so considerable a figure upon so small a stock? But with how much greater advantage would your noble talents have appeared had you gone into Britain?

Undoubtedly there would not have been so profound a sage in the law throughout all that extensive island.

Since your epistle has provoked me to be thus jocose, I will proceed in the same strain, and tell you there was one part of it I could not read without some envy; and how indeed could it be otherwise, when I found that, whilst much greater men were in vain attempting to get admittance to Caesar, you were singled out from the crowd, and even summoned to an audience? But after giving me an account of affairs which concern others, why were you silent as to your own, assured as you are that I interest myself in them with as much zeal as if they immediately related to myself. Accordingly, as I am extremely afraid you will have no employment to keep you warm in your winter-quarters,
I would by all means advise you to lay in a sufficent quantity of fuel. Both Marcus and Manilius1 have given their opinions to the same purpose; especially as your regimentals, they apprehend, will scarce be ready soon enough to secure you against the approaching cold. We hear, however, there has been hot work in your part of the world, which somewhat alarmed me for your safety; but I comforted myself with considering that you are not altogether so desperate a soldier as you are a lawyer.
It is a wonderful consolation indeed to your friends to be assured that your passions are not an overmatch for your prudence. Thus, as much as I know you love the water, you would not venture1

1 The ludicrous author of the "Tale of a Tub" has applied this passage with more humour, perhaps, than it tends seriously. In his account of the proceedings of the several absurd doctrines of philosophy and religion that have prevailed in the world, by supposing that every system-maker is always sure of finding a set of disciples whose taste of understanding is exactly pitched to the absurdity and extravagance of his tenets. "And in this one circumstance," says he, "lives all the skill or lack of the matter. Cicero understood this very well, when writing to a friend in England, with a caution, among other matters, to beware of being cheated by our hackneycoachmen, who, he says, in three days, are as many rascals as they are now; has these remarkable words:
est good pautiec te in ista loca venisse, ubi aequitas sapere vidercer. For, to speak a bold truth, it is a fatal miscarriage, so ill to order affairs, as to pass for a fool in one company, when in another you might be treated as a philosopher; which I desire some certain gentlemen of my acquaintance to lay up in their hearts as a very se-mine admonishment."—Tale of a Tub, p. 164.

2 Trebatius, it is probable, bad informed Cicero, in the letter to which this is an answer, that he had been summoned by Caesar to attend him as his assessor upon some trial; which seems to have led our author into the rallies of this and the preceding passages.

3 Marcus and Manilius, it must be supposed, were two lawyers; or particular friends of Trebatius, as the humours of this witticism evidently consist in an allusion to that profession.

4 In the original it is studiorum situs homo natandi, the
I find, to cross it with Caesar; and though nothing could keep you from the combats 1 in Rome, you were much too wise I perceive to attend them in Britain.

But pleasantry apart: you know without my telling you what zeal I have recommended you to Caesar; though perhaps you may not be apprised, that I have frequently as well as warmly written to him upon that subject. I had for some time indeed kept my son's solicitations, as I would not seem to distrust his friendship and generosity; however, I thought proper in my last to remind him once more of his promise. I desire you would let me know what effect my letter has produced, and at the same time give me a full account of everything that concerns you. For I am exceedingly anxious to be informed of the prospect and situation of your affairs, as well as how long you imagine your absence is likely to continue. Be persuaded that nothing could reconcile me to this separation, but the certainty of its proving to your advantage. In any other view, I should not be so impolitic as not to insist on your return; as you would be too prudent I dare say to delay it. The truth is, one hour's gay or serious conversation ambiguity of which could not have been preserved in a more literal translation. The art of swimming was among the number of polite exercises in ancient Rome, and esteemed a necessary qualification for every gentleman. Thus we find Cato the elder himself instructing his son in this accomplishment; as Augustus likewise performed the same office in the education of his two grandsons, Caius and Lucius. It was, indeed, one of the essential arts in military discipline, as both the soldiers and officers had frequently no other means of pursuing or retreating from the enemy. Accordingly the Campus Martius, a place where the Roman youth were taught the science of arms, was situated on the banks of the Tiber; and they constantly finished their exercises of this kind by throwing themselves into the river. This shows the wonderful propriety of those noble lines which Shakespeare puts into the mouth of Caesar, in that masterly scene where he is endeavouring to sound the sentiments, and火灾 the indignation of Brutus towards Caesar.

We can both endure the winter's cold as well as he. For once upon a raw and gusty day, The troubled Tiber clashing with his shores, Caesar says to me, "Darest thou, Cæsarius, now Leap in with me into this angry flood, And swim to yonder point?" Upon the word, Accosted as I was, I plunged in, And bade him follow: so indeed he did. The torrent roared, and we did buffet it With lusty sinews, throwing it aside, And stemming it with hearts of controversy. But ere we could arrive the point proposed, Caesar cried, "Help me, Cæsarius, or I sink!" I, as Zeno's, our great ancestor, Did from the flames of Troy, upon his shoulder, The old Anchises bear, so from the waves of Tiber Did I the tired Caesar: and this man is now become a God, &c.

Monseigneur Ducler observes, that this passage of Cicero discovers the impiety of those verses in Horace, where Trebutius is represented as advising the Roman satirist to swim across the Tiber, as an excellent remedy against his pastoral poverty; since, like other physicians, he prescribed a regimen, it seems, most agreeable to his own taste and conceit.—Plut. in Vit. Catb. Censor.; Suet. in Vit. August. 64; Veget. de Re Milit. i. 10; Ducler, Rem. sur la Sat. i. du liv. ii. d'Heracle.

1 Alluding to his fondness of the gladiatorial games.
2 See rem. 7, p. 391.

Together is of more importance to us than all the foes and all the friends that the whole nation of Gaul can produce. I intreat you therefore to send me an immediate account in what posture your affairs stand; and he assured, as honest Chremes says to his neighbour in the play

Whatever cares thy lab'ring bestowed grow,
My tongue shall soothe them, or my hand relieve."

Farewell.

LETTER XVI.

To the same.

You remember the character given of the Phrygians in the play 3, "that their wisdom ever came too late:" but you are resolved, my dear cautious old gentleman 4, that no impudence of this kind shall be fixed upon you. Thank heaven, indeed, you wisely subdued the romantic spirit of your first letters, as you were not so obstinately bent upon new adventures, as to hazard a voyage for that purpose into Britain; and who, in truth, can blame you? It is the same disposition, I imagine, that has immovably fixed you in your winter quarters, and certainly there is nothing like acting with circumspection upon all occasions. Take my word for it, prudence is the safest shield.

If it were usual with me to sup from home, most undoubtedly I could not refuse your gallant friend Octavius. I will own, however, I love to mortify the man's vanity; and whenever he invites me I always affect to look with some surprise, as not seeming to recollect his person. Seriously, he is a wondrous pretty fellow; what pity it is that you did not take him abroad with you 5.

Let me know how you are employed, and whether there is any probability of seeing you in Italy this winter. Balbus assures me, that you will certainly return immensely rich; but whether he means in the vulgar sense, or agreeably to the maxim of his friends the Stoics, who maintain, you know, "that every man is rich who has the free enjoyment of earth and air," is a doubt which time will clear up.

I find, by those who come from your part of the world, that you are grown wonderfully reserved; for they tell me you answer no queries. However, it is on all hands a settled point, (and you have

1 In Terence's play called the "Self-torminator."
2 A tragedy called the "Trojan Horse," which seems, by Cicero's frequent quotations from it, to have been in great esteem.
3 The celebrated Monsieur Ducler produces this passage as a proof that Trebutius must have been more than four-score years of age, when Horace addressed the satirist to him mentioned in the remarks on the preceding letter. But that learned critic has been led into this error by taking in a serious sense, what Cicero most evidently meant in a ludicrous one.
4 See the conclusion of let. xiii. p. 394.
5 The Witticism of this passage consists in the double sense of the verb respondere, which, besides its common acceptation, signifies likewise the giving an opinion as a lawyer. This conceit, such as it is, seems to have been a favourite one with our author, for he repeats it in a subsequent letter, where he is rallying another of his friends upon an occasion of the same nature.—See rem. 10 on letter 23 of this book. But—reason, certainly, to congratulate yourself upon it,) that you are the most profound sage in the law throughout the whole city of Samarobriva. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

To Lentulus.

It is with singular pleasure I perceive, by your letter, that you are sensible, I will not say of my affection only, but of my devotion towards you. Even that sacred term, indeed, can but ill express the sentiments you merit from me; and if you esteem yourself (as you would persuade me) obliged by my endeavours to serve you, it is your friendship alone which can make you think so. I am sure, at least, I could not refuse you my best good offices without being guilty of the most unpardonable ingratitude. You would have experienced, however, much stronger and more powerful instances of my friendship if, instead of being thus long separated from each other, we had passed this interval together at Rome. It is not only in the particular article you mention, and in which no man is more qualified to shine, that I impatiently wish to receive you as my coadjutor: It is not, I say, in the senate alone that our amicable concurrence would have been distinguished—it would have appeared conspicuous, my friend, in every act of public concernment. (Suffer me then to add, previously to the information you request me to give you of my political sentiments and situation, that if fortune had not thus divided us I should have enjoyed in you a wise and faithful guide, as you would have found in me a kind, a friendly, and, perhaps, no unexperienced associate. However, I rejoice (as undoubtedly I ought) at the honourable occasion of your absence, and in which your military conduct and success has procured you the illustrious title of imperator. Nevertheless, I must repeat it again, it is owing to this circumstance that you not received far more abundant and efficacious fruits of that friendship to which you have so undisputed a claim. In particular, I should most strenuously have united with you in taking just vengeance on those whose ill offices you have experienced, partly in resentment of your having supported and protected me in my adversity, and partly as they envy you the glory of so generous an action. One of them, however, has sufficiently anticipated our revenge, and drawn down by his own hands the chastisement he merits from ours. The person I mean is that man who has ever distinguished himself by opposing his benefactors, and who, after having received from you the highest services, singled you out as the object of his impotent malice. This man, in consequence of being detected in his late infamous attempts, has entirely and irretrievably lost at once both his honour and his liberty.(5) As to yourself,

1 In not obtaining the commission to replace Piso on his throne.

2 He was embezzled with Appius, as being the brother of his inveterate enemy, Clodius.

3 It was customary at trials for the person arraigned to produce witnesses to his character, who were called laudatores, and ten was the number requisite for this purpose.

4 Vatinius was tribune of the people in the consulate of Cesar, and had been in the number of Cicero’s most inveterate enemies, as he was his constant opposer likewise in politics. He was a man of a most abandoned character, and whose person (as Paeranius assures us) was not less deformed than his mind. A very learned and polished writer, whose just esteem for Cicero’s writings has betrayed him, perhaps, into some partiality towards his actions, acknowledges that “the defence of Vatinius gave a plausible handle for some censure upon Cicero.” The truth of it is, the censure was more than plausible, for nothing certainly could discover more meanness of spirit than thus, in compliance with those in power, not only to defend Vatinius as an advocate, but to bear public testimony likewise to his general good conduct. Some colourful excuse, indeed, may be given for the former, by considering it in the light which Valerius Maximus has placed it, as an instance of Cicero’s generosity towards his enemies; but the latter seems to stand beyond the reach even of a plausible justification.—Vell. Pat. II. 69; Val. Max. IV. 59.

5 The conjecture of Manutius seems highly probable, that the person to whom Cicero alludes is Calus Cato, whose ill offices to Lentulus have been often mentioned in the preceding letters. But what the secret practices were which had been discovered so much to his disgrace, is a point in which history does not afford any light.
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

Cicero had ceased the original inscription, and placed his own name in its stead. — See rem. * on this letter, p. 370.

2 Clodius, after having procured a law which declared it treason to vote or take any step towards recalling Cicero from his banishment, proceeded to pillage and burn all his houses both in town and country. Cicero, however, being restored in the manner which he himself will relate, in a subsequent part of this letter, the senate decreed that his houses should be rebuilt at the public expense. But while the workmen were employed on his Palatine house, and he had carried it up almost to the roof, Clodius made a second attack, and after driving them off, set fire to the adjoining edifice, which belonged to Cicero's brother, and wherein he himself likewise at that time was; so that they were both obliged to make their escape with the utmost precipitation. — Ad Att. iv. v. 352.

3 His house upon the Palatine hill in Rome, together with his Tusculum and Formian villas, were jointly estimated at 29,000l. a valuation universally condemned as extremely unequitable. But "those who had elipt his wings (as he expresses himself in a letter to Atticus upon this occasion) were not disposed they should grow again." It seems highly probable that Lentulus himself was in this number; as it appears, by a letter of our author to his brother, that he had reasons to be dissatisfied with his conduct towards him. But though, in the passage before us, he speaks of the injustice that had been done him, as arising solely from those who were concerned with Lentulus in taking an estimate of his losses; yet, at the same time, he expresses himself in such a manner, as to throw a very artful reproach upon the latter. — Ad Att. iv. 2; Ad Quint. Frat. ii. 2.

4 * P. Sextius was a tribune of the people A. U. 606 in the consilium of Lentulus, and a great instrument in restoring Cicero. He resisted the faction of Clodius by force of arms in the year 608. In the following year, accused of public violence by M. Tullius Albinovanus, Cicero defended him in an excellent oration, which is still extant, and he was acquitted by the suffrages of all the judges." — Rose.

5 Declared the senator, on the triumphs of that year, accused of public violence by M. Tullius Albinovanus. Cicero defended him in an excellent oration, which is still extant, and he was acquitted by the suffrages of all the judges. — Rose.

6 Vatinius was joint consul with J. Caesar A. U. 694. The senate secured the election of the former, in order to his being a check to the ambitious designs of assorted, likewise, upon another occasion (and asserted too in the hearing of Pompey,) that the same persons who confined Bibulus to his house had driven me from mine. Indeed, the whole series of those interrogatories, which I put to Vatinius at this trial, was merely designed as an invective against his tribunate; and I particularly exposed, with much freedom and indignation, his contempt of the auspices, his corrupt disposal of foreign kingdoms, together with the rest of his violent and illegal proceedings. But it was not only upon this occasion that I spoke thus unre- servedly, I frequently avowed my sentiments with the same resolute spirit in the same senate. Thus, when Marcellinus and Philippus were consuls, I carried a motion, when the affair of the Campanian lands should be referred to the re-consideration of a full house, on the 15th of May following. Now tell his colleague; and it was thought of so much importance to the republic that he should be chosen, that even Cato did not scruple upon this occasion to employ methods of bribery for that purpose. But Bibulus, after many vain efforts of persuasion and bribing, was opposed in the forum by Caesar's mob, at length withdrew from the functions of his office, and voluntarily confined himself (as Suetonius relates) to his own house; though by the expression which Tully here uses, it rather seems as if Caesar had employed some force in keeping him there. After which, as the same historian informs us, Caesar governed the republic without control. — Sue. in Vit. Jul. Cæs. c. 50.

7 Cicero, instead of examining Vatinius upon the facts in his evidence against Sextus, put to him a series of questions in such an artful manner, that he exposed all the intrigues and iniquity of his tribunate. This examination is still extant, under the title of Interrogatio in Vatinium." — Rose.

8 It is wholly unfaithful to what particular facts Cicero alludes, when he imputes to Vatinius what he calls the donatio regnerum; however, by comparing this expression with the oration to which it refers, and with a passage in a letter to Atticus, it seems probable that Vatinius, when he was tribune, had been bribed to procure a confirmation from the people of some disputed regal title, and passed to obtain assistance from the republic, in transferring a contested crown from its rightful possessor into the hands of a usurper. It is certain at least that such unworthy methods were frequently practised at this time, in order to gratify the vanity of those degenerate Romans. — Orat. in Vatini., Ad Att. ii. 9.

9 They were consuls, A. U. 697.

10 The lands in Campania, a district in Italy, now called the Terra di Lavoro, in the kingdom of Naples, were partly appropriated to the use of the republic, and partly to private hands. Caesar had procured a law for dividing the former among 25,000 poor citizens, and for purchasing the latter in order to distribute them in the same manner. Both these designs seem to have been very artfully calculated by Caesar to promote and facilitate his grand purpose of usurping the supreme power. For by parceling out these lands among the common people which belonged to the republic, he secured the populace to his interest, and, at the same time, deprived the government of those very considerable supplies, both of money and corn, which it derived from its demesnes in Campania; as on the other side, by purchasing the remainder of these estates, he must necessarily have weakened those public treasures which were already much impoverished, and which, consequently, were indispensably necessary for opposing his ambitious measures. — Sue. in Vit. Jul. Cæs. 20; Cic. Agr. ii. 59.

11 A decree of the senate had not its complete effect, unless it passed in a full house; that is, when a sufficient number of the members were present. It seems, by a passage which Manutius quotes from Dio, l. 54, that before the times of Augustus, who made some alteration me, my friend, could I possibly have made a holder or more formidable attack upon this party? Could I possibly have given a more convincing evidence that I had not departed from my old principles, notwithstanding all the schemes I had formerly suffered for the sake of. The truth of it is, they made great exasperated not only those whom it was reasonable to expect it would offend, but others upon whom I did not imagine it would have had any such effect. Pompey, soon after this decree had passed, set forward upon his expedition into Sardinia and Africa, without giving me the least intimation of his being disgusted. In his way thither he had a conference with Caesar at Lucca, who made great complaints of this motion. He had before, it seems, been informed of it by Crassus at Ravenna, who took that opportunity of incensing him against me: and it appeared afterwards that Pompey was likewise much dissatisfied upon the same account. This I learned from several hands, but particularly from my brother, who met him in Sardinia a few days after he had left Lucca. Pompey told him he was extremely glad of that, and extremely satisfied with the way he had been treated, and wished much to talk with him. He began with saying, that as my brother stood engaged for my conduct, he should expect him to exert all his endeavours to influence me accordingly. Pompey then proceeded very warmly to remonstrate against my late motion in the senate; reminding my brother of his services to us both, and particularly of what had passed between them, concerning Caesar's edicts, and of those assurances, he said, my brother had given him of the measures I would pursue with respect to that article. He added, that my brother himself was a witness that the steps he had formerly taken for procuring my recall were with the full consent and approbation of Caesar. Upon the whole, therefore, he entreated him, if it were either therein, the number requisite to make an act valid was 400.

8 This expedition of Pompey into Sardinia and Africa, was in pursuance of the commission with which he had been invested in carrying the public magazines with corn. See p. 345.

9 Lucca was a frontier town in Caesar's province of Cisalpine Gaul, adjoining to Italy: it still subsists under the same name, and is a celebrated republic. It was Caesar's policy, at the end of every campaign, to fix his winter-quarters as near Italy as possible, in order to be within observation of what passed at Rome. A numerous court was immediately formed around him in these places of his residence, consisting of the most distinguished persons in Rome, and the neighbouring provinces, and no less than 200 senators have been observed among the attendants upon these occasions. Candidates for offices; young men who had run out their estates; and, in a word, all whose affairs of any kind were embarrassed, flocked to him in those cities; and he received liberal concessions to their respective wants and interests, he strengthened his faction, and forwarded his grand enterprise. It was thus (as the judicious Plutarch observes) he had the address to employ the forces of the republic against Gaul, and the spirit of Gaul against the republic—Plut. in Vit. Jul. Cæs. at Pomp.; Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cæs.

2 This alludes to those engagements which Quintus Cicero entered into behalf of his brother, in order to induce Pompey to favour his recall from banishment. And it appears by what follows, that he promised, on the part of Cicero, an unlimited resignation to the measures of that ambitious chief.
thau history has taught me, when the power of the commonwealth was in worthless and wicked hands. In such a conjuncture, no hope of interest (which I have at all times most heartily contended) nor fear of danger (which upon some occasions, however, has influenced the greater part) should prevail with me to co-operate in their measures; no, not though I were attached to them by the strongest ties of friendship and gratitude. But when a man of Pompey's distinguished character presides over the republic; a man who has acquired that eminence of power and honour by the most heroic actions and the most signal services; I could not imagine it would be imputed to me as a levity of disposition if, in some few instances, I declined a little from my general maxims and complied with his inclinations. But my justification, I thought, would still rise in strength when it should be remembered that I favoured his credit and dignity even from the earliest part of my life, as I particularly promoted them in my pretorship and consulate; when it should be remembered that he not only assisted me with his vote and his influence in the senate during my adversity, but joined his counsels and his efforts with yours for the same generous and amiable ends. And I would further be remembered that he has no other enemy in the whole commonwealth, except the man who is my professed adversary. In consequence of these sentiments, it was absolutely necessary for me, you see, to unite with Cæsar, as one who was joined in the same views and the same interest. His friendship, likewise, which you are sensible my brother and I have long shared, together with his humane and generous disposition, which I have abundantly experienced both by his late letters and his good offices towards me, contributed greatly to confirm me in these resolutions. To which I must add, that the commonwealth in general seemed to be most strongly averse from giving any opposition to these extraordinary men; more especially after Cæsar had performed such great and glorious exploits for the honour of his country. But what had still a farther and very powerful weight in my deliberations, was Pompey's having engaged both my word and my heart to Cæsar, as my brother had given the same assurances to Pompey.

Plato, I remembered, lays it down as a maxim, in his divine writings, that "the people generally model their manners and their sentiments by those of the great;" a maxim which, at this juncture, I thought merited my particular attention. I was convinced, indeed, of its truth when I reflected on the vigorous resolutions which were taken in the senate on the memorable noes of December; and it seemed no wonder so noble a spirit should appear in that assembly, after the animating example I had given them upon my first entering on the consular office. I reflected, also, that, during the whole time which intervened between the expiration of my consulship and that of Cæsar and Bibulus, when I still retained a very considerable authority in the senate, all the better part of the republic were united in their sentiments. On the other hand, about the time you took possession of your government in Spain, the commonwealth could not properly be said to be under the administration of consuls as of infamous barbarians of provinciers, and the mean vassals and ministers of sedition. It was then that discord and faction spread through all ranks amongst us; and I was marked out as the victim of party rage. In this critical season, however, not only every man of worth, but the greater part of the senators, and indeed all Italy in general, rose up with remarkable unanimity in my cause. What the event proved, I hope, will be the subject of another address; but it should be imputed to a complication of errors and artifices. But this I will say, it was not forces, so much as leaders to conduct them, that were wanting to me at this crisis. I must add, that whatever censure

The fifth. It was on this day, in the consulship of Cicero and Antonius, A. U. 690, that the senate came to a resolution of inflicting capital punishment on all those who were concerned in Catiline's conspiracy: "And it is certain (as the learned and polite historian of Cicero's life observes), that Rome was addressed to him on this day for one of the greatest deliverances which it had ever received since its foundation; and which nothing, perhaps, but his vigilance and sagacity could have so happily effected."—Life of Cicero, p. 61.

Cicero was chosen consul in the year of Rome 690, Cæsar and Bibulus in the year 694.

The consulate to whom Cicero alludes, are Lucius Calpurnius Piso, whose daughter Cæsar had married, and Titus Gabinus, a dependant and favourite of Pompey. They succeeded Cæsar and Bibulus, who were expelled from the year when Cicero went into exile: "Cicero secured them to his measures by a private contract to procure for them, by a grant from the people, two of the best governments of the empire: Piso was to have Macedonia, with Greece and Thrace; Gabinus, Cilicia. For this time they agreed to serve him in all his designs, particularly in the oppression of Cicero."—Life of Cicero, p. 88.

Cicero procured a law, importing; "that whoever had taken the life of a citizen uncondemned, and without a trial, should be prohibited from fire and water." Though Cicero was not named, yet he was marked out by this law. His crime was, the putting Catiline's accomplices to death; which, though not done by his single authority, but by a general vote of the senate, and, after a solemn hearing and debate, was alleged to be illegal, and contrary to the liberties of the people. Cicero, finding himself thus reduced to the condition of a criminal, changed his habit upon it, as was usual in the case of a public impeachment, and appeared in a mourning gown, to excite the compassion of his fellow-citizens; whilst Cicodes, at the head of his mob, contrived to meet and insult him at every turn. But Cicero soon gathered friends enough to secure him from such insults; and the whole body of the knights, together with the equestrian nobility, to the number of 40,000, headed by Crassus, the son, changed their habit, and perpetually attended him about the city to implore the protection and assistance of the people."—Plut. in Vit. Cicer. ; Orat. post Red. ; Life of Cicero, p. 88.

may justly fall on those who refused me their assistance, most certainly they who first promised it and then deserted me are not less to be blamed. In a word, if some of my friends really well be regarded, though sincere, counsels they gave me, how much more severe must their condemnation prove, who artfully alarmed me with their pretended fears? Let it be noted at the same time to my honour, that zealous as my fellow-citizens showed themselves to rise up in the defence of a man who had formerly stood forth in theirs, yet I would not suffer them to be exposed (un supported as they were by those who ought to have been their protectors) to the barbarous insults of a lawless banditti. On the contrary, I rather chose the world should judge by the power of my friends in recalling me from my exile, what their honest unanimity could have effected, had I permitted them to have drawn their swords to prevent it.

You were sensible of this general zeal in my favour, when you undertook my cause, not only encouraged, but contributed, by your influence and authority. I shall always most willingly acknowledge, that you were assisted upon this occasion by some of the most considerable persons in Rome; who, it must be owned, exerted themselves with much greater vigour in procuring my return, than in preventing my banishment.

And had they persisted in the same resolute disposition, they might have recovered their own authority at the same time that they obtained my restoration. The spirits, in truth, of the aristocratical part of the republic were, at this juncture, greatly raised and animated by the inflexible patriotism of your conduct during your consulship, together with Pompey's concurrence in the same measures. Caesar, likewise, when he saw the senate distinguishing his glorious actions by the most singular and unprecedented honours, joined in adding weight to the authority of that assembly. Had these happy circumstances, therefore, been rightly improved, it would have been impossible for any ill-designing citizen to have violated the laws and liberties of the commonwealth. But let me entreat you to reflect on a moment on the subsequent conduct of my political associates. In the first place, they screened from punishment that infamous intruder on the matron-mysteries, who showed no more reverence for the awful ceremonies of the goddess in whose honour these sacred solemnities are celebrated, than for the chastity of his three sisters. And thus, by preventing a worthy tribunal of the people from obtaining that justice upon Ciclius which he endeavoured to procure, they deprived future times of a most salutary example of chastised sedition. Did not they suffer, likewise, that monument, that glorious monument, which was erected, not indeed with the spoils I had gained in foreign wars, but by the generosity of the senate for my civil services; did they not most shamefully suffer it to be inscribed with the name of the cruel and avowed enemy of his country? Obliged most certainly I am to them for having restored me to the commonwealth; but I could wish they had conducted themselves, not only like physicians, whose views terminate merely in the health of their patients, but like the Alipiae.

[Lentulus, immediately upon entering on his consul office, A. U. 666, moved the senate that Cicero might be restored; in which he was seconded by Pompey with much zeal, and the whole house unanimously concurred in the motion. Nevertheless, a state was interposing its negative, no decree could pass at that time; nevertheless, it was with one consent resolved, that, on the 22d of the same month, a special should be appointed to the people for Cicero's recall. When the appointed day arrived, Cicero sulleyed that he could not succeed in the possession of Ciclius, who had planted his mole there over-night, in order to prevent the promulgation of this law. A very bloody skirmish ensued, in which several lives were lost, and many other outrages committed; in consequence of which, Ciclius was impeached by Milo as a disturber of the public peace. But Metellus, the colleague of Lentulus, together with Appius the praetor, and Serranus the tribune, determined to screen Ciclius; and accordingly, by a most dangerous exercise of their authority, they published their several votes, and declared farther proceedings in this prosecution to be discontinued. It was a very impolitic power (as a late Ingenious writer upon government observes) which was lodged in the tribunes, of thus preventing the execution of the laws as well as the passing of them, and which caused infinite mischiefs to the republic.—Oral. pro Sext. 34, 35, 41; L'Esprit des Loix, I. 223.]

also, who endeavour to establish the spirits and vigour of those under their care. Whereas they have acted with regard to me, as Apelles did in relation to his celebrated picture of Venus?; they have finished one part of their work with great skill and accuracy, but left all the rest a mere rude and imperfect sketch.

In one article, however, I had the satisfaction to disappoint my enemies. They imagined my banishment would have wronged as the same effect on me, which they falsely supposed a calamity of a like kind produced formerly in Quintus Metellus. This excellent person (whom I look upon to have been a man of the greatest fortitude and magnanimity of any in his times) they represented as broken and dispirited after his return from exile*. But if the athletic combatants, by omissions and other proper methods, for rendering them vigorous and active in their gymnastic exercises.

* Apelles, one of the greatest masters of painting in ancient Greece, was a native of Coes, and flourished in the 11th Olymp. or about 332 years before Christ. His principal excellency consisted in the inimitable grace which distinguished all his performances. Fliny the elder, bas, by a very strong expression, informed us that the imitating force of his pencil; πίναξις (says that author, quæ peripetiam non possunt, toinimua, fulgura et fulgetara). He could even convey ideas which seemed impossible to be raised by colours, and animate his sublime pieces with all the terrors of thunder and lightning. His capital performance was a figure of Venus, which was so admired, that a copy of it has been at Rome in the times of Augustus. The lower parts of this picture being damaged, no painter would venture to re touched. Something of the same kind is mentioned to the honour of Raphael, who restored a painting by Metelli at Rome, being so much disfigured, as it was with the greatest difficulty that even Carlo Maratti was prevailed upon to restore them. Apelles began a second figure of Venus, which he intended should excel his first; but he died before he had proceeded any farther in that design than the head and shoulders.—Quintil. xii. 10; Plin. Hist. Nat. xxxiv. 10; Réflex. sur la Poés. et sur la Peint.

Q. Cecilius Metellus was in the number of those who opposed the faction of Caius Marius; in consequence of which he was at length driven into exile. On his return, his sentence was this: Saturninus, a tribune of the people, and creature of Marius, proposed a law in the year 653, which, among other things enacted, that "the senators should swear to ratify whatever the people proposed," Metellus. He was ordered to be absent from the city of ancient Rome; resolutely refused to take, and when his friends represented to him the dangerous consequences which would probably attend his persevering in that honest resolution, he nobly replied, "It is the characteristic of a man of virtue and honour to act rightly, whatever consequences may ensue." Accordingly, a decree passed in an assembly of the people for his banishment; and when his friends offered him their assistance to withstand this piece of public injustice, he generously refused their aid. —"For," said he, "either public virtue or private interest will be obtained, and the people will repent of the injury they have done me; and then I shall be recalled with honour: or they will continue in the same sentiments; and in that case banishment will be a happiness." He greatly chose, therefore, to submit to the destructive policy of his country; and, retiring to Rhodes, he calmly spent his time in philosophical studies. His virtues, however, prevailed at last over the iniquity of his persecutors, and he was restored to the republic, notwithstanding all the opposition of Marius. Cicero has recorded a circumstance relative to Metellus, that gives one the highest idea of the character he enjoyed amongst his countrymen. He was accused, it seems, by the Marian faction, of having been guilty of public extortion; but when he entered upon his defence, and produced his accounts, the judges refused to inspect them, as being well convinced that Metellus had a soul broken he really were, it could not be the effect of his adversity; as it is certain he submitted to his sentence without the least reluctance, and lived under it, not only with indifferency, but with cheerfulness. The truth is, no man ever equalled him in the strength and heroism of his mind; no, not even the celebrated Marcus Scaurus*. Nevertheless, such as they had heard, or, at least, chose to imagine Metellus to have been, they figured me to themselves, if I but endeavoured, even yet more abject. They reverse, however, proved to be the case, and that general concern which the whole republic expressed at my absence, inspired me with more vigorous spirits than I had ever before enjoyed. The fact is, that the sentence of banishment against Metellus was repealed by a law proposed only by a single tribune of the people; whereas, I was recalled from mine upon the motion of the consul himself(1), and by a law in which every magistrate of Rome concurred. Let me add, likewise, that each order and degree in the commonwealth, besides the senate, and supported by all Italy, zealously much too enlarged to be capable of anything so mean as injustice. I cannot forbear mentioning likewise a noble instance of the expressions of friendship for my banishment, as it shows the spirit with which he bore his misfortune. Illi (inimi mei, fure et honestate interiidi; ego neque aqua neque igni careo, et summa gloria fruor."

Whilest my enemies," says he, "vanily hoped to banish me from the common benefit of a country, who, however, I still enjoy, together with the highest glory, they have much more severely banished from their own breasts all sentiments of justice and honour." One cannot but acknowledge with regret, that neither the enemies nor the friends of Cicero, when they compared him to Metellus; for, besides the great superiority of the latter in the present instance, he, upon all occasions, acted consistently with his avowed political principles, and preserved a uniform and unalloyed reputation to the end of his days.—Plut. in Vit. C. Mar.; Ad Att. i. 10; Orat. pro Balbo, in princep.; Aul. Gel. xvii. 2; Sallust. Bell. Jugurth. 47.

a M. Æmilius Scaurus was advanced a second time to the honour of this important office, in the year of Rome 666, having enjoyed that dignity eighteen years before. He is mentioned by Cicero among the orators of that age; but there was more of force and authority in what he delivered, than of grace in his manner, or elegance in his expression. He was the last abuser of the office of censor, and is notorious to the present generation, of what I transacted before they were born. But, notwithstanding the greater part of this assembly are too young to have been witnesses of the services and honours of my former life, I will venture to rest the whole of the great man, in a letter written during his time, then, asserts, that Scaurus was bribed to betray his country: Scaurus, on the other hand, utterly denies that he ever was tainted with a crime of this nature. Now lay your hands upon your hearts, and tell me, my fellow citizens, to which of these two men you will give credit? The people were so struck with the honest simplicity of this speech, that Scaurus was dismissed with honour, and his infamous accuser blasted out of the assembly.—De Clar. Orat. 110, 111; Val. Max. iii. 7; Sallust. Bell. Jugurth. Orat. pro Ponticulo; In Vit. Bell. Jugurth. united in one common effort for recovering me to my country. Yet, high as these unexampled honours were, there was never elated my heart with pride, or tempted me to assume an air which could give just offence even to the most malevolent of my enemies. The whole of my ambition is, not to be wanting either in advice or assistance to my friends; or even to those whom I have no great reason to rank in that number. It is this, perhaps, which has given the real ground of complaint to those who view only the lustre of my reconciliations, but cannot be sensible of the pains and solicitude they cost me. But whatever the true cause may be, the pretended one, is, my having promoted the honours of Caesar; a circumstance which they interpret, it seems, as a renunciation of my old maxims. The genuine motives, however, of my conduct, in this instance, are not only what I just before mentioned, but particularly what I hinted in the beginning of my letter, and will now more fully explain.

You will now find then, my friend, the aristocratical part of the republic disposed to pursue the same system as when you left them. That system, I mean, which I endeavoured to establish when I was consul, and which, though afterwards occasionally interrupted, and at length entirely overthrown, was again fully restored during your administration. It is now, however, totally abandoned by those who ought most strenuously to have supported it. I do not assert this upon the credit only of appearances, in which it is exceedingly easy to dispense; I speak it upon the unquestionable evidence of facts, and the public proceedings of those who were styled patriots in my consulate. The general scheme of politics, therefore, being thus changed, it is time, most certainly, for every man of prudence (in which number I have the ambition to be justly accounted) to very likewise his particular plan. Accordingly that chief and favourite guide of my principles, whom I have already quoted, the divine Plato himself, advises not to press any political point farther than is consonant with the general sense of the community; for methods of violence, he maintains, are no more to be used towards one's country than one's parent. Upon this maxim, he tells us, he declined engaging in public affairs; and, as he found the people of Athens could not be engaged in the notion of government, he did not think it lawful to attempt by force what he despaired of effecting by persuasion. My situation, however, is, in this respect, different from Plato's: for, on the one hand, as I have already embarked in public affairs, it is too late to deliberate whether I should now enter upon them or not: so, on the other, the Roman people are by no means so incapable of judging of their true interest, as he represents the Athenians. It is my happiness, indeed, to be able by the same measures, to consult at once both my own and my country's welfare. To these considerations I must add those uncommon acts of generosity which Caesar has exorted both towards my brother and myself; so much, indeed, beyond all example, that, even whatever had been his success, I should have thought it incumbent upon me at least to have defended him. But now, distinguished as he is by such a wonderful series of prosperity, and crowned with so many glorious victories, I cannot but esteem it duty which I owe the republic, to extract from all personal obligations to himself, to promote his honours as far as lies in my power. And believe me, it is at once my confession and my glory, that, next to you, together with the other generous authors of my restoration, there is not a man in the world from whom I have received such amicable offices.

And now, having laid before you the principal motives of my conduct in general, I shall have the better able to satisfy you concerning my behaviour with respect to Cassius and Vatinius in particular: for as to Appius and Caesar, I have the pleasure to find that you acquit me of all reproach.

My reconciliation then with Vatinius was effected by the mediation of Pompey, soon after the former was elected praetor. I must confess, when he petitioned to be admitted a candidate for that office, I very warmly opposed him in the senate; judging an union most evidently calculated for the ruin of the commonwealth. This reasoning is not built merely upon distant speculation, but is supported by the express testimony of one who was not only an actor in this important scene, but well understood the plot that was carrying on.

"You are mistaken," said Cato, to those who were lamenting the breach that afterwards happened between Pompey and Cicero; and, that it was mistaken in old age, but that on that event; they owe their rise to another cause, and began, not when Pompey and Caesar became enemies, but when they were made friends." The difficulty of justifying Cicero in this measure, grows still stronger, when it is remembered that he must have been sensible at this very time how much was to be dreaded from the power of these his pretended friends. For he assures Atticus, in a letter which was written at the breaking out of the civil war, that he foresaw the storm that was gathering to destroy the republic, fourteen years before it fell, and has told the union of these ambitious chiefs, sacerdotes conscriptionis fides, a wicked confederacy. To which he adds, that they had upon all occasions preferred the interest of their families and the advancement of their power to the honour and welfare of their country.—Plut., in Vit. Pompe.; Ad Att. x. 4.

On the passage in the original, it is acknowledged, does not absolutely imply the sense which is given to it in the translation. It runs thus:—"cum quidem ego ejus petitionem gravissimam in senatu sententia oppugnaveram." But it is not easy to conceive in what manner the competition between Cato and Vatinius, in relation to the office of praetor, could come before the senate, unless the authority of that assembly were some way necessary in nominating or recommending the candidates to the people.

This sentence has been thought by some, one of Pliny's letters,—"Meo suffragio," says he, speaking of a friend, for whom, not being legally qualified to sue for the tribunate, he had obtained a dispensation from the emperor for that purpose, "Meo suffragio perveniit ad jus tribunitium potestas, quem non obtinui in senatu, vere ne descissae Cesarei vizard."—i. 9. That the senate originally claimed this prerogative with respect to the election of kings, is indisputable. "Patres decreventum," as Livy informs us, "at cum populo regem jussemset, id sic rectum esse, id patres annecteres fierent."—i. 12. It is equally clear, likewise, that the senate exercised a privilege of the same
To Several of His Friends,

Having thus explained my conduct with regard to Vatinus, I will now lay before you these motives which determined me in respect to Crassus. I was willing, for the sake of the common cause, to bury in oblivion the many and great injuries I had formerly received from him. Agreeably to this disposition, as we were then upon good terms, I should have borne his unexpected defence of Gabinius, (whom he had very lately with so much warmth opposed) if he had avoided all personal reflections on myself. But when, with the most unprompted violence, he broke in upon me whilst I was in the midst of my speech, I must confess it raised my indignation; and, perhaps, I took fire so much the sooner, as possibly there still remained in my heart some latent sparks of my former resentment. However, my behaviour in the senate upon this occasion was much and generally applauded. Among the rest, I was complimented—likewise by the same men whom I have often hinted at in this letter, and who acknowledged I had rendered a very essential service to their cause, by that spirit which I had thus displayed. In short, they advised me to speak of me in public, as being now, indeed, restored to the commonwealth in the best and most glorious sense. Nevertheless, they had the malice in their private conversations (as I was informed by persons of undoubted honour) to take note of the unbecoming purchase of the bar with their rational policy to take advantage of that dissatisfaction, and endeavour by an artful management to gain him over to the cause of liberty. But Cicero's engaging in the support of Gabinius cannot be justified by any political reason of this nature, and to speak truth it seems to be altogether without excuse. For Vatinus was actually in league with the enemies of his country; to espouse his cause, therefore, was to strengthen his faction, and sacrifice public interest to private pugno. 1

1 See the remarks on the 7th letter of this book, particularly rem. 1, and 2.

J. Aulus Gabinius was consul the same year in which Cicero was so outrageously persecuted by Ciccius, with the avowed and aspersive declaration, that he was the most zealously concerned. To give his character as Cicero himself has drawn it in several of his orations, he was effeminat in his mien, dissolute in his principles, and a professed libertine in every kind. After the expiration of his consulship, he was accused of corrupting public men, and he was recalled the following year by a decree of the senate. Cicero spoke very warmly in favour of the decree, and it is probable that the dispute here mentioned between him and Crassus happened in the debates which arose upon this occasion. Not many months after the date of this letter, Gabinius was impeached for mal-practices during the administration of his proconsular government, and Cicero was now so entirely at the disposal of Caesar and Pompey, that in compliance with their request he immediately undertook his defence. But it was not without that struggle which took place between himself, that he submitted to an office so unworthy of his principles and his character. However, he endeavoured to represent it to the world as an act of pure generosity; and, indeed, the sentiment with which he defended himself from the censure thus passed upon him on this occasion, is truly noble: "Neque me vero pomerit mortalibus, semperius antivicia habe.

But Gabinius was by no means entitled to the benefit of this generous maxim, nor was it true (as will incontestably appear by a passage I shall add) that Cicero advised him to go to Rome in the case under consideration. Cicero's conduct, indeed, upon this occasion, is so utterly indefensible, that his very ingenious and learned advocate, Dr. Middleton himself, is obliged to confess, that it was "against his reason, and is pernicious to the body of learning."—Orat. pro Sext. In Pison.; De Prov. Consular.; Ero Barbar.; Plut. in Vit. Caton. Ulpian.; Life of Cicero, p. 144. See rem. 2 below.
to express singular satisfaction in the new variance that had thus happened between Crassus and myself; for as they pleased for two before the expiration of the former fortunes. In pursuance of these sentiments, I consented to a reconciliation; and, in order to render it more conspicuous to the world, Crassus set out for his government almost from under my roof; for, having invited himself to spend the preceding night with me, we supped together in the gardens of my son-in-law Crassipes. It was for these reasons that I thought proper to go to the Senate, and to confess, I mentioned him with that high applause of which, it seems, you have been informed.

Thus I have given you a full detail of the several views and motives by which I am governed in the present conjuncture, as well as of the particular disposition in which I stand with respect to the slender part I can pretend to claim in the administration of public affairs. And, believe me, I should have judged and acted entirely in the same manner had I been totally free from every sort of amicable bias. For, on the one hand, I should have esteemed it the most absurd folly to have attempted to oppose so superior a force; and, on the other, supposing it possible, I should yet have deemed it imprudent to weaken the authority of persons so eminently and so justly distinguished in the commonwealth.

k Caesar and Pompey. The former (who was undoubtedly as much superior to the rest of his contemporaries in genius as in fortune), finding it necessary for his purposes that Crassus and Pompey should act in concert, procured a reconciliation between them; and by this means, Plutarch, formed that invincible triumvirate which riveted the authority both of the senate and the people; and of which he alone received the advantage.—Plut. in Vit. Crass.

l The province of Syria was allotted to Crassus, for which he set out in the year 69, before the consulat, in the year 689, and from whence he never returned, as has already been observed in the notes on the 7th letter of this book. See p. 360.

m These gardens were situated a small distance from Rome, on the banks of the Tiber.—Ad Att. iv. 12; Ad Quint. Frat. iii. 7. See rem. 8 on letter 7 of this book.

n It will appear very evident, perhaps, from the foregoing observations, that what Cicero here asserts could not possibly be his real sentiments. That I was not practicable to bring down Caesar and Pompey from their height of power to which they were now arrived, will not, probably, be disputed; though, at the same time, it is very difficult to set limits to what prudence and perseverance may effect. This, at least, seems undeniable, that if their power were absolutely immovable, Cicero's conduct was in the number of those causes which contributed to render it so. However, one cannot but be astonished to find our author seriously maintain, that, granting it had not been impossible, it would yet have been improper, to have checked these towering chiefs in their ambitious flight. For it is plain, from a passage already cited, out of his letters to Atticus, (see above, rem. 6.) that he long foresaw their imminent destruction of power would at last overturn the liberties of the republic. At least, it is not credible, indeed, destroyed his own; and this, too, by the confession of himself. For, in a letter which he writes to his brother, taking...
I am well persuaded had you been in Rome you would have concurred with me in these sentiments. I knew indeed the general likeness of your disposition of your temper; and I know too that your heart not only glows with friendship towards me, but is wholly undisturbed by malevolence towards others; in a word, I know that as you possess every sublime and generous affection, you are incapable of anything so mean as artifice and disguise. Nevertheless, even this elevated disposition has not secured you from the same unprovoked malice which I have experienced in my own affairs. I doubt not therefore, that you would have been an actor in this scene, the same motives would have animated your conduct which have governed mine. But however that may be, I shall most certainly submit all my actions to your guidance and advice whenever I shall again enjoy your company; and I am sure you will not be less attentive to the preservation of my honour than you formerly were to that of my person. Of this at least you may be persuaded, that you will find me a faithful friend and associate in all your counsels and measures, as it will be the first and doing of my life, to supply you with additional and more powerful reasons for rejecting in those obligations you have conferred upon me.

As you desire me to send you those compositions which I have written since you left Rome, I shall deliver some orations into the hands of Menocrates for that purpose. However, not to alarm you, their number is but inconsiderable; for I withdraw as much as possible from the contention of the bar, in order to join those more gentle Museums which were always my delight, and art particularly so at this juncture. Accordingly I have drawn up three dialogues upon oratory, wherein I have endeavoured to imitate the manner of Aristotle. I trust they will not prove altogether useless to your son, as I have rejected the modern precepts of rhetoric and adopted the ancient Aristotelian and Isocrates rules. To this catalogue of my writings I must also add an historical poem which I have lately composed in three cantos, upon the subject of my brother-in-law, and which I am willing to present to my friendship and my gratitude. This I should long since have transmitted to you had it been my immediate intention to make it public. But I am encouraged lies so open to discovery as that of Cicero; and yet there is none, at the same time, which seems to be less generally understood. Had there been no other of his writings extant, however, but this single letter, the patriot character, one should have imagined, would have been the last that the world would ever have ascended to our author. It is observable, (and it is an observation for which I am obliged to a gentleman, who, amidst far more important occupations, did not refuse to be the censor of these papers) that "the principles by which Cicero attempts to justify himself in this epistle, are such as will equally defend the most abandoned prostitution and desertion in political conduct. Personal gratitude and resentment; an eye to private and particular interest, mixed with a pretended regard to public good; an attention to a brother's advancement and further favour; a sensibility in being caressed by a great man in power; a delusion of the advantages derived from the popularity and credit of that great man to one's own personal self, are very weak foundations indeed, to support the superstructure of a true patriot's character. Yet there are the principles which Cicero here expressly avows and defends."

This poem Cicero delivered, sealed up, to his son; enjoining him, at the same time, not to publish or read it till after his death.—Manutius.

from this design at present, not indeed as fearing the resentment of those who may imagine themselves the objects of my satire (for in this respect I have been excessively timid), but at finding it impossible to make particular mention of every one from whom I received obligations at that season. However, when I shall meet with a proper opportunity, I will send it to you; submitting my writings as well as my actions entirely to your judgment. I know indeed these literary meditations have ever been the favourite employment of your thoughts no less than of mine.6

Your family concerns, which you recommend to me, and which make me own that I am sorry you should think it necessary even to remind me of them. I could not therefore read your solicitations for that purpose without some uneasiness.

I find you were prevented by an indisposition from going last summer into Cilicia, which was the occasion it seems of your not settling my brother's affairs in that province. However, you give me assurance that you will now take all possible methods of adjusting them. You cannot indeed be more ardent to have him, and he will think himself as much indebted to you for procuring him this additional farm, as if you had settled him in the possession of his patrimony. In the meantime I entreat you to inform me frequently and freely of all your affairs, and particularly give me an account of the studies and exercises in which your son is engaged. For he well persuaded, never friend was more agreeable or more endeared to another than you are to him; and with all this truth I hope to render not only you but all the world, and even posterity itself, thoroughly sensible.

Appius1 has lately declared in the senate (what he had before indeed often intimated in conversation) that if he could get his proconsular commission confirmed in an assembly of the Curia, he would cast lots with his colleague for the particular province to which they should respectively succeed; if not, that, by an amicable agreement between themselves, he had resolved upon yours.2 He added, that in the case of a consul it was not

To turn from the actions of Cicero to his writings, is changing our point of view, it must be acknowledged, extremely to his advantage. It is on this side, indeed, that his character can never be too warmly admired; and admired it will undoubtedly be, so long as the ancient and genuine philosophy have any friends. Perhaps there is something in that natural mechanism of the human frame necessary to constitute a fine genius, which is not altogether favourable to the excellencies of the heart. It is certain, at least, (and let it shew our envy of uncommon parts) that great superiority of intellectual qualifications, which have not often been found in conjunction with the much nobler advantages of a moral kind.

Appius Claudius Pulcher, one of the present consuls,3 sees rest a part of this arm, and Romulus divided the city into a certain number of districts called curia, which somewhat resembled our parishes. When the people were summoned together, to transact any business agreeable to this division, it was called an assembly of the curia: where the most votes in every curia was considered as the voice of the whole district, and the most curiae as the general consent of the people.—Kennett, Rom. Antiq.

The senate annually nominated the two provinces to which the consuls should succeed, by the expiration of their office; but it was left to the consuls themselves to determine, either by casting lots, or by private agreement, which of the particular provinces so assigned they should respectively administer.—Manutius, De Leg. c. x.

absolutely necessary, though perhaps it might be expedient, to procure a law of this kind; and as a guess, he thought he had been appointed him by a decree of the senate, he was entitled, he said, in consequence of the Cornelian law, to a military command till the time of his entrance into Rome". I know not what accounts you may have received of this matter from your other friends; but I find the sentiments of the world are much divided. Some are of opinion that you are not obliged to resign your government if your successor should not be authorized by an assembly of the Curiae; whilst others maintain that notwithstanding you should think proper to leave the province, you may nevertheless depute a person to preside in your absence. As to myself, I am not altogether so clear with respect to the law in question; though I must own at the same time that my doubts are by no means considerable. Of this however I am perfectly sure, that it is agreeable to your honour, and to that generosity of conduct in which I know you place your highest gratification, quietly to yield up your province to your successor, especially as you cannot in this instance oppose his ambitious views without incurring the suspicion of being influenced by the same motives yourself. But be that as it will, I thought it incumbent upon me to inform you of my sentiments, as I shall certainly defend your way they may determine to adopt.

After I had finished my letter, I received your last concerning the farmers of the revenues. Your decision appears to me, I must own, perfectly equitable; yet, at the same time, I cannot but wish you might be so happy as not to disgust a body of men whose interest you have hitherto always favoured. However, you may be assured I shall support the decree you have made upon this occasion, though you well know the temper and disposition of these people, and what formidable enemies they proved to the excellent Quintus Scaevola. I would recommend it to you therefore if possible, to recover their good graces, or at least to soften them. The task, I confess, is difficult; but prudence, I think, requires you should use your best endeavours for that purpose. Farewell.}

LETTER XVIII.

To Lucius Cullenus, Proconsul.

It was with the warmest expressions of gratitude that my friend Lucceius acquired me a. v. 699. had generously assured his agents of your assistance, as indeed I know not a man in the world who has a heart more sensible of obligations. But if your promises only were thus acceptable to him, how much more will he think himself indebted to you when you shall have performed (as I am well persuaded you will most faithfully perform) these your obliging engagements? The people of Bullis have intimated a disposition to refer the demands in question between Lucceius and themselves to Pompey's arbitration; but as the concurrence of your influence and authority will be necessary, I very strongly entreat you to exert both for this purpose. It affords me great satisfaction to find that your levies are no great obstacles to his agents, have convinced them that no man has more credit with you than myself; and I earnestly conjure you to confirm these sentiments by every real and substantial service in your power. Farewell.

LETTER XIX.

To the same.

You could never have disposed of your favours where they would be more gratefully remembered a. v. 699. than on my friend Lucceius. But the obligation is not confined to him only; Pompey likewise takes a share in it: and whenever Cicero's time. The first, the most celebrated lawyer and politician of his age, is distinguished by the title of augur. The other, who was high-priest, was slain at the entrance of the temple of Vesta, as he was endeavouring to make his escape from that general massacre of the senators which was perpetrated by the orders of the young Marius. To which of these Tully alludes is uncertain. Manutius supposes to the former, but without assigning his reasons. It seems not unlikely, however, to be the latter, as there is a passage in Valerius Maximus, by which we find that he exercised his Asiatic government with so much honour and integrity, that the senate, in their subsequent decrees for nominating the proconsul to that province, always recommended him as an example worthy of their imitation. It appears, by a fragment of Vettius Valeriaeus, that he endeavoured, during his administration in Asia, to reform the great abuses which were committed by the farmers of the revenues in his province, and imprisoned many of them for their cruel oppressions of the people. This drew upon him their indignation: but in what particular instance he was a sufferer by it, history does not mention.—Liv. epit. 86; Val. Max. vill. 15.

The person to whom this letter is addressed, and the province of which he was proconsul, are equally unknown. An account of Lucceius has already, been given in the rem. on letter 20, book 1.

b Geographers are not agreed as to the situation of this city, some placing it in Ilyria, others in Macedonia.
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

I see him (as I often do) he never fails to express in very strong terms how much he thinks himself indebted to you. To which I will add (what I know will give you great satisfaction) that it afforded me also a very sensible pleasure. As you cannot now discontinue these obliging offices without forfeiting your character of constancy, I doubt not of your persevering in the same friendly services for your own sake, which you at first engaged in for ours. I cannot forbear, nevertheless, most earnestly entreating you to proceed in what you have thus generously begun, till you shall have perfectly completed the purposes for which we requested your assistance. You will by these means greatly oblige not only Luceceus but Pompey; and never, I will venture to assure you, can you lay out your services to more advantage. I have nothing further to add, having given you my full sentiments of public affairs in a letter which I wrote to you a few days ago by one of your domestics. Farewell.

LETTER XX.

To Curius, Proconneus.

I have long been intimately connected with Quintus Pompeius by a variety of repeated good offices. As he has upon many former occasions supported his interests, his credit, and his authority in your province by my influence, so, now the administration is in your hands, he ought undoubtedly to find, by the effects of this letter, that none of your predecessors have ever paid a greater regard to my recommendations. The strict union indeed that subsists between you and myself gives me a right to expect that you will look upon every friend of mine as your own. But I most earnestly entreat you to receive Pompeius in so particular a manner into your protection and favour, as to convince him that nothing could have proved more to his advantage and his honour than my applications to you in his behalf. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

To Basilius.

I congratulate both you and myself on the present joyful occasion. All your affairs here are much concern, as your person is infinitely dear to me. Love me in return, and let me know what you are doing, and what is going forward in your part of the world. Farewell.

* The person to whom this letter is addressed, and the time when it was written, are unknown.

* If Basilius be the true name of the person to whom this letter is inscribed, (and, indeed, all the editions agree in calling him so,) no account can be given concerning him. But, if we may be allowed to suppose the genuine reading to be Bactius, he was pretor in the year 708: and Cesar not having given him a province, as usual, at the expiration of his office, he was so mortified with the affront, that he put an end to his life. — Dio, xliii. p. 237.

LETTER XXII.

To Quintus Philippus, Proconneus.

I congratulate your safe return from your province, in the fulness of your fame, and amidst the general tranquillity of the republic. A. U. 663.

If I were in Rome, I should have waited upon you for this purpose in person, and in order, likewise, to make my acknowledgments to you for your favours to my friends Egnatius and Oppius.

I am extremely sorry to hear that you have taken great offence against my friend and host, Antipater. I cannot pretend to judge of the merits of the case; but I know your character too well not to be persuaded that you are incapable of indulging an unreasonable resentment. I conjure you, however, by our long friendship, to pardon, for my sake, his son, who awaits your mercy. If I imagined you could not grant this favour consistently with your honour, I should be far from making the request; as my regard for your reputation is much superior to all considerations of friendship which I owe to this family. But, if I am not mistaken, (and, indeed, I very possibly may) your clemency towards them will rather add to your character than derogate from it. If it be not too much trouble, therefore, I should be glad you would let me know how far a compliance with my request is in your power; for that it is in your inclination, I have not the least reason to doubt. Farewell.

LETTER XXIII.

To Lucius Valerius, the Lawyer.

Fox, why should I not gratify your vanity with that honourable appellation? Since, as the times go, my friend, confidence will readily pass A. U. 669. from me to you, and we shall have promoted you to the world for skill.

I have executed the commission you sent me, and made your acknowledgments to Lentulus. But I wish you would render my offices of this kind unnecessary, by putting an end to your tedious absence. Is it not more worthy of your mighty ambition to be blended with your learned brethren at Rome, than to stand the sole great wonder of wisdom, amidst a parcel of paltry provincials? But I long to rally you in person, for which merry

c See rem. 1 on letter 6, of this book.
d Valerius is only known by this letter and another, wherein Cicero recommends him to Appius as a person who lived in his family, and for whom he entertained a very singular affection. By the air of this epistle he seems to have been one of that sort of lawyers who may more properly be said to be of the profession than the science. But, as the vein of humour which runs through this letter partly consists in playing upon words, it is not very easy, perhaps it is impossible, to be preserved in a translation; and, as it alludes to circumstances which are now altogether unknown, it must necessarily lose much of its original charm.

e The abrupt beginning of this letter has induced some of the commentators to suspect that it is not entire. But Manutius has very justly observed, that it evidently refers to the inscription: and he produces an instance of the same kind from one of the epistles to Atticus. — Ad Att. III. 20.

b After this passage in the original, Cicero goes on in the following strain: — Quaquam qui iste venient, partim tu superbum esse ducis, quod nihil respondens, partim est contumeliosus, quod male respondens. "The trans-purpose I desire you would hasten hither as expeditiously as possible. I would by no means, however, advise you to take Apulia in the way, lest some disastrous adventure in those unlucky regions should prevent our welcoming your safe arrival. And, in truth, to what purpose should you visit this your native province? For, like Ulysses, Istor, however, has ventured to omit this Witticism, upon the advice of Horace.

Deserat tantata ficticia poese, reliquit.

It is a pun, indeed, which has already occurred in one of the preceding letters to Trebatius, where our author plays in the same manner upon the equivalent sense of the verb respondere. [See rem. r on letter 16 of this book.] Voltaire has managed an allusion of this kind much more successfully. "Si vous pretendez (says agreeable writer to his friend the plenipotentiary at Münster) que la dignité de plénipotentiaire vous dispense de répondre, Papinius avoit à sa charge toutes les affaires de l'empire romain, et je vous monstere en cent lieux dans de gros livres, Papiniannus respondit, et respondit Papiniannus. Les plus sages et les plus prudens estoient ceux qui avoient accou- tumult de répondre, et de là response caputum, et pro- dentum respond. Les ombres mêmes, quand vous en seriez un, répondentont; et il n'est pas qu'aux choses incalculées, qui ne se mettent quelquefois en devoir de répondre:

Lot. de Vol. l. 165.

1 Manuities imagines that Cicero means to rally the chesury of his friend's birth. Perhaps it would be nearer the truth to acknowledge that it is impossible to know what he means: yet, as this sense is as consistent with the original as any other, it is adopted in the translation. But if this very learned commentator be right in his general notion of this passage, he is certainly deceived in his interpretation of tanguam Ulysses, cognosces tuorum neminis, with which the letter concludes. For he takes the verb cognosces in its usual acceptation: by which means he makes Cicero mistake so well known a story as that of the behaviour of Ulysses upon his first return to Ithaca. However, he is persuaded that this is a designed misre- presentation in his author; and discovers I know not what improvement of the humour by this very perversion of the fable. The labours of this penetrating commentator have cast such a light upon the writings of Cicero, that even his errors deserve to be treated with respect, other- wise one might justly laugh at a notion so exactly in the true spirit of a fanciful critic, who refines upon his own when he first returned to his Ithaca, you will be much too prudent, undoubtedly, to lay claim to your noble kindred. Farewell.

mistakes. It is a mistake, nevertheless, in which all the succeeding commentators concur with him, except Mr. Ross, who has removed the whole difficulty of the passage, by explaining cognosces in the sense of notices. The sense (which indeed it is not frequently used) recon- ciles the allusion to the truth of the fact: and where a word has several significations, it would be out of all rule of criticism to understand it in an application the least favourable to an author's meaning. It is not always so easy however to justify Cicero with respect to Honor; and he has, in one instance at least, been betrayed into an error in quoting that poet. The instance occurs in his Tusculan disputations, where he takes notice of that passage in the seventh Idad, in which Ajax is described as going forth to accept the challenge of Hector. "Vide- mus (says he) progradientem apud Homerus, Ajaxem multa cum hilareitate cum depugnaturus esset cum Hec- tore; cujus, ut arma sumpsi, ingressus lettiam atitut sociis, terrorem autem hostibus: ut ipsun Homeri, quemadmodum est apud Homerus, lato pectorre trans- tem, provocasse ad pugnam puerit."

But Homer by no means represents Hector thus totally dismayed at the approach of his adversary: and, indeed, it would have been inconsistent with the general character of that hero to have described him under such circumstances of terror.

Van de vai 'Arreges me' γείσεσαν ελεγομένοις; Τροῖς δὲ τρόμος αὐτὸς ὑπῆρχε γιὰν ἑκατόν, "Ετορὶ τ' αὐτοῦ θυμός ἐν στήθους πάτασσεν."

Ver. 234.

But there is a great difference (as Dr. Clarke observes, in his remarks upon these lines) between θυμός ἐν στήθους πάτασσεν, and κατάρη ξένη στήθους ἀφόσι, or τρόμος αὐτὸς ὑπῆρχε γιὰν. The Trojans, says Homer, trembled at the sight of Ajax; and even Hector himself felt some emotion in his breast; or to express it in the same spirit of poetry which distinguishes the original,

Thro' e'vry Argive heart new transport ran;
All Troy trembling at the mighty man.

Pall his great heart suspended in his breast.—Fure.

Perhaps this slip of attention in so great an author may not be improperly pointed out, as engaging the candour of the reader towards those errors of the same nature, which he will too probably meet with in the course of this attempt.

LETTER I.

To Caius Curio.

Though I am sorry you should suspect me of neglecting you, I will acknowledge that I am not A. 900. so much concerned at your reproaches for my not writing, as I am pleased to find that you are desirous of hearing from me. Con- 1 Curio was a young nobleman of great parts, spirit, and eloquence; but addicted, beyond all modesty or measure, to the prevailing luxury and gallantries of a most dissolute age. After having dissipated his fortune by extravagant indulgences, for which no estate could suffice, he fell an easy prey to corruption. sciou, indeed, of not meriting your friendly accusation, the instance it afforded me that my letters were acceptable to you, was a very agreeable proof of the continuance of that affection which I have already so frequently experienced. Believe me, I have never omitted writing whenever any person offered whom I imagined likely to convey my letters into your hands; and, which of your acquaintance, your great heart suspended in his breast.—Fure.

If you were not already in the number of our absentees, undoubtedly you would be tempted to leave us at this juncture; for what business can a lawyer expect in Rome during this long and general suspension of all juridical proceedings? I accordingly, advise my friends, who have any actions commenced against them, to petition each successive interrex for a double enlargement of the usual time for putting in their pleas; and is not this a proof how wonderfully I have profited by your sage instructions in the law? But tell me, my friend, since your letters, I observe, have lately run in a more enlivened strain than usual, what is it that has elevated you into so gay a humour? This air of pleasure I like well; it looks as if the world went successfully with you, and I am all impatience to know what it is that has thus raised your spirits. You inform me, indeed, that Cesar does you the honour to advise with you. For my own part, however, I had rather hear that he consulted your interest than your judgment.

But, to return, is there any real foundation for the supposition that there is any probability of its proving so, let me entreat you to continue in your present situation, and patiently submit to the inconveniences of a military life; as, on my part, I shall support myself under your absence with the hopes of its turning to your advantage. But, if all expectations of this kind are at an end, let us see you as soon as possible; and, perhaps, some method may be found here of improving your fortunes. In the meantime, however, we shall at least have the satisfaction of enjoying each other's company, and one hour's conversation together is of more value to us, my friend, than the whole city of Samarobriva. Besides, if you return illustrious family from utter ruin.—Plut. in Vit. Anton.; Cic. Phil. ii. 18.

b The feud in the republic was raised to so great a height towards the latter end of the preceding year and the beginning of the present, that the office of the late consuls had expired several months before new ones could be elected. In exigencies of this kind, the constitution had provided the magistrature called an interrex, to whom the consular power was provisionally delegated. But public business, however, was at a stand, and the courts of judicature, in particular, were shut up during this interregnum: a circumstance from which Cicero takes occasion to enter into his usual vein of pleasure with Trebatus, and to rally him in perpetual allusions to his profession.—Dio, xl.

c This office of interrex continued only five days; at the expiration of which, if consuls were not chosen, a new interrex was appointed for the same short period. And in this manner the succession of these occasional magistrates was carried on, till the elections were determined.

d The minute forms of law-proceedings among the Romans, are not sufficiently known to distinguish precisely the exact point on which Cicero's humour in this passage turns; and, accordingly, the explanations which the commentators have offered, are by no means satisfactory. It would be foreign to the purpose of these remarks to lay before the reader their several conjectures; it will be sufficient in general to observe, that there was some notorious impropriety in the advice which Cicero here represents himself as having given to his friends, and in which the whole force of his pleasure consists.

A city near Ag/pub Gal., and not far from the place where Trebatus had his present quarters.
soon, the disappointment you have suffered may pass unremarked; whereas, a longer pursuit to no purpose would be so ridiculous a circumstance, that I am terribly afraid it would scarcely escape the drollery of those very arch fellows*. Laberius, and my own friend Valerius. And what a burlesque character would a British lawyer furnish out for the Roman stage! You may smile, perhaps, at this notion; but though I mention it in my usual style of pleasantry, let me tell you it is no jesting matter. In good earnest, if there is any prospect that my recommendations will avail in obtaining the honours you deserve, I cannot but exhort you, in all the sincerity of the warmest friendship, to make yourself easy under this absence, as a means of increasing both your fortunes and your fame: if not I would strongly advise your return. I have no doubt, however, that your own merit, in conjunction with my most zealous services, will procure you every advantage you can reasonably desire. Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Appius Pulcher*

If the Genius of Rome were himself to give you an account of the commonwealth, you could not be more fully apprised of public affairs, than by the information you will receive from Phanias: a person, let me tell you, not only of

*Laberius was a Roman knight, who distinguished himself by his comic humour, and he had written several farces which were acted with great applause. He was prevailed upon by Cæsar to take a part himself in one of his own performances, and the prejudice my little acquaintance had, to that occasion is still extant. The whole composition is extremely spirited, and affords a very advantageous specimen of his genius; but there is something so peculiarly just and beautiful in the thought of the concluding lines, that the reader perhaps will not regret the being carried out of his way in order to observe it. Laberius was sixty years of age, when, in complaisance to Cæsar, he thus made his first entrance upon the stage; and, in allusion to a circumstance so little favourable to his appearing with success, he tells the audience,

"Ut hedera serpen virens arbores necat; Ina me vitustas amplius annorum eceat; Sepulchris similis, nihil aliis nomem retinet;"

"While round the oak the fruitful ivy twines, Rob'd of its strength, the ephes tree declines, Thus cautious age, advanced with stoving pace, Claps my child'll limbs, and kills with cold embrace. Like empty monuments to heroes' fame, Of all I was retaining but the name!"

Maccus. Saturn. ii. 7.

This Valerius is supposed by some of the commentators to be Quintus Valerius Catullus, a celebrated poet, who, as appears by his works, which are still extant, was patronised by Cicero. But the opinion of Manutius is much more probable, that the person here meant is the same to whom the 15th letter of the first book in this collection is addressed, and who is likewise mentioned in the following epistle.

Appius Clodius Pulcher had been consul the preceding year, and was at this time governor of Cilicia. The particular traits of his character will be occasionally marked out in the observations on the several letters addressed to him in this and the subsequent books. In the mean time it may be sufficient to observe that Cicero very zealously cultivated his friendship, not from any real opinion of his merit, but as one whose powerful alliance rendered him too considerable to be despised as an enemy. For one consummate politics, but of infinite curiosity. I refer you, therefore, to him, as to the shortest and safest means of being acquainted with our situation. I might trust him likewise with assuring you, at the same time, of the favourable disposition of my heart towards you; but that is an office which I must claim the privilege of executing with my own hand. Be persuaded, then, that I think of you with the highest affection; as, indeed, you have a full right to these sentiments, not only from the many generous and amiable qualities of your mind, but from that grateful sensibility, with which, as I am informed, both by your own letters and the general report of your answers, you receive my best services. I shall endeavour, therefore, by my future good offices, to compensate for that long intermission which unhappily suspended our former intercourse*. And, since you seem willing to renew our amicable commerce, I doubt not of engaging in it with the general approbation of the world.

Your freedman Cilix, was very little known to me before he delivered your obliging letter into my hands: the friendly purpose of which he confirmed with promised commendations. The accent, indeed, gave me of your sentiments, as well as of the frequent and favourable mention you are pleased to make of my name, were circumstances which I heard with much pleasure. In short, during our two days' conversation together, he entirely won my heart: not to the exclusion, however, of my old friend Phanias, whose return I impatiently expect. I imagine you will speedily order him back to Rome, of the friendly sort. I hope you will not dismiss him without sending me, at the same time, your full and unreserved commands.

I very strongly recommend to your patronage Valerius the lawyer*, even though you should discover that he has but a slender claim to that appellation. I mention this, as being more cautious in obviating the flaws in his title than he usually is in guarding against those of his clients. But, seriously, I have a great affection for the man: as, indeed, he is my particular friend and companion. I must do him the justice to say, that he is extremely sensible of the favours you have already conferred upon him. Nevertheless, he is desirous of my recommendation, as he is persuaded it will have much weight with you. I entreat you to convince him that he is not mistaken. Farewell.

* Appius was brother to Cicero's declared enemy, the turbulent Clodius, which occasioned that interruption of their friendship to which he here alludes. It appears by a passage in the oration for Mulo, that Clodius, in the absence of his brother, had forcibly taken possession of an estate belonging to Appius; and the indignation which this piece of injustice must necessarily raise in the latter, rendered him, it is probable, so much the more disposed to a re-union with Cicero.—Orat. pro Mil. 27.

 The whole passage in the original stands thus:-

"Eique me, quantum tu ita vis, put non invita Minerva facturam: quam quiem ego, si forte deus summeper, non solum Pallada, sed etiam Appiada nominabo." The former part of this sentence is translated agreeably to the interpretation of the learned Gronovius: but the latter is wholly omitted. For notwithstanding all the pains of the commentators to explain its difficulties, it is utterly unintelligible: at least I do not scruple to confess it is so to me.

* See rer. on letter 39, book iv.
LETTER IV.

To Caius Memmius.

Your tenant, Caius Evander, is a person with whom I am very intimate: as his patron, Marcus A. u. 700. Emilius, is in the number of my most particular friends. I entreat your permission, therefore, that he may continue some time longer in your house, if it be not inconvenient to you: for, as he has a great deal of work upon his hands, he cannot remove so soon as the first of July, without being extremely hurried. I should be ashamed to use these many words in soliciting a favor of this nature at your hands; and I am persuaded that, if it is not very much to your prejudice, you will be as well inclined to grant me this request as I should be to comply with any of yours. I will only add, therefore, that your indulgence will greatly oblige me. Farewell.

LETTER V.

To Trebatius.

I was wondering at the long intermission of your letters, when my friend Pansa accounted for your insolence, by assuring me that you were turned an Epicurean. Glorious effect, indeed, of camp-conversation! But, if a metamorphosis so extraordinary has been wrought in you amidst the martial air of Samarobriva, what would have been the consequence had I sent you to the softer regions of Tarasium? I have been in some pain for your principles, I confess; ever since your intimacy with my friend Seius. But how will you reconcile your tenets to your profession, and act for the interest of your client, now that you have adopted the maxim of doing nothing but for your own? With what grace can you insert the usual clause in your deeds of agreement: "The parties to these presents as becomes good men and true," &c.? For neither truth nor trust can there be in those who professedly govern themselves upon motives of absolute selfishness? I am in some pain, likewise, how you will settle the law concerning the partition of "rights in common:" as there can be nothing in common between those who make their own private gratification the sole criterion of right and wrong. Or can you think it proper to administer an oath, while you maintain that Jupiter is incapable of all resentment? In a word, what will become of the good people of Ulubra who have placed themselves under your protection, if you hold the maxim of your sect, "that a wise man ought not to engage himself in public affairs?" In good earnest I shall be extremely sorry, if it is true that you have really deserted us. But if your conversion is nothing more than a convenient compliment to the opinions of Pansa, I will forgive your dissimulation, provided you let me know soon how your affairs go on, and in what manner I can be of any service in them. Farewell.

LETTER VI.

To Caius Curio.

Our friendship, I trust, needs not any other evidence to confirm its sincerity than what arises from the testimony of our own hearts. I cannot, however, but consider the death of your illustrious father as depriving me of a most venerable witness to that singular affection I hear you has. I regret that he had not the satisfaction of taking a last farewell of you before he closed his eyes: it was the only circumstance wanting to render him as much superior to the rest of the world in his domestic happiness as in his public fame.

I sincerely wish you the happy enjoyment of your estate: and, be assured, you will find in me a friend who loves and values you with the same tenderness as your father himself conceived for you. Farewell.

LETTER VII.

To Trebatius.

Can you seriously suppose me so unreasonable as to be angry, because I thought you discovered too inconstancy a disposition in your impatient leave Gaul? And can you possibly believe it was for that reason I have thus long omitted writing? The truth is, I was only concerned at the uneasiness which seemed to have overcast your mind: and I forbore to write upon no other account; but as being entirely ignorant where to direct my letters. I suppose, however, that this is a plea which your leftness will scarcely condescend to admit. But tell me then, is it the weight of your purse, or the honour of being the counsellor of Cæsar, that most disposes you to be thus insipidly arrogant? Let me perish if I do not believe that thy vanity is so immoderate, as to choose rather to share in his councils than his coffers. But should he admit you into a participation of both, you will undoubtedly swell into such intolerable airs, that no mortal will be able to endure you: or none, at least, except myself, who am philosopher enough, you know, to endure anything. But I was going to tell you, that as I regretted the uneasiness you formerly expressed, so I rejoice to hear that you are better reconciled to your situation. My only fear is, that your wonderful skill in the law will little avail you in your present quarters; for I am told, that the people you have to deal with,

I wish from my heart they were as harmless as their namesakes round the edges of our coin. But I must reserve the rest of my jokes to another opportunity: in the mean time let me desire you would send me a full account of whatever is going forward in your province. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.
To Cornificius.

Your letter was extremely agreeable to me in all respects, except that I was sorry to find by it, you had slighted my lodge at Sinuessa.

A. D. 700. I shall not excuse the affront you have thus passed upon my little hovel, unless you give me double satisfaction by making use both of my Cumae and Pompeian villas. Let me entreat you then to do so, and to preserve me likewise in your affection. I hope you will provoke me to enter into a literary contest with you, by some of your writings; as I find it much easier to answer a challenge of this kind, than to send one. However, if you should persevere in your usual indolence, I shall venture to lead the way myself, in order to show you that your idleness has not infected me. I steal a moment to write this whilst I am in the senate; but you shall have a longer letter from me when I shall be less engaged. Farewell.

LETTER IX.
To Trelatus.

I am giving you an instance, that those who love are not easily to be pleased, when I assure you, that though I was very much concerned when you told me that you continued in Gaul with reluctance, yet I am no less mortified now your letter informs me, that you like your situation extremely well. To say the truth, as I regretted you should not approve a scheme which you pursued upon my recommendation; so I can ill bear that any place should be agreeable to you where I am not. Nevertheless, I had much rather endure the uncereness of your absence, than suffer you to forego the advantages with which I hope it will be attended. It is impossible, therefore, to express how much I rejoice in your having made a friendship with a man of so improved an understanding and so amiable a disposition as Matius:

Rest the strength of their cause on the force of their might, and the sword is supreme arbitrator of right." As I know you do not choose to be concerned in forcible entries, and are much too peaceably disposed to be fond of making assaults, let me leave a piece of advice with my lawyers; and by all means recommend it to you to avoid the Treviri; for I hear they are most formidable fellows. I wish from my heart they were as harmless as their namesakes round the edges of our coin. March the 4th.

Your letter was extremely agreeable to me in all respects, except that I was sorry to find by it, you had slighted my lodge at Sinuessa.

A. D. 700. I shall not excuse the affront you have thus passed upon my little hovel, unless you give me double satisfaction by making use both of my Cumae and Pompeian villas. Let me entreat you then to do so, and to preserve me likewise in your affection. I hope you will provoke me to enter into a literary contest with you, by some of your writings; as I find it much easier to answer a challenge of this kind, than to send one. However, if you should persevere in your usual indolence, I shall venture to lead the way myself, in order to show you that your idleness has not infected me. I steal a moment to write this whilst I am in the senate; but you shall have a longer letter from me when I shall be less engaged. Farewell.

I am giving you an instance, that those who love are not easily to be pleased, when I assure you, that though I was very much concerned when you told me that you continued in Gaul with reluctance, yet I am no less mortified now your letter informs me, that you like your situation extremely well. To say the truth, as I regretted you should not approve a scheme which you pursued upon my recommendation; so I can ill bear that any place should be agreeable to you where I am not. Nevertheless, I had much rather endure the uncereness of your absence, than suffer you to forego the advantages with which I hope it will be attended. It is impossible, therefore, to express how much I rejoice in your having made a friendship with a man of so improved an understanding and so amiable a disposition as Matius:

whose esteem, I hope, you will endeavour to cultivate by every means in your power. For believe me, you cannot bring home a more valuable acquisition. Farewell.

LETTER X.
To Caius Curio.

You must not impute it to any neglect in Rupa, that he has not executed your commission; as he omitted it merely in compliance with the opinion of myself and the rest of your friends. We thought it most prudent that no steps should be taken during your absence which might preclude you from a change of measures after your return; and therefore that it would be best he should not signify your intentions of entertaining the people with public games. I may perhaps, in some future letter, give you my reasons at large against your executing that design; or rather, that you may not come prepared to answer my objections, I believe it will be the wisest way to reserve them till we meet. If I should not bring you over to my sentiments, I shall have the satisfaction at least of discharging the part of a friend; and should it happen (which I hope, however, it will not) that you should hereafter have occasion to repeat of your scheme, you may then remember that I endeavoured to dissuade you from it. But this much I will now say, that those advantages which fortune, in conjunction with your own industry and natural endowments, have put into your possession, supply a far surer method of opening your way to the highest dignities than any ostentatious display of the most splendid spectacles. The truth of it is, exhibitions of this kind, as they are instances of wealth only, not of merit, are by no means considered as reflecting any honour on the authors of them; not to mention that the public is quite sated with their frequent returns. But I am fallen unawares into what I designed to have avoided, and pointing out my particular reasons against your scheme. I will waive all further discussions thereon, till this matter is at an end, and in the mean time inform you that the world entertains the highest opinion of your virtues. Whatever advantages may be hoped from the most excited patriotism united with the greatest abilities, the public, believe me, expects from you. And should you come prepared (as I am sure you ought and I trust you will) to act up to these its glorious expectations, then indeed you will exhibit to your friends and to the commonwealth in general, a spectacle of the noblest and most affecting kind. In the meanwhile, be assured no man has a greater share of my affection and esteem than yourself. Farewell.

Curio's pretence for exhibiting these games, was to pay an honour to the memory of his father, lately deceased: but his principal motive was to ingratiate himself with the people, who were passionately attached to entertainments of this kind. As Ciceron well knew the passion of Curio's temper, and that the scheme he was meditating could not be executed without great expense, he acted a very judicious and honest part, in labouring to turn him aside from a project that would contribute to embarrass his finances, and most probably therefore impair the foundation of his integrity.

Curio was not of a disposition to listen to this prudent counsel of his friend; but in opposition to all the grave
LETTER XI.
To Trebatius.

Two or three of your letters which lately came to my hands at the same time, though of different dates, have afforded me great pleasure; as they were proofs that you have reconciled yourself, with much spirit and resolution, to the inconveniences of a military life. I had some little suspicion, I confess, of the contrary; not that I question your courage, but as imputing your anxiety to the reverse of our separation. Let me entreat you then to persevere in your present temper of mind, and believe me, you will derive many and considerable advantages from the service in which you are engaged. In the mean while I shall not fail to renew my solicitations to Caesar in your favour upon all proper occasions, and have herewith sent you a Greek letter to deliver to him for that purpose: for in truth you cannot be more anxious than I am that this expedition may prove to your benefit. In return, I desire you would send me a full relation of the Gallic war, for you must know I always depend most upon the accounts of those who are least engaged in the action.

As I do not imagine you are altogether so considerate a person as to retain a secretary in your service, I could not but wonder you should trouble yourself with the precaution of sending me several copies of the same letter. Your parsimony, however, deserves to be applauded, as one of them, I observed, was written upon a tablet that had been used before. I cannot conceive what unhappy composition could be so very miserable as to deserve to give place upon this occasion, unless it were one of your own conveyances. I flatter myself at least, it was not an atrophied epistle of mine that you thus disgraced, in order to scribble over it a dull one of your own. Or was it your intention to intimate affairs go so ill with you, that you could not afford any better materials? If that should be your case you must even thank yourself for not leaving your modesty behind you.

I shall recommend you in very strong terms to Balbus when he returns into Gaul. But you must not be surprised if you should not hear from me again so soon as usual, as I shall be absent from Rome during all this month. I write this from Pompinat, at the villa of Metrillus Philemon, where I am placed within hearing of those croaking clients whom you recommended to my protection; for a prodigious number it seems of your Ulbrian frogs are assembled in order to compliment my arrival among them. Farewell.

April the 8th.

P.S.—I have destroyed the letter I received from you by the hands of Lucius Aruntius, though it was much too innocent to deserve so severe a treatment: for it contained nothing that might not have been advice of Cicero, he persevered in his resolution, and executed it with great magnificence. The consequence was just what Cicero foresaw and dreaded: he contracted debts which he was incapable of discharging, and then sold himself to Caesar, in order to satisfy the clamours of his creditors. See rem. I on the first letter of this book.

Cicero indignantly gives the inhabitants of Ulubre this appellation; in allusion to the low and marauding situation of their town. See rem. I, p. 381.

proclaimed before a general assembly of the people. However, it was your express desire I should destroy it, and I have complied accordingly. I will only add, that I wonder much at not having heard from you since, especially as so many extraordinary events have lately happened in your province.

LETTER XII.
To Catius Curio.

NUMBERLESS are the subjects which may enter into a correspondence of the epistolary kind; but the most usual, and which indeed gave the first rise to this amicable commerce, is, to inform an absent friend of those private affairs which it may be necessary, either for his interest or our own, that he should know. You must not however expect anything of the latter sort from me, as your family correspondents, I am sensible, communicate to you what relates to your own concerns, and nothing new has happened in mine. There are no two species of letters with which I am particularly pleased; those I mean that are written in the freedom and pleasantness of common conversation, and those which turn upon grave and moral topics. But in which of these it would be least improper for me to address you at this juncture, is a question not easily determined. Ill indeed would it become me to entertain you with letters of humour, at a season when every man of common sensibility has hidden adieu to mirth. And what can Cicero write that shall deserve the serious thoughts of Curio, unless it be on public affairs? My situation, however, is such, that I dare not trust my real sentiments of those points in a letter; and none other will I ever send you. Thus precluded as I am from every other topic, I must content myself with repeating what I have often urged, and earnestly exhort you to the pursuit of true and solid glory. Believe me, it will require the utmost efforts of your care and resolution, to act up to those high and uncommon expectations which the world has conceived of your merit. There is indeed but one possible method that can enable you to surmount this arduous task. The method I mean is, by diligently cultivating those qualities which are the foundation of a just applause; of that applause, my friend, which I know is the constant object of your warmest ambition. I might add

k Affairs at Rome were at this time in the utmost confusion, occasioned (as has already been observed in the notes above) by the factious interruption that was given to the usual election of the magistrates. [See rem. I, p. 579.] This state of tumult, or indeed to speak more properly of almost absolute anarchy, was however somewhat composed towards the latter end of the present year, by the election of Domitius Calvinus and Valerius Messala to the consulship. — Dio, xi. p. 141.

l The disturbances mentioned in the preceding note, were artfully fomented by Caesar and Pompey, in order to turn them to the advantage of their ambitious purposes. But this was too delicate a circumstance for Cicero to explain himself upon: especially as he was now cultivating a friendship with both.

m The text in the original is evidently defective: "atque in hunc genere have mea causa est, ut necque ea quae non sentio velim seriem." The sense is supplied in the translation, in a way that seemed to coincide best with this mutilated sentence.
much more to this purpose, but I am sensible you stand not in need of any incitements; and indeed I have thrown out these general hints far less with a view of inflaming your heart, than of testifying the ardency with which I give you mine. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

To Memmius.

I claim the promise you gave me when we met last, and desire you to treat my very intimate and zealous friend Aulus Fusius, in the manner you assured me you would. He is a man of letters as well as great politeness, and indeed in every view of his character he is highly deserving your friendship. The civilities you shall show him will be extremely agreeable to me, as they will at the same time for ever attach to your interest a person of a most obliging and friendly disposition. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

To Caius Curio.

Public affairs are so circumstances that I dare not communicate my sentiments of them in a letter.

This however I will venture in general to say, that I have reason to congratulate you on your removal from the scene in which we are engaged. But I must add, that in whatever part of the world you might be placed, you would still (as I told you in my last') be embarked in the same common bottom with your friends here. I have another reason likewise for rejoicing in your absence, as it has placed your merit in full view of so considerable a number of the most illustrious citizens and allies of Rome, and indeed the reputation you have acquired is universally and without the least exception, confirmed to us on all hands. But there is one circumstance attending you, upon which I know not whether I ought to send you my congratulations or not; I mean with respect to those high and singular advantages which the commonwealth promises itself from your return amongst us. Not that I suspect your proving unequal to the opinion which the world entertains of your virtues, but as fearing that whatever is most worthy of your care will be irrecoverably lost ere your arrival to prevent it; such, alas, is the weak and well-nigh expiring condition of our unhappy republic.

But prudence, perhaps, will scarce justify me in trusting even this to a letter; for the rest, therefore, I must refer you to others: in the meanwhile, whatever your fears or your hopes of public affairs may be, think, my friend, incessantly think on those virtues which that generous patriot must possess, who in these evil times, and amidst such a general depravation of manners, gloriously purposed to vindicate the ancient dignity and liberties of his oppressed country. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

To Trebatius.

If it were not for the compliments you sent me by Chrysippus, the freedom of Cyrus the architect, I should have imagined I no longer possessed a place in your thoughts. But surely you are become a most intolerable fine gentleman, that you could not bear the fatigue of writing to me, when you had the opportunity of doing so, by a man whom you know I look upon as one almost of my own family. Perhaps, however, you may have forgotten the use of your pen; and so much the better, let me tell you, for your clients, as they will lose no more causes by its blunders. But if it is myself only that has escaped your remembrance, I must endeavour to refresh it by a visit, before I am worn out of your mind beyond all power of recollection. After all, is it not the apprehensions of the next summer's campaign that has rendered your hand too unsteady to perform its office? If so, you must e'en play over again the same gallant stratagem you practised last year, in relation to your British expedition, and frame some heroic excuse for your absence. However, I was extremely glad to hear, by Chrysippus, that you are much in Caesar's good graces. But it would be more like a man of equity, methinks, as well as more agreeable to my inclinations, if you were to give me frequent notice of what concerns you by your own hand: a satisfaction I should undoubtedly enjoy, if you had chosen to study the laws of good fellowship rather than those of contention. You see I rally you as usual in your own way, not to say a little in mine. But to end seriously: be assured, as I greatly love you, I am no less confident than desirous of your affection in return. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.

To Publius Scutius.

I hope you will not imagine by my long silence that I have been unmindful of our friendship, or that I had any intention of dropping my usual correspondence with you. The sincere truth is, I was prevented from writing during the former part of our separation, by those calamities in which the general confusion of the times had involved me; as I afterwards delayed it, from an unwillingness to break in upon you, whilst your own severe and unmerited injuries were yet fresh upon your mind. But when I reflect that a

The commentators are greatly divided as to the time when this letter was written, and the person to whom it is addressed. To examine the several reasons upon which they support their respective opinions, would be leading the English reader into a field of criticism, which could afford him neither amusement nor instruction. The subject, indeed, of this letter, which is merely consolatory, to a friend in exile, is not of consequence enough to merit any pains in ascertaining (if it were possible to ascertain its precise date: and it is sufficient to observe, that it contains nothing but what perfectly coincides with the circumstances both of Cicero's affairs and those of the republic in the present year. As to the person to whom this letter is written, it is impossible to determine anything concerning him; for the MSS. and printed copies are by no means agreed as to his name, some calling him Titius, others Sitius, and others Scutius.

sufficient time has elapsed to wear off the first impressions of your misfortunes: and consider, likewise, the virtues and magnanimity of your heart; I think I may now write to you consistently with my general caution of avoiding an unseasonable officiousness.

You are sensible, my dear Sextius, that I warmly stood forth your advocate, when a prosecution was formerly commenced against you in your absence; and can it be supposed that after you were absolved in that accusation which was brought against your friend, I exerted every means in my power for your defence? Thus, likewise, upon my return into Italy, though I found your affairs had been managed in a very different manner than I should have advised, yet I omitted no opportunity of rendering you my utmost services. And upon this occasion, when the clamour that was raised against you on account of the corn, by those that were the enemies, not only of yourself, but of all who endeavoured to assist you: when the general corruption of the judges, and, in short, when many other public iniquities had prevailed to your condemnation against all truth and justice, I was not wanting in my best good offices of every kind towards your son. Having, therefore, thus faithfully performed every other sacred duty of friendship, I would not omit this likewise of entertaining and encouraging you to bear your afflictions as becomes a man of your distinguished spirit and fortitude. In other words, let me conjure you to support with resolution those common vicissitudes of fortune which no prudence can prevent, and for which no mortal is answerable; remembering that in all popular governments, as well as in our own; it has been the fate of many of the best and greatest men to fall a sacrifice to the injustice of their country. I will add (and I wish I could, with truth, be contradicted) that the injurious sentence you lament has only banished you from a commonwealth in which no rational mind can receive the least satisfaction.

If I were to say nothing of your son, it would look as if I were inattentive to that general applause which his virtues so justly receive: on the other hand, were I to tell you all that I hear and think of him, I am afraid I should only renew your grief for being thus separated from his company. However, you should wisely consider his uncommon virtues as a possession which inapproposely attends you, in whatever part of the world you may be placed. For surely the objects of the mind are not less intimately present with us than those of the eye. The reflection, therefore, on his singular merit and filial piety, the fidelity of myself and the rest of those friends whom you have found, and will ever find, to be the followers, not of your fortune, but of your virtue; and, above all, the consciousness of not having deserved your sufferings, are circumstances which ought to administer the highest consolation to you. And they will more effectually do so, if you consider that it is guilt, not misfortune; one's own crimes, and not the injustice of others, which ought to disturb the serenity of a well-regulated mind. In the mean time be assured, that in compliance with the dictates of that friendship I have long entertained for you, and of that esteem which I bear for your son, I shall neglect no opportunity, both of alleviating your afflictions, and of contributing all I can to support you under them. In a word, if, upon any occasion, you should think it necessary to write to me, you shall find that your application was not made in vain. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.
To Curio.| I DESPATCH Sextus Villius, a domestic of my friend Milo, to meet you with this letter, notwithstanding we have received no account of your being yet advanced near Italy. However, we are assured that you are set forward from Asia; and as it is generally believed it will not be long ere you arrive in Rome, I persuade myself that the importance of the affair which occasions you this application will justify my desire of making it as early as possible.

If I estimated my services towards you by the same enlarged standard that you gratefully measure them yourself, I should be extremely reserved in requesting any considerable favour at your hands. It is painful indeed to a man of a modest and generous mind to solicit great obligations from those whom he has greatly obliged, lest he should seem to claim the price of his good offices, and ask a matter of right rather than of grace. But I can have no scruples of this sort with respect to you; as the services you have conferred upon me, and particularly in my late troubles, are not only of the highest, but most conspicuous nature. An ingenuous disposition, where it already owes much, is willing to owe more; and it is upon this principle that I make no difficulty of requesting your assistance in an article of the last importance to me. I have no reason, indeed, to fear that I should sink under the weight of your favours, even if they were to rise beyond all number, as I trust there is none so considerable that I should not only receive with gratitude, but return with advantage.

I am exulting the utmost efforts of my care, my industry, and my talents, in order to secure the election of Milo to the consulate; and I think myself bound upon this occasion to give a proof to the world of the more than common affection with which I enter into his interest. I am persuaded no one ever was so anxious for the preservation of his own person and fortunes, as I am that Milo may obtain this honour; an event upon which the security of my own dignities, I am sensible, depends. Now, the assistance which it is in your power to give my friend is so very considerable, that it is all we want to be assured of victory; for thus our forces stand. In the first place, Milo's conduct towards me in his tribunate has gained him (as I hope you perfectly well know) the affections of all our patriots, as the liberality of his temper and the magnificence of his shows have secured to him the favour of the populace. In the next place, all the young part of the republic, together with those who have the most influence in elections, and who, wholly in his interest, as having received or expecting to receive, the benefit of his own popularity and active offices upon occasions of a like nature. I will add, likewise, that he has my suffrage; which, though it may not draw after it any considerable effects, is, however, universally approved as a tribute which is justly his due; and so far perhaps it may be considered as of some weight with the public. All, therefore, that we farther require is, a person to appear as the leader of these rude forces, and to unite them together under one head; and had we the choice of the whole world, we could not fix upon a man so well qualified for this purpose as yourself. If you believe, then, that I have any worth or gratitude, or can even infer it from these my earnest endeavours to serve Milo; in a word, if you esteem me deserving of your favours, I entreat you to co-operate with me in this affair, upon which my interest, or (to speak nearer to the truth) upon which almost my very preservation depends. With regard to Milo himself, I will only assure you that you never can oblige a man of a more solid turn of mind, of a more resolute spirit, or one who, if you should embrace his interest, will receive your good offices with a more affectionate gratitude. You will at the same time also confer so singular an honour upon myself, as to convince me that you have no less regard for the support of my credit than you formerly showed for the safety of my person. I should enlarge much farther upon this subject, if I were not persuaded that you are perfectly sensible of the infinite obligations I have received from Milo, and that it is incumbent upon me to promote his election with my utmost zeal, and even at the hazard of my life.

Milo had dissipated three very considerable estates in the extravagant shows which, upon different occasions, he had exhibited to the people; as he was likewise at this time proposing to entertain them in the same magnificent manner, at the expense of 250,000 s. Orat. pro Mil. 29; Ad Quint. Frat. iii. 8.

Cicero was particularly concerned to secure Milo's election, not only from a principle of gratitude, but of self-preservation. For Ciculus, our author's implacable enemy, was now soliciting the office of praetor: and if Milo were rejected from the consulship, it would fall into the hands of Pallas Hyspaus and Metellus Scipio, who were both under the influence of Ciculus. By these means, the latter would once again have been armed with the principal authority of the commonwealth; and Cicero knew, by sad and recent experience, that he had everything to fear from such an enemy when he could add power to malice. His interest, therefore, combined with his friendship in supporting the pretensions of Milo, who had, upon all occasions, opposed the designs of Ciculus with great warmth and spirit; and who, in the present instance, would have proved a counter-balance, if Ciculus should have attempted a second time to fall with his whole weight upon Cicero.—Orat. pro Mil. 30.

In this declining state of the republic, the elections were carried on, not only by the most shameful and avowed bribery, but by the several mobs of the respective candidates. These, it may well be imagined, were both disposed and prepared to commit every outrage that the cause of their leaders should require. Accordingly, the party of Milo, and that of his competitors, had such frequent and bloody engagements with each other, as to raise a general apprehension of a civil war.—Plut. in Vit. Cest. I will only, then, in one word, recommend this affair, and therein the most important of my concerns, to your favour and protection: and be assured I shall esteem your compliance with my request as an obligation superior, I had almost said, even to that for which I am so greatly indebted to Milo. The truth of it is, it would give me more pleasure to make him an effectual return for the very considerable part he bore in my restoration, than I received even from the benefit of his good offices themselves. And this, I am confident, your single concurrence will fully enable me to perform. Farewell.

LETTER XVIII.
To Titus Fadius.

I know not any event which has lately happened, that more sensibly affects me than your disgrace.

Far, therefore, from being capable of giving you the consolation I wish, I greatly stand in need of the same good office myself. Nevertheless, I cannot forbear not only to exhort, but to conjure you likewise by our friendship, to collect your whole strength of reasoon, in order to support your afflictions with a firm and manly fortitude. Remember, my friend, that calamities are incident to all mankind, but particularly to us who live in these miserable and distracted times. Let it be your consolation, however, to reflect, that you have lost far less by fortune than you have acquired by merit: as there are few under the circumstances of your birth who ever raised themselves to the same dignities; though there are numbers of the highest quality who have sunk into the same disgrace. To say truth, so wretched is the fate which threatens our laws, our liberties, and our constitution in general, that well may he esteem himself happily dealt with who is dismissed from such a distempered government upon the least injurious terms. As to your own case in particular, when you reflect that you are still undeprived of

Soon after this letter was written, an unfortunate adventure discoverted all Cicero's measures in behalf of his friend, and obliged him, instead of soliciting any longer for Milo as a candidate, to defend him as a criminal. It happened that Milo and Claudius having met, as they were travelling the Appian road, a encounter ensued, in which the latter was killed. Milo was arraigned for this murder; and, being convicted, was sentenced to banishment. Cicero, in his defence, laboured to prove, by a variety of circumstances, that this meeting could not have been premeditated on the part of his client: and, indeed, it seems probable that it was not. But however casual that particular incident might have been, Milo, it is certain, had long before determined to assassinate Claudius; and it appears, too, that Cicero himself was apprised of the design. This is evident from a letter to Aticus, written about four years antecedent to the fact of which I am speaking:—"Reum Publim (nisi ante occisum oris) fora Milone puto. Si se inter viam cbullatens, ceccium iri ab ipso Milone video. Non dubitat facere; pro eis ferte."—Dio, xl. p. 143, 148; Orat. pro Mil.; Ad Att. iv. 9.

It is altogether uncertain to whom this letter is addressed; as there is great variety in the several readings of its inscription. If the title adopted in the translation be the true one, (and it is that which has the greatest number of commentators on its side,) the person to whom it is written was questor to Cicero in his consulate; and afterwards one of those tribunes who, in the year of Rome 696, promoted the law by which he was restored to his country.—Ad Att. iii. 33.
your estate; that you are happy in the affections of your children, your family, and your friends; and that in all probability you are only separated from them for a short interval: when you reflect, that among the great number of impeachments which have lately been carried on; yours is the only one that was considered as entirely groundless; that you were condemned by a majority only of one single vote; and that, too, universally supposed to have been given in compliance with some powerful influence. These, undoubtedly, are considerations which ought greatly to alleviate the weight of your misfortune. I will only add, that you may always depend upon finding in me that disposition both towards yourself and your family, as is agreeable to your wishes, as well as to what you have a right to expect. Farewell.

LETTER XIX.

To Titius Titius.

It is by no means as suspecting that my former recommendation was not sufficient, that I give you this second trouble, but merely in compliance with the request of my friend Avianus Placens; to whom I neither can nor indeed ought to refuse anything. The truth is, notwithstanding your very obliging answer, when I mentioned his affair to you in person, and that I have already written to you in strong terms upon the same subject, yet he imagines I cannot too often apply to you in his behalf. I hope, therefore, you will excuse me, if in thus yielding to his inclinations I should seem to forget that you are incapable of receding from your word; and again entreat you to allow him a convenient port, and sufficient time for the exportation of his corn. Both these favours I obtained for him when Pompey had the commission in which you are now employed; and the term he granted him was three years. To say all in one word, you will very sensibly oblige me by convincing Avianus that I enjoy the same share in your affection which he justly imagines he possesses of mine. Farewell.

LETTER XX.

To Trebatius.

I acquainted you with the affair of Silius. He has since been with me, when I informed him that it was your opinion we might safely enter into the usual recognizance. But he has consulted, he tells me, with Servius, who assures him, that where a testator has no power to make a will, it must be considered, to all intents and purposes, as if it had never subsisted; and Offilius, it seems, agrees in this opinion. He told me, at the same time, that he had not applied to you upon this subject; but desired I would recommend both himself and his cause to your protection. I do not know a worthier man than Silius, nor any one, excepting yourself, who is more my friend. You will extremely oblige me, therefore, my dear Trebatius; by calling upon him in order to give him the promise of your assistance; and I earnestly entreat you, if you have any regard for me, to pay this visit as soon as possible. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

To Marcus Marius.

I shall punctually execute your commission. But is it not a most wonderful specimen of your sagacity, thus to employ a man in making a purchase for you, whose interest it is to advance the price as high as possible? Above all, I most admire the wisdom with which your restriction, in confining me to a particular sum. For had you trusted me with an unlimited order, I should have thought myself obliged, in point of friendship, to have settled this affair with my coheirs upon the most advantageous terms in your behalf: whereas, now I know your price, you may depend upon it, I shall rather set up a fictitious bidder than suffer the estate to be sold for less than the money you mention. But, jesting apart, be assured I shall discharge the trust you have assigned me, with all the care I ought.

I know you are well pleased with my victory over Bursa, but why then did you not more warmly congratulate me upon the occasion? You were mistaken in imagining the character of the man to be much too despicable to render this event a matter of any great exultation. On the contrary, the defeat of Bursa has afforded me a more pleasing triumph even than the fall of Caton; and in both, indeed, I could see my adversaries vanquished by the hand of justice than of violence: as I would choose it should be in a way that does honour to the friends of my cause, without exposing them, at the same time, to any unseasy consequences. But the principal satisfaction I derive from this affair, is in that honest and undaunted zeal with which

* Munatius Plancus Bursa was tribune the year before this letter was written, and had distinguished himself by inflaming those disturbances in Rome, which were occasioned by the assassination of Clodius. The body of Clodius being produced before the people in the forum, Bursa, together with one of his colleagues, infused such a spirit of riot into the populace, that, snatching up the corpse, they instantly conveyed it to the curia hostilia, (a place in which the senate sometimes assembled,) where they paid it the funeral honours. This they executed in the most insolent and tumultuous manner, by erecting a funeral pile with the benches, and setting fire to the senate-house itself. Bursa, not satisfied with these licentious outrages, endeavored likewise to instigate the mob to fall upon Cicero, the avowed friend and advocate of Milo, by whom Clodius had been killed. Cicero, therefore, as soon as Bursa was out of his office, (for no magistrate could be impeached during his ministry,) exhibited an information against him, for this violation of the public peace; and Bursa, being found guilty, was sentenced to suffer banishment.—Dio, xl. p. 143. 146; Ascon. Argument. in Orat. pro Mil.
which I was supported against all the incredible efforts of a very great man, who most warmly exerted his power in favour of my antagonist. I will mention another circumstance, likewise, that recommends this victory to me, and which, though perhaps you will scarcely think it a probable one, is, nevertheless, most assuredly the case. I have conceived a much stronger aversion to this man, than I ever entertained even against Clodius himself. To speak truth, I had openly declared war against the latter; whereas, I have been the advocate and protector of the former. Besides, there was something enlarged, at least, in the views of Clodius, as he aimed, by my destruction, at overturning the whole commonwealth: and, even in mis, he acted less from the motions of his own heart, than by the instigations of a party who were sensible they could never be secure whilst I had any remaining credit. But the contemptible Burns, on the contrary, singled me out for the object of his malice, in mere gaiety of heart; and, without the least provocation, offered himself to some of my enemies as one who was entirely at their service upon any occasion wherein they could employ him to my prejudice. Upon these considerations, my friend, I expect that you warmly congratulate my success, as, indeed, I esteem it an event of my considerable importance. Never, in truth, did Rome produce a set of more inflexible patriots than the judges who presided at this trial: for they had the honest courage to pass sentence against him, in opposition to all the power and influence of the very person by whom they were appointed to this honourable office. And, undoubtedly, they would not have acted with such uncommon spirit, had they not considered the insults I suffered from this man as so many indignities offered to themselves. I have at present a great deal of troublesome business upon my hands; as several considerable impeachments are going forward, and many new laws are in agitation. It is my daily wish, therefore, that no intercalation may protract these affairs beyond the usual period, and prevent the pleasure I propose to myself, of paying you a visit very soon. Farewell.

Pompey, in his late consulship, made some alterations with respect to the method of choosing the judges, and elected a certain number out of the three orders of the state, for the cognizance of civil and criminal causes.—Manut. De Leg. p. 122; Veil. Pat. ii. 79.

The Roman months being lunar, a proper number of supplemen tal days were added every two years, in order to adjust their reckoning to the course of the sun. This was called an intercalation, and was performed by the pontifical college at their own discretion. Accordingly, they often exercised this important trust as interest or ambition dictated; and by their arbitrary intercalations, either advanced or retarded the stated times for transacting civil or religious affairs, as best suited the private purposes of themselves or their friends. By these means, these unworthy observers of the heavenly motions had introduced so great a confusion into their calendars, that, when Caesar undertook its reforming, all the seasons were misplaced; and the appointed festivals for harvest and vintage were no longer found in the summer and autumn quarters.—Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cap. 40; Macrob. Saturn. 1.

To Trebatius.

You laughed at me yesterday when I asserted, over our wine, that it was a question among the lawyers, whether an action of theft could be brought by an heir for goods stolen before he came into possession. Though it was late when I returned home, and I had drunk pretty freely, I turned to the place where this question is discussed, and have sent you an extract of the passage, with my convictions, that which you imagined had never been maintained by any man, was actually held by Sextus Elius, Marcus Manlius, and Marcus Brutus. But, notwithstanding these great names, I agree in opinion with Scareola and Trebatius. Farewell.

To Appius Pulcher.

I find myself obliged, contrary, indeed, to my expectation, as well as my wishes, to accept the government of your province. Amidst the numberless uneasy thoughts and occupations which this circumstance occasions me, it is my single consolation, that I could not have succeeded any man in this employment who would be more disposed than yourself to deliver it up to me as little embarrassed as possible. I hope you entertain the same opinion of my disposition with regard to you a little as you are assured, that I was not at liberty to appoint you in this expectation. I most earnestly

* These were all of them lawyers of great note in their respective generations, and whose writings in the science they professed were in much esteem. The two former flourished about the year of Rome 546, and 600; the latter about the year 630.—Pompon. De Orig. Juris.

* Scareola was one of the names of Trebatius, as appears by a letter to Atticus wherein he is so called. There was likewise a Quintus Mucius Scareola, a lawyer of very considerable eminence, who lived about fifty years before the present date, and who compiled a body of laws in eighteen volumes. Manutius imagines, therefore, that in allusion to this person, Cicero formally separates the names Scareola and Trebatius by an intervening cumpative, as if he were speaking of two different men, though he only means his friend to whom he is writing.

* The great commotions that had been raised the last year in Rome, on account of the elections, have already been mentioned in the notes above. In order, therefore, to remedy these evils for the future, by abating the inconsistent ardour with which the magistracies were pursued, it was thought expedient to deprive the praetorship and consulship of one of their principal and most tempting advantages. This consisted in the government of provinces; to which those magistrates, of course, succeeded at the expiration of their respective administrations. For these governments not only secured them from any impeachments during the time they continued in them, but were likewise inexhaustible sources of wealth to those who were not scrupulous in the means of obtaining it. Accordingly a law passed, by which it was enacted, that no future praetor or consul should be capable of a provincial charge, till five years after the expiration of his office: and, in the meantime, that the provinces should be supplied from among those of praetorian and consular rank, who had laid down their offices without succeeding to any appointment. Cicero was of this number; and it is probable, there were so few of them, that he was not at liberty to refuse, what it is very certain he had no inclination to accept.—Dio, xl. p. 142.
then entreat you, by all the ties of our friendship in particular, as well as by that uncommon generosity which distinguishes your actions in general, to render me, upon this occasion, every good office in your power; as undoubtedly there are many. You will observe, from the decree of the senate, that I was under a necessity of accepting the government of some province: and, I must repeat it once more, the ease with which I shall pass through the functions of my ministry depends upon your smoothing, as far as in you lies, the difficulties at my first entrance. You are the best judge in what particular instances you can contribute to this end: I will only, in general, beseech you to do so in every article wherein you imagine your services may avail me. I might enlarge on this subject, if either your own generous temper, or our mutual friendship, would suffer me to dwell upon it any longer; and I may add, too, if the nature of my request did not sufficiently speak for itself. I will only, therefore, assure you, that if I should not make this application in vain, you may depend upon receiving a strong and lasting satisfaction from the faithful returns of my gratitude. Farewell.

LETTER XXIV.

To the same.

I arrived on the 22nd of May at Brundisium, where I found your lieutenant Quintus Fabius; a. u. 700, who, agreeably to your orders, informed me, that it's highly expedient Cilicia should be strengthened with an additional number of forces. This was conformable, not only to my own sentiments, who am more immediately concerned in the security of that province, but to the opinion likewise of the senate; who thought it reasonable that both Bibulus and myself should reinforce our respective legions with recruits from Italy. But it was strongly opposed by Sulpicius the consul; though not without very warm remonstrances on our parts. However, as it seemed to be the general inclination of the senate that we should hasten our departure, we were obliged to submit: and we set forward accordingly.

Let me now repeat the request I made in my last from Rome, and again entreat you to favour me in all those instances wherein one friend can oblige another who succeeds to his government. In short, let it be your care to convince the world that I could not have followed a more affectionate predecessor; as it shall be mine to give conspicuous proofs, that you could not have resigned your province to one more sincerely devoted to your interests.

I understood, by the copy which you communicated to me of those dispatches you sent to the senate, that you had actually disbanded a considerable part of your army. But Fabius assures me, this was a point which you only had in your intention; and that, when he left you, the whole number of your legions was complete. If this be the case, you will greatly oblige me by keeping the few forces under your command entire; as I suppose the decree of the senate which passed in relation to this article has already been transmitted to you. To comprise all in one word, I pay so great a deference to your judgment, that, whatever measures you may think proper to pursue, I shall, undoubtedly, believe them reasonable; though I am persuaded, at the same time, you will pursue such only as shall appear to be for my benefit.

I am waiting at Brundisium for my lieutenant Caius Pontinus, whom I expect here on the 1st of June; and I shall take the earliest opportunity, after his arrival, of proceeding on my voyage. Farewell.

LETTER XXV.

Cæliús to Cicero.

Agreeably to my promise when we parted, I have sent you a full account of every event that has happened since you left Rome. For this purpose I employed a person to collect the news of the town: and am only afraid you will think he has executed his office much too punctually. I am sensible, at the same time, that you are a man of infinite curiosity; and that travellers take pleasure in being informed of every little circumstance transacted at home. But, I hope, you will not impute it to any want of respect, that I assigned over this employment to another hand. On the contrary, as much engaged as I really am, and as little fond of writing as you know me to be, I should with great pleasure execute my commission, which gave me occasion to think of you.

Cælius has, with great industry, drawn together the several scattered passages in the ancient historians, relating to Cicero: and it is but a piece of justice due to that learned erite to acknowledge, that the following account is extracted from those materials, which his labours spared me the trouble of collecting.

Marcus Cælius was tribune of the people the year before this letter was written. He distinguished himself in that office by zealously and boldly supporting the claims of the senate and the interests of the aristocratic party, against the attacks of the opposite faction. When the civil war broke out between Pompey and Caesar, he affected at first to stand neuter: he afterwards, however, thought proper to join with the latter. But Caesar not gratifying his ambition in the manner he expected, he changed sides, and raised great disturbances in Rome in favour of Pompey.

Cælius applied himself early to the art of oratory; and, for that purpose, was introduced by his father to the acquaintance of Cicero, under whose direction he formed his eloquence. His parts and genius soon distinguished him in the forum, though his speeches were conceived with peculiar spirit and vivacity, his language was thought forcible, and the harmony of his periods too much neglected. His morals were suitable to the degenerate age in which he lived, luxurious and dissolute; as his temper was remarkably inflammable, and apt to kindle into the most implacable resentment.—Cic. Orat. pro Cæli. Cæs. De Bell. Civ. iii. Vell. Pat. ii.; Dialog. de Cæs. corrupt Elloquent.; Sénec. De Ira. iii. See letter 17, book vii. rem. v. and b trust, however, when you cast your eye upon this volume of news, you will very readily admit my excuse. I know not, indeed, except the compiler, could find leisure, I will not say to transcribe, but even to peruse, such a strange medley. It contains a collection of decrees of the senate and rumours of the people; of private tales and public edicts. Should it happen, nevertheless, to afford you no sort of entertainment, give me due notice, that I may not put myself to this prodigious expense only to be impertinent. If any events of more importance should arise, and which are above the force of these hackney-news writers, I will take the relation upon myself, and give you a full account of the sentiments and speculations of the world concerning it: but, at present, there is little of this kind stirring.

[Notes: a. Every proconsul, or governor of a province, was accompanied with a certain number of lieutenants, in proportion to his rank and quality. These officers served him as a kind of first ministers in civil affairs; and they commanded in chief under him when he took the field. b. Servius Sulpicius Rufus was consul this year, together with Marcus Claudius Marcellus. For a more particular account of the former, see letter 12, book viii., rem. 7, and of the latter, rem. v., letter 35, of this book.]}

As to the report which was so current when we were at Cumae, of enfranchising the colonies on the other side the Po, it does not seem to have happened: at least, I have heard nothing of it, and no mention of this affair since my return to Rome. Marcellus not having yet moved that Caesar may be recalled from his government in Gaul, and intending to defer it, as he told me himself, to the 1st of June, it has occasioned the revival of those suspicions to his disadvantage, which so strongly prevailed when you were here.

If you had an interview with Pompey (as I remember it was your intention) let me know the conversation that passed between you, and what you could discover of his designs: for, though he seldom speaks his real sentiments, he has not artifice enough to conceal them. As to Caesar, we have frequent, and no very favourable, reports concerning him: however, they are at present nothing more than rumours. Some say he has lost all his cavalry; and I believe this is the truth of the case: others, that the seventh legion has been entirely defeated, and that he himself is so surrounded by the Balluvoci, that he cannot possibly receive any succours from the main body of his army. But this news is not publicly known: on the contrary, it is only the whisper of a party which I need not name, and who mention it with great caution; particularly Domitius, who tells it in your ear with a most important air of secrecy.

A strong report prevailed here that you were assassinated upon the road on the 24th of May, by Quintus Pompeius. I heartily cursed the idle authors of this alarm: however, it did not give me any great disturbance, as I knew Pompeius to be then at Baulis, where the poor man is reduced to exercise the miserable office of a pilot, to keep himself from starving. May you ever be as secure from all other dangers as you were from this!

Your friend Plancus is at Ravenna; and, notwithstanding the very considerable benefaction he has lately received from Caesar, the man is still in distress.

Your political treatise is universally read and much admired. Farewell.

LETTER XXVI.

To Appius Pulcher.

I received your letter at this place on the 4th of June, by which I am informed that you have charged Lucius Clodius with a message to me. I am, therefore, waiting for his arrival, that I may hear as early as possible whatever he has to say on your part. In the mean time, notwithstanding I have already by many instances convinced you, I hope, of my friendship; yet, let me assure you, that I shall particularly endeavour to show it upon every occasion, by the most tender regard for your character. I have the satisfaction in return to be informed, not only by Fabius and Flaccus, but particularly by Octavius, of the share you allow me in your esteem. I had before, indeed, many reasons for believing I enjoyed that privilege; but chiefly by that very agreeable present of your treatise upon augury, which

1 A city in Campania, situated upon the sea-coast; near which Cicero had a villa.

2 Cisalpine Gaul was divided into two parts by the river Po; and, accordingly, as the inhabitants were situated with respect to Italy, either on one side or the other of that river, they were called Cispadani, or Transpadani. Cicero had occasion of putting the latter on the same foot with the municipal towns of Italy; the chief magistrates whereof had a right of suffrage in the assemblies of the Roman people, and were capable of being elected to the offices of the republic. This seems to be the circumstance to which Ceilus here alludes; as Cicero obliquely hints at it likewise in one of his letters to Atticus.—Ad Att. v. 2; and the remark of Morgant upon that passage.

3 Marcellus, the present consul, distinguished himself throughout his whole administration by a warm opposition to Caesar; beyond which is actually more the motion of which Ceilus here speaks. He was not, however, so fortunate as to succeed in it, being opposed by his colleague Sulpicius, in conjunction with some of the tribunes.—Dio, xx. p. 148. See his character in rem. a on the 30th letter of this book.

5 Cicero in his letters to Atticus often mentions the difficulty of penetrating into Pompey's real designs: but if Ceilus may be credited, he was, it seems, one of those over-relished men, who, as our British Herace observes, are—So very close, they're hid from none.—Pope.
you have so affectionately addressed to me? No testimony shall be wanting on my part, likewise, of the singular friendship I bear you. The truth is, you have continually risen in my affection ever since you first distinguished me with yours: but you are now still more endeared to me from that regard I entertain for those illustrious persons with whom you have formed a family alliance. For Pompey and Brutus, though so distant from each other in point of age, have both of them the same high rank in my esteem. I must add, that the connexion between us as fellow-members of the same sacred college, especially after the honourable applause I have lately received from you, is a very powerful cement of our mutual friendship.

If I should have an interview with Ciclius, who is expected to arrive as soon as possible, I shall have occasion to write to you more fully. I will at this time, therefore, only farther assure you, that I read with great pleasure that part of your letter where you tell me, your single reason for continuing in the province is, in order to give me a meeting. Farewell.

LETTER XXVII.

To Caius Memmius.

I am doubtful whether I have more reason to regret or rejoice that I did not find you, as I expected, in Athens. On the one hand, if that meeting would have renewed my concern for the injure which has been done you, I should have had the satisfaction, on the other, of being a witness of your supporting it with the...

Memmius, you and your friend have promised the election of Memmius and his friend Calvinus, with all their credit and power. These, in return, entered into a bond in the presence of many witnesses, in which they engaged the money they have received to procure three augurs, who should attest, that they were present in the comitia when a law passed to invest those consuls with the military command in their provinces. The contract farther added, that they would also produce three persons of respect, whom they should likewise depose, that they were not only present in the senate, but actually in the number of those who signed a decree, by which the usual proconsular appointments were granted to Appius and Abbonarius. The truth, however, was, that so far from any law or decree of this sort, before having passed, it had not even been proposed either to the people or the senate.

Romano rerum dominos, gentemque to gastam!

Extraordinary as this infamous association was, it is still more surprising that Memmius should have had the front publicly to avow it, by becoming himself the instigator of the whole transaction. Yet so the fact is: and, in compliance with the request of Memmius, he has laid open the whole of this shameful agreement to the senate. It is difficult to imagine the motive that could induce Memmius to make a discovery which must show him to the world, in every view, so completely abandoned. But Pommy, it is highly probable, instigated him to this resolution, with the hope that the rumors so unexampled a violation of all that ought to be held most sacred in society, would add strength to those flames which now rage in the commonwealth. For most of the historians agree, that Pommy secreted fomented the spirit of insurrection, in order to reduce the republic to the necessity of investing him with the supreme authority. What resolutions were taken in the senate, upon this occasion, do not clearly appear: for those passages in the letters to Atticus wherein their proceedings in relation to this affair seem to be hinted at, are extremely dark; and rendered still more obscure by the negligence of the transcribers, in blundering epistles together of different and distant dates. It is certain, however, that Memmius lost his election: some time after which, being impeached, and sentence passed, he retired to Athens; where he seems to have spent the remainder of his days. He was a man of greater parts than application, and would have proved an excellent orator, if he had trusted less to the strength of his natural Talent, and more to the art of oratory. Indeed, if he had not been too indolent to improve his faculties of this kind, by an habitual exercise, he was not too lazy, however, to employ them with the ladies: in which he was extremely successful: particularly with the wife of Marcus Lucullus, brother to the celebrated Lucius Lucullus, so well known to every reader of the Roman story. He seems, in truth, to have been one of that sort of men, who, in the language of Shakspere, is formed to make woman fake: at least if a poet may be supposed to flatter in the picture he draws of his patron. Thus, it is said, that Memmius, represents Venus, in his invocation to that goddess, as having bestowed upon her this favorite, every charm that could render him the most graceful and accomplished of the sons of men:

To sociam studia scribubus versibus esses
Quadris de Nereum Natura pangere comor
Memmius nostro: quam tu, Des, tempore in omne
Omnibus ornatus volutissimum excellentem rebus.

Thy aid, celestial queen of beauty, bring,
White nature's laws in various verse I sing;
To Memmius sing: the man, whom 'twas designed,
With every grace and all every art refined,
To shine the first and fairest of his kind.

Gifatit Prolegom, in Laureat. de Gent. Memmiis; Ad Att
most philosophical magnanimity. Upon the whole, however, I cannot but lament that I did not see you: for the uneasiness I feel at your unmerited sufferings is too great to have admitted of much increase by that interview; and, in all other respects, it would have added very considerably to my pleasure. It is a pleasure, therefore, in which I should have scoured, in search of myself the first convenient opportunity. In the mean time, so much of the purpose of my intended visit as may be explained, and, I should hope, settled too, in a letter I will now lay before you. The favour I am going to request, though of little consequence to you, is of much importance to me: however, ere I enter upon the subject, let me previously assure you, that I do not desire you to comply with my inclinations any farther than it shall be agreeable to your own. I must inform you, then, in the first place, that I am most intimately united with Patro, the Epicurean, in every article I mean except his philosophy: for there, indeed, we are at a great distance. I received the first marks of his esteem so long ago as when he distinguished himself at Rome by his singular attachment to you and your friends. He has since, in the course which he late gained in our courts, I was a principal advocate both for him and his associates. I must add, that he was recommended to me by my very worthy friend Phaedrus; a man whom, long before I became acquainted with Phileos, and indeed from my childhood, I always highly valued. The first quality that recommended him to my esteem was his philosophical abilities; as I afterwards had reason to admire him for his moral and social virtues. Before I left Rome, I received a letter from Patro requesting me, in the first place, to intercede with you to be reconciled to him; and in the next, that you would make him a grant of an old ruinous edifice which belongs, it seems, to the college of Epicurea. I forbore writing to you, however, upon this subject, as being unwilling to interrupt you in the design which I then thought you enter-

I. Suet. in Vit. Aug. 40; Virgil. Eel. 1. 298; De Char. Orat. 1. 38; De Orat. 1. 283. 2. Cicero took Athens in his way to Cloidea: and Memmius left that city the day before his arrival. Manutius supposes that he withdrew on purpose to avoid our author, with whom, he imagines, Memmius was disgusted for not having given him his assistance at his trial, and his trial was really a mere conjecture; and has so much the less foundation, as there is not the least hint of this kind in the letter to Atticus, wherein Cicero acquaints him with the circumstance of his not meeting with Memmius. — Ad Att. v. 10. 3. It is by no means certain upon what occasion Memmius was banished. The principal commentators, indeed, are of opinion, that it was in consequence of a prosecution that was commenced against him for corrupt practices committed in the first reversion on this letter. But it seems to appear from Cicero's epistles to his brother, that either Memmius and his associates were all acquitted of that impeachment, or that their several prosecutions were dropped. — Ad Quint. Frat. iii. 2, 3, 8. 4. Phaedrus, it is supposed, was the predecessor of Patro in the Epicurean college. 5. Cicero, in another part of his writings, mentions an Academic philosopher of this name, whose lectures he attended. If the same person he meant in both places, as indeed is highly probable, Mr. Ross is undoubtedly right in charging the learned Memmius with a mistake, in imagining Philo to have been an Epicurean, and predecessor to Phaedrus. 6. Memmius had obtained a grant of this edifice from the Athenians, in order to build a house for his own use. 7. I endeavored, as building upon that spot. But I now comply with his solicitation, as he has assured me, since my arrival in Athens, that it is the general opinion of your friends, that you have totally laid aside this sense of it. Should, however, your particular interest should no longer interfere, let me prevail with you to grant his petition. And if you should have taken any slight prejudice against my friend by the ill offices of his countrymen, (whose capricious tempers I am well acquainted with,) I entreat you to renounce your resentment, not only for my sake, but in compliance also with the suggestions of your own generous nature. Shall I freely own to you my real sentiments? To confess the truth, then, there does not appear any just reason either for his being so earnest in pressing this affair of the edifice, or for your persisting in your refusal. This, at least, is most evident, that it is much more suitable to a man of his character than of yours, to be obstinate in trifles. You are well apprised, I know, of the plea which Patro alleges, to justify his warmth upon this occasion. I need not mention, therefore, that he urges the honour and reverence which is due to the last injunctions of Epicurus; and the particular regard he owes to the earnest request of Phaedrus, together with that veneration which ought to be paid to a mansion impressed with the footsteps of so many celebrated philosophers. One cannot, indeed, condemn his zeal in this instance, without deriding, at the same time, the whole system of his philosophy. But neither you nor I are such enemies to those of his sect as not to be inclined to pardon an enthusiasm of this sort, especially as it is a prejudice (if it be a prejudice) that arises from the weakness, not the wickedness, of his heart. But I must not forget to mention another inducement which engaged me to apply to you in his favour. I will introduce it by assuring you that I look upon Atticus as my brother: and indeed there is no man who has a more considerable share of my heart, or from whose friendship I derive greater satisfaction. It is in pursuance of his most earnest entreaty, as well as of Patro's, that I make the present application. And though Atticus is by no means of a temper to be importunate, nor has any ambitious purposes of his own to gratify; yet he has desired me, with all the ardour imaginable, to exert my utmost interest with you in this affair. Not that he is influenced by his particular attachment to this sect, for he has too much learning, as well as judgment, to be a bigot to their unphilosophical tenets: but he is swayed entirely by his friendship for Patro, and the esteem he entertained for his predecessor in this college, the worthy Phaedrus. He is persuaded that my influence with you is so great, that the slightest

To Marcus Calius. 1

Could you seriously then imagine, my friend, that I commissioned you to send me the idle news of the town; matches of gladiators, adjournments of causes, robberies, and the rest of those uninteresting occurrences which no one ventures to mention to me, even when I am in the midst of them at Rome? For other are the accounts which I expect from your hand, as I know not any man whose judgment in politics I have more reason to value. I should esteem it a misemployment of your talents, even were you to transmit to me those more important transactions that daily arise in the republic, unless they should happen to relate immediately to myself. There are other less penetrating politicians who will send me intelligence of this sort; and I shall be abundantly supplied with it likewise by common fame. In short, it is not an account either of what has lately been transacted, or is in present agitation, that I require in your letters: I expect, as from one whose discernment is capable of looking far into futurity, your opinion of what is likely to happen. Thus, by seeing a plan, as it were, of the republic, I shall be enabled to judge what kind of structure will probably arise. Hitherto, however, I have no reason to charge you with having been negligent in communicating to me your prophetic conjectures. For the events which have lately happened in the commonwealth were much beyond any man’s penetration: I am sure, at least, they were beyond mine.

I passed several days with Pompey 2 in conversation upon public affairs; but it is neither prudent nor possible to give you the particulars in a letter. In general, however, I will assure you, that he is animated with the most patriotic sentiments, 3 and is...

as a fact within my own knowledge, for I was present when their verdict was delivered. You must not imagine, however, that the world is convinced of his innocence; on the contrary, never was there an event more unexpected, or which raised so universal an indignation.

For my own part, even with all my prejudices in his favour, I was under the utmost astonishment when I heard him pronounced not guilty; and indeed it was a circumstance I so little expected, that I was actually preparing to condole with him on the reverse. What must have been the surprise, then, of others less biased in his behalf! The whole assembly, in truth, warmly exclaimed against the judges, and very strongly intimated, that they looked upon them as guilty of the most insufferable corruption. My friend, in the mean time, is in much greater danger than he was before, as he will now most assuredly be indicted on the Licinian law. I must not forget to add, that the day after his trial, his advocate Hortensius appeared in Curio's theatre, with a view, as I suppose, of receiving the general congratulations. But he no sooner entered than, lo!

With thunder hark the rending concave tore."

This circumstance is so much the more observable, as Hortensius has passed on to a good old age without ever having before been thus insulted. But it broke out upon him with so much violence in the present instance, that it might well suffice for a whole life; as I am persuaded, indeed, it occasioned him heartily to repent of the victory he had obtained.

I have no political news to send you. Marcellus has dropped the design, upon which he was lately so intent; but not so much from indolence, I believe, as prudence. It is wholly uncertain who will be our succeeding consul. As to my own pursuits, there are two competitors with me for the sedileship; the one really is, and the other would fain be thought, a man of quality. In short, Marcus Octavius and Caius Hirrus are candidates for me with for that office. I mention this, as I know your contempt for the latter will raise your impatience to be informed of the event of this election. I must, however, add, that you shall hear that I am chosen, to give proper directions about the panthers; and, in the mean time, that you would endeavour to procure the sum of money which is due to me on the bond of Sittius.

I sent my first collection of domestic news by Lucius Castrinus Pius, and I have given the subsequent part to the hearer of this letter. Farewell.

LETTER XXX.

From the same.

OWN the truth, my friend: have I not verified what I could not persuade you to believe when you left Rome, and written to you as frequently as I promised? I am sure, at least, if all my letters have reached your hands, you must acknowledge more than punctual correspondence than yourself. I am the more regular in my commerce of this kind, as it is the only method I have of amusing those few vacant hours I can steal from business, and which I used to take so much pleasure in passing with you. I greatly, indeed, lament your absence, and look upon it not only as having reduced me, but all Rome in general, to a state of total solitude.

When you were within my reach, I was careless enough to let whole days slip by without seeing: but now you are absent, I am every moment regretting the loss of your company. Thanks to my noble competitor, Hirrus, for giving me an additional reason thus frequently to wish for you. It would afford you high diversion, in truth, to observe with what a ridiculous awkwardness this formidable rival of yours endeavours to conceal his mortification, in finding that my interest in the approaching election is much stronger than his own. Believe me, however, it is more for your gratification than mine that I am desirous you may soon receive such an account of his success in this pursuit as I know you wish. For, as to merit and importance. "O Di! (says he, speaking of Hirrus in a letter to his brother) O Di! quam inquit; quam se ipse amans sine rivali!" Yet a time came when Cicero did not scruple to court the friendship of this man, whom he so much affected to despise; and when he was making interest to obtain the honour of a triumph for his exploits in Cilicia, we find him applying to Atticus for his good offices, in order to close the breach between Hirrus and himself. Cicero seems, indeed, upon many occasions, to have recolected too late, that in popular governments, a man who is not superior to the ambition and interests of the world, can scarcely make a contemptible enemy.—Ad Quin. Frat. iii. 8; Ad Att. vii. 1.

The sediles were of two kinds, plebeian and eurule; and it was the latter office that Cænilius was at this time soliciting. They had the care of the temples, theatres, and other public structures; they were the judges, likewise, in all causes relative to the selling or exchanging estates.—Rosin. Antiq.

It was customary for the sediles to entertain the people with public shows twice, during their office. The principal part of these entertainments consisted in combats of wild beasts of the most uncommon kind.—Manutius.

Hirrus stood in competition with Cicero for the office of augur, when the latter was chosen.

See the preceding letter. myself, his disappointment may possibly prove a means of my being chosen in conjunction with a colleague, whose superior finesses will draw me, I fear, into much inconvenient expense. But, however that may be, I shall rejoice if Hirrus should be thrown out, as it will supply us with an inexhaustible fund of mirth. And this appears likely to prove the case; for the disgust which the people have conceived against the other can-date, Marcus Octavius, does not seem to have any great effect in lessening their many objections to Hirrus.

As to what concerns the behaviour of Philotimus, in relation to Milo's estate, I have endeavoured that he shall act in such a manner as to give full satisfaction to Milo and his friends, and at the same time clear your character from all imputation.

And now I have a favour to beg in my turn;
let me entreat you, when your leisure shall permit (as I hope it soon will), to give me an instance of your regard, by inscribing to me some of your literary performances. You will wonder, perhaps, at the oddness of this request; but I am very desirous, I confess, that posterity should see, among the many ingenious monuments you have erected to friendship, some memorial likewise of the amity which subsisted between us. You, who possess the whole circle of science, will best judge what would be the most proper subject for this purpose; but I should be glad it might be of a kind that will take in the greatest number of readers, and at the same time bear a proper relation to my own studies and character. Farewell.

LETTER XXXI.

To Appius Pulcher.

I ARRIVED at Tralles on the 27th of July, where I found Lucilius waiting for me with your letter, which he delivered, together with this other. A. v. 702.

You will not have employed upon this occasion a more friendly hand, or one who is better qualified to give me light into those affairs concerning which I was so desirous of being informed. Accordingly I listened to his account with great attention, as I read your letter with much pleasure. I will not remind you of the numerous good offices which have passed between 4 Milo having been sentenced to banishment, (see Pont. v.

p. 386,) his estate was sold for the benefit of his creditors.

Philotimus, a freedman of Cicero, bought this estate, in partnership with some others, at an undervalue. It was thought strange that Cicero should suffer Philotimus, who acted as a sort of steward in his family, to engage in a purchase of this kind, which was always looked upon as odious, and was particularly so in the present case: for Cicero had received great obligations from Milo.

Accordingly the latter complained of it, in the letters he wrote to his friends at Rome, and his alarmed Cicero for his reputation, and he seems to have written to Cælius, as he did to several others of his correspondents, to accommodate this affair in the way that he would most to his honour. It was not to prove the vanity of his hope that he wrote this article: for though he pleaded in his justification an intent of serving Milo, yet it appears very evidently, from his letters to Atticus upon this subject, that he shared with Philotimus in the advantages of the purchase.—Ascon. in Quint. pro Mil.; Ad Att. v. 6. vi. 4. See also Mung. Réüm.

A city in Asia Minor.

5 An island in the Ionian sea, at which Cicero touched in his voyage to Cilicia. It is now called Corfu, and belongs to the republic of Venice.

6 A city in Phrygia, situated on the river Lycus.

7 A principal city to the province of Cilicia. It still subsists under the name of Cogni, and belongs to the Turkish dominions.
I spent the three days I continued at Ephesos \(^1\) with Scævola \(^2\). But though we entered very freely into conversation, he did not mention the least word of your having desired him to take upon himself the government of the province during the interval between your leaving it and my arrival. I wish, however, it had been in my power (for I cannot persuade myself it was not in his inclination) to have composed with your request. Farewell.

\(^{1}\) A very celebrated city in Ionia, situated not far from Smyrna.

\(^{2}\) He was probably either master, or lieutenant, to Appius.

\(^{3}\) He was cousin to the present consul, Marcus Marcellus. The reader will find an account of him in the farther progress of these remarks.

\(^{4}\) In the text he is called Marcus Claudius: but Manilius and Cornellus both agree in the reading here adopted, which is likewise confirmed by Pighius. He was competitor for the consulate with Marcellus, mentioned in the preceding note. The wonder, therefore, in these two instances was, (as Mr. Ross observes,) that Marcellus should be chosen consul, who was an avowed enemy to Cæsar; while Cælius, though supported by the Cæsarian party, lost his election.

\(^{5}\) Cælius was one of the most agreeable orators of his age, as Cicero, who has drawn his character at large, informs us. His sentiments were conceived with uncommon delicacy, as they were delivered in the most correct, perspicuous, and elegant expression. His words were so happily combined together, and accented with each other in such a well-adjusted arrangement, that Cicero, by a very strong image, compares his style to a piece of beautiful inlaid-work. His metaphors were so justly imagined and so properly introduced, that they rather seemed to arise spontaneously out of his subject, than to have been transplanted from a foreign soil. His periods, at the same time, were exquisitely musical. They did not, however, lull the ear with uniform cadence; but were artfully diversified with all the various modulations of the most skilful harmony. In short, if to instruct and to please had been the single excellences of an orator, Cælius would have merited the first rank in the Roman forum. But he forgot that the principal business of his profession was to animate and to inflame.—Cic. de Clar. Orat. 274.

\(^{8}\) There is some variation amongst the MSS. in the reading of this name. The best commentators, however, suppose, that this person is the same who was advanced to the censorship two years after the date of this letter: that is, of his election. It was an event for which he was so little prepared, that he entered the field in all the gay confidence of victory; whilst his competitor Dolabella, on the contrary, was so diffident of success, that if our friends of the equestrian order had not been too wise to have suffered him, he would have tamely retreated without the least contest. But as much disposed as you may be to wonder at our transactions, you will not be surprised, I dare say, when I inform you that Servius, the tribune elect, has been tried and convicted: and that Curio \(^{9}\) is a candidate to succeed him. This last circumstance greatly alarms those who are unacquainted with the real good qualities of Curio’s heart. I hope, and indeed believe, he will act agreeably to his professions, and join with the senate in supporting the friends of the republic. I am sure, at least, he is full of these designs at present: in which Cæsar’s conduct has been the principal occasion of engaging him. For Cæsar, though he spares no pains or expense to gain over even the lowest of the people to his interest; \(^{10}\) has thought fit to treat Curio with singular clemency. But the letter which he is said to have written upon this occasion, that he, who never acted with artifice in all his life, is suspected to have dissembled his resentment in order the more effectually to defeat the schemes of those who oppose his election: I mean the Lælii and the Antonii, together with the rest of that wonderful party.

I have been so much engaged by the difficulties which have retarded the several elections, that I could not find leisure to write you a former letter; and, indeed, as I every day expected they would be determined, I waited their conclusion that I might give you at once an account of the whole. But it is now the first of August, and they are not yet over, the elections of prætors having met with some unexpected delays. As to that in which I am candidate, I can give you no account which way it is likely to be decided; only it is generally thought that Hirrus will not be chosen. This is collected from the fact that he has attended the gladiatorial shows, and has been the candidate for the office of plebeian sedile. \(^{9}\) That foolish project of his for the nomination of a dictator \(^{10}\) (which we formerly, you may in the year of Rome 704. It appears he was a competitor with Dolabella for the office of quindecimvir.

\(^{10}\) The account which Dion Cassius gives of Cæsar, exactly corresponds with what Cælius here asserts. For it appears, from this historian, that Cæsar, when he could not by direct means secure the master in his interest, insulted himself by proper applications to the good graces of the favourite slave: and, by confessions of this political kind, he gained over many persons of principal rank in Rome.—Dio, xl. p. 149.

\(^{11}\) If Curio did not act with artifice in the present instance,—of which, however, there is great reason to doubt,—it is certain, at least, that he was far from being so incapable of assuming that character, as Cælius here represents him. On the contrary, it appears by the concurrent testimony of the ancient historians, that he secretly favoured the cause of his party, even before he avowed his party. And Dion Cassius, in particular, assured us, that Curio, at the same time that he pretended to act in concert with the enemies of Cæsar, was only gaining their confidence, in order to betray them.—Vell. Pat. l. 48; Dio, xlv. p. 149.

\(^{12}\) The plebeian sediles were chosen out of the commons, and were, in some respects, a sort of judges to the tribunes.

remember, exposed to so much ridicule,) suddenly turned the election against him; and the people expressed the loudest acclamations of joy at his repulse: at the same time, Hirrus was universally called upon by the populace to give up his pretensions at the ensuing election. I hope, therefore, you will very soon hear that this affair is determined in favour of Pompey with respect to the office of censor, which you scarce dare promise yourself, I know, with regard to Hirrus.

As to the state of the commonwealth, we begin to give up all expectation that the face of public affairs will be changed. However, at a meeting of the senate, holden on the 22d of the last month in the temple of Apollo, upon a debate relating to the payment of the forces commanded by Pompey, mention was made of that legion, which, as appeared by his accounts, had been lent to Caesar: and he was asked, of what number of men it consisted, and for what purposes it was borrowed. In short, Pompey was pushed so strongly upon this article, that he found himself under a necessity of promising to recall this legion out of Gaul: but he added at the same time, that the clamours of his enemies should not force him to take this step too precipitately. It was afterwards moved, that the question might be put concerning the election of a successor to Caesar. Accordingly the senate came to a resolution that Pompey (who was just going to the army at Ariminum, and is now actually set out for that purpose,) should be ordered to return to Rome with all expedition, that the affair relating to a general election of new governors for all the provinces might be debated in his presence.

This point, I imagine, will be brought before the senate on the 15th of this month; when, if no infamous obstacles should be thrown in the way by the tribunes, the house will certainly come to some resolution. For Pompey, in the course of the debate, let fall an intimation that he "thought every man owed obedience to the authority of that assembly." However, I am impatient to hear what Paulus, the senior consular elect, will say when he delivers his opinion upon this question.

and absolute power; but was never created unless on emergencies of great and sudden danger, which required the exertion of an extraordinary authority. Accordingly, it was an occasion of the disturbances that happened at Rome in the year 700, [see Rem. 3, p. 306, and Rem. 5, p. 397,] that some of the friends and flatterers of Pompey proposed him for this office. Vinicius and Hirrus were the principal promoters of this scheme: but it was so unbecoming to the people in general, that this single circumstance, it appears, turned the election against the former; and, probably, was the chief reason that the latter was likewise disappointed of the sedileship. See letter 28 of this book, p. 383; All Qunt. Prat. III. 6.

Because Hirrus was supported by Pompey, and Pompey, though he remained in Rome, was at this time governor of Spain; which had been continued to him for four years at the end of his late consulship. It was the payment of his troops in that province, which was under this circumstance. —Pint. ibid.

The Parthians, having lately obtained a most signal victory over Crassus, (an account of whose unfortunate expedition has already been given in the course of these notes,) were preparing to make an invasion in the Roman provinces that lay contiguous to their dominions. Accordingly they soon afterwards executed this design by invading Syria and Cilicia; as will be related at large in the letters of the following book. The kingdom of Parthia is now included in the empire of Persia, of which it makes a very considerable province.

I repeat my former request in relation to the money due to me on the bond of Sittius; and I do so that you may see it is an article in which I am greatly interested. I must again likewise entreat you to employ the Cyhyrates, in order to procure me some panthers. I have only to add, that we have received certain accounts of the death of Ptolemy. Let me know, therefore, what measures you would advise me to take upon this occasion; in what condition he has left his kingdom; and in whose hands the administration is placed. — Farewell.

August the first.

Let. XXXIII.

From the same.

How far you may be alarmed at the invasion which threatens your province and that of the neighbouring countries, I know not; but for myself, I confess, I am extremely anxious for the consequence. Could we contrive indeed that the enemy's forces should be only in proportion to the number of yours, and just sufficient to entitle you to the honour of a triumph, there could not be a more desirable circumstance. But the misfortune is, if the Parthians should make any attempt, I well know it will be a very powerful one: and I am sensible, at the same time, that you are so little in a condition to oppose their march, that you have scarce troops to defend a single defile. But the world in general will not be so reasonable as to make the proper allowances for this circumstance. On the contrary, it is expected from a man in your station, that he should be prepared for every occurrence that may arise, without once considering whether he is furnished with the necessary supplies for that purpose. I am still the more uneasy upon your account, as I foresee the contests concerning affairs in Gaul will retard the nomination of your successor; and though I dare say you have already had this contingency in your view, yet I thought proper to apprise you of its probability, that you might be so much the more early in adjusting your measures accordingly. I need not tell you that the usual artifices will undoubtedly be played off.

3 * * Ptolemy Auletes, of whom an account has been given in the notes on the first book. By the following inquiries which Caesar makes, it is probable he was one of those who had lent money to that king when he was at Rome, soliciting the senate to assist him with troops for the recovery of his dominions. See Rem. 1, p. 344.

4 The Parthians, having lately obtained a most signal victory over Crassus, (an account of whose unfortunate expedition has already been given in the course of these notes,) were preparing to make an invasion in the Roman provinces that lay contiguous to their dominions. Accordingly they soon afterwards executed this design by invading Syria and Cilicia, as will be related at large in the letters of the following book. 5 * * No general could legally claim this honour, unless he had destroyed 5,000 of the enemy in one engagement.—Val. Max. II. 8.
A day will be appointed for considering of a successor to Caesar: upon which some tribune will interpose his negative; and then a second will probably declare, that unless the senate shall be at liberty to put the question freely concerning all the provinces in general, he will not suffer it to be debated with regard to any in particular. And thus we shall be trifled with for a considerable time: possibly, indeed, two or three years may be spun out by these contemptible artifices.

If anything new had occurred in public affairs I should, as usual, have sent you the account, together with my sentiments thereupon: but at present the wheels of our political machine seem to be motionless. Marcellus is still pursuing his former designs concerning the provinces; but he has not yet been able to assemble a competent number of senators. Had this motion been brought on the preceding year, and had Curio at the same time been tribune, it would probably have succeeded: but as affairs are now circumstanced, you are sensible how easy it will be for Cæsar, regardless as he is of the public interest when it stands in competition with his own, to obstruct all our proceedings. Farewell.

LETTER XXXIV.

From the same.

Will you not be surprised when I tell you of the victory I have obtained over Hirrus? But if you know how easy a conquest he proved, you would blush to think that so powerless a competitor once ventured to stand forth as your rival. His behaviour since this repulse affords us much diversion, as he now affects upon all occasions to act the patriot and vote against Cæsar. Accordingly, he insists upon Cæsar's being immediately recalled; and most unmercifully inveighs against the conduct of Curio. In a word, a little conversant as he is in the business of the Forum, he is now become an advocate professed, and most magnanimously pleads the cause of liberty. You are to observe, however, that it is only in a morning he is seized with these violent fits of patriotism; for he is generally much too elevated in an afternoon to descend into so grave a character.

I mentioned in one of my former letters how the affairs of the provinces would come before the senate on the 13th of the last month: nevertheless, by the intervention of Marcellus, the consul elect, it was put off to the first of this instant. But when the day arrived, they could not procure, a sufficient number of senators to be present. It is now the second of September, and nothing has yet been done in this business: and I am persuaded it will be adjourned to the following year. As far as I can foresee, therefore, you must be contented to leave the administration of your province in the hands of some person whom you shall think proper to appoint for that purpose, as I am well convinced you will not soon be relieved by a successor. For as Gaul must take the same fate with the rest of the provinces, any attempt that shall be made for settling the general succession will certainly be obstructed by Cæsar's party. Of this I have not the least doubt, and therefore I thought it necessary to give you notice, that you may be prepared to act accordingly.

I believe I have reminded you of the panthers in almost every one of my letters; and surely you will not suffer Patiscus to be more liberal in this article than yourself. He has made Curio a present of no less than half a score; great therefore will be your disgrace if you should not send me a much larger number. In the mean time, Curio has given me those he received from Patiscus, together with as many more from Africa: for you are to know, it is not only in granting the provinces, but the public that the generous Curio displays his liberality. As to yourself, if you can but charge your memory with my request, you may easily procure me as many of these animals as you please: it is only sending for some of the Cybiraete to hunt them, and issuing forth your orders likewise into Pamphylia, where I am told they are taken in great abundance. I am the more solicitous upon this article, as I believe my colleague and I shall exhibit our games separately; so that the whole preparation for them must lie singly upon myself. I know you love ease as well as I do; but I should beglad if you could by any means prevail with yourself to part with a little of it upon the present occasion. In good earnest, you will have no other trouble than merely to give your commands; as my people, whom I have sent into your province in order to recover the money due to me from Sittius, will be ready to receive the panthers and convey them into Italy. It is probable likewise, if you should give me any hopes of succeeding in my request, that I may send a reinforcement to assist them.

I recommend Marcus Feridius, a Roman knight, to your protection and friendship, who comes into Cilicia to transact some business relating to his private affairs. He is a young man of great worth and spirit; and his father is my very particular friend. He holds an estate under certain cities in your government, of which he is desirous to procure the enfranchisement: and I am persuaded he may easily obtain his point by the intervention of your good offices. Your employing them upon this occasion will indeed be doing an honour to yourself, as it will oblige two men of great merit, who, I will venture to assure you, are not capable of proving ungrateful.

You were mistaken when you imagined that Favorinus was opposed by the more contemptible

None of their conjectures, however, appear so much to the purpose as that of an ingenious gentleman, to whose animadversions I have already acknowledged myself indebted. part of the people: on the contrary, it was all the better sort that voted against him. Your friend Pompey openly declares that Caesar ought not to be admitted as a candidate for the consulship while he retains his command in the province. He voted, however, against passing a decree for this purpose at present. Scipio moved that the first of March next might be appointed for taking into consideration the nominating a successor in the Gallic provinces; and that this matter should be proposed to the house separately, and without blending it with any other question. Balbus Cornelius was much discomposed at this motion; and I am well assured he has complained of it to Scipio in very strong terms. Candidus defended himself upon his trial with much eloquence; but in the impeachment which he afterwards exhibited he supported his charge with little force or spirit. Farewell.

LETTER XXXV.
To Marcus Marcellus, Consult. / I very warmly congratulate you on your relation, Caius Marcellus, being elected to succeed you, as I sincerely rejoice in your having received this happy fruit of your pious affection to your family, of your patriot zeal to be at this time chosen protonect.—Plut. in Vit. Pomp.; Dio, xlv. p. 356.

1 Pompey, who contributed more than any man to the advancement of Caesar's power, had lately procured a law, by which the personal appearance of the latter was dis- pensed with in soliciting the consular office. But Pompey now began to repent of a concession so entirely unconsti- tutional: not that his own designs were more favourable to the liberties of Rome than those of Caesar, but as discov- ering at last that they could not both subsist together. His present opposition, however, was as impotent as his former compliances were imperative, and only tended to bring on so much the sooner his own destruction, together with that of the republic.—Ad Att. vili. 3.

2 Metellus Scipio, who was chosen consul by Pompey the latter end of the last year, agreeably to a power with which he was invested by the senate, for nominating his colleague. Pompey likewise married his daughter, the amiable Cornella, who added to the charms of her person every moral and intellectual qualification that could render her the most estimable and accomplished of her sex. And yet, with all these extraordinary endowments, her sex was still more distinguished by that singular modesty and hum- ility with which they were accompanied. It is Plutarch who gives her this character; upon which Moniteur Dacier remarks:— "Je dois être plus persuadé qu'un autre, que l'étoffe que Plutarque donne à Cornelle peut n'être point flâted. J'ai un exemple domestique, qui prouve que beaucoup d'esprit et de savoir, et de grands talents, peuvent se trouver dans une femme, et être accompagnés d'une modeste aussi grande et plus estimable encore que ses talents." May I add my suffrage to that of this celebrated critic, by declaring, from the same domestic experience, that uncommon knowledge and a superior understanding are perfectly consistent with those more valuable qualities of the heart, which constitute the principal grace and ornament of the female character.—Plut. in Vit. Pomp.; Les Vies de Plut. par Duc. vol. v. p. 498, rém. 89.

3 He was involuntarily attached to Caesar, and seems to have been the principal manager of his affairs at Rome. He was disdained by a long line of potentates, who had burned the most honourable offices in the republic; as he himself was advanced to the consular dignity this year, in conjunction with Servius Sulpicius Rufus. It is mentioned to the credit of both these illustrious magistrates, your country, and of your illustrious deportment in the consular office. I can easily imagine the sentiments which your address upon this occasion has created in Rome: and as to myself, whom you have sent to those far distant parts of the globe, believe me I speak of it with the highest and most unfeigned applause. I can with strict truth assure you, that I have ever had a particular attachment to you from the earliest year of my life, and am confident you have always shown, by your generous offices in promoting my dignities, that you deemed me worthy of the most distinguished honours. But this late instance of your judicious management in procuring the consuleship for Marcellus, together with the proof it affords of the favour in which you stand with the republic, has raised you still higher in my esteem. It is with great complacency, therefore, that I hear it observed, by men of the first distinction for sense and merit, that, in all our words and actions, our taste and studies, our principles and pursuits, we bear a strong resemblance to each other. The only circumstance that can render your glorious consulate still more agreeable to me, will be your procuring a successor to be nominated to this province as soon as possible. But if this cannot be obtained, let me entreat you, at least, not to suffer my continuance here to be prolonged beyond the time limited by your decree and the law which occasioned that pax perpetua. In a word, I hope upon all occasions to experience in my absence the benefit of your friendship and protection. Farewell.

P. S.—I have received some intelligence concerning the Parthians, but as it is not at present sufficiently confirmed, I forbear to communicate the particulars to you; for, as I am writing to a consul, my letter perhaps might be considered as an information to the senate.

LETTER XXXVI.
To Caius Marcellus, Consul elect.
I received great pleasure in hearing of your advancement to the consulate. May the gods give you success in the enjoyment of this honour, and may you discharge its important duties in a manner worthy of your own that they were chosen without having employed those corrupt and violent measures which were at this period so generally practised: and Marcellus, in particular, had recommended himself to the people by the superior grace and energy of his eloquence. It has already been observed in these remarks, that he was extremely zealous in promoting the decree by which Caesar was recalled from his province, and which forwarded the flames of that unhappy civil war, which soon afterwards broke out to the destruction of the commonwealth. Upon that occasion Marcellus took the part of Pompey. But after the battle of Pharsalia, he threw down his arms, and withdrew to Mitylene, the capital of Lesbos, where he purposed to devote the remainder of his days to a philosophical retirement. But being persuaded by his friends, and particularly by Cicero, to accept the clemency of the victor, he, at length, yielded to their solicitation, and was preparing to return home, when he was cruelly assassinated by a man who had been in the number of his clients. The reader will find a particular account of this murder, together with some other circumstances concerning Marcellus, in the farther progress of these letters and remarks.—Suet. in Vit. Tiber. 1; Dio, x. l. p. 148; Cic. de Clar. Orat. 250; Ep. Fam. iv. 12.

4 He was conterminus with Marcus Marcellus, to whom illustrious character and that of your excellent father! You have my best wishes indeed upon this occasion, not only from affection, but gratitude, and in return to those warmest instances of your friendship which I have ever experienced in all the various incidents of my life. Many and important are the obligations likewise which I have received from your father, both as my protector in adversity and as having contributed to adorn my prosperity. I must add also to this family-list of my benefactors your worthy mother, whose zealous services in behalf both of my person and dignities have risen much higher than could have been expected from one of the tender sex. Being then, as I most certainly ought, entirely devoted to your family, let me earnestly cutret your friendship and protection in my absence. Farewell.

LETTER XXXVII.

To Caius Marcellus.

The advancement of your son to the consular dignity, and your enjoying a pleasure you so much wished to obtain, are circumstances which afford me a very uncommon satisfaction. They do not only upon his account, but yours, whom I esteem as highly deserving of every advantage that Fortune can bestow. Let me acknowledge at the same time that I have experienced your singular good-will towards me, both in the adverse and prosperous seasons of my life: and, indeed, my welfare and honours have been the zealous concern of your whole family. I shall be extremely obliged the preceding letter is addressed, and by whose interest, in conjunction with that of Pompey, he was elected to succeed him in the consular office. He pursued the politics of his illustrious relation and predecessor, by firmly opposing the views of Caesar.—Dio, xi.

LETTER I.

To the Consuls, the Praetors, the Tribunes of the People, and the Senate.

The many obstructions I met with in my way to this province, both by sea and land, prevented me from reaching it sooner than the last of July. I thought it my first duty, on my arrival, to see that the militia and garrisons were in good order; being articles in which the interest of the republic is principally concerned. Accordingly, I have taken all proper measures to that end; though I cannot forbear adding, that I have been enabled to effect this more by my own care and diligence than from any supplies I was furnished with for that purpose. Having thus adjusted my military preparations, and receiving daily intelligence that the Parthians had actually invaded Syria, I thought it advisable to move with my forces through Lycaonia, Isaurica, and Cappadoce. It seemed highly probable, indeed, if the enemy had any design of attempting an irruption into my province, that they would direct their route through Cappadoce, as being a country that could give them the least opposition. I marched, therefore, into that part of Cappadoce which lies contiguous to Cilicia, and encamped at Cybistra, a town at the foot of Mount Taurus. I had a double view in leading my troops to this place. The first was, that in whatever disposition Artuades, king of Armenia, stood towards us, he might be sensible that a Roman army was not far from his frontiers and in the next place that I might be as near as possible to Deiotarus,—a prince, I well knew.

* Cicero's province comprehended not only Cilicia, but Pamphylia, Lycaonia, part of Phrygia, and the island of Cyprus, together with some other less considerable appendages. Cilicia was first added to the Roman provinces by Publius Servilius, surnamed Isauricus, in the year of Rome 69.—Ad Att. v. 21; Ammian. Marcellin. xiv. 8.

* He was prince of Galatia, a country bordering on Phrygia. He distinguished his zeal for the republic in all the Asiatic wars in which the Romans were engaged during his reign, and was particularly serviceable to Pompey in his expedition against Mithridates; for which he was honored by the senate with the title of king. Some time extremely our friend, and whose counsel and assistance might prove of great advantage in the present conjuncture. As soon as I had finished my encampment, I detached my cavalry before me into Cilicia. This I did in order to confirm the several cities in that part of my province in their allegiance, by giving them notice of my arrival, and likewise that I might have the earliest intelligence of what was transacting in Syria. During the three days that I continued in this camp, I was engaged in discharging a commission equally necessary and important. I had received your express commands to take the worthy and faithful Ariobarzanes1 under my particular protection, and to defend the quarters with which I had it my kingdom to the utmost of my power. In your degree, which passed for this purpose, a clause was inserted declaring that “the welfare of this province was much the concern of the people and senate of Rome;” an honour which was never before paid to any potentate. For this reason I thought it became me to signify to him in person the distinction which you had conferred upon him. I acquainted him, therefore, in the presence of my council, with the instructions you had given me in his behalf; and called upon him to examine whether there was any instance in which he had occasion for my service. I assured him at the same time, on my own part, that I offered him my protection with the utmost zeal and fidelity. He began his speech with expressing a proper sense of the high honour thus conferred upon him by the people and senate of Rome. He then addressed his acknowledgments to me in particular, for having executed my commission in such a manner as to convince him both of the respect with which I honoured him my good offices, and of the strong injunctions I had received from the republic for that purpose.

It gave me great satisfaction to hear him say, in this our first interview, that he neither knew, nor indeed suspected, any designs to be carrying on either against his life or his crown. After I had congratulated him upon so happy a circumstance, and exhorted him, in remembrance of his father’s fate, carefully to observe the admonitions of the senate in being particularly cautious of his person, he took his leave and returned to Cibistra. The next day, however, he paid me a second visit in my tent, accompanied by his brother Ariaithes, together with several venerable old ministers of his late father, who, in a very plaintive and affecting manner, all joined with him in imploring my protection. Upon my inquiring, with much surprise, what sudden accident had occasioned this unexpected visit, he told me that he had just received certain information of a design to seize his crown; that those who were apprised of this conspiracy had not the courage to disclose it till my arrival, but in confidence of my protection had now ventured to lay open to him the whole plot; and that the disaffected party had actually made treasonable applications to his brother, of whose singular loyalty and affection he expressed at the same time the strongest assurance. This account was confirmed to me by Ariaithes himself, who acknowledged that he had been solicited to accept the government of the Romans; which in effect, he said, was amounting to their intention of destroying Ariobarzanes, as he could never reign during his brother’s life. He added, that he had not acquainted the king with these treasonable overtures before, as being apprehensive for his own person if he had ventured to reveal them sooner. When he had finished, I exhorted Ariobarzanes to take all proper precautions for his security; and then turning to the approved and experienced ministers of his father’s and grandfather’s house, I reminded them of the cruel fate that had attended their late sovereign, and admonished them to be so much the more particularly vigilant in protecting their present.

The king requested me to supply him with some troops both of horse and foot; which, however, I refused, notwithstanding I was empowered and indeed directed to do so by your decree. The truth is, the daily accounts I received of what was transacting in Syria, rendered it expedient, for the interest of the republic, that I should march my whole army, with all expedition, to the borders of Cilicia. Besides, the conspiracy against Ariobarzanes was now fully detected, he appeared to be in a condition of defending his crown without the assistance of a Roman army. I contented myself, therefore, with giving him my advice; and recommended it to him, as the first act of government, to found his security on the affections of his people. With this view, I persuaded him to exert his royal authority in the present conjuncture no farther than necessity should require, and against those only whom he perceived to be most deeply engaged in the plot: as for the rest, that he should grant them a free and general pardon. To which I added, that the best use he could make of my army was, to intimidate the guilty from persevering in their designs, rather than actually to turn it against them; and that, when the design was secret and not generally known, the disaffected party would be well convinced that I should not fail of assisting him, pursuant to your orders, if occasion required.

Having thus encouraged him, I struck my tents, and am now proceeding on my march to Cilicia. I had the satisfaction, in leaving Cappadocia, to

1. The kingdom of Cappadocia, of which Ariobarzanes was monarch, was of a very large extent, comprehending the greater part of those countries, at present under the Ottoman dominion, which are now called Amasia, Gasse, and Totac. It appears, however, by the letters to Atticus, that this kingdom was so extremely impoverished, that the crown was almost wholly destitute of any revenues—a circumstance to which Herace alludes in one of his epistles.

Manoeips inclypes agent aries Cappadocam rox.

The instance that Plutarch gives of the great scarcity of money among these people is indeed almost incredible, if what the ancient geographers assert be true, that their country abounded in silver mines: for that historian tells us, that when Lucullus was carrying on the war against Mithridates, in this part of the world, an ox sold in Cappadocia for about fourpence, and a slave for sixpence. — Ad Att. vi. 1; Hor. Ep. i. 6; Plut. in Vit. Luculli.
reflect that my arrival had wonderfully, and indeed almost providentially, delivered that monarch from a conspiracy which was upon the very point of taking effect. This reflection was so much the more agreeable to me, as you had not only voluntarily, and without any application for that purpose, honoured Ariobarzanes with the acknowledgment of his regal title, but had particularly recommended him to my protection, and expressly declared in your decree that his security was highly your concern. I judged it proper, therefore, to send you this minute account of what has passed in relation to Ariobarzanes, that you might see with how much prudence you had long before provided against a contingency which had well nigh happened. And this I the rather do, as that prince appears to be so faithfully attached to the republic, as well as endowed with such great and excellent qualities, as to justify the extraordinary zeal you have shown for his interest.

LETTER II.

To Thermus, Proprator.

Lucius Egnatius Corvus has been long in the number of my most intimate friends; and, indeed, no man possesses a worthier or more grateful heart. I recommend him, therefore, most warmly and entirely to your protection; beseeching you to assist him upon every occasion that shall not be inconsistent with your honour and dignity. This is a restriction, however, which I might well have spared; as I am sure he will never make you a request unworthy either of your character or his own. But I must particularly entreat your favour in relation to his affairs in Hellespontus. In the first place, then, I beg you would confirm the grant of certain lands which was made to him by the city of Parion, and which he has hitherto enjoyed without molestation: in the next place, that if any inhabitant of Hellespontus should controvert his rights of this kind, you would direct the cause to be heard in that district. But, after having already assigned him wholly to your patronage, it is unnecessary to point out particular articles with which I recommend your good offices. To say all then in one word: be assured I shall consider every instance wherein you shall advance either his honour or his interest as so many immediate favours conferred upon myself. Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Appius Pulcher.

Though I am by no means disposed to be more favourable to myself than to you, in judging of the part we have respectively acted towards each other; yet, when I reflect on our late mutual behaviour, I have far greater reason to be satisfied with my own conduct than with yours.

Quintus Minucius Thermus was proctor in the year of Rome 701. At the expiration of his office, he was appointed proprator, or governor of that part of the Asiatic continent, styled Asia propr, which included Lydia, Ionia, Caria, Mya, and part of Phrygia. Cicero speaks of him in a letter to Atticus, as exercising his administration with great integrity.—Ad Att. vi. i.

A city in Hellespont.

As I knew the high rank which Phanias justly possesses in your confidence and esteem, I inquired of him when we met at Brundisium to what part of the province he imagined you chose I should receive the resignation of your government. He assured me (as I would extremely agree to) that, if I landed at Sida*. For this reason, notwithstanding I could not have made so splendid an entrance from that city, and it was inconvenient to me, likewise, upon many other accounts, yet I told him I would certainly comply with your inclinations. Some time afterwards I had a conference with your friend Clodius, at Corcyra, and I always consider myself as talking to you whenever I am conversing with him. I repeated, therefore, the same promise I had given to Phanias; and assured him that I intended to pursue the route which the latter had marked out to me. Clodius made many acknowledgments upon this occasion in your name, but entreated me to change my design and proceed directly to Laodicea. For it was your purpose, he said, to advance towards the maritime part of the province in order to embark as soon as possible. He added, at the same time, that it was from your great desire to see me that you had deferred your departure; for, had any other person been your successor, you would not have waited for him. And this, indeed, corresponded with the letters I received from you at Rome, by which I perceived your great impatience to leave the province. I informed Clodius that I would comply with his request and with much more willingness, I told him, than if I had been to have executed my first engagement with Phanias. I therefore changed my plan, and immediately gave you notice of it with my own hand,—which, I find by your letter, you received in due time. When I reflect upon my conduct in this instance, I have the satisfaction to be assured that it is perfectly consonant to the strictest friendship. And now let me desire you to consider your behaviour in return. You were so far then from waiting in that part of the province which would have given us the earliest opportunity of an interview, that you withdrew* to such a distance as to render it impossible for me to reach you within the thirty days limited (if I mistake not) by the Senate at Corunna to your departure. This proceeding (to speak of it in the softest terms) must look with no friendly aspect in the eye of those who are unacquainted with our real sentiments towards each other,—as it has the appearance of your industriously avoiding a conference: whereas mine, on the contrary, must undoubtedly be deemed conformable to whatever could be expected from the strongest and most intimate union.

* A sea-port town of considerable note in Pamphylia.

* It was usual for the governors of provinces, when they entered upon their administration, to publish what they styled an edict, which was a kind of code or formulary of laws, by which they intended to proceed in the dispensation of justice. Cicero's Institutes of this sort were founded upon maxims so extremely different from those by which Appius had regulated himself, that the latter looked upon them as the indirect reflections upon his own modest and humble conduct. And this seems to have been the occasion of his treating Cicero in the manner of which he here, and in other subsequent letters, so much and so justly complains.—Ad Att. v. i.

* This letter was so called from its author, Cornelius Sylla, the dictator.
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

In the letter I received from you before my arrival in the province, though you mentioned your design of going to Tarsus, you still flattered me with hopes of a meeting. In the mean time, there are some who have the malice (for malice, I suppose, is their motive, as that vice indeed is widely diffused among mankind) to lay hold of this plausible pretence to alienate me from you, little aware that I am not easily shaken in my friendships. They assure me, that when you had reason to believe I was arrived in the province, you held a court of judicature at Tarsus, and exercised such other acts of authority as even those who have yet some little time unexpired in their ministry may usually choose to discharge. Their insinuations, nevertheless, are far from making any impression upon me. On the contrary, I rather consider you as having kindly eased me of part of my approaching trouble; and I rejoice that you have thus abridged me of one fatiguing month out of the twelve I must pass through in my government.

To speak freely, however, there is a circumstance that gives me concern; and I cannot but regret to find, that so small a number of forces in the province, there are no less than three considerable corps wanting, and I know not in what part they are dispersed. But my principal uneasiness is, that I cannot learn where I shall see you; and I should have sooner told you so if I had not concluded, from your total silence, both as to what you were doing and where you proposed to give me an interview, that I might daily expect your arrival. I have, therefore, despatched my brave and worthy friend Antonius, prefect of the Eroditai, with this letter; and, if you think proper, you may deliver up to him the command of the troops, that I may be able to enter upon some action ere the season is too far advanced. I had reason to hope, both from our friendship and your letters, to have had the benefit of your advice upon this occasion; and indeed I will not even yet despair of enjoying that advantage. However, unless you give me notice, it is impossible I should discover either when or where I am to have that satisfaction. In the mean while, I shall endeavour to convince even the most uncandid, as well as the equitable part of the world, that I am sincerely your friend. I cannot forbear saying, nevertheless, that those who are not disposed to judge in the most favourable manner, have some little cause to imagine that you do not bear the same amicable disposition towards me, and I shall be much obliged to you for endeavouring to remove their suspicions.

That you may not be at a loss what measures to take in order to our meeting consistently with the terms of the Cornelian law, I think it necessary to inform you that I arrived in the province on the last day of July; that I marched from Iconium on the 31st of August, and am now advancing to Cilicia by the way of Cappadocia. After having thus traced out my route, you will let me know, in case you should think proper to meet me, what time and place will be most convenient to you for that purpose. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Marcus Cato.

I thought it agreeable to our friendship to communicate to you the intelligence I have lately received. I am to inform you, then, that envos from Antiochus, king of Commagene, arrived in my camp at Iconium, on the 30th of August. They brought me advice that the king of Parthia's son, who is married, it seems, to a sister of the king of Armenia, was advanced to the banks of the Euphrates; that he was at the head of a very considerable army, composed of his own nation, together with a large body of foreign auxiliaries; that he had actually begun to transport his troops over the river; and that it was reported the king of Armenia had a design to invade Cappadocia. I have forborne to acquaint the senate with this news for two reasons. The first is, because the Commagenian envoys assured me that Antiochus had immediately despatched an express to Rome with this account; and, in the next place, knowing that the proconsul Marcus Bibulus had sailed from Ephesus with a favourable wind about the 13th of August, I imagined he had by this time reached his province, and would be able to give the senate a more certain and particular intelligence.

As to my own situation with respect to this important war, it is my utmost endeavour to find that security from the clemency of my administration, and the fidelity of our allies, which I can scarce expect from the strength and number of my troops. I have only to add my entreaties that you would continue, as usual, to favour me with your friendly offices in my absence. Farewell.

LETTER V.

To Thernus, Proprator.

CILIVUS PETROLANUS distinguishes me, upon all occasions, with the highest marks of esteem; indeed, we are united in the strictest bonds of amity. He has some affairs in your province, and, unless he should be able by my means to settle them during your administration, he looks upon them as utterly desperate. This task, my very obliging friend having assigned to my care, I take the liberty (in confidence of that most amicable disposition you have ever discovered towards me) of transferring it to yours; with this restriction, nevertheless, that it do not engage you.

Some account will be given of this great and celebrated patriot, in the notes on the first letter of the following book.

c Commagenes was a part of Syria not subjected to the Roman dominion.

in too much trouble. I am to inform you, then, that the corporations of Mylata and Alabanda 1 are respectively indebted to Cluvius 2 that Euthymedes owes me, when I saw him at Ephesus, he would take care that syndics 3 should be sent to Rome from the former, in order to adjust the matters in controversy between them. This, however, has not been performed: on the contrary, I hear they have commissioned deputies to negotiate this affair in their stead. But syndics are the proper persons, and therefore I entreat you to consider if these cities can despatch those officers to Rome, that this question may be soon and finally determined. I am farther to acquaint you, that Philoletus, of Alabanda, has assigned certain effects to Cluvius by a bill of sale. But the time for payment of the money, for which they are a security, being elapsed, I beg you would compel him either to discharge the debt, or to deliver the goods to the agents of Cluvius. My friend has likewise caused to be done of the same kind upon the cities of Heraclea and Barygys 4. I beseech you, therefore, either to procure him satisfaction by an immediate payment, or to oblige them to put him in possession of a proportionable part of their demesmes. The corporation of Canus 5 is also indebted to Cluvius: but they insist that, as the money has been ready for him, and actually lodged in the temple for that purpose, he is not entitled to any interest beyond the time the principal was so deposited 6. I entreat the favour of you to

1 Two cities of Caria, in Asia Minor.
2 These officers were a kind of solicitors to the treasury of their respective corporations.
3 In Caria.
4 This city was likewise in Caria.
5 This passage is rendered in a sense very different from that in which all the commentators have understood it. They take the expression,

| deponere depositum habuisse,

| to mean, that the Canians pretended the money in dispute was a deposit; and, therefore, that they were not liable to pay interest. But if we suppose the question between the Canians and Cluvius to have been, whether the sum demanded was or was not a deposit, the request which Cicero afterwards makes must be highly unjust:—

| operam ut usurae Cluvio commendaret,

| it could make no equitable decision whether the money came to them by a judicial decree, or from a private hand; and in either case it must have been equally oppressive to oblige them to pay interest. Now this difficulty will be entirely removed by supposing that the expression

| is periphrastic, and to be resolved into depositum habere cognitum.

| Scilicet, is equivalent to cognoscere: as in Plautus vobis habeo habere edictum, is the same as edicto.—(Pseu. i. ii. 30.) But if

| is a circumlocution for depositum, some substantiae must be understood to complete the sense; and accordingly a passage in the letter to Atticus will not only point out the word required, but prove likewise that depositum was used in this elliptical manner.

—Cicero, giving an account to Atticus of a transaction relating to the claim of a debt due from the city of Salamis, in Cyprus, tells him that

| deponere solvendo=—[Ad Att. vi. 1.] which, in another letter where he is speaking of the

| ut in fine

| deponere deponent postulantibus, (says he,) non conexerit.

| [Ad Att. vi. 21.] And the last-quoted passages will not only justify, but explain, the sense contended for; as they prove that it was usual where any controversy arose concerning the enquire into the truth of the fact; and if it shall appear that the sum in question was not paid into the sacred treasury either in conformity to the general edict 7, or special decree, of the praetor, to direct that Cluvius may have such a rate of interest allowed him, as is agreeable to the laws you have established in these cases.

I enter with so much the more warmth into these affairs, as my friend Pompey likewise makes them his own, and indeed, seems more solicitous for their success than even Cluvius himself. As I am extremely desirous that the latter should have reason to be satisfied with my good offices, I most earnestly request yours upon this occasion. Farewell.

LETTER VI. To the Consuls, the Praetors, the Tribunes of the People, and the Senate.

The first intelligence I received that the Parthians had passed the greatest part of their army over the Euphrates was extremely positive. However, as I imagined the consul, Marcus Bibulus, could give you a more certain account of this event, I did not consider it necessary to charge myself with the relation of what more immediately concerned the province of another. But, since my last despatch, I have been farther and more satisfactorily assured of this fact, by several express messages from the Parthians, and from the Romans at the Euphrates. But, as it was the opinion of some of my general officers, that it was difficult to form any intelligence that could be derived from this quarter, I thought proper to wait for better information. Accordingly, on the 19th of September, whilst I was on my march towards Cilicia, I was met by a courier on the frontiers of Lycocia and Cappado- ciâ, with an express from Tarcondimotus; a prince esteemed the most faithful of our allies on that side quantum of a debt, for the defendant to apply for leave to pay the money into some temple; from which time it no longer carried interest. Thus Cicero tells Atticus that the sum due from the city of Salamis ought to have been consisere usus debito; and assigns this reason for it—deponere volvrant: they were ready and desirous to have lodged it in the sacred treasury. But in the case of Cluvius, if the Caunians had paid the money without giving him notice, (which might very possibly have been the fact if they had not acted under a judicial order,) it was no unreasonable request to desire they might be compelled to pay the whole interest up to the time when Cluvius should receive the principal.

By the term edict is meant, in this place, that formulary of provincial laws explained in v. 5, p. 402.

the Taurus, and extremely in the interest of the Romans. The purport of his despatches was to inform me that a powerful body of horse, commanded by Pacorus, the son of Orodés, king of Parthia, had passed the Euphrates, and were encamped at Tyba, and that the province of Syria was in great commotion. The same day I received an express likewise to this purpose from Jamilbicus, an Arshian phylarch, and one who has the general reputation of being a friend to the republic. Upon the whole, therefore, I came to a resolution of leading my army to Tarsus. I was sensible that our allies in general were far from being warm in our interest, and were only waiting the opportunity of some favourable revolution to desert us. I flattered myself, however, that the lenity and moderation of my conduct towards such of them through whose territories I had already passed, would render them better inclined to the Romans, as I hoped to strengthen Cilicia in its allegiance, by granting part of my extraordinary measures to the republic; and also by discovering the same equitable administration. But I had still a farther inducement: I determined upon this march, not only in order to chastise those who had taken up arms in Cilicia, but also to convince our enemies in Syria that the army of the Romans, far from being disposed to retreat upon the news of their invasion, were so much the more eager to advance.

If my advice, then, has any weight, let me earnestly exhort and admonish you to take proper measures for the preservation of these provinces; measures, indeed, which ought to have been concerted long before, as you were well apprised of those dangers which are now almost within my view. I need not inform you in what manner you thought proper to equip me when I was sent into this part of the world, under a full expectation of being engaged in so important a war. If I did not, however, refuse this commission, it was not because I was so weak as to be insensible how ill provided I was to execute it in a proper manner, but merely in subservience to your commands. The truth is, I have at all times willingly exposed myself to the utmost hazards, rather than not testify my implicit obedience to your authority. But the plain fact is, that if you do not speedily send a very powerful reinforcement into these provinces, the republic will be in the greatest danger of losing the whole of her revenues in this part of the world. If your reliance is upon the provincial militia, be assured you will be extremely disappointed; as they are very inconsiderable in point of numbers, and such miserable dastards as to run away upon the first alarm. The brave Marcus Bibulus is so sensible of the nature of these Asiatic troops, that he has not thought proper to raise any of them, though he had your express permission for that purpose. As to the assistance that may be expected from our allies, the severity and injustice of our government has either so greatly weakened them as to put it out of their power to be of much service to us, or so entirely alienated their affections as to render it unsafe to trust them. The inclinations, however, and the forces too (whatever they be) of king

Deiotarus, I reckon as entirely ours. Cappadocia is wholly unfurnished with any place of strength: and as to those other neighbouring princes, our allies, they are neither willing nor able to afford us any considerable succours. If provided, however, as I am with troops, my courage, you may be assured, shall not be wanting; nor, I trust, my prudence. What the event may prove is altogether uncertain: I can only wish that I may be in a condition to defend myself with as much success as I certainly shall with honour.

LETTER VII.

Marcus Callius to Cicero.

Though I have some political news to communicate to you, yet I can acquaint you with nothing, I believe, that will give you more pleasure than what I am going previously to mention. You are to know then that Rufus, your favourite Sempronius Rufus, has been lately convicted of false accusation, to the singular joy of the whole city. This prosecution was occasioned by the following circumstance. Rufus, soon after the exhibition of the Roman games, was impeached by Marcus Tuccius; and being sensible that the charge would be proved against him, and that his trial must unavoidably come on this year, unless some other of a higher nature intervened, he determined upon an expedient for his escape. Accordingly, as no one, I thought, had so good a title to the honour of this precedence as his prosecutor, he preferred an accusation upon the Plutonian law against Tuccius, for a violation of the public their number; but they were by no means inconceivable. For it appears by a letter to Atticus, that they amounted to 15,000 foot, armed in the Roman manner, and 3,000 horse. — Ad Att. v. 6.

Cicero mentions this person in a letter to Atticus, as a man who had failed in the civilities he owed him, by not waiting upon him before he set out for Cilicia; but at the same time expresses a satisfaction in having, by that means, been spared the trouble of a very disagreeable visitor. The epithet, therefore, which Cælius here gives to Rufus must be understood ironically. — Ad Att. v. 2.

The Roman laws were particularly severe against those who were discovered to have offended in this point. In criminal causes they inflicted banishment, and ordinis amnisio (the loss of rank). In civil causes the plaintiff generally deposited a sum of money, which he forfeited if he was found guilty of bringing a vexatious suit. Cicero alludes to another punishment of marking a letter upon the forehead of the false informer, ‘Pro Ross. Ap. 20.’ It was the letter K which was impressed upon them, being the first letter, according to the old orthography, in the word Kalamnia.—Ross.

These games were instituted by Tarquinius Priscus, A. D. 136, in honour of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva. Their annual celebration commenced on the 9th of September, and continued nine days.

It is probable, as Manutius observes, that the judges of the present year were in general no friends to Rufus, which made him endeavour to postpone his trial. The same learned commentator remarks, that all trials were brought on in a regular rotation, unless in accusations that were connected with some other cause that had been immediately before adjudged, or in the case of impeachments for the violation of the public peace. These he proves, by several instances, were always determined preferably to all other causes whatsoever.

The author of this law was P. Platus, or Platus, tribune of the people, A. D. 675; and the penalty inflicted by it was banishment.
peace; a charge, however, which he could not prevail with a single person to subscribe. As soon as I was apprised of this affair, I flew to the assistance of Tuccius without waiting his request. But when I rose up to speak, I forborne entering into a particular defence of my friend, or displaying the character of his adversary in all its true and odious colours, in which you may be sure I did not forget the story concerning Vestorius, and his unworthy conduct towards you.

I must inform you, likewise, of another trial which at present greatly engages the forum. Marcus Servilius has been convicted of extortion in his office, and I ventured to be his advocate, notwithstanding the popular curiosity was strongly against him. Servilius, however, having dissipated his whole estate, and being utterly insolvent, Pusaeus\(^a\) petitioned the praetor Laterensis (and I spoke likewise in support of this petition) that he might be empowered to pursue the sum in question into whose hands soever it should appear to have been paid.\(^b\) But this petition was dismissed; the praetor alleging that Filius, a relation of our friend Attius, had been unjustly charged with embezzlement against my client for a crime of the same kind.

This news immediately spread throughout Rome; and it was generally said in all conversations, that Filius would certainly make good his charge. Appius, the younger, was much disturbed at this report, as having a claim upon Servilius of eighty-one hundred thousand sestertii; a sum which he scrupled not to avow had been deposited in the hands of Servilius, in order to be paid over to the prosecutor in an information against his father, provided the informer would suffer himself to be nonsuited.

If you are surprised at the weakness of Appius in thus acknowledging so shameful a bargain, how much higher would your astonishment have risen, if you had heard his evidence upon the trial of that very ill-judged action which he brought against Servilius for this money? He most clearly

\(^a\) It seems to have been customary for the prosecutor in capital causes to procure some of his friends to join with him in signing the articles of his impeachment. These were styled subscriptiones, and acted as a sort of seconds to him in this judicial combat. They could not, however, be admitted into this association without a special licence from the judges for that purpose.—Bottom. In Q. Caecil. Divin. 15.

\(^b\) The whole account of the following transactions concerning Servilius is extremely (perhaps impenetrably) obscure in the original, and has exercised the ingenuity of all the commentators to enlighten. The translator, however, has ventured in some instances to depart from them, though he acknowledges, at the same time, that he hasacquired more satisfaction with his own interpretation than with theirs.

Who this person was, or in what manner concerned in the present cause, is altogether undiscernible. Perhaps, as Mr. Ross conjectures, he might have been the prosecutor.

It appears by a passage which Manutius produces from the oration in defence of Rabirius, that in convictions of this kind the money was recoverable by the Julian law from any hand into which it could be proved to have been paid.—Pro Rabir. Post. 4.

About 65,367 of our money. This sum must appear excessive if considered with respect to the wealth of the present times. But Appius might well be called to give it, and it might have been extremely prudent in him, likewise, to have done so, if this prosecution was (what seems highly probable) on account of his father's having plundered some province committed to his administration.

indeed made appear, to the full satisfaction of the whole court, both his own folly and his father's guilt. To complete the absurdity of his conduct upon this ground, he was so imprudent as to summon the very same judges upon this cause, who tried the information I just now mentioned to have been brought against his father. It happened; however, that their voices were equally divided. But the praetor, not knowing now the law stood in this case, declared that Servilius had a majority of the three classes of judges in his favour, and accordingly acquitted him in the usual form. At the rising of the court, therefore, it was generally imagined that the acquittal of Servilius would be enrolled. But the praetor thinking it advisable to look into the laws upon this point before he made up the record, found it expressly enacted, that "in all causes sentence shall be pronounced according to the majority of the votes in the whole collective number of judges." Instead, therefore, of registering the acquittal of Servilius, he only inserted in the roll the number of voices as they stood in each respective class. Appius, in consequence of this, and the great expenses which the acquittal of Servilius for bribery: as he has also another accusation laid against him by one Titus, a creature of his own, who has charged him with a breach of the peace. And thus are these two worthy combatants most equally matched.

As to public affairs: we had waited several days in expectation that something would be determined concerning Gaul, frequent motions having been made in the senate for this purpose, which were followed by very warm debates. At length, however, it plainly appeared, agreeable to Pompey's sentiments, that Caesar's command in Gaul should not be continued longer than the first of March, the senate passed the following orders and decrees.

"By authority of the senate, held in the temple of Apollo, on the 30th day of September. Signed: L. Domitius Ahenobarbus; Q. Caecilius; Metellus Pius Scipio; L. Villius Annalis; C. Septimius; Caius Lueceius Hirrus; C. Scribonius Curio; L.\(^a\)

\(^b\) It has already been observed in the foregoing remarks that the judges were divided into three classes. [See rem. 5, p. 363.]

\(^c\) It is obvious, therefore, that there might have been a majority in two of the classes out of the three, in favour of Servilius, and yet that the voices considered with respect to the whole number of judges might have been equal. But it is inconceivable that a magistrate of praetorian rank could possibly be ignorant of a practice which one can scarce suppose the most common citizen of Rome to have been unacquainted with. Notwithstanding, therefore, Ceelius ascribes the praetor's conduct to ignorance; it seems much more probable to have arisen from design.

\(^e\) The decrees of the senate were usually signed in this manner by those who were the principal promoters of the question.
Attieus Capito; M. Oppius. Whereas a motion was made by Marcus Marcellus, the consul, concerning the consular provinces, it is ordered, that Lucius Paulus and Caius Marcellus, consuls elect, shall, on the first of March next, following their entering upon their offices, move the senate concerning the consular provinces, at which time no other business shall be proceeded upon, nor any other motion made in conjunction therewith. And for this purpose the senate shall continue to assemble, notwithstanding the comitial days, and until a decree be passed."

"Resolved, that when the consul shall move the senate upon the question aforesaid, they shall be empowered to summon such of the three hundred judges who are members of the senate to attend.""

The thirtieth day of September, in the temple of Apollo. Signed: L. Domitius Ahenobarbus; Q. Cecilius; Metullus Plus Scipio; L. Villius Annius; C. Septimius; C. Scribonius Curio; M. Oppius. The consul, Marcus Marcellus, having moved the senate concerning the provinces, "Resolved, that it is the opinion of the senate, that it will be highly unbecoming any magistrate who has a power of controlling their proceedings, to occasion any hindrance whereby the senate may be prevented from taking the aforesaid motion into consideration as soon as possible: and that whosoever shall obstruct or oppose the same shall be deemed an enemy to the republic."

"Ordered, that if any magistrate shall put a negative upon the foregoing resolution, the same shall be entered as an order of the senate, and again referred to the consideration of this house."

This resolution was protested against by Caius Coelius. Lucius Vinicius, P. Publius Cornelius, and Caius Vibius Pansa."

Resolved, that the senate will take into consideration the case of such of the soldiers under Caesar's command who have served out their legal time, or also, for other reasons, are entitled to a discharge, and make such order thereupon as shall be agreeable to equity."" 4

1 The comitial days were those on which the comitia, or assemblies of the people, were held; and on these the law prohibited the senate to be convened. The senate, however, in the present instance, and agreeably to a prerogative which they claimed and exercised upon many other occasions, took upon themselves to act with a dispensing power. — Mid. on the Rom. Sen. p. 121.

2 This clause was inserted in order to secure a full house, a certain number of senators being necessary to be present for making a decree valid. [See Rem. i. p. 367.] The correction of Manutius has been adopted in the translation, who, instead of sec abducret licet, reads eos abduere, &c.

3 A Roman soldier could not be compelled to bear arms after having been in the service ten years. As the strength of Caesar's army in Gaul consisted principally in his veterans, this clause was added, as Gronovius observes, with a view of drawing off those soldiers from his troops.

4 Resolved, that if any magistrate shall put his negative upon the foregoing decree, the same shall stand as an order of the senate, and be again referred to the consideration of this house."

This resolution was protested against by Caius Coelius and Caius Pansa, tribunes of the people.

"Ordered, that such of the present prætors who have not held any provincial command, shall draw lots to succeed respectively to the government of Cilicia and the eight remaining praetorian provinces. But if there shall not be a sufficient number of these to fill up the aforesaid governments; then, in this case, the deficiency shall be supplied by lot out of the first college of prætors, among those who have never held a foreign government. And if there shall not be found a sufficient number among these last, so qualified as aforesaid, the same shall be supplied from the members of each preceding college, till the whole number required be completed."

This decree was protested against by Caius Coelius and Caius Pansa, tribunes of the people. In the debates which preceded these decrees, Pompey let fall an expression that was much observed, and gave us very confident hopes of his good intentions. "He could not, without great injustice, he said, determine anything in relation to the provinces under Caesar's command, before the first of March: but after that time, he assured the senate he would have no sort of scruple." Being asked, "what if a negative should then be put upon a decree of the senate for recalling Caesar?" he declared that he should look upon it as just the same thing, whether Caesar openly refused to obey the authority of the senate, or secretly procured some magistrate to obstruct their decrees. "But suppose," said another member, "Cesar should pursue his pretensions to the consulate, and retain his command, and at the same time:" "Suppose," replied Pompey, with great temper, "my own son should lay violent hands upon me?" From expressions of this kind the world has conceived a notion that a rupture will undoubtedly ensue between Pompey and Caesar. I am of opinion, however, that the latter willsubmit to one of these two conditions: either to give up his present pretensions to the consulate, and continue in Gaul, or to quit the province, provided he can be assured of his election. — Curio is preparing most strongly to oppose his demands. What he may be able to effect, I know not; but sure I am, that a man who acts upon such patriot principles, must gain honour, at least, if he gain nothing else. He treats me upon all occasions with great generosity; and indeed, in a late instance, has been more liberal than I could have wished; as his civility has drawn upon me a trouble, which perhaps I might otherwise avoid."

5 The provinces of lesser note were usually assigned to the prætors, and from thence they were distinguished by the name of the prætorian provinces.

6 The number of prætors varied in different periods of the republic. In the times of Cicero this magistracy was composed of eight persons, as Cælian remarks in his note upon this passage.

7 Everywhere the prætors were distinguished by colleges, styled the 1st, 2d, 3d, &c. according to their several remains from the current year.
LETTER VIII.

To Publius Silius, Proprorger.

You are apprised, I imagine, of the friendship that subsisted between Titus Pinnius and myself. He has so much declared it indeed by his will, wherein he not only appointed me one of the guardians to his son, but left me the contingent reversion also of his estate. My ward (who is a youth of uncommon modesty, as well as great application to his studies) has a very considerable demand upon the city of Nicea, amounting to eighty millions of sesterces and the corporation, I am told, are inclined to pay off part of this sum the first debt they shall discharge. New, as not only the rest of the trustees who know the regard you bear me, but the young man himself, is persuaded that you will not refuse anything to my request, I shall be exceedingly obliged to you for employing your good offices (as far, I mean, as may be consistent with your dignity and character,) that they pay off as large a proportion of this demand as possible. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

To Marcus Cælius, Curule-Edile elect.

I CONGRATULATE you on the honourable post you have lately obtained, and on the prospect of this mean, is open to you, of advancing still higher in the dignities of the republic. I am somewhat late, I confess, in my compliments: however, you must not impute it to any intentional neglect, but merely to my ignorance of what passes at Rome. For, partly from the great distance of my situation, and partly from those banditti which infest the roads, it is a considerable time before I can receive any intelligence from Italy. And now I know not where to find words sufficiently strong to give you joy upon this occasion, or to express my thanks for having thus furnished me (as you termed it in one of your former letters) with a subject of perpetual ridicule. When I first received the news of your victory, I could not forbear mimicking a certain worthy friend of ours, and imitating the droll figures those gallant youths exhibited, of whose interest he had so confidently boasted. But it is not easy to give you in description a complete idea of this my humorous sally. I must tell you, however, that I next figured you to myself, and accosted you, as if present, in the words of the comic poet:

Far less, my good friend, I rejoice at your deed,
As exceeding whatever before did exceed,
Than as mounting sloth o'er my hopes the most high;
And for this, "By my truth 'tis amusing," I cry.

Upon which I broke out into a most immediate fit of laughter; and, when some of my friends reproved my mirth, as deviating almost into downright folly, I excused myself by the old verse,

Excessive joy is not exceeding wise.

In short, whilst I ridiculed this noble friend of ours, I became almost as ridiculous as himself. But you shall hear farther upon this subject another opportunity: for, in truth, I have many things to say both of you and to you, whenever I shall find more leisure for that purpose. In the mean time be assured, my dear Cælius, that I sincerely love you. I consider you, indeed, as one whom fortune has raised up to advance my glory, and avenge my wrongs: and, I doubt not, you will give both those who hate and those who envy me sufficient reason to repent of their folly and their injustice. Farewell.

LETTER X.

To Publius Silius, Proprorger.

YOUR good offices in the affair of Atilius afford me an additional motive for giving you my affection. Late, indeed, as I applied to you in his behalf, I have, however, by your generous intervention, preserved a most worthy Roman knight from ruin. The truth is, I always looked upon my friendship with Lanio as giving me a claim to yours. In the first place, then, I return you thanks for easing my mind of all its disquietude with respect to Atilius; and, in the next, after thus acknowledging your last favour, I have the assurance to request another: and it is a favour

A mere modern reader, who judges of past ages by the modes that prevail in his own, must undoubtedly conceive a very low opinion of Cicero from the account which he has given of his manners. But Cicero was not esteemed by the Romans, as it is with us, a talent becoming only a comedian or a buffoon. On the contrary, this species of humour was thought worthy of the greatest characters even upon the gravest occasions: and it was prized by their orators, as well as by recommended by their rhetoricians, as a quality, under certain restrictions, of singular grace and efficacy in the whole business of public eloquence. —Cic. de Orat. lib. 59, 69,

1 In the games he was preparing to exhibit as ediles.
2 This letter seems to be explained by an epistle to Atticus, wherein Cicero mentions the receipt of a very pressing letter from Cælius, by the hands of his freedman. The purport of it appears to have been to solicit Cicero to levy a contribution upon his province, towards the expense of those public games, which Cælius as edile was obliged to exhibit. This oppressive tax had been frequently raised by the governors of provinces in favour of their friends at Rome, and was, indeed, almost established into a custom. —But Cicero, notwithstanding, he seems to have had a sincere affection for Cælius, would by no means be prevailed upon to break through the equitable maxims of his administration, and with great integrity refused his request. —Ad Att. vi. 1.; Ad Quint. Frat. i. 9.
3 He was at this time proprorger, or governor, of Bithynia and Pontus in Asia, where he discharged the provincial functions with great applause. —Ad Att. vi. 8.
4 About 70,000l. sterling. — The edileship.
which I shall repay with the utmost returns of my esteem and gratitude. Let me entreat you, then, if I have any share in your heart, to allow my brother an equal enjoyment of the same privilege; which will be adding a very considerable obligation to that important one I so lately received at your hands. Farewell.

LETTER XI.
To Appius Pulscher.

By all that I can collect from your last letter, this will find you in the suburbs of Rome. But, though the impotent calumnies of these petty provincials will probably be subsided ere this reaches your hands, yet I think it necessary to return some answer to the long epistle I received from you upon that subject; and I shall do so in as few words as possible.

As to the accusation contained in the two first paragraphs of your letter, it is conceived in such vague and general terms, that it is impossible to give it a direct reply. The whole that I can gather from it is, that I am accused of having discovered, by my countenance and my silence, that I was by no means your friend; a discovery which I made, it seems, upon some occasion in the courts of judicature, and, likewise, at certain public entertainments. I am very sure there is not the least ground for this imputation; but as you do not point out the particular instances, I know not in what manner to vindicate myself from the charge. This, however, I most undoubtedly know, that I have mentioned you upon all occasions, both public and private, with the highest applause, and with the warmest professions of friendship. As to the affair of the deputies, I will appeal to your own breast, whether I could possibly have acted with more probity and discretion than to lessen the expenses of these impoverished cities, without any diminution, at the same time, of those honours which they proposed to you; especially as it was in compliance with their own immediate request? And, indeed, I was wholly unacquainted with the particular purposes of that deputation, which was going to Rome with the customary complimential address to the senate upon your account.

When I was at Apamea, some of the principal inhabitants of several different cities complained to me of the excessive appointments that were decreed to their deputies; assuring me, that their respective communities were by no means in a condition to support the assessments levied upon them for that purpose. This suggested to my thoughts various reflections: and I imagined, that a man of your refined sentiments could not be extremely fond of honours of this unsubstantial nature. Accordingly, it was at Synnada, I think, that I took occasion to say from the tribunal, (and I expatiated very largely upon the subject,) that the approved merit of Appius was sufficient, without the testimony of the Milensis (for it was in their city that the proposal first arose) to recommend him to the esteem of the senate and the Roman people; that I had often, indeed, seen instances of this kind of deputations, but did not remember they were ever admitted to an audience; that, however, I applauded the gratitude they had thus shown for your merit towards them, but thought the particular instance in question was wholly unnecessary; that if any of them were willing to undertake this commission at their own expense, I should highly commend their zeal; and I would even consent it should be performed at the public charge, provided they did not exceed a reasonable sum; but, beyond that, I would in no sort give my permission."

I am persuaded there is nothing in what I thus said, that can possibly give you offence: and, indeed, your principal complaint is levelled, I perceive, against my edict. For those were some, it seems, who thought it manifestly drawn up with a view of preventing these legations. I cannot, however, say, that, to give attention to these groundless insinuations, is no less injurious to me than to be the author of them. The truth of it is, I settled this edict before I left Rome; and the single addition that I made to it afterwards, was at the instance of the farmers of the revenues, who, when they met me at Samos, desired I would transcribe a paragraph out of your edict and insert it into mine. It was that article which restrains the public expenses, and contains several new and very salutary regulations, which I greatly approved. But as it is framed, I think the letter is a little strained: I find, to the suspicion that I framed it with a design of striking at you, it is copied entirely from the old precedents. I was not, indeed, so absurd as to think (what I perceive you imagine) that some private affair was concerned in this deputation; well knowing that it was sent from a public body in relation to your public character, and addressed to that great council of the whole world, the senate of Rome. But I, (as you object,) when I prohibited any person from going out of the province without my permission, exclude all those from the possibility of obtaining that leave, who could not

A city in that part of Phrygia which was annexed to Cicerone's province: as was Synnada, likewise, mentioned a few lines below.

A town in the neighbourhood of Synnada. In the original it is Mendesium; but the reason there has given good reason for the reading here followed.

The nature of these proscurmalian edicts has already been explained in rem., p. 402.

An island near the coast of Ionia, lying opposite to the city of Ephesius; Cicero touched at this island in his voyage to the province.
follow me to the camp and beyond Mount Taurus; an imputation, I must needs say, the most ridiculous of any in your whole letter. For where, let me enquire, the sense that any person should follow me for this purpose to the camp, or beyond Mount Taurus, when I regulated my journey from Laodicea to Iconium in such a manner, that all the magistrates and deputies of the several cities in that district might have an opportunity of meeting me? They could not, therefore, be under the difficulty you charge me with having thrown in their way, unless they had taken up the design of going to Rome after my leaving Mount Taurus, which most undoubtedly was not the case. For, during my stay at Apamea, Synada, Philomelum, and Iconium, all affairs of that nature were entirely settled.

I must farther assure you, that I decreed nothing concerning the abating or abolishing the appointments of the deputies, but at the express request of the principal inhabitants of several cities; and their view was, to prevent any unnecessary exactions that were occasioned by the farming of the subsidies imposed for this purpose, and raising them in that cruel method of capitulation with which you are so well acquainted. Compassion, indeed, as well as justice, inclined me to ease the calamities of those unhappy cities, oppressed, as they chiefly were, by their own magistrates: and when I was engaged in a design of that nature, I could not possibly overlook an expense which appeared so extremely superfluous as that of the appointments of these deputies. It was but a piece of justice therefore due to me, not to have listened to any idle tales that might be related to you upon this subject. But if it should prove, after all, that you attribute to the reports of others what, in truth, receive their rise merely from your own suspicions, you certainly make use of a sort of figure which the language of friendship will by no means authorise. Had it ever, indeed, been my design to derogate from your reputation in the province, I should scarcely have acted in the manner I did; I should not have referred it to your son-in-law at Rome, to your freedman at Brundisium, and to the commander of your artillery when I saw him at Corcyra, to name the place which they thought would be most agreeable to you for our meeting. In short, I wish you would remember the maxim in which those great authors have laid down, who have written so excellently upon friendship; that 'to accuse and to defend are terms which ought for ever to be banished from intercourses of this amicable kind.'

But do you imagine that I have had no opportunities of listening, in my turn, to accusations of the same nature against yourself? Was it never told me, do you think, that after you had appointed me to meet you at Laodicea, you retired beyond Mount Taurus? That, at the very time I was employed in my juridical office at Apamea, Synada, and Philomelum, you took the liberty to exercise the same authority at Tarsus? But I forbear to enter farther into these particulars, that I may not follow your example in the very instance of which I am complaining. This, moreover, I will say, and I lay through great sincerity, that if you were really persuaded of the truth of these reports, you do me much injustice; and you are not entirely without reproach, if you only suffered them to be related to you. The truth is, it will appear that I have acted towards you in one uniform tenor of friendship. And let those who impute arithic to me say, whether it is probable that, after having paid the utmost attention to your interest during your absence from Rome, and at a time when I had not the least expectation of its ever being in your power to return me the same favour, I should give you just reason to abandon me now that I have so many occasions for your good offices. I must, however, acknowledge that there is one article wherein I may not, perhaps, have regulated myself altogether agreeably to your inclinations.

I am sensible you would be displeased with any liberties that should be taken with the characters of those who resided in offices under you; and I am own that I have heard very unfavourable representations of some of them. But, I must add, that no persons were ever mentioned upon this occasion, or any greater irregularities laid to their charge, than those which your friend Clodius himself named to me when I saw him at Corcyra, who lamented, I remember, that you had been some sufferer in your reputation by the malpractices of those officers*. Reports of this kind (and many such indeed there are) I never in the least encouraged: but I will frankly acknowledge, likewise, that I never greatly endeavoured to repress them; well persuaded as I am, that they can, in no sort, affect your character.

* A particular instance of the cruelty of one of those officers under Appius is mentioned in the letters to Atticus. Scaptius, who commanded a troop of horse in Cyprus, surrounded a city with his troops and would not let them go; it is probable, to comply with some unjust demands, and kept them thus besieged till five of the members perished with hunger. When the government of this province came into the hands of Cicero, the Cypriotes, as their island lay within his jurisdiction, petitioned that these troops might be withdrawn, and be very humanely complied with their request. He relieved them, likewise, as well as other cities under his government, from the immediate interest which they paid for the money which their necessities had obliged them to borrow in Rome, reducing it from 4 per cent, paid monthly, to 1 per cent. This equitable reduction very considerably affected Brutus, who was concerned in these loans; and he seems to have complained of it to Atticus. But notwithstanding the latter had every reason to be satisfied that Brutus himself likewise had written to Cicero for the same purpose; yet he consistently withheld their united solicitations. 'If Brutus,' says he, 'resents my conduct upon this occasion, I shall be sorry; but much more so, to find him a different man from what I always thought him.' And if Cicero, I will add, had spoken and acted upon every other occasion with the same spirit and integrity as he certainly did in the present, he would have merited all the encomiums which the warmth of his admirers could have bestowed.—Ad Att. vi. 1, 2.
Whoever attempts to persuade you that there is no such thing as a perfect reconciliation between friends whose affections have once been alienated, discovers the perfidy of his own heart, instead of proving the dissimulation of mine; at the same time that it is evident that he has not a worse opinion of my sincerity than he must necessarily entertain of yours. But if any man has taken offence at the measures I pursue in my government, as not exactly coinciding with yours, I am perfectly unconcerned at the loss of his friendship.

To say truth, we have both acted in the manner we ought, though we have not both followed the same plan. The instances you gave of your diffusive liberality in this province were suitable to a man of your quality. Though, indeed, even you yourself were obliged, the last year, in compliance with the calamities of the season, a little to restrain the munificence of your natural disposition. But if mine, on the contrary, flows in a somewhat more limited channel, let not those to whom the benefit of that stream has not reached, wonder that I rather choose they should suffer from the necessary restrictions of my bounty, than that I should, from the just reproaches of my conscience. I have ever, indeed, been extremely reserved in dispensing largesses at another's cost, as I cannot but be sensibly affected with distresses that extend themselves throughout a whole community.

I am much obliged to you for the account you gave me of affairs at Rome, and particularly for the assurance of your faithfully executing all my requests. What I principally recommend to your care is, that neither the business nor the period of my administration may be enlarged. To this end, I beg you would entertain our common friend and colleague Hortensius, that if ever he was disposed to comply with my inclinations, he would not persist in my continuing two years in this government, than which he cannot do me a more unfriendly office.

As to the information you desire concerning my own motions; I marched from Tarsus in my way to Amanus, on the seventh of October; and I write this the day following, from my camp in the plains of Mopsuestia. If any action should happen, I shall not fail of giving you notice; and you may depend upon my enclosing a letter to you, whenever I send one to my family. With respect to the Parthian whom you inquire after, I am persuaded that none ever appeared. They were only a troop of Arabsians, armed after the Parthian manner. But these, it is said, are all returned home, and I am assured there is now no appearance of an enemy in Syria. I entreat you to write to me as often as possible, not only as to what regards your own and my private affairs, but as to those likewise of the republic. I am more than ordinarily, indeed, solicitous concerning the latter, as I find by your letter that Pompey is going into Spain. Farewell.2

The government of Spain had been renewed to Pompey for five years at the end of his consulate in the preceding year: which province, however, he administered by his lieutenant, whilst he himself still continued in Rome—Dio, xii. p. 148.

LETTER XII.

To Publius Silus, Proprætor.

I did not imagine I should ever have found myself at a loss for expressions: yet at a loss believe me I am, to recommend Marcus A. u. 707. Lænius to you in the terms he deserves. I must content myself, therefore, with explaining the business of this letter in few words; but in such, however, as may render you sufficiently sensible of my inclinations. It is incredible how great an esteem both my dearest brother and myself entertain for Lænius: an esteem which is founded not only on the many good offices he has conferred upon us, but on the exalted integrity of his heart, and the singular modesty with which all his virtues are accompanied. It was with the utmost regret, therefore, that I consented to part with him, as I receive much advantage from his counsels, as well as great entertainment from his company. But if I should expiate any farther in his praise, will you not run from me farther than I am mentioned, as I just now complained, I have employed more than are necessary? To be short, then, I recommend Lænius to your protection with all that warmth which you must be sensible I ought, after what I have here said. Let me earnestly entreat you to expedite the business which has called him into your province, and to favour him likewise with your advice in the conduct of it. You will find him, be assured, a man of a most generous and well-natured disposition; for which reason I beg you will send him back to us with the satisfaction of having finished his affairs by your means, as soon as possible. Your compliance with this request will extremely oblige both my brother and myself. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

To Marcus Cælius, Curule-Adile elect.

I wish you would inquire the reason that your letters miscarried; for I cannot be induced to think that you have not once written to me since your election. I am persuaded, on the contrary, that you could not have omitted to communicate a piece of news I so much wished with regard to yourself, and so little expected in relation to Hirrus. The truth, however, is, that I have not heard from you since that glorious and joyful event; which gives me some uneasiness, lest my letters should have had no better success in finding their way to your hand. But be assured I have never written to my family without accompanying my packet with a letter for you; as, indeed, there is no man whom I more sincerely and tenderly value. But to turn to the principal purpose of this epistle. Your wish has succeeded, and I have just had employment enough of the military kind to entitle me to a triumph. You were under some apprehensions, I perceive, about the Parthians, as being deficient of my forces. I must acquaint you, then, that having received advice that the Parthians had committed hostilities, I took the advantage of some defiles, and of the neighbouring mountains, to lead my army, supported by a tolerable number of auxiliaries, to Amanus. The reputation of my a Into the office of adile.
name was of some benefit to me likewise in my march; for you cannot imagine of what importance it is, in places of this kind, to have the populace ask, Is this the consul that saved Rome? Is this he that was so honour'd by the senate? together with other questions of the same import, which I need not add. When I approached to Amanus, a mountain which separates Cilicia from Syria, I had the satisfaction to hear that Cassius had obliged the enemy to abandon the siege of Antioches, and that Bibulus had taken upon himself the command of the province. However, I employed my army in harassing the Amanians, our eternal enemies; and having put many of them to the sword, as well as taken a great number of prisoners, and entirely dispersed the rest, I surprised and burnt some of their fortresses. Having thus obtained a complete victory, I was saluted with the title of Imperator by the whole army at Issue 2; the very place (as your favourite historian Clitarchus has often, I have heard you say, informed you) where Alexander defeated Darius. From thence I marched into the most infested parts of Cilicia, where I am now before Pindessus, a city of great strength, and which I have already been battering above these three weeks. The garrison makes a most obstinate and furious defence; so that nothing seems wanting to complete the glory I shall here obtain, but that the name of this place were less obscure. If I should make myself master of it (as I trust I shall), I will send an immediate express to the senate. In the mean time I have given you this general account of my operations, to let you see there is some foundation to hope that your good wishes will take effect. But to return to the Parthians. This summer’s campaign has proved, you find, tolerably successful; I am in great pain, however for the next. Let me entreat you, therefore, my dear friend, to endeavour that a successor be appointed to my government: but if that should prove a matter of too much difficulty, (as you intimated in one of your letters, and as I am myself inclined to suspect,) be careful at least to guard against what may easily be prevented; I mean the prolongation of my residence.

I expect from your letter (as I mentioned in one of my former), not merely an account of what is at present going forward in the republic, but a clear prospect also of what is likely to happen. For which purpose I.entreat to inform me fully of everything that concerns the public. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

Marcus Calvius to Cicero.

We 8 have received an express from Caius Cassius, and another from Deiotarus, which greatly alarm us. The former writes that the Parthian army has passed the Euphrates; and the latter, that they are actually marching towards your province, by the way of Commagene. As I well know how ill provided you are with troops, the principal concern I feel from this invasion, with respect to you, is lest you should be a loser by it in point of reputation. Had you been better prepared, indeed, to receive the enemy, I should have been in great pain for your life; but as the very small force you now possess, together with what I imagine, rather to think of a retreat than an engagement, I am only anxious concerning your honour. For how far the world may consider the necessity of the case, and approve of your thus declining a battle, is a point, I confess, which gives me much uneasy reflection. In short, I shall be in continual anxiety till I hear of your arrival in Italy. In the mean time, this news of the Parthians has occasioned a variety of speculations. Some are of opinion that Pompey ought to be sent to oppose them; and others, that it is by no means convenient he should leave Rome. A third party is for assigning this expedition to Caesar and his army, whilst a fourth names the consuls 1 as the most proper persons to be employed. But all agree, however, in being silent as to any decree of the senate for placing this command in private hands. 2 The consuls, in the apprehension that they shall either be nominated to a commission which they do not relish, or suffer the disgrace of its being given from them, forbear to convene the senate, and by this mean incur the censure of neglecting the public interest. But whether idolence or pusillanimity be the real motive of their declining the conduct of this war, it is concealed under the specious appearance, however, of modesty.

As we have received no courier from you, it was suspected, till the despatch from Deiotarus arrived, that the whole was an invention of Cassius, who, it was thought, in order to cover his own rapine, had suffered a parcel of Arabs to make an incursion into the province, and then represented them to the senate as a formidable body of Parthians. Whatever, therefore, may be the true state of the affair, let me persuade you to be extremely circumspect in giving a faithful and accurate account of it to the senate, that you may neither be reproached with magnifying matters in order to gratify the private purposes of Cassius, nor with concealing anything which may be of importance for the public to know.

It is now the eighteenth of November; and as we are advanced thus far towards the end of the year, I do not see that anything can be done in this affair before the first of January. 3 For you know how slow and inactive Marcellus is upon all occasions, and are no stranger to the dilatory disposition of Sulpicius. You will easily judge, therefore, what it is to be expected from two men of this unperforming cast; and that they who usually act with so much coldness, as to make one doubt their inclinations, even in points they really desire to effect, will not be very warm in forwarding a business from which they are certainly averse.

Cicero’s despatches concerning the Parthians, had reached Rome; and consequently before Calvius had received the preceding epistle.

8 Marcus Marcellus, and Servius Sulpicius.

8 That is, in the hands of those who were not invested with some public command.

b When the consuls elect entered upon the administration of their office.
If the Parthian war should become a serious matter, the new magistrates will be engaged, for the first two or three months of their office, in adjusting the proper measures to be taken in this conjuncture. On the other hand, if it should appear to be an invasion of no consequence, or such, at least, that, with the supply of a few additional troops, may easily be repelled by you and the other consuls already in the provinces, or by your successors, Curio, I foresee, will begin to play his double game: that is, he will in the first place attempt to weaken the authority of Caesar; and in the next, endeavour to throw some little advantages on the side of Pompey. As for Paulus, he declares most vehemently against suffering Caesar to continue in Gaul; and our friend Furnius is the only tribune whom I suspect of obstructing his measures for that purpose. You may depend upon these, as certain; but warm, and make it with any assurance pronounce. Time, indeed, may produce much; as many schemes, I know, are concerted: but they all turn upon the points I have already specified. I forgot to mention that Curio designs to make an attempt to procure a division of the lands in Campania. It is preposterous to think Caesar does not concern himself in this matter: certain, however, it is, that Pompey is very desirous of having the division settled before Caesar's return, that he may be precluded from applying to his own purposes.

As to what concerns your leaving the province, I dare not promise that you shall be relieved by a successor; but you may rely upon my endeavouring all I can that your administration shall not be protracted. Whether you will think proper to remain in your government, if affairs should be so circumstanced as to render it indecent for me to oppose any decree of the senate for that purpose, depends upon yourself to determine, as it does upon me to consider, how warmly you made it your request when we parted, that I would prevent any such resolution from being taken. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

To Publius Silius, Proprator.

It was with the warmest and most grateful acknowledgment of your favours that my friend A. U. 702. Nero assured me you have distinguished him with every honour in your power. You may depend upon the most efficacious instances of his friendship in return, as there is not a man in the world of a more grateful and generous disposition. You have conferred, at the same time, a very singular obligation upon myself, for I know not any man amongst all our nobility who stands higher in my esteem and affection. Your good offices to him, therefore, in the following instances, wherein he desired I would particularly request them, will be highly agreeable to me. In the first place, I beg you to defer the affair of Pausanias, an inhabitant of Alibanda, till Nero arrives in your province; and as this is a point in which I perceive he is exceedingly solicitous, it is with a proportionable degree of zeal that I entreat your compliance. The next favour I am to ask is, your particular protection for the citizens of Nysa. Nero is greatly attached to the interest of this corporation, and I hope you will show them that nothing can be more to their advantage than his patronage. I have frequently had occasion of recommending Strabo Servilius to you; but I renew my applications with so much the more ardour, as Nero takes a share in his concerns. We jointly then entreat you to settle his affair, and not leave an innocent man to be a prey, perhaps, to one who may succeed to your government with a turn of mind far different from that generosity which distinguishes yours. This will be acting in a manner highly agreeable to myself, and suitable at the same time to your usual humanity. In a word, the purport of my present application amounts to this: that you would upon all occasions continue to distinguish Nero with your most peculiar regard. The truth is, your province has, in this respect, greatly the advantage over mine, as it affords you full scope of doing honour to so noble, so ingenuous, and so virtuous a youth. Your perseverance in the same generous offices with which you have thus far assisted my friend, will give him an opportunity of confirming and strengthening those illustrious clientships which have been delivered down to him from his ancestors. And let me add, that it will be placing your favours with great judgment in respect to Nero, as well as bestowing them in the most obliging manner likewise with regard to myself. Farewell.
neither chance nor ignorance that led you to solicit this magistracy in so important a crisis. It was a deliberate and well-considered resolution that engaged you in this design, and you were perfectly sensible of the great and general confusion in which the commonwealth is involved, together with the utter uncertainty in what manner these our unhappy divisions will finally be terminated. You frequently reflect, I doubt not, on the vain, the treacherous, and the pliant dispositions of the present generation. To repeat, thence what I just now mentioned, let me conjure you steadfastly to persevere in your old principles; to consult the dictates of your own breast, and faithfully to comply with its wise and worthy admonitions. Hardly, perhaps, is any man more qualified than yourself to direct the conduct of others;—none, I am sure, to steer your own. Good gods! why am I thus prevented from being a witness of your glorious actions, and an associate in your patriot designs? The latter, I am persuaded, you are far from wanting; however, the strength and warmth of my affection might possibly render the conjunction of my counsels with yours not altogether unprofitable.

You will hear from me again very soon, as I purpose in a few days to send an express to the senate with a particular account of the success of my arms during the last summer’s campaign. In the mean time you will perceive, by the letter which I delivered to your freedman Thraso, with what zealous pains I have solicited your election to the pontifical dignity; an election, indeed, that will be attended with much difficulty. I conjure you in return, my dear Curio, not to suffer this my very troublesome provincial administration to be lengthened out beyond the usual period, and I entreat it by all the strong and tender ties of our mutual friendship. When I first made this request to you in person, and several times afterwards repeated it by letter, I had not the least imagination of your being tribune. I then, indeed, only entreated your good offices as an illustrious senator, and as one who stood high in the favour and esteem of every Roman. But I now apply to Curio not only as my noble friend, but as a powerful tribune. I do not desire, however, (what interest could be more difficult to obtain,) that anything unusual should be decreed in my favour; but, on the contrary, that you would support that decree, and maintain those laws by which I was appointed to this government. In a word, my single and most earnest request is, that the terms upon which I set out for this province may not be changed. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

To Thesus, Proprator.

I found you perfectly well inclined to employ every good office in your power for my lieutenant. Marcus Annaeus, when I mentioned his affair to you at Ephesus. However, as my affection will not suffer me to omit any circumstance which may tend to his advantage, I write to you in the belief that this letter will considerably add to the favourable disposition in which you already stand towards him. He has long enjoyed a share in my friendship; and, as, indeed, I have sufficiently shown the good opinion I entertain of him, by having appointed him my lieutenant in preference to so many others who solicited for that office.

The war in which I was soon afterwards engaged gave me occasion of experiencing his military abilities; and the prudence, the courage, and the fidelity with which he executed his commission, together with the extraordinary marks he gave me of his affection, have raised him to the highest possible degree of my esteem. I informed you at Ephesus, that there were some points of controversy between him and the city of Sardis, the particulars of which you will best learn when the cause shall come before you. And here, I must confess, I have been long debating with myself what I should farther say to you. The world universally acknowledges and admires your impartial administration of justice, and my friend’s claim is so well founded as to require no other protection than that of your usual equity. However, as I am sensible of the great authority which naturally attends the prætorian office, especially where it is exercised with so much honour, lenity, and wisdom, as are well known to distinguish your administration, I entreat you to exert that influence in such a manner upon this occasion as may convince Annaeus that you are his friend. He is already indeed persuaded that you are so, and has often mentioned you to me in that character. Nevertheless, I cannot forbear conjuring you, by those reciprocal good offices which have equally passed between us, to let him see that this letter has rendered you still more inclined to serve him. Be assured, the whole extent of your provincial power cannot supply you with an opportunity of more effectually obliging me. It is unnecessary I should add, that you cannot better dispose of your favours than by conferring them on Annaeus; and I am persuaded you have too high an opinion of his merit and gratitude to entertain the least doubt upon that article. Farewell.

To Volumius.

This familiar manner in which your letter to me was addressed, though extremely agreeable indeed to the intimacy that subsists between us, made me at first doubt whether it did not come from my very good friend, your namesake, the senator. But I soon found, by that lively and elegant humour with which it was distinguished, that it could be the produce of no other hand than yours. I was exceedingly pleased with it in every respect, but that I perceived you had not sufficiently discharged your trust and defended the credit of my possessions as a wit. For you tell me, that since I left Rome, every paltry joke, even those of the dull Sextius himself, is placed to my account. And did you suffer your friend to be thus dishonoured.

= The person to whom this letter is addressed was a Roman knight, extremely admired for his wit and pleasantness. It was this quality, it is probable, that recommended him to Antony, with whom he appears to have been in some credit, as he was likewise employed by him in the civil wars. Attics also was in the number of Volumius’s friends; and after the battle of Modena, when Antony’s faction was supposed to be irrecoverably crushed, he generously protected him from the violence of the successful party.—Ad Att. xvi. 8; Corn. Nep. in Vit. Attidi.
without heroically standing forth in vindication of his genius? I was in hopes that my wit was stamped with such distinguishing marks as to prevent the possibility of its being mistaken. But it seems there is such a general deprecation of taste in Rome, that no man's conceits are so execrably vile as not to meet with admirers. As you value my reputation, then, assert boldly that every low thing which is repeated of this sort is none of mine. And unless it be some smart pun or elegant hyperbole, some striking paragraph, or some arch and unexpected turn of a thought, unless it answers the character of true humour, as described in my dialogue on oratory, I desire you would do me the favour most vehemently to swear that mine you are confident it is not. With regard to those little pretenders to eloquence of whom you complain, as having usurped my place in the forum, I am much concerned. Fear it as it may with plaintiffs and defendants of every kind, I am nothing disturbed;

The hyperbole is a figure of speech by which anything is extravagantly magnified or diminished beyond the truth; as a paragon is a species of the pun, which consists in changing the initial letters of a name. It would be needless to produce any example in explanation of the form in which Cicero, in the latter kind will consist, to every English reader in the well-known reply which Cromwell made to the judges, when they reminded him of Magna Charta.

Of this kind is the Duke of Buckingham once said to one of his subjects:—"My lord, if I tell the truth, I am damned. "How, my lord!" returned the earl, with some warmth. "Nay," replied the duke, "there's no help for it: for it is positively said, Cursed is he of whom all men speak well."—Tatler, vol. 1. No. 17.

Cicero, in his oration to which he here refers, introduces one of his speakers as pointing out the principal sources of oratorical humour, among which he makes very honourable mention of the pun. There is scarce an author, indeed, of any note among the ancients, that has not, in some part or other of his writings, tried his genius at a conceit; and it is remarkable, that there is one in particular which runs through almost the whole set of Roman classics. The first that appears to have started it is that venerable censor, Cato the elder, who, in a grave speech recorded by Livy, taking notice of those fine statues that had been erected to him, in Egypt, sent a copy of Greece, expresses his concern,—"ne illae magis res nos repérant quam nos illas." Horace was so well pleased with this witticism, that he has transplanted it into one of his epistles:—

Grecia captâ forum victorem capit, et artes Intulit agresti Latini.

And even the majestick Virgil could not secure himself from the infection of this contagious ambiguity:—

Num capit potuere capi?

A quibble, which was afterwards taken up by Qun-tius Curtius: though it seems to be somewhat damaged in passing through his hands:—"plures capitâe (says that historian, speaking of one of Alexander's victories,) quam qui exercent, erunt." When it is considered how early this species of false wit appeared in the world; with what difficulty it has been subdued; that some of the best writers have not been able entirely to abstain from it; and that it was the favourite of so unquestionable a genius as Cicero; one cannot forbear thinking with the inimitable Mr. Addison, that the seeds of punning are in the minds of all men." It is the business, therefore, of criticism, to root out a weed, which the best as well as the worst soil, it seems, is so strongly disposed to produce: as it cannot spread without obliterating the nobler growth of true wit and that improvement of the Os. Decl. Hist. II. 30; Liv. xxxiv. 4; Hor. Ep. II. 1. 157; Virg. Aen. vii. 256; Quint. Curt. v. 13; Addison, Spect. i. No. 91.

no, not though the worthless Selinus himself should be deemed eloquent enough to persuade the world that he is not an arrant slave. But in the article of wit, my friend, there indeed I am much too jealous not to assert my prerogative. It is an article, however, in which I stand in fear of no other competitor but yourself: for your pretensions, doubtless, are formidable. Yet when I say this, you will modestly suspect perhaps that I am bantering; and who but must own that Volumnius is a man of penetration? To speak seriously, a most agreeable and lively vein of wit runs throughout your whole letter. I will confess, however, that what you mention concerning our friend, though you represented it in a very droll light, did not once make me smile. It is much my desire, I must own, that he should conduct himself through his tribunitial office with dignity, not only for his own sake, as you know he is a man I value, but for the sake likewise of my country, which, however ill it has treated me, I shall never cease to love.

And now, my dear Volumnius, I hope you will continue the agreeable correspondence you have begun, and give me frequent accounts of affairs both private and public: for, be assured, your letters are extremely pleasing to me. I entreat you, likewise, to endeavour to gain Dolabella entirely to my interests, by confirming him in that amicable disposition towards me which I know he is inclined to entertain. Not that I suspect he wants any applications of this sort: but as I am very desirous to make him my friend, it is a point, I think, that cannot be too much laboured. Farewell.

LETTER XIX.

To Crassipes.

I took occasion, before I left Rome, of recommending the Bithynia* company to you in the a. v. 702. strongest terms I was able; and I had the pleasure to find you perfectly well disposed, not only from my instances but your own inclinations, to do them all the good offices in your power. However, as those who are concerned in the matters of this society think it may be to their advantage that I should thus repeat my assurances of the regard I bear them, I make no difficulty of yielding to their solicitations. Be well persuaded, then, that I have ever been desirous of rendering to this whole order in general my best services; to which, indeed, the important obligations they have conferred upon me give them an undoubted right. But my attachments are more particularly strong to that branch of them concerned in the finances of Bithynia; as this company, from the rank and character of its members, forms one of the most considerable bodies in the whole republic. It is composed, indeed, out of all the other companies, and happens to consist of several of my most intimate friends. In this number their

Book V.

Letter I.

To Marcus Cato.

The great authority you bear in the republic, together with the high esteem I have ever entertained for your uncommon virtues, make me look upon it as a point of much consequence to me, that you should be apprised of the success of my arms; of the disinterested protection I have given to our allies; and of the integrity of my administration in general. And I doubt not, when you shall be informed of these several articles, I shall find the less difficulty in persuading you to comply with the request I am going to make.

I arrived in this province on the last of July; and, as the season of the year rendered it necessary for me to hasten to the army, I continued only two days at Laodicea, four at Apamea, three at Synade, and as many at Philomelium. I found great

There was the glorious object of his ambition from the first appearance in the world to the last moment of his life; and he undoubtedly pursued it through all the various insults and opposition that Caesar, Crassus, and Pompey could contrive to traverse and perplex his way. He resolutely, indeed, opposed the progress of their power, in every step of its unconstitutional advancement; and, with a most consummate prudence, perpetually forewarned his countrymen of these calamities which they afterwards experienced. Cicero, nevertheless, has said (and it has been often repeated after him) that there was more of probity than of prudence in Cato's politics, and particular numbers of people assembled in these several towns in expectation of my arrival: and, during my stay in each, I relieved many cities from the oppressive taxes they laboured under, reduced the exorbitant interest they paid for the money they had been obliged to borrow, and discharged them from the unjust demands of their usurious creditors. Before I arrived in my province, many rebellions had arisen in the army, and the soldiers had dispersed themselves into different parts of the provinces: five cohorts, in particular, were retired to Philemolum, without a single officer to command them. I therefore ordered my lieutenant Annius to conduct these scattered regiments to the main body in Lycaonia, and to assemble the whole army at Iconium, where I directed him to encamp. These orders he very diligently executed; and I joined the troops on the 28th of August. In the interval, I employed myself, agreeably to the injunctions of the senate, in raising a strong body of evocati, together with a proper number of cavalry, as also in assembling those auxiliary forces which the free as well as regal states in alliance with the republic had voluntarily offered me. As soon as the junction of all the troops was completed, I reviewed the whole army; and, on the 30th of August, we began to move towards Cilicia. In the mean time, envoys from the king of Commagene arrived with a very confused message; but, however, as it appeared afterwards, a very true account, that the Parthians had invaded Syria. This news greatly alarmed me, not only for the danger to which that province, but my own, was exposed; and which threatened, likewise, all Asia in general. I thought it advisable, therefore, to lead my troops through that part of Cappadocia which borders on Cilicia. If, indeed, I had marched directly into Cilicia, I could easily have protected that district of my province from any invasion on the side of Syria; as it cannot be entered from thence without traversing Mount Amanus, over which there are only two narrow defiles, that might be defended by a very small force. In short, nothing can be more impregnable than Cilicia is from that quarter, by the fortifications with which nature has secured it. But my chief concern was for Cappadocia, which lies entirely open towards Syria: and besides, there are several petty kingdoms in its neighbourhood, which, though in friendship with the Romans, yet dare not openly act against the Parthians. These considerations, therefore, determined me to lie with my army on the borders of Cappadocia; and accordingly I encamped at Cybista, a town situated not far from Mount Taurus. By these means, I was in a condition of protecting Cilicia, at the same time that, by possessing myself of Cappadocia, I prevented the contiguous states from entering into any measures to our prejudice.

Whilst affairs were in this commotion, and there was reason to apprehend a general war, king Deiotarus sent an embassy to my camp with an offer of joining me with all his forces. I was extremely sensible of this instance of his zeal and friendship, and immediately returned him a letter of acknowledgments, with my pressing exhortation, at the same time, that he would hasten his march. I cannot but observe, upon this occasion, that Deiotarus justly merits those peculiar marks of favour and esteem, with which both you and I in particular, as well as the senate in general, have ever distinguished him. He discovers, indeed, a remarkable fidelity and affection to the republic, together with an uncommon presence and greatness of mind both in action and in council.

I found it necessary, for the better concerting my plan of operations, to continue five days at Cybista. During my stay there, I had the satisfaction to be of singular service to Ariobarzanes; a prince particularly assigned to my protection by the senate, in consequence of your motion for that purpose. I delivered him from a very dangerous conspiracy, which was just upon the point of being carried into execution. I did more indeed; and not only preserved his person, but strengthened his authority. For this purpose I procured Metras and Athenaeus (the latter of whom you strongly recommended to my care) not only to be recalled from that exile into which the intrigues of the cruel Athenais had driven them, but to be restored to their former favour and credit with the king. And as it would have produced a very terrible civil war if the high priest, who was among the disaffected party, had taken up arms, as was generally supposed to be his intention, I found means of obliging him to depart the kingdom. This young man abounded both in money and troops, and possessed every other advantage that could render him of importance to those who were inclined to attempt a revolution. In a word, I recovered the authority of Ariobarzanes, without occasioning the least bloodshed or disturbance, and firmly established him in his royal dignity.

In the mean time, I was informed, by various expressers, that a considerable army of Parthians and Armenians were advanced to the city of Antioch; and that a large body of their cavalry which had penetrated into Cilicia, were entirely cut to pieces by a detachment of mine, supported by the pretorian cohort in garrison at Epiphanes. Perceiving, therefore, that the Parthians had turned off from Cappadocia, and were approached within a small distance of the frontiers of Cilicia, I conducted the army with all possible expedition to Amanus. Upon my arrival, I found the enemy was retired from Antioch, and that Bibulus had taken possession of the city. I sent an express, therefore, to Deiotarus, who was upon full march with all his forces to join me, acquainting him that I did not at present see occasion of drawing him out of his dominions; but that if any new occurrence should arise, I would immediately give him notice.

My principal view in advancing to Amanus was, that I might be ready to assist either Cilicia or Syria, as circumstances should require. I had likewise another design, which I had before meditated, and now prepared to execute, as being of great importance to both provinces: I mean, to quell the insurrection of these highlanders, and extirpate an enemy that was perpetually infesting us. To this end I made a point of retiring towards another part of Cilicia; and, having actually returned a day’s march, I encamped at Ephiphanes. But, on the 12th of October, in the evening, I struck my tents, and, by a long march during the whole night, I arrived early the next morning at Amanus. I immediately formed in order of battle, heading part of the troops myself, in conjunction with my brother, and distributing the command of the rest amongst my lieutenants. Thus alone, with these helpings, thus surprised by surprise, were taken and destroyed in great numbers. Meanwhile, my lieutenants Pontinius attacked Seprya, Commons, and Erana; the latter of which is the principal town on these mountains, and indeed considerable enough to be called a city. They each made a very obstinate resistance; and, notwithstanding the attack began before day-break, they did not surrender till night, nor without having suffered a prodigious slaughter. In this action we took six fortresses, and burnt many more.

Having thus successfully completed this expedition, we encamped at the foot of Mount Amanus, near Alexander’s 2 Altars, where I continued four days. During the whole time I remained here, I was employed in extirpating the rest of these mountaineers, and destroying that part of their lands which lies within my province. From hence I sat down before Pindissenum, a city in the territories of that part of Cilicia which has never submitted to the Romans. This was a place of great strength, and inhabited by a stubborn people who had preserved themselves unconquered, even by the neighbouring kings. It was a harbour, likewise, for fugitives of every kind, and they were greatly also in the interest of the Parthians, whose approach they impatiently expected. Upon these considerations, I thought it for the honour of my arms to restrain their insolence; essentially, as should by this means the more easily subdue the spirit of those other cantons which were equally averse to the Roman government. In consequence of this resolution, I invested the town; and, having raised six large fortresses, I began to play my battering engines against their walls. They held out, however, fifty-seven days; but at length finding the flames had seized several parts of the town, and that other quarters were laid in ruins, they surrendered at discretion, after having occasioned me an infinite fatigue. I had the satisfaction to complete this enterprise without occasioning our allies the least inconvenience or expense. After having thus reduced Pindissenum, and received hostages from the Thiburanis, a neighbouring people equally bold and insolent, I sent my army into winter-quarters. This care I assigned to my brother, and ordered him to canton the troops amongst those towns we had lately taken, or that were most disposed to revolt.

And now, if a motion should be made in the senate concerning the honours due to the success of my arms, I shall esteem it the highest glory to be supported in my pretensions by your suffrage. I am sensible it is usual for the gravest characters to request, as well as to be requested, for favours of this nature in the strongest terms; but I persuade myself it will be more proper for me to remind, than to solicit you, in the present instance. You have frequently, indeed, not only distinguished me with your vote, but with your highest applause, both in the senate and in the assemblies of the people. And believe me, I have ever thought there was so much weight and authority in all you uttered, that a single word of yours in my favour was the highest honour I could possibly receive. I remember, upon a certain occasion, when you refused to vote for a public sacrifice, which was proposed in favour of a very worthy and illustrious citizen; you told the senate that you should willingly have given your suffrage in support of the honour in question, had it been designed as a reward for any civil services which that consul had performed in Rome. Agreeably to this maxim, you formerly concurred in voting that a public thanksgiving should be decreed to me; not, indeed, for having advanced the glory of our country by my military achievements, (for that would have been a circumstance nothing uncommon,) but for having, in a most singular and unexampled manner, preserved the liberties of the whole commonwealth without drawing a sword. I forbear to mention the generous share you have taken in all the envy, the difficulties, and the dangers to which my life has been exposed; and a far greater you were willing to have taken, if I could have been prevailed upon to have consented. I forbear to mention, likewise, that you considered my enemy 3 as your own; and that, in order to give me a convincing proof of your great regard, you scrupled not to show your approbation even of his death, by defending Milo in the senate. In return, (and I speak of it not as a favour for which you are indebted to me, but as a tribute which I owed to truth,) I have been no silent admirer of your virtues; for who, indeed, can suppress his applause of them? In all my speeches, both in the forum and the senate, as well as in the several pieces I have published, either in our own language or in Greek, I have ever represented your character as superior, not only to the noblest amongst our contemporaries, but to the most celebrated in history.

After all, you will wonder, perhaps, what should induce me to set so high a value upon these little transient honours of the senate. I will acknowledge, then, the whole truth, and lay open my heart before you with a freedom becoming that philosophy we cultivate, and that friendship we profess; a friendship delivered down to us from our parents, and improved by many reciprocal good offices.

Let me previously observe, that if ever any man was a stranger to vain-glory, and a desire of vulgar

1 Cicer. soon after the expiration of his consulate, had very particular obligations to Cato, of the kind he mentions. For the latter being tribune at that time, procured him a confirmation, from an assembly of the people, of the glorious title of father of his country.—Plut. in Vit. Cicer.

b This honour was usually decreed to a general after some signal advantage obtained by his arms. It consisted in appointing a solemn festival, in order to return thanks to the gods for the public successes; at which time the senate went in solemn procession to the principal temples in Rome, and made such public sacrifices instituted for such occasions.

admiration, it is myself; and this frame of mind, which I possess by temper, has been still strengthened (if I dare not the military, rather than civil, pedagogy. As an evidence of this, I appeal to my consulate; in which, as in every other part of my life, though I pursued that conduct, I confess, from whence true honours might be derived, yet I never thought they were of themselves an object worthy of my ambition. On the contrary, I refused the government of a very noble province; and, notwithstanding it was highly probable I might have obtained a triumph, yet I forbore to prosecute my pretensions of that kind. I forbore, too, the offering myself as a candidate for the office of augur, though you are sensible, I dare say, that I might have succeeded without much difficulty. But I will acknowledge that the injurious treatment I afterwards suffered, though you always speak of it, indeed, as a circumstance which reflects the highest honour upon my character, and as a misfortune only to the republic, has rendered me desirous of receiving the most distinguished marks of my country's approbation. For this reason I solicited the office of augur, by which I had before declined; and, as little as I once thought the military honours deserved my pursuit, I am now ambitious of that distinction which the senate usually confers on its successful generals. I will own I have some view, by this mean, of healing the wounds of my former unmerited disgrace; and, therefore, though I just now declared that I would not press you upon this article, I recal my words, and most earnestly conjure your suffrage and assistance. My request, however, was never, upon the supposition that what I have performed in this campaign shall not appear contemptible in your eye, but, on the contrary, far superior to the actions of many of those generals who have obtained the most glorious rewards from the senate. I have observed, (and you are sensible I always listen with great attention whenever you deliver your opinions,) that, as often as any question of this nature has come before the senate, you were less in the habit of disputing the claims of the proconsul. It was the political ordinances he had established, and the moral qualities he had displayed, that seemed to have the principal weight in determining your vote. If you should examine my pretensions in this view, you will see that, with a weak and inconsiderable army, I found a strong resource against the danger of a very formidable invasion in the lenity and justice of my government. By these aids I effected what I never could by the most powerful legions; I recovered the friendship of our alienated allies; firmly strengthened their allegiance to the republic; and conciliated their affections at a time when they were waiting the opportunity of some favourable juncture to desert us. But perhaps I have expatiated farther upon this subject than is necessary; especially to you, before whom all our allies in general are accustomed to lay their complaints. To them, therefore, I refer you for an account of the benefits they have received by my administration. They will tell you, I am persuaded, you give the most advantageous answer, though for my favour; but particularly those illustrious clients of yours, the Cyprians and Cappadocians, to whom I ever concerned the interest of the commonwealth—Plut. in Vit. Cato.

3 Cyprus had a particular claim to the patronage of Cato, as he had been employed in executing a commission by which that island was annexed to the dominions of the republic. This commission was artfully contrived by Plutarch and Dion Cassius to swell Cicero's glory in his way; but the precise nature of it is nowhere distinctly explained. It should seem, by what may be collected from Plutarch, that it was only an embassy in which Cato was appointed to claim, on behalf of the republic, the dominions of Polyenn, King of Cyprus, and to offer him, at the same time, the highest pensions among all the islands of the Euphrates, which in these days might have been no disadvantageous exchange. Cato, however, has been severely censured by some modern historians, for having accepted this office; and Dr. Middelton, in particular, thinks he cannot be justified, but accuse the ancient historians speak of it as in the least unworthy of Cato's virtue: and, indeed, one of the most moral writers in all antiquity mentions it upon an occasion which clearly shows by no means thought inconsistent with that character of philosopher which this historian had so deservedly obtained. Seneca, in his letter of consolation, addressed to Marcia, on the loss of her son, taking notice of the advantages of an early death, instances, among other examples, those calamities which a more extended period has brought upon us. Cato—Marcus Cato seno (says he) at Cypro et hereditatia regis dispensationes redundantes mutuo devoravert, nonne ille bene actu foret?—Nunc anno capite adjecto piae sentimenta, virum liberati non unam aliarmi, sed in omnem et eum turn pompeian amorem, Pompelium sequi. It is evident, then, that this action was so far from being deemed unjustifiable in the opinion of the ancients, (by which alone it can be fairly examined,) that the noblest of their moralists has chosen it to complete a glorious and inglorious the favourite hero. It must unquestionably, therefore, have been founded upon some circumstances that reconciled it to that law of nations which then prevailed in the world. Accordingly, it appears, by some passages in Cicero's orations, that the republic at this time entertained such an idea of Alexander, king of Egypt, whose territories Cyprus belonged, appointed the Roman commonwealth his general heir; and though the senate did not judge proper, at that juncture, to assert their full right under his will, they thought it, however, a sufficient title to possess themselves of Alexander's effects. From that time down to the date of Cato's commission, frequent attempts had been made in the senate to enforce their right under the will, and a decree had actually passed for that purpose. But as this decree was protested against by some tribune, it had never been carried into execution. Thus far it should seem that Cato's commission was not founded upon a more arbitrary exercise of power, but on a right which had long before received the sanction of the senate, and which had already in part been vicissitudes to the public. In the next place, the inhabitants of Cyprus were extremely oppressed under the government of Polyenn, and desirous of transferring their subjection to the Romans. Paternus represents this prince as one who well deserved the punishment he suffered:—omnis ingenii subsitus, hic se cum cunctis consensu medio merito. And Dion Cassius expressly declares, that the Cyprians received Cato, "ob euvacuios hoping that, from slaves, as they were before, they should be raised into the number of the friends and allies of Rome." But to consider this question in another point of view: what probable interest could be assigned for Cato's undertaking this office? It could not be from a spirit of avarice: for it is unanimously confessed that no discharged it with the most unsought importunity. It could not be from may likewise add your great and royal friend, prince Deiotarus. If thus to act is a merit of the most superior kind, if in all ages the number has been far less considerable of those who knew how to subdue their desires than to vanquish their enemies, he that has given an instance of both, cannot, certainly, but he deemed, in Cato's estimation at least, to have strengthened his claim to the honours of his country, and to have improved the splendour of his military achievements by the more unusual lustre of his civil conduct.

Let me, in the last place, and as in diffidence of my own solicitations, call in Philosophy for my advocate; than which nothing has ever afforded me a more sensible satisfaction. The truth is, she is one of the noblest blessings that the gods have bestowed on man. At her shrine we have both of us, from our earliest years, paid our joint and equal adorations; and while she has been thought by some the companion only of indolent and seceding speculationists, we (and we alone, I had almost said) have introduced her into the world of business, and familiarised her with the most active and important scenes. She, therefore, it is that now solicits you in my behalf; and in so Philosophy is suppliant, Cato surely can never refuse. To say all in one word, be well assured, if I should prevail with you to concur in procuring a decree I so much wish to obtain, I shall consider myself as wholly indebted for that honour to your authority and friendship. Farewell.

LETTER II.

Marcus Cato to Cicero.

The affection I bear both to you and to the republic induces me, very sincerely, to rejoice in finding that you exercise the same integrity and vigilance in the conduct of our arms abroad as distinguished your administration of our most important affairs at home. I have, therefore, paid my actions that honour which was most consistent with my judgment; and, in speaking to this question before the senate, as well as afterwards when I assisted in drawing up the decree that has passed in your favour, I applauded the probity and prudence with which you have protected your province, preserved the crown and person of Ariobarzanes, and conciliated the affections of our allies in general.

If you rather choose, however, that we should ascribe to the gods those advantages which the republic has gained entirely by your own consummate wisdom and probity, I am glad the senate has passed a decree for that purpose. But if you are willing that fortune should have the credit of your actions, as supposing a public thanksgiving necessarily opens your way to a triumph, I must observe that the latter is not always a consequence of the former. Yet, granting it were, is it not far more to the honour of a general, to have it declared, by a vote of the senate, that he preserved his province by the mildness and equity of his administration, than that he owed it either to the strength of his troops, or to the peculiar interposition of Providence? Such, at least, were my sentiments when this question came before the house; and if I have employed more words than usual in explaining them, it was from a desire of convincing you, that, though I proposed to the senate what I thought would be most for the advantage of your reputation, I rejoice that they have determined what is most agreeable to your wishes. I have only to request the continuance of your friendship, and to entreat you steadily to persevere in those paths of integrity which you have hitherto pursued both in respect to our allies and the republic.

Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Caius Marcellus, Consul.

Nothing could be more agreeable to my wishes, than that the question concerning the honours due to my military services should come before the senate at a time when you are consul, as it will afford you an opportunity of gratifying that uncommon zeal for my interests which I have upon all occasions experienced from every branch of your family. Let me entreat you, therefore, when the letter I have addressed to the senate shall be laid before that assembly, to exert your influence in procuring a decree in my favour of the most distinguished kind. I persuade myself you will find no difficulty in complying with this request, as the senate, I trust, will by no means be averse to my pretensions. If there were any of your family whose friendship I enjoyed in a higher degree than yours, I should have applied to you by their intervention. But though no man ever entered more warmly into my interests than your father; though the esteem which your relation Marcus Marcellus has long entertained for me is conspicuous to the whole world; and, in a word, though all your family, in general, have ever honoured me with the most signal marks of their regard; yet there is not one of them who hath afforded me stronger instances of affection than yourself. I conjure you, then, to distinguish me with the highest honours; and let me experience,

1 This letter (to speak in the virutus language) is a unique, and extremely valuable, as being the only composition that has been transmitted to us from the hands of Cato. It confirms what Plutarch expressly asserts, that Cato's manners were by no means of a rough and unpolished cast, as no refusals could have been drawn up in more decent and civil terms. A judicious eye, however, cannot but discern, through this veil of politeness, the nice touches of a delicate and concealed rascality, which Cicero, nevertheless, thought proper to dissemble, as will appear by his answer to this letter in the following book. See letter 10, book vi.

in the affair of my thanksgiving, as well as in every other wherein the glory of my reputation is concerned, that I want no solicitor to recommend me to your good offices. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Lucius Paulus, Consul.

Among many reasons for wishing myself, with you at Rome, the principal was, that I might, both in your presence and in the course of your consular ministry, have given you proofs of that zeal to which you have so undoubted a right. I am sensible, at the same time, that the unanimity with which you were chosen, (and of which, indeed, I never entertained the least doubt,) would have rendered my assistance in that article altogether unnecessary: and I sincerely wish you may have as little occasion for it in the subsequent discharge of your office. However, I should have had the satisfaction, at least, of seconding your views in both. It is a great concern to me, I confess, when I reflect that, notwithstanding I experienced many important instances of your affection during my consulship, I am yet utterly incapable of making any return in yours. And what readers this reflection still more mortifying, is, that you were but a young man when you thus generously displayed the effects of your friendship: whereas, I am at a time of life when much greater advantages might well be expected from mine. I know not, in truth, by what fatality it is that you have continually had opportunities of advancing my dignities, and that I have never been able to contribute anything but ineffectual good wishes to yours. Thus, as not only in the instance I just now mentioned, but in the article of my restoration, I was indebted to you for the highest honours, so a fresh occasion now presents itself to you of distinguishing me, as my military achievements have happened to fall within the period of your consulate. The dignity of that office with which you are invested, and the importance of those honours I am suing for, might well require that I should address you in all the warmth of solicitation; but I dare not venture thus to press you, lest it should look as if I forgot, or at least imagined that you had forgotten, your usual disposition to serve me. I will make my request, therefore, in few words: and it will be treating you in a manner more agreeable, I dare say, to your own inclinations, as well as to those favours which all the world is sensible I have received at your hands. If any others, indeed, than you and your colleague were in possession of the consular office, you are the first man whose mediation I should have employed in order to render the consuls favourable to my pretensions. But as this high authority is vested in you, with whom I have the strongest and most conspicuous connexions, I cannot scruple to conjure your assistance in speedily procuring a decree of the most illustrious kind in my favour; an honour which you will find, by the letter I have addressed to the senate, that my arms are not unworthy of receiving. I recommend then my reputation, and, indeed, my concerns of every sort, to your generous patronage. But, above all, I beseech you (and it is a request I mentioned in my former letter) that you would not suffer the time of my continuance here to be prolonged. It is much my desire, in truth, to see you in your consular office; and I doubt not of obtaining from your administration every advantage, both here and in Italy, that I most wish to enjoy. Farewell.

LETTER V.

Marcus Catius to Cicero.

You have been informed, I doubt not, that Dolabella has exhibited articles of impeachment against Appius; and this prosecution seems to be more agreeable to the world in general than I imagined. Appius, however, has acted with great prudence upon the occasion: for as soon as his adversary had lodged his information, he withdrew his petition for a triumph, and immediately entered the city. By these means he silenced the reports to his disadvantage; as he appeared more willing to take his trial than his prosecutor expected. Appius relies greatly in this conjuncture upon your assistance; and I am persuaded you are not disinclined to serve him. You have it now in your power to do so as far as you shall think proper: though, I must add, you would be more at liberty to limit your good offices towards him, if you and he had never been upon ill terms together. But, as the case now stands, were you to measure out your services by the right he has to demand them, it might be suspected that you were not sincere in your reconciliation: whereas, you can hazard no censure by obliging him; as you will show that you are not to be discouraged from acting a generous part, even where friendship might incline you to the contrary. This reminds me of acquitting you that Dolabella's wife obtained a divorce just upon the commencement of this prosecution. I remember the conclusion you left with me when you set out for the province; as I dare say you have not forgotten what I afterwards wrote to you concerning that affair. I have not time to enlarge upon it at present; only let me advise you, how much soever you may relish the scheme, to await the event of this trial before you discover your sentiments. If, indeed, your inclinations should be known, it will raise a very invidious clamour against you; and should you give Dolabella the least intimation of them, they...
willing certainly become more public than will be convenient either for your interest or your honour. He would, undoubtedly, be unable to conceal a circumstance so advantageous to his present views, and which would give him much credit to the prosecution in which he is engaged; and I am persuaded he would scarcely refrain from making it the subject of his conversation, notwithstanding he were sure the discovery would prove to his prejudice. Pumpey, I am told, interests himself extremely in behalf of Appius; as your leaving that point at large will be of singular importance, not only to the affair I hint at, but also in regard to the opinion the world will entertain of your justice and honour.

Will it not be a high reflection upon you if I should not be furnished with some Grecian panthers? Farewell.

LETTER VI.

From the same.

I know not how soon you may wish to resign your government; but, for my own part, my impatience for your return is in proportion to the good fortune that has hitherto attended your arms. Whilst you continue in the province, therefore, I shall be under perpetual apprehensions lest some unlucky reverse should damp the joy I take in your late successful expedi-

I have time to write but a very few words, as I convey this by the hands of the courier to the farmers of the revenue, who is just setting out; and, indeed, I sent you a long letter yesterday by your freedman. Nothing has since occurred worth communicating; unless you should have curiosity enough to think (as I imagine you will) that the following articles deserve notice. In the first place, then, Cornificius is upon the point of being married to the youngest daughter of Sylla; and in the next, Paula Valeria, on the very day her husband was expected from his government, procured a divorce, without alleging the least cause. She is to be married to Decimus Brutus. Several very extraordinary incidents of the same kind have happened during your absence. But would you have suspected that Servius Ocella was so well with the ladies, as to have been twice discovered in close gallantry within the space of three short days? If you ask me where the scene of this amorous adventure was laid? in sad truth, my friend, where I least wished; but for the rest, I leave you to inquire of others. And a pleasant piece of intelligence it will be for our noble general to learn in whose fair quarters the luckless Ocella was seized! Farewell.

absolute power for five years over all the revenues of the republic, to distribute them at pleasure to the citizens; to sell and buy what lands they thought fit; to determine the rights of the principal possessors; to require an account from all the generals abroad, except Pompey, of the spoil taken in their wars; to settle colonies wherever they judged proper, and particularly at Capua; and, in short, to command all the money and forces in the empire. Life of Cicero, p. 43.

One would almost suspect from the reserved manner in which Ocellus relates this adventure, that he had a starling reason on his brow (as the post humorously calls it) for not being more explicit.
I will answer your letter more fully than I can at present, the very first moment I shall have more leisure. In the mean while I snatch the opportunity of sending this by the hands of some domestics of Brutus, who just now called upon me at Laodicea, and are returning with all expedition to Rome. They are in so much haste, that I have only time to write this, and another to Brutus.

The deputies from Apamea delivered your long letter to me, wherein you very unjustly accuse me of having obstructed by my mandates the public monument* which that city proposed to raise. You desire I would suffer them to proceed immediately upon the execution of that design, lest they should be prevented by the winter; and very severely reproach me for having suspended the assessments for that purpose till I should be able to inquire into the justice of raising them. This, you tell me, was in some sort an absolute prohibition; since the winter would necessarily be set in before I could return out of Cilicia in order to examine into that affair. Having thus stated the several articles of your charge, I will now show you that they are altogether unreasonable. In the first place, then, as I had received complaints on the part of those who thought themselves aggrieved by excessive taxes, where was the impropriety if I forbade those subsidies to be levied till I could examine into the merits of the case? But this, it seems, I could not be able to effect till the winter. Yet why not? let me ask: since it was the part of those who made these complaints to wait upon me, rather than mine to attend them. But you will object, perhaps, to the reasonableness of laying these people under the difficulty of taking so long a journey. Yet this journey you yourself must necessarily have designed they should take, when you gave them their letter to deliver to me. And deliver it they accordingly did: but they timed it so absurdly, that though it was to desire they might be permitted to begin their work during the summer, they did not bring it to me till that season was expired. I must acquaint you, however, that far the greater part of these very citizens are averse to the levying this tax in question. Nevertheless, I shall take such measures for that purpose, as I imagine will prove most agreeable to your inclinations. And thus much for this Apamian business.

I am informed, by Pausanias, a freedman of Lentulus, and one of my accusers*, that you complained to him of my having treated you with great haughtiness and incurability by not coming to meet you in your approach to Iconium. The fact, however, is this: I received a message from you late at night, acquainting me that you proposed to give me an interview in that city the next morning; but your servant could not inform me of which of the two roads you intended to take. In order, therefore, that I might be ready to attend you, I despatched your friend Varro, together with Lepta, the captain of my artillery, directing them to take different roads, and whichever should meet you first, to return with immediate notice. Accordingly Lepta came back with great expedition; and assuring me that you had actually passed the camp, I instantly went to Iconium. What followed I need not mention: and now it is probable that I, who am rather apt to be more assiduous in offices of this kind than my station and character require, should neglect to pay the accustomed honours to Appius Claudius; to one dignified with the august title of imperator, and, what is still stronger, to my friend? But not to dwell any longer upon this article, I cannot forbear taking notice of an expression you made use of to the same person. "A compliment of this kind, you told him, had mutually passed between you and Lentulus; and did Cicero attempt towards a person of your quality with less ceremony?" But can it be true that so weak an expression should drop from a man of your improved understanding and knowledge of the world: I will add too, (what the Stoics justly rank in the number of social virtues,) of your refined good breeding? Can you possibly believe me so mean as to be influenced more by the distinctions of birth than of merit? I have ever, indeed, held the fouler of insinuations families as truly great; but never could I esteem the splendid names they transmitted to their posterity as objects of my admiration. These were my sentiments even before I had myself attained what the world considers as the highest honours. But now, after having filled the most distinguished posts in the commonwealth with a character that leaves nothing more for my ambition to wish, though I am far from thinking myself superior to those of your rank, I hoped, however, that I might be deemed to have theenuaged at least that I have been always regarded as such, not only by Lentulus, to whom I yield the preference to myself in every respect, but by Pompey likewise, whom I look upon as the greatest man the world has ever produced. But if you differ from them in this opinion, I would recommend the writings of Athenodorus* to your attentive perusal,—as they will teach you to form a more just distinction between high birth and true nobility. But to divert farther from the purpose of my letter, I beg you would do me the justice to believe, not only that I am your friend, but that I am most affectionately so; the truth of which I shall endeavour to evince by every means in my power. Nevertheless, if you are disposed to make the world suspect that you have less reason to take my interest under your protection during my absence than I had to act for yours in the same circumstance, I willingly spare you the trouble:

LETTER VII.

To Appius Fulcher.

* It was usual with these Asiatie provinces to consecrate temples to their Roman governors, and associate them with the gods in the same common ceremonies of religious worship. Probably, therefore, the building which the city of Apamea proposed to erect, and which was so complimentary to Appius of this sacred kind. The very ingenious Monsieur Mongeaut has shown, in a learned dissertation which he read before the Royal Academy of Belles Lettres at Paris, that the divine honours which were paid to the Roman emperors, were only a continuance of this infamous superstition which had been practised during the times of the republic.—Plut. in Vit. Flamini.; Mémoires de Littérat. vol. i. p. 669.

There want not chiefs in such a cause to fight,
And Jove himself shall guard a monarch’s right. a
But, notwithstanding you should give me reason to think that you are of a temper too apt to take offence, you will not, however, extinguish my desire of exerting my best services in your behalf; you will only render me less solicits in what manner you may receive them.
Thus I have opened my heart to you with a freedom that results from the conscious sincerity of my friendship towards you, and which, as it was founded on dispassionate judgment, I shall preserve just as long as may be agreeable to your own inclinations. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

To Caius Cassius b, Proconsul.

My own inclinations have anticipated your recommendation: I have long since received Marcus a, u. 703. Fabius into the number of my friends.

He has extremely endeared himself to me, indeed, by his great politeness and elegance of manners, but particularly by the singular affection I have observed he bears towards you. Accordingly, though your letter in his behalf was not without effect, yet my own knowledge of the regard he entertains for you had somewhat more: you may be assured therefore, I shall very faithfully confer upon him the good offices you request.

Many reasons concurred to make me wish you could have given me an interview. In the first place, I was desirous, after so tedious a separation, to see a friend whom I have long esteemed. In the next place, I should have been glad to have expressed those congratulations in person which I have already paid you in a letter. I wanted, likewise, an opportunity of conferring with you upon our mutual affairs, as well as of confirming a friendship founded on many reciprocal good offices, though interrupted, indeed, by a long absence. But, since I could not obtain the pleasure of a nearer meeting, let me take the advantage of this more distant communication, and which, in most respects, will answer the same purpose. There is one or two, however, I must except, as it can neither afford me a satisfaction equal to that of seeing you, nor a mean of rendering you so sensible of the joy I feel in your late success. But though I have already expressed my congratulations in a former letter, I will here again assure you that I sincerely rejoice, not only in the illustrious actions you have performed, but at your very opportune departure amidst the general esteem and applauses of the whole province.

And now, what I had farther to say, if we had met, related to our mutual affairs; a point, however, which may full as well be discussed in this manner. With regard to your own, when I consider your interest in general, I cannot but advise you to return to Rome. When I left the city, there was not the least appearance of any designs to your prejudice; and I am persuaded your returning thither, while the success of your arms is fresh upon the minds of the people, will ensure you a reception greatly to your honour. The reason for hastening your journey will hold still stronger, if you are convinced that you shall be able to defeat those prosecutions which you are apprehensive, it seems, may be brought against some of your suffices, as nothing will place your character in a more advantageous light than a victory of this kind. But if you imagine the chance can be made good against them, it merits your consideration whether your arrival in Rome will not happen in a conjuncture very unfavourable for such a circumstance. Upon the whole, you yourself are most capable of determining this question, as you are the best judge of your own strength. If you think you shall triumph over your adversaries, it is a circumstance, undoubtedly, that will raise your general credit; but if you are clear that the reverse a Hemer, Pope's translation. These lines are taken from the speech of Agamemnon to Achilles, in the first Iliad, where the hero threatens to withdraw his forces from the common cause. Cicero seems to apply them in particular allusion to his interest with Pompey, who at this time was the great idol of his devotion, and the political Jove, at whose shrine he most devoutly bow’d. [See letter 36, book viii. rem. 7.] It is unnecessary to mention the part which Cassius afterwards acted towards his benefactor, as everybody knows that he was the principal contriver and manager of the conspiracy against Caesar. Plutarch assures us that he engaged in this design from this his passionate love of liberty, but the contemporaries of Cassius thought otherwise, and it was generally believed in Rome that he was actuated upon that occasion more by pique than patriotism. It is probable, indeed, that the former was his strongest, if not this single motive; for his oppressive and tyrannical conduct, during his administration of the provinces of Syria, renders it not very reasonable to suppose that he was a real friend to the natural rights of mankind.

b Cassius, after the death of Crassus and the total defeat of his army, conducted back the remnant of the Roman troops into Syria, and shut himself up in Troad. In a letter to Nicolaus, he says, of his being upon the merch in order to assist Cassius, that animated his courage, and spread such terror among the enemy as induced them to retreat. But this (as the very ingenious French translator of the letters to Atticus observes) was ascribing to himself something to which he had certainly no right. For Cicero was at a great distance from Antioch when the Parthians retreated from that city, which the bravery of Cassius, together with their own inexperience in the nature of regular slights, only caused their abandoning. An observation, therefore, of Cicero’s own may serve perhaps as a proper conclusion to this remark:—“Deforme est de seipso praecipere, fuls praesertim; et cum irentius antiquam civiliter militum gloriam.”—Dio, p. 134; Ad Att. v. 29, 51; Meng. Traduct. vol. iii. p. 146, rem. 9; De Offic. 1. 36.
will prove the case, you will certainly be less mortified by the distant reflections of the world, than if you were placed within the hearing of their malicious censures.

As to my own affairs, I must repeat the request of my last, and entreat you to exert your utmost endeavours that my continuance here may not be extended beyond the period limited by the senate and the people. I urge this request as one upon which all my hopes depend, and entreat you to act in it with a proportionable zeal. You will find Paulus extremely well disposed to co-operate with you upon this occasion; as also both Curio and Furnius.

I have only to add the last article I mentioned, as an inducement for desiring an interview; I mean, in order to renew and confirm the pledges of our mutual friendship. I persuade myself it will not be necessary to employ many words for that purpose. You discovered, indeed, an early disposition to be thus united with me, as on my part I always considered it as my particular honour. I found it too my great support, in the season of my misfortunes. Let me add, in farther claim to its continuance, that I have contracted, since your absence, a great intimacy with your relation Brutus. I promise myself much satisfaction from the society of two such ingenuous friends, as well as very high advantages from your united services: suffer me not, I conjure you, to conceive this hope in vain. In the mean time, I beg to hear from you immediately, as I desire, likewise, you would write to me very frequently when you return to Rome. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

To Marcus Cælius, Curule-Edile.

The very worthy and learned Marcus Fabius is a person with whom I am most intimately connected. He strongly, indeed, engages my affection, not only by his superior genius and erudition, but by that uncommon modesty which adorns them. I entreat you, therefore, to undertake his cause with the same warmth as if it were my own. I know you fine orators are as much employed, that a man must have committed murder at least, ere he can hope that his affairs are of significance enough to claim your assistance. In the present instance, however, I will take no excuse: and if I have any share in your regard, you will give up all other business when Fabius requires your services.

The severity of the winter has prevented my receiving any despatches from Rome a considerable time. I am extremely impatient, therefore, to hear what is going forward amongst you, and particularly what my friend Cælius is doing. Farewell.

LETTER X.

To Curtius Peduscanus, Prator.

I have long enjoyed an intimacy with Marcus Fabius, for whom I sincerely profess the most tender regard. I do not, however, desire to influence your judgment in the suit which he has depending before you, as I am sure you will not depart from those rules of equity which your honour obliges you to observe, and which you prescribed to yourself when you first entered upon your office. My only request is, and it is a request I most earnestly make that you would allow him to wait upon you, and would favour his claim so far as justice is on his side. In a word, let me entreat you to show him that my friendship can avail him even at this distance. Farewell.

LETTER XI.

To Appius Pulcher.

I have at last received a letter from you, written in a spirit worthy of yourself, as it is conceived in terms full of a generous and candid friendship. It should seem, indeed, that the very view of Rome had an immediate effect upon your temper, and restored you to the agreeable possession of your usual good humour and politeness. I am sure, at least, that the two complaining letters you wrote to me on your journey, ere you had left Asia, were such as I could not read without reluctance. I will own, too, that, conscious of the inviolable attachment which I have ever preserved to your interests, I could not forbear answering them with some warmth. The letter, indeed, which you delivered to my freedman Philotimus, left me no room to doubt that there were some persons in this province who were no well-wishers to our union. But I have the satisfaction to find, that as soon as you came to Rome, or rather as soon as you were met by your friends and family, you were convinced of that warm and constant testimony I gave of my friendship and esteem for you upon all occasions during your absence. You will easily imagine, then, with how much pleasure I read your assurances, that if any incident should arise whereby my reputation may be concerned, you will endeavour to make me an equal return. And though you doubt whether you shall be able effectually to do so, most certainly there is no reason to question it: for there is nothing, my friend, which a sincere and zealous affection is not capable of performing. Notwithstanding I was well persuaded, in my own judgment, and had received frequent assurances likewise by the letters of my friends, that you would undoubtedly be honoured with a triumph, yet it afforded me a singular pleasure to be confirmed in this persuasion by your own hand. Believe me, however, I by no means rejoice in it.
from a selfish Epicurean principle, and as it may probably facilitate my own pretensions of the same kind, but as taking a sincere and disinterested share in every increase of your dignities. You then, as you more and more enjoy the opportunities of writing into this province than any other of my friends, that you would give me immediate notice as soon as you shall have obtained the decree, which you have so much reason to expect, and which I so uneignedly wish you. If the tedious resolutions of the long bench, as our friend Pompey calls the senate, should delay your hopes a few days, (and more than a few days they surely cannot delay them,) be confident, however, that they will at length distinguish you with those honours which are so justly due your. Done, therefore, I conjure you, as you give me your affection, or would preserve mine, to let me participate in the joy of this good news as early as possible.

To this request I will join another, and remind you of executing your promise of sending me the completion of your treatise on augury. I ask this, not only as being desirous most of it in the right and learned principles of the sacred college, but as I receive with uncommon satisfaction every mark of your favour. As to the request you made on your part of returning you a compliment in the same kind, it is a point I must well consider. For it would ill become an author whom you have so often applauded for the pains he bestows upon his compositions, to suffer any crude and indisgested performance to come forth from his hands, especially upon an occasion that would justify expose to their censures, not only of being guilty of negligence, but of a most ungrateful disrespect. However, I may find some opportunity, perhaps, of satisfying both you and myself upon this article. In the mean time, I hope you will undertake, in conformity to your promise, that a public thanksgiving of the most distinguished kind he decreed, as soon as possible, on account of my late victories; and I am persuaded you will act with that zeal which is agreeable to your sincerity, and to the friendship which has long subsisted between us.

1 "Tis strange to see how differently the vanity of mankind runs in different times and seasons. "Tis at present the boast of almost every enterprizer in the Muses' art, that, by his genius alone and a natural rapidity of style and thought, he is able to carry all before him; that he plays with his business, does things in passing, at a venture, and in the quickest period of time. In the days of Attic elegance, as works were then truly of another form and turn, so works were of another humour, and had their vanity of a quite contrary kind. They became rather affected in endeavouring to discover the pains they had taken to be correct. They were glad to insinuate how laboriously, and with what expense of time, they had brought the smallest work of theirs (as perhaps a single ode, or satire, an oration, or panegyric) to its perfection. When they had so polished their piece, and rendered it so natural and easy that it seemed only a lucky flight, a hit of thought, or flowing vein of humour, they were then conscious of it, and it should bear fitness pass for such, and their artifices remain undiscovered. They were willing it should be known how serious their play was, and how elaborate their freedom and facility; that they might say, as the agreeable and polite poet, glancing on himself, "Ludens spectat habit atque verquebatur."—Shakespeare's Characteristics, I. 233.

was somewhat later in my public despatches for this purpose, than I wished; and as they were delayed likewise by the difficulty of navigation at that season, they did not, I suppose, arrive before the senate was prorogued. It was the influence which your advice always has upon my judgment that induced me to defer them; and I am satisfied it was perfectly right not to acquaint the senate of my being saluted with the title of Imperator, till I had gained still farther advantages by my arts, and entirely completed the campaign. I confidently rely, therefore, upon the assistance you have promised, and recommend to your protection whatever else concerns either my affairs or my family. Farewell.

LETTER XII.

To Marcus Calvis.

Would you imagine that I should ever be at a loss for words! I do not mean of that chosen and elegant kind which are the privilege of you celebrated orators, but those of ordinary and common use. Yet, believe me, I am utterly incapable of expressing the solicitude I feel concerning the resolutions that may be taken in the senate in regard to the province I hold in my hand, impatient, indeed, to return to my friends at Rome, among which number you are principally in my thoughts. I will confess, likewise, that I am quite satisated of my government. For, in the first place, I have more reason to apprehend that some reverse of fortune may deprive me of the glory I have here acquired, than to expect I shall be able to raise it higher. And, in the next place, I cannot but look upon the whole business of this scene as much inferior to my strength, which is both able and accustomed to support a far more important weight. I will acknowledge, too, that I am uneasy in the expectation of a very terrible war, which is likely to be kindled in this part of the world, and which I may probably escape if I should obtain my dismission at the stated time.

I do not forget the panthers you desired, and have given my orders to the persons usually employed in hunting them; but these animals are exceedingly scarce with us. They take it so unkind, you must know, that they should be the only creatures in my province for whom any snares are laid, that they have withdrawn themselves from my government, and are marched into Caria. However, the huntsmen, and particularly honest Patiscus, are making very diligent inquiry after their haunts; and all the game they can meet with shall certainly he yours; but what the number will prove is altogether uncertain. Be well assured the honour of your sedileship is much my care; and this day particularly remarkable of it, as it is the festival of the Megalesian games.

With the Parthians.

= The Megalesian games were under the conduct of the curule ædiles, as well as those called the Roman. The learned Mancius, therefore, conjectures that the anniversary of the former reminded Cicero of the parties which Calvis requested, in order to grace those shows he was to exhibit at the latter, which were celebrated with greater pomp and magnificence. The nature of the Roman games has already been explained in rem. i. p. 406. The Megalesian games were instituted in honour of the mother of the
I hope you will send me a minute detail of our public affairs, as I have an entire dependence on the accounts which are transmitted to me by your hand. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.
To Thermus, Proprator.
Your very generous treatment of Marcus Marcius, the son of my friend and interpreter, is a most obliging instance, among many others, of the regard you pay to my recommendations. He came to me at Laodicea, and expressed the highest gratitude for the good offices you had conferred upon him at my request. As you see, therefore, that your favours are not bestowed upon those who are insensible of their value, I hope you will be the more inclined to continue them. I entreat you, then, to interpose, as far as your honour will permit, in preventing a prosecution wherein the mother-in-law of this young man is likely to be involved. And though I strongly recommended Marcius to you in my former letter, yet it is with still greater warmth that I do so in this; as I have since received very singular, and, indeed, almost incredible proofs of his father’s probity and fidelity during the many months he has been engaged in my service. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.
To the same.
The report of a very considerable war being kindled in Syria, is confirmed to me by daily expressions. I take the liberty, therefore, in confidence of our mutual friendship, to press you so much the more strongly to dismiss my lieutenant Amnias as soon as possible. His military abilities, indeed, will render his advice and assistance of singular advantage in this conjunction, both to myself and to the republic. Nothing could have induced him to leave me at this critical season, or, in truth, have prevailed with me to consent to his absence, but an affair of the last importance to his interest. However, as I purpose to go into Cilicia about the beginning of May, it is absolutely necessary he should return before that time.

I will take this opportunity of most earnestly renewing the request I made to you in person, and which I afterwards repeated in a letter, that you would employ your good offices in settling his contest with the city of Sardis, agreeably to the justice of his cause, and the dignity of his character. I had the pleasure, when I talked with you, and were so called from Megalopolis, a temple in Phrygia, from whence the statue and worship of that goddess was brought to Rome. This festival commenced on the 4th of April, and continued six days.

The governors of provinces were prohibited from using any other language than the Latin, in the functions of their ministry, for which reason they were always attended with interpreters—Val. Max. II. 2.

For that he had a real affection for him, as he pretends in this epistle, is by no means probable. On the contrary, in a letter to Atticus he speaks of his disposition towards Appius, in terms of much lower import, and discovers, at the same time, the principal motive that engaged him in his interest—Pro Appio ad Att. vi. 1; videtur enim saepe, etc., aliquid. Pro consilio, sed non in amore, nec in animo, sed in arte liberorum. Nemo enim ipsum adulescit, ut Pompeius mitis secundum eum contendat—Ad Att. vi. 2.
as your letter seemed to intimate a doubt in what manner I was inclined towards him. This leads me to suspect that some idle tale or other has been reported to the disadvantage of my sentiments respecting Appius: but, be assured, whatever you have heard of that nature is utterly false. I must confess, at the same time, that his maxims and mine in the administration of this province have been somewhat different; and it may from thence, perhaps, have been suggested that I acted counter to his measures, more from a spirit of opposition than from any real disagreement of principles. But, believe me, I have never said or done the least thing throughout the whole course of my government with a view of prejudicing his reputation. And now that my friend Dolabella has so rashly attacked him, I am exerting all my good offices to dissipate the rising storm with which he is threatened.

You mentioned something of a lethargic inactivity that had seized the republic. I replied, no doubt, to hear that you were in a state of such profound tranquillity, as well as that our spirited friend was so much infected with this general indolence as not to be in a humour of disturbing it. But the last paragraph of your letter, which was written, I observed, with your own hand, changed the scene, and somewhat, indeed, discomposed me. Is Curio really, then, become a convert to Caesar? But, extraordinary as this event may appear to others, believe me it is agreeable to what I always suspected. Good gods! how do I long to laugh with you at the ridiculous farce which is acting in your part of the world?

I have finished my juridical circuit, and not only settled the finances of the several cities upon a more advantageous basis, but secured to the farmers of the revenues the arrears due on their former agreements, without the least complaint from any of the parties concerned. In short, I have given entire satisfaction to all orders and degrees of men in this province. I propose, therefore, to set out for Cilicia on the 7th of May, from whence, after having just looked upon the troops in their summer cantonment, and settled some affairs relating to the army, I intend, agreeably to the decrees of the senate for that purpose, to set forward to Rome. I am extremely impatient, indeed, to return to my friends, but particularly to you, whom I much wish to see in the administration of your sedile ships. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.

To Quintus Thermus, Proprietor.

It is with great pleasure I perceive that my services to Rhodii and others of your friends, as well as those likewise which I have performed to yourself, prove acceptable to a man of your grateful disposition. Be assured you will find me still more and more desirous of advancing your credit and reputation; though I must add, that the lenity and justice of your government seem already to have raised them as high as possible.

The more I reflect upon your affairs, and (they are the daily subject of my thoughts,) the more I am confirmed in that advice I communicated to you by Aristo. I am well persuaded, indeed, that you will draw upon yourself very powerful enemies, if you should put any slight upon a young nobleman of your questor's rank and interest. And a slight it will undoubtedly be, if you should not at your discretion commit the administration of the province to his hands, as there is no other person to whom you can trust it of superior quality. But, abstracted from all considerations of this kind, he has an unquestionable right, as your questor, to be preferred to any of your lieutenants, whose blameless and worthy conduct, however, I must at the same time in justice acknowledge. I am perfectly sensible that you have nothing to fear from the resentment of any man. I could wish, nevertheless, that you would not incur the displeasure, and especially with just reason, of three such distinguished persons as your questor and his brothers; for they are all of them men of some eloquence, as well as great spirit; to which I must add, that I am persuaded they will successively be tribunes of the people during the three next following years. Now who can tell what turn affairs may take? For my own part, I think there is much appearance of great commotions arising in the commonwealth. I should be sorry, therefore, that you should render yourself obnoxious to so formidable a power as the tribunitial; especially since you may easily avoid it without offending any person, by justly preferring your questor to your lieutenants. And should his conduct as your vicegerent in the province, prove worthy of his glorious ancestors, as I hope and believe, it will reflect, in some degree, an honour upon yourself. But, on the contrary, should be deviate from their illustrious examples, the whole discredit will fall singly upon his own character, without involving yours in any part of the reproach.

I am this moment setting out for Cilicia; so that I have only time to write these loose hints just as they occur. I thought it incumbent upon me, however, to send you my general sentiments of a point wherein your interest is so nearly concerned. May the gods give success to whatever you shall determine! But if my advice has any weight, you will avoid raising to yourself unnecessary enemies, and prudently consult your future repose. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

To C. Titius Rufus, Prætor.

Lucius Custidius is not only of the same tribe and corporation with myself, but is likewise my particular friend. As he has a cause which he purposes to bring before you, I recommend his interest to your protection, but so farther, however, than is consistent with your honour and my own good manners. All I request, therefore, is, that you would allow him freely to wait upon you as often as he shall have occasion; that you would comply with his desires as far as they shall appear equitable; and, in a word, that you would convince him that my friendship can effectually avail, even at this distance. Farewell.

\[2\] See rem. P. p. 427.

\[3\] Romulus divided his citizens into three tribes, each of which were subdivided into ten curiae, or wards; the wards being often increased, till they amounted to the number of thirty-five.

LETTER XVIII.

To Silius.

Will you not think that I am employed in a very unnecessary office, when I take upon me to recommend a man to your friendship who already, I know, enjoys that privilege? Let it be a proof, however, that I am with passion, as well as esteem, devoted to his interest. I most earnestly entreat you, then, to convince Egnatius, by the good effects which this letter shall produce in his favour, both of your affection for me, and of mine for him. And, be assured, your compliance with this request will be the most agreeable of all the many and great instances I have received of your disposition to oblige me.

The pleasing hopes I entertained of public affairs are now totally vanished. However, whilst we wish things were better, let us support ourselves with the trite consolation, that we must submit to what cannot be remedied. But this is a subject I will reserve to our meeting. In the mean time, continue to give me your friendship, and he well persuaded of mine. Farewell.

the privileges of Roman citizens. Cicero was a native of one of these corporations, called Arpinum, situated in a district of Italy which now makes part of the kingdom of Naples.

BOOK VI.

LETTER I.

To Appius Pulcher.

When I first received an account of the illjudged prosecution which has been commenced against you, it gave me great concern; and, indeed, nothing could possibly have happened that I less expected. But as soon as I had recovered from my surprise, I was well satisfied that you will easily disappoint the malice of your enemies: for I have the highest confidence in your own judicious conduct on this occasion, as well as a very great one in that of your friends. I see many reasons, indeed, to believe that the envy of your adversaries will only brighten that character they mean to sully: though I cannot but regret that they should have thus snatched from you an honour you so justly merit, and of which you had so well-grounded an assurance; the honour, I mean, of a triumph. However, you will show your judgment if you should consider this pompous distinction in the light it has ever appeared to my own view; and at the same time enjoy a triumph of the completest kind in the confusion and disappointment of your enemies: as I am well convinced that the vigorous and prudent exertion of your power and influence will give them abundant reason to repent of their violent proceedings. As for myself, I am well assured (and I call every god to witness the sincerity of what I promise) that I will exert my utmost interest in support—I will not say of your person, which I hope is in no danger,—but of your dignities and honour. To this end, I shall employ my best good offices for you in this province, where you once presided; and employ them with all the warmth of an intercessor, with all the assiduity of a relation, with all the influence of a man who, I trust, is dear to these cities, and with all the authority of one who is invested with the supreme command. In a word, I hope you will both ask and expect of me every service in my power: and believe me, I shall give you greater proofs of my affection than you are disposed perhaps to imagine. Notwithstanding, therefore, that the letter I received from you by the hands of Quintus Scrullius was extremely short, yet I could not but think it much too long: for it was doing an injury to the sentiments of my heart, to suppose you had any occasion to solicit my assistance. I am sorry you should have an opportunity of experiencing, by an incident so little agreeable to you, the rank you bear in my affection, the esteem which I entertain for Pompey, whom I justly value indeed above all men, and the measure of my unfeigned regard for Brutus: circumstances, I should hope, of which our daily intercourse had rendered you sufficiently sensible. However, since it has so happened, I should think that I acted a most unworthy, not to say a criminal part, if I were to omit any article wherein my services can avail you.

Pontinius remembers the singular instances of friendship he has received from you, and of which I myself was a witness, with all the gratitude and affection to which you have so undoubtedly a right. The urgency of his affairs had obliged him, though with great reluctance, to leave me. Nevertheless, having been informed, just as he was going to embark at Ephesus, that his presence in this province might be of advantage to your cause, he immediately returned back to Laodicea. I am persuaded you will meet with numberless such instances of zeal upon this occasion: can I doubt, then, that this troublesome affair will prove in the conclusion greatly to your credit?

You should have been careful to bring on an election of censors, and should exercise that office in the manner you certainly ought, and for which you are so perfectly well qualified, you can never want that authority in the republic which will afford at once a protection both to yourself and your friends.

Let me entreat, therefore, your most strenuous endeavours to prevent my administration from being prolonged; that, after having filled up the measure of my affectionate services to you here, I may have the satisfaction also of presenting them to you at Rome.

I read with pleasure, though by no means with surprise, the account you gave me of that general zeal which all orders and degrees of men have shown in your cause,—a circumstance of which I had likewise been informed by my other friends. It affords me great satisfaction to find, that a man with whom I have the honour and pleasure to be so intimately united is thus distinguished with that universal approbation he justly deserves. But I rejoice in this upon another consideration likewise; as it is a proof that there still remains a general disposition in Rome to support the cause of illustrious merit: a disposition which I have myself also experienced upon every occasion as the honourable recompense of my pains and vigils in the public service. But I am astonished that Dolabella, a young man whom I formerly rescued with the utmost difficulty from the consequences of two capital impeachments, should so ungratefully forget the patron to whom he owes all that he enjoys, as to be the author of this ill-considered prosecution of my friend. And what aggravates the folly of his conduct is, that he should thus venture to attack a man who is distinguished with the highest honours, and supported by the most powerful friendships; at the same time, that he himself (to speak of him in the softest terms) is greatly deficient in both these respects. I had received an account from our friend Cælius, before your letter reached my hand, of the idle and ridiculous report he has propagated, and on which you so largely expatiated. There is so little ground, however, for what he asserts, that I assured you I would much sooner have you break off all former friendship with a man who has declared himself so ungrateful, than be prevailed upon to engage with him in any new connexions.

4 Pontinius was proconsul in the consulate of Cicero, and at this time one of his lieutenants in the province. He distinguished himself in the affair of Catiline: and having quelled the insurrection of the Allobroges, who took up arms on that occasion, he demanded a triumph. But he met with so strong an opposition to this claim, and particularly from Cato, that it was four years before his petition was granted. Appius was at that time consul; by whose interest it chiefly was, that Pontinius length succeeded: and it is to this circumstance that Cicero seems to allude.—Liv. Epit. 103; Dio, xli.; Ad Att. lv. 16.

5 'tis an office of censors was the most honourable post in the Roman republic; though its authority was not so considerable as that of the consul. The two principal branches of his duty consisted in taking a general survey of the people, in order to range them in their proper classes; and in watching over the public manners. Appius, together with Plinius, whose daughter Cæsar had married, were chosen censors soon after the date of this letter; and they were the last (as Dr. Middleton observes) 'who bore that office during the freedom of the republic.' If the republic, indeed, could with any propriety be said to have enjoyed freedom at this period, when all was faction and miscarriage.—Rosan. de Antiq. Rom. 699; Life of Cicero, p. 165. See rem. 5, and the passage to which it refers, letter 16 of this book.
You have not the least reason to doubt of my zeal to serve you; of which I have given many conspicuous testimonies in this province as well as at Rome. Your letter, nevertheless, intimates some sort of suspicion of the contrary. It would be improper at this juncture to reproach you with indulging so injurious a thought; but it is necessary I should convince you that it is altogether without foundation. Tell me, then, wherein did I obstruct the deputation which was intended to be sent to Rome with the complimentary addresses to you of this province? Had I been less desirous of seeing you, my enemy, I could not have indulged my spleen by a more impotent piece of malice: and most certainly, if I had meant to act with a disguised malevolence, I could not have chosen an occasion that would have rendered my sentiments more notorious. Were I as perfidious as the authors of these unjust insinuations, yet surely I should not have been so weak either to discover my enmity where I designed to conceal it, or to show a strong inclination of injuring you by instances utterly insufficient. Remember, as I said before, in tenderness to your complaints were made to me concerning the excessive appointments allowed to the deputies from this province. In answer to which, I rather advised than directed that all expenses of this kind should be regulated by the Cornelian law. But far was I from insisting even upon this, as may appear by the public records of the several cities. For when they afterwards passed their accounts before me, I suffered them to charge to the article of their deputations whatever sum they thought proper. Yet what falsehoods have not these worthless informers imposed upon you? They have affirmed, it seems, not only that I absolutely prohibited all expenses of this kind, but even obliged the agents of those deputies, who were actually set forward in their way to Rome, to refund the appointments that were lodged in their hands; and by these means discouraged several others from undertaking the same commission. I might here, with great justice, condemn of your giving credit to these calumnies; but I forbear, remembering, as I said before, to your present disquietude, thinking it more proper, at this season, to vindicate my own conduct than to reproach yours. I will only, therefore, remind you of a few reasons that ought to have secured me against suffering in your opinion from these groundless imputations. If ever, then, you experienced the purity of my heart, or observed a disposition in me worthy of those sublime contemplations to which I have devoted myself from my earliest youth; if ever you discovered, by my conduct in the most important transactions, that I was neither void of spirit nor destitute of abilities, you ought to have believed me incapable of acting a low and little part towards my friends, much more a base book; he expresses himself in the following remarkable words: "Quid si meam (sc. quodigitam) legas, quum ego team ex ipsis litteris misi ad Appium? sed quid agas? sic virilis:" which in plain English amounts to this, that if a man would be well with the world, he must submit to the lowest and most contemptible hypocrisy. And it must be owned that Cicero, in the present instance, as well as in most others, acted up to the full extent of his maxim. — Ad Att. vi. 6; Ep. Fam. vili. 6; De Clar. Orator 1; Ep. Fam. ii. 13.

1 This law was enacted, it is probable, in order to restrain the immoderate sums which were expended in these complimental deputations.—Manutius.
entertain for the illustrious 1 father-in-law of your daughter? If personal obligations, indeed, can give him a title to these sentiments, do I not owe to Pompey the enjoyment of my country, my family, my dignities, and everything else so? If friendly relations may be supposed to have any effect, is there an instance amongst all our consuls of a more intimate union than his and mine? If confidence can create affection, what has he not committed to my care, or communicated to my secrecy? Whenever he was absent from Rome, was there any other man whom he preferred to be the advocate of his interest in the senate? And what honour is there which he has not endeavoured to gain, and to the most distinguished manner? In fine, with how much temper did he suffer my zeal in the cause of Milo, notwithstanding the latter had upon some occasions joined in the opposition to his measures? And how generously did he protect me by his counsel, his authority, and even his arms, from the insults and the dangers to which I exposed myself in that defence? And I cannot but here observe, that far from being displeased, as you justly may imagine he himself in this affair of the deputies, to listen to the little idle tales that might be propagated to my disadvantage by any paltry provincial, he nobly scorned to give attention to the malicious reports which were dealt about to my prejudice by the most considerable persons in Rome. 2 Upon the whole, then, as you are united not only by alliance, but by affection, to my illustrious friend, what are the sentiments, do you imagine, that I ought to bear towards you? The truth of it is, were I your professed enemy, as I am most sincerely the reverse, yet after the letter which I lately received from Pompey, I should think myself obliged to sacrifice my resentment to his request, and be wholly governed by the inclinations of a man to whom I am thus greatly indebted. But I have said enough, and perhaps more than was necessary, upon this subject: let me now, therefore, give you a detail both of what I have effected and am still attempting for your interest.

This, my friend, is what I have performed, or am endeavouring to perform, in support of your character, I will rather say, than in defence of your person. But I expect every day to hear that you are chosen censor: the duties of which office, as they require the highest fortitude and abilities to execute, so, I am sure, they far better deserve your attention than any services I am capable of rendering to you in this province. Farewell.

To Papirius Patus.

Your letter has rendered me a most complete general. I protest I did not imagine you were so wonderfully skilled in the art military. But I perceive you are an absolute adept, and deeply studied in the tactics of king Pyrrhus 3 and his minister Cicero. I have some thoughts, therefore, of following your most curious precepts, and indeed of improving upon them. For as I am assured that the best armament against the Parthian cavalry is a good fleet, I am designing to equip myself accordingly. Seriously, you cannot imagine what an expert commander you have undertaken to tutor: for after having worn out Xenophon's life of Cyrus with reading it at Rome, I have now fairly practised it in the province. But I hope I shall not joke with you in person. In the mean time, attend with submission due to my high behests. You are not ignorant, I suppose, of the particular intimacy that subsists between Marcus Fabius and myself. I value him, indeed, Pompey, that our author was privy to that design.-Oral. pro Milon. 24.

1 The particular instances of Cicero's services to Appius are omitted in the original; and, probably, were so by the first editor of these letters, as not being thought proper, perhaps, for public inspection.

2 Lucius Papirius Patus appears to have been a person of great wit and humour, and in close friendship with Cicero. "He was an Epicurean, and, in pursuance of the plan of life recommended by the principles of that sect, seems to have sacrificed his ambition to his ease. He had sent some military instructions by way of railing to Cicero, who returns an answer to this letter in the same jeconic manner."-Ross.

3 Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who flourished about 300 years before the date of this letter, was esteemed by the ancients as one of the greatest soldiers that ever appeared in the world. His whole thoughts and application were turned to the art of war: upon which subject he published some treatises, that were extant in Plutarch's time. Cicerone was one of the generals who commanded under this heroic prince; and who, as it should seem from this passage, had likewise distinguished himself by his military writings-Plut. in Vit. Pyrrhii.
extremely, not only for the singular integrity and modesty of his heart, but as he is a most excellent second to me in those contests wherein I am sometimes engaged with certain jovial Epicanum companions of yours. He lately joined me at Laodicea, where I am very desirous of detaining him: but he received an unexpected letter, which has given him great uneasiness. The purport of it is, that his brother has advertised his intentions of selling an estate at Herculanenum, in which they are both equally interested. The news exceedingly alarms my friend, and as his brother's understanding is not extremely strong, he is inclined to think he has been instigated by some of their common enemies, to take this very extraordinary measure. Let me then entreat you, my dear Petus, if you have any friendship for me, to ease Fabius of the trouble of this affair, by receiving the whole burden of it upon yourself. We shall have occasion for your authority, your advice, and your interest: and I hope you will assist them all, in order to prevent these two brothers from the disgrace of appearing as adversaries in a court of justice. I must not forget to tell you, that the persons whom Fabius suspects to be the malicious authors of this advice to his brother, are Mato and Pollio. To say all in one word, I shall think myself inexpressibly obliged, if you ease my friend of this troublesome affair; a favour, he persuades me, entirely in your power. Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Clatus Calicus 9, Quaaker elect.

When I received the very acceptable news of your being elected my quaaker, I was well persuaded that the longer you continued with me in this province, the more I should have occasion to be satisfied with that choice. It is of importance to the public relation which has thus arisen between us that it should be improved by a nearer intercourse. But, having received no account, either from yourself or any other of my friends, of your being set forward on your way hither, I began to be apprehensive (what I still fear) that I should leave this province before your arrival. I was favoured, 'tis true, with a most obliging and polite letter from you, on the 22d of June, whilst I was encamped in Herculaneum; and it afforded me a very pleasing instance both of your abilities and friendly disposition. But it was without any date, nor did it mention when I might expect you. The person, likewise, that delivered it, not having received it immediately from your own hands, could give me no information either when or from what place it was written. Nevertheless, I thought proper to despatch my couriers and lictors with this express; and if it reaches you time enough, you will greatly oblige me by meeting me in Cilicia as soon as possible.

The strong letters I received in your behalf, from your relations, Curio and Virgilius, had all the influence which is due to the recommendations of such very intimate and very worthy friends; but your own letter had still a greater. Believe me, there is no man whom I should have rather wished for my quaaker; and I shall endeavour to show the world, by distinguishing you with every honour in my power, that I pay all the regard which is so justly due to your own personal merit, as well as to that of your illustrious ancestors. But this I shall the more easily be enabled to effect, if you should meet me in Cilicia: a circumstance in which not only the public interest and mine, but particularly your own, is, I think, nearly concerned. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Marcus Calibus, Curule-Aedile.

I am extremely anxious concerning affairs at Rome, as I hear there have been great disturbances in the general assemblies of the people; and that the festival of Minerva 1 was celebrated in a most riotous manner. But my intelligence goes no lower than that period, and I am altogether uninformed of anything which has since passed. Yet nothing mortifies me more than being prevented the pleasure of laughing with you at several ridiculous incidents which attended, I am told, these public tumults; but they are of such a delicate nature, that I dare not mention them in a letter. I am a good deal uneasy, likewise, at not having received any account of these commotions from yourself. For which reason, notwithstanding I shall be set out for Italy before this reaches your hand, yet I hope I shall meet a letter from you upon the road, that I may not arrive an utter stranger to the state of public affairs; as I am sure no man is more capable of instructing me concerning them than yourself.

Your agent, the worthy Diogenes, together with your freedman Philo 2, parted from me at Pusovus 3, in order to proceed on your journey to the king of Galatia 4; though with little hopes of succeeding at a court neither very able nor very willing to comply with the purposes of their embassy.

Rome, my friend, Rome alone, is the object that

9 The famous city near Naples, which was swallowed up by an earthquake in the reign of Vespasian; and which is now furnishing the literary world with so many invaluable treasures of antiquity.

10 He was a young man of a noble family, and this seems to have been the cause of his merit. For, notwithstanding Cicero addresses him in this letter, as one of whose talents and virtues he had conceived a favourable opinion, it is certain his real sentiments of him were far different. This appears from an epistle to Atticus, where both the morals and understanding of Calinus are mentioned in terms greatly to his disadvantage. "Nos provinciae prae- fidimus Calidum: quorum inquies, et fortasse fatum, et non graven, et non continentem. Assentior: fort non possum alter,"—Ad Att. vi. 6. See the 15th letter of this book.

5 Calibus mentions these persons in a former letter, as being employed by him to execute some commission in this part of the world; but the nature of the business with which they were charged, does not appear.—Ep. Fam. viii. 8.

merits your attention; and may you ever live within the splendour of that illustrious scene! All foreign employments (and it was my sentiments from my first entrance into the world) are below the ambition of those who have talents to distinguish themselves on that more conspicuous theatre. And would to God, as I was ever well convinced of this truth, that I had always acted accordingly! Be assured, the pleasure of a single walk with you would afford me more satisfaction than all the advantages I can derive from my government. I hope, indeed, I shall receive the applause of having conducted myself throughout my administration with an untainted integrity; however, I should have merited as much honour by refusing the government of this province, as by having thus preserved it from the hands of our enemies. "But where, then," you will ask, perhaps, "had been the hopes of a triumph?" Believe me, I should have deemed that loss well compensated by escaping so long and so tedious a separation from all that I hold most valuable. But I hope I shall now soon be with you. In the mean time, let me meet a letter from you, worthy of your political penetration. Farewell.

LETTER V.

To Appius Pulcher.

Whilst I lay encamped on the banks of the Pyramids, I received two letters from you, and both at the same time, which Quintus Servilius forwarded to me from Tarsus. One of them was dated on the 9th of April, but the other, which seemed to have been written later, was without any date. I will answer the former, therefore, in the first place, wherein you give me an account of your having been acquitted of the impeachment exhibited against you for mal-administration in this province. I had before been apprised of many circumstances of this event by various letters and expresses as well as by general report; as, indeed, there never was any occurrence more particularly known. Not that it was in the least unexpected, but because the world is usually very minute in its accounts of all that concerns the honour of so distinguished a character. But, not withstanding your letter was thus in some measure anticipated, yet it heightened my satisfaction to receive the same good news from your own hand. My information was by this means not only more full than what I had learned from common fame, but it brought you nearer to my imagination, and rendered you in some sort present to those sentiments of joy which arose upon this occasion in my heart. Accordingly, I embraced you in my thoughts, and kisst the letter that gave me so much reason to rejoice, upon my own account, as well as upon yours. I say upon my own account, because I look upon those honours which are thus paid by the general voice of my country, to virtue, industry, and genius, as paid to myself; being too much disposed, perhaps, to imagine that there are no qualifications to which my own character is no stranger. But though I am by no means surprised that this trial should have ended so much to your credit, yet I cannot forbear being astonished at that mesmeric and unworthy spirit which induced your enemies to engage in this prosecution.

But you will tell me, perhaps, that I am premature in my congratulations; for, while there is a charge still subsisting against you, what imports it, you possibly ask, of which impeachment you are first acquitted? And I must confess it is a point of no consequence with respect to your character; for you are not only perfectly innocent of both accusations, but are so far from having committed any action injurious to the honour of the republic, that you have greatly contributed to raise and extend its glory. However, there is this advantage gained by your present victory, that the principal difficulty of the whole contest is now over. For, by the terms in which Sulla's law is drawn up concerning offences against the state, and upon which your first prosecution was founded, it is easy for any man to give a colour to the most groundless charge. Whereas an information of bribery turns upon a fact in its own nature notorious, as no man can be guilty of this crime unobserved by the public; and consequently either the prosecutor, or the person accused, must evidently, and beyond all power of artifice, appear infamous. But who ever entertained even the slightest suspicions of your having obtained the high dignities through which you have passed by illegal methods? How do I regret that I could not be present at these prosecutions, that I might have exposed them to all the ridicule they so justly deserve!

You mentioned two circumstances which attended your trial that afforded me particular satisfaction. The one is, that general zeal which was expressed by the whole republic in your behalf; the other, that generous and friendly part which both Pompey and Brutus have acted towards you in this conjunc-

* It may be unnecessary, perhaps, to remind the reader that this alludes to Dolabella, whose friendship and alliance Cicero was at this time courting.

+ Cicero himself will furnish the most proper comment upon this passage. For, in a letter to Atticus, written out many months before the present, he describes the conduct of Appius in Cilicia, in terms which show that he was far from being unjustly arraigned by Dolabella. He represents him as having spread desolation through the province by fire and sword; as having left nothing behind him which he could possibly carry away, and as having suffered his officers to commit all kinds of violeces which lust and avarice could suggest. "And I am going," says he, "this very morning to repeat several of his iniquious edicts." Appius, cum et deproceret provinciam curris, saugnerem miserit, quidquid potuit detraheret, nihil tradiderit eam, &c. -Quid dicam de illius praefectis, equitibus, legatis? tamen de rapibus, de libidinis & de contumelias-! Eo ipse dies, quo hac ante lucem scribam, cogitabam ejus multa iniqua constituta et acta tolleret. It is pleasant to observe, upon some occasions, the different colours in which the same character is painted by different hands: but one has not so frequently the opportunity of hearing the same conduct thus abused and thus applauded by the same man, and almost, too, in the same breath.--Ad Att. vi. 1.
tire. With regard to the first, it would undoubtedly have been the interest of the commonwealth, even in the most flourishing periods of heroic virtue, to have distinguished a citizen of your exalted merit; but it is more especially so in the present age, when there are so few of the same patriotic character to whom she can look up for protection. And as to the latter, I sincerely rejoice that your two relations, and my very particular friends, have thus warmly and zealously exerted themselves in your cause. The truth of it is, I look upon Pomp- ey as perhaps the only considerable man that any age or nation has ever produced: and Bratus, I am persuaded, will soon rise to the same honourable pre- eminence above his fellow-citizens in general, which now distinguishes him among our youth in particu- lar.

With regard to those witnesses who were subpoenaed to give evidence against you, it shall be my care, when I pass through Asia (if Flaccus has not already prevented me) to bring them to condign punish- ment. And now let me turn to your second letter.

I received great pleasure from the judicious sketch you communicated to me of public affairs. It appears that the dangers of the commonwealth are much less considerable, as well as her resources much more powerful, than I imagined, since the principal strength of Rome is united (as you inform me) under Pompey. It afforded me much satisfaction, at the same time, to remark that spirit of patriotism which animates your letter; and I am infinitely obliged to you, likewise, that you should suspend your own more important occu- pations, in order to teach me what judgment to form of our political situation. As to your treatise upon Augury*, I beg you would reserve it to a season when we shall both of us be more disengag- ed. When I reminded you of that design, I

* In the last remark I took occasion to contrast Cicero with himself, in respect to his sentiments and his profes- sions of public virtue. The present passage affords an opportuni- ty of showing him in the same opposition with regard to Pompey. The author, then, of this encomium, has else- where said of the hero of his present panegyric, that "he was artful and ungentle in his common intercourse; and as to his public appearances, that was a void and nothing, everything great or disinterested, and utterly unworthy of a man who meant well to the liberty of his country." "Nie ille, nihil simplex, nihil et tois politero hominem, nihil filiae, nihil forte, nihil librum." This character, 'tis true, was drawn several years before the date of the present letter; and different sentiments of the same man, at different times, are perfectly reconcilable, no doubt, with truth and sincerity. But there is extant a letter to Atticus, written after this to Appius, and at the distance too of not many months, wherein Cicero expresses the same contemptible opinion of Pompey. "Ego hominem damnativum (says he) omnium jam ante cungramus, nec vero etiam damnativum." And, in another still more recent letter to Atticus, he assures, that Pomp- ey's political conduct had been full of mistakes during the last ten years; "Et enim alia decem annorum pen- catis omnibus, &c." The truth of it is, Cicero seldom con- tinues long in the same sentiments, or at least the same language, of Pompey; and if he raises a trophy to his fame in one letter, we may be almost sure of seeing it reversed in another. If our author's judgment and penetration were less unquestionable, these variations from himself might be imputed to a more favourable cause than can now, perhaps, be reasonably assigned.—Ad Att. i. 13; viii. 16; vi. 18.

Imagined you were wholly unemployed and waiting in the suburbs of Rome the determination of your petition*. But I shall now expect your orations in its stead; and hope, agreeably to your promise, that you will send me such of those performances as have received your last hand.

Tullus, whom you charged, it seems, with a commission to me, is not yet arrived; nor have I any other of your friends with me except those of my own train, every one of whom I may with strict propriety call yours.

I do not well know what particular letters you mean by those which you call my angry ones. I have written twice, 'tis true, in order fully to justify myself against your suspicions, as well as tenderly to reprove you, for too hastily crediting reports to my disadvantage; and I thought I acted in this agreeably to the strictest friendship; but since you seem to be displeased with what I said, I shall not take the same liberty for the future. However, if these letters were not, as you tell me, marked with my usual vein of eloquence, I desire you would consider them as none of mine. For, as Aristarchus* insisted that every verse in Homer was spurious which he did not approve, I desire you would in the same manner look upon every line which you think unmetrical, as not the produce of my pen. You see I am in a humour to be jocose. Farewell: and if you are (as I sincerely hope) in the possession of the censorial office, reflect often on the virtues of your illustrious ancestors.

LETTER VI.

From Marcus Calius.

We met with a difficulty that greatly embarrassed our scheme for procuring you a thanksgiving; but

A. D. 703.

a difficulty, however, which we were not long in surmounting. For Curio, notwith- standing he is much in your interest, declared that, as all his attempts for convening a general assembly of the people had been obstructed*, he

* For a triumph.

Apullus maintained some rank in the republic as an orator, and was well skilled likewise in the laws and anti- quities of his country. The orations which Cicero inquires after were probably those which Appius spoke in defence of himself on these trials.—De Clar. Orat. 297.

F A celebrated critic, who flourished at Alexandria 176 years before Christ. He is said to have left two sons behind him, both of them fools; but they will not, perhaps, be thought to have degenerated very greatly from their father, if what is reported of him be true, that he wrote above a thousand commentaries upon different authors. Miros si tam multis superacens legisset?

F The commentators suppose that Cicero alludes to Appius Claudius Cæsus, who was censor in the year of Rome 442. He distinguished himself in his office by two works of great utility to the public; for he made that famous road called the Via Appia, part of which subsists to this day, and was the first, likewise, that supplied the city of Rome with water, by conveying the river Anio through an aqueduct of eleven miles in length.—Liv. ix. 29.

Paulus, one of the present consuls, not having yet sacrificed his integrity to his interest, very warily opposed the attempts of Curio, who was endeavouring to procure certain laws from the people in favour of Caesar's present designs. Curio, in revenge, would not suffer any business to proceed in the senate—a power with which he was invested as tribune of the people. would by no means suffer the senate to pass any decree of the kind in question. If he were to deposit the bill, as he said, from this resolution, it would look like a yielding; but the advantage he had gained by the indiscreet zeal of the consul Paulus, and he should be considered as deserting the cause of the public. In order, therefore, effectually to remove this objection, we entered into an agreement with him, that if he would suffer the decree for your Thanksgiving to pass, no other thanksgiving should be proclaimed during the remainder of this year; to which he assented likewise. Your acknowledgments are accordingly due to them both, but particularly to Paulus; for he came wholly and readily into our proposal in the most obliging manner; whereas Marcellus somewhat lessened the merit of his compliance, by telling us that 'the affair of these thanksgivings was an article upon which he laid no sort of stress.' After having thus adjusted matters with Curio, we were informed that Hirrus intended to defeat our measures, by lengthening out the debates, when the question should come before the senate. Our next business, therefore, was to make our applications on that side, which we so successfully did, that we not only prevailed with him to drop this design, but when the question was moved concerning the number of the enemy's forces, and he might easily have prevented the decree, by requiring a list of the slain, he sat entirely silent. Indeed, the single opposition he gave to us was by voting with Cato, who, though he would not assent to this motion, spoke of your conduct, however, in very honourable terms. I must not forget to mention Favonius, likewise, as a third in this party. You will distribute your thanks, therefore, as they are respectively due—to the three last, for not preventing this decree, when it was both in their inclination and their power to have done so; and to Curio, for making an exception in your favour to the general rule he had laid down to himself. Furnius and Lentulus laboured in this affair, as they ought, with as much zeal as if it had been their own, and went about with me in all my applications to solicit votes. It is but justice to Balbus Cornelius, who did me too much of the catalogue of your active friends. He exerted himself, in this cause, with great spirit in gaining over Curio: to whom he warmly remonstrated, that if he continued to obstruct the senate in this article, it would affect the interest of Caesar, and consequently render his own sincerity suspect. Among those who voted in your favour, there were some that in their hearts, nevertheless, were by no means well-wishers to the measure. In this number were the Domitii and the Scipios: in allusion to which Curio made them a very smart reply, when they affected to be extremely importunate with him to withdraw his protest. 'I am the more inclined,' said he, 'to do so, as I am sure it would be a terrible disappoint- ment to some who have voted on the other side.' As to the political affairs, the efforts of all parties are at present directed to a single point; and the general contest still is in relation to the provinces. Pompey seems to unite in earnest with the senate, that the 13th of November may be limited for Caesar's resigning his government. Curio, on the contrary, is determined to oppose this to the utmost, and accordingly has reenlivened all his other schemes, in order to apply his whole strength to the affair in question. As to our party, you well know their irresolution, and consequently they readily believe me when I tell you they have not the spirit to push their opposition to the last extremity. The whole mystery of the scene, in short, is this: Pompey, that he may not seem to oppose Caesar, or to aim at anything but what the latter shall think perfectly equitable, represents Curio as acting in this affair merely upon his own authority, and with no other view than to create disturbances. It is certain, at the same time, that Pompey is much averse to Caesar's being elected consul, before he shall have delivered up his government, together with the command of the army; and indeed he seems to be extremely apprehensive of the consequences, if it should prove otherwise. In the meanwhile, he is severely attacked by Curio, who is perpetually reproaching him with deviating from the principles upon which he acted in his second consulship. Take my word for it, notwithstanding all the difficulties they may throw in Curio's way, Caesar will never want a friend to rise up in his cause: and if the whole turns, as they seem to fear, upon his procuring some tribune to attend his senate, I cannot but think that he will not longer be contended with a second consulship. In this manner I have viewed the state of the public affairs in this year; but I am not without hopes that we may soon learn new events, which will remove many difficulties, and open a way to our plans.

\[\text{a} \text{ The commencement of Caesar's government in Gaul cannot be dated higher than the year of Rome 665;} \text{ for it is unanimously agreed by all the ancient historians, that he was consul in the year 694. This government was at first very licentious, and divided into four years;} \text{ but by an ingenious and continued contract, they fixed it for five more. Agreeably to this computation, therefore,} \]

\[\text{the legal period of his administration could not expire till the year 705, yet Cicero, in a letter to Atticus, written in the very beginning of the year 706, speaks of it as absolutely completed. Caesar, on the contrary, in this harangue, which he made to his army, just before his march into Italy, in the commencement of the same year, expressly says, that they had served under him nine years; and it appears, by what he mentions soon after, that he wanted six months to complete his second consulship when he was recalled from his government. The historians, likewise, are neither agreed with themselves, nor with each other, in their account of the continuance of Caesar's administration in Gaul. For some entitulate it nine years, and in another ten; whereas, Dion Cassius expressly says it was but eight. As the decision of this difficulty would prove very little entertaining to the generosity of English readers, it is only marked out for the consideration of those who may think the solution of their inquiry.—Ad Att. viii. 9; Ces. De Bell. Civil. i. 7; 9; Suet. In Vit. Jul. Ces. 25, 69; Dio, xliv. p. 583.} \]

\[\text{b} \text{ This party was what they called the optimates, and which, in modern language, might be termed the 'country party.' They wanted not only spirit, but unanimity, to act to any effectual purpose: 'non enim boni, ut patiens, consentiunt,' says Cicero, in a letter to Atticus, vii. 5.} \] interpose his negative to their decrees, I will venture to pronounce that he may remain in Gaul as long as he shall think proper.

You will find the several opinions of the senators in relation to this affair, in the newspaper which I herewith send to you. I leave you to select such articles as you may think worthy of notice; for though I have omitted all the idle stories of such a man being hissed at the public games, of another being buried with great funeral pomp, together with various impertinences of the same uninteresting kind; it still abounds with many paragraphs of little moment. However, I chose to err on the right side, and had rather hazard informing you of what you may not, perhaps, desire to hear, than pass over anything material.

I am glad to find that your care has not been wanting to procure me satisfaction from Sittius; and since you suspect that affair is not in very safe hands, I entreat you to take it altogether into your own. Farewell.

LETTER VII.

To Caninius Sallustius, Propugnator.

Your courier delivered both your letters to me at Taurus, on the seventeenth of July, which I will answer, as you seem to desire, according to their respective dates.

I have heard no news of my successor; and indeed I am inclined to believe that none will be appointed. Nevertheless, I see no occasion for my continuance in this province after the expiration of my year, especially now that all our fears are over with respect to the Parthians. I do not propose to stay at any place in my return; though, perhaps, I may visit Rhodes, in order to show that city to my son and nephew; but of this I am not yet determined. The truth is, I am desirous of reaching Rome as soon as possible: however, I shall regulate my journey according to the posture of public affairs. But I am afraid it will be impossible for your successor to be so expeditious, as to give you an opportunity of joining me in Asia.

As to what you mention concerning your account of my nephew, I cannot but believe, to make use of the designation which Bibulus, it seems, is willing to grant. But I think you can scarce neglect delivering them in, without violating the Julian law; and though Bibulus may have his particular reasons for not paying obedience to that ordinance, I cannot but strongly advise your observing its injunctions.

I find you agree with some of my friends in thinking that I ought not to have drawn the troops out of Armenia; and I am sorry I should have given occasion by that step to the malicious censures of my enemies. But you are singular in doubting whether the Parthians had at that time actually repassed the Euphrates. It was in full confidence of a fact so universally confirmed, that I evacuated the several garrisons of those brave and numerous troops with which I had filled them.

It is by no means reasonable that I should transmit my questor's accounts to you; nor indeed are they yet settled. I intend, however, to deposit a copy of them at Apamea. In answer to what you mention concerning the booty we took from the Parthians in this war, let me assure you that no man shall touch any part of it, except the city questors on behalf of the public. I purpose to leave the money at Laodicea which shall arise from the sale of those spoils, and to take security for its being paid in Rome, in order to avoid the hazard both to myself and the commonwealth, of conveying it in specie. As to your request concerning the 100,000 drachmas, it is not in my power to comply with it. For the chests of money taken in war fall under the direction of the praefectus, in the same manner as all other plunder; and the particular share that belongs to myself is in the hands of the questor. In return to your question, What my thoughts are concerning the legions which have received orders to march into Syria,—I always doubted of their arrival; but I am now fully persuaded, if it should be known at Rome that everything is quiet in your province, before those forces enter Syria, that they will certainly be countermanded. And as the senate has appointed your successor, Marius; to conduct those troops, I imagine it will be a considerable time before you see him. Thus far in reply to your first letter: I am now to take notice of your second.

I want no inclination to recommend you, as you desire, in the strongest manner to Bibulus. But I must take this opportunity of inquiring how you have accounted me of the ill, though unmerited, terms on which I stand with him. You are indeed the only one of my friends among his officers who omitted to inform me that when the city of Antiochus was in a general

4 It was usual with the populace, when any person, who had incurred their displeasure, entered the places of public entertainments, to express their resentments by a general hiss. An instance of this kind, which happened with regard to the celebrated Hortalamus, is mentioned in the 29th letter of the third book.

5 Nothing more is known of this person than what may be collected from the present letter; by which it appears, that he was questor to Bibulus in Syria.

6 That period was now within a few days of expiring; for the letter before we could not have been written sooner that the day on which the events occurred ended on the last day of the same month, computing it from the time he entered his province.—Ep. Fam. xiv. 2.

"The island of Rhodes is situated in the Mediterranean, not far from the coast of Libya and Caria. It had a city of the same name, which was at this time much celebrated and requisite to, on account of its schools of eloquence and philosophy. Cicero himself, in the course of his travels, resided some time here, and applied himself to the study of oratory under the direction of Molo, who was both an experienced pleader and fine writer."—Bos. 457

7 Julius Caesar procured a law in his first consulate, by which it was enacted that the several magistrates in the provinces should deposit a copy of their respective accounts in the two principal cities of their government.—Pigh. Annal. i. 39.

8 Bibulus, in the year of Rome 694, was elected joint consul with Cesar, by whom he was treated with great contempt and indignity for endeavouring to withstand the violent measures of the administration. [See Note 4, p. 397.] It is probable, therefore, that Bibulus, in resentment of these injuries, refused to acknowledge the validity of the law mentioned in the preceding note: as not having been passed, perhaps, with all the necessary formalities.

10 Notwithstanding Cicero represents the disgust which Bibulus had conceived against him to have been altogether without foundation, yet (as Cicero truly observes upon this passage) it had a great reason to be offended: for Cicero had been a principal promoter of steration from the late invasion of the Parthians (and their great hopes depended upon me and my army), that Bibulus often declared he would suffer the last extremity rather than be obliged to my assistance. However, I was not offended at your silence, as I imputed it to that particular and powerful connexion in which you stood related to him as his questor, though I was not ignorant, at the same time, of the manner in which he treated you. But his unfriendly disposition appeared likewise in another instance; for though he despatched a courier to Thermus with an account of the interruption of the Parthians, he did not think proper to communicate any intelligence of that kind to me, notwithstanding he well knew that I was particularly concerned in the consequence of that invasion. The single letter I received from him was to desire my interest when his son was soliciting the office of augur; to which, in compliance with those sentiments I ever bore towards him, and in tenderness to the affliction under which he then laboured, I deploured to return my civil and friendly answer I was capable. If this behaviour proceeded from a general moroseness of temper (which I confess I never took to be his disposition) I have the less reason to complain; but if it arose from any particular coolness to myself, my recommendations can nothing avail you. I am inclined to suspect the latter, from the whole tenor of his conduct towards me. For in his late despatches to the senate, he is pleased to usurp the entire credit of an affair in which I was jointly concerned with him: and assures that venerable assembly that "he had taken proper care to settle the exchange in such a manner as would be most advantageous to the public." He mentions, at the same time, as his own act, what was solely and absolutely mine; and says, that "in order to ease the people of the burden of maintaining the Lombard troops, he forbore to demand them." On the other hand, he thought proper to give me part in an action which belongs altogether to himself, and names me in the letter I am speaking of as "joining in his application for a larger allowance of corn for the use of the auxiliary troops." To point out another instance, also, which betrays the meanest and most contemptible mevolence:—Ariobarzanes having been particularly recommended by the senate to my protection, and it being by my means they were prevailed upon to acknowledge his regal title, Bibulus constantly speaks of him, throughout his letter, under the degrading appellation of "the son of the late king." My recommendation, therefore, to a person thus ill-disposed towards me, would only render him so much the more disinclined to serve you.

Nevertheless I herewith enclose a letter which I have written to him in compliance with your request, and I leave it to your own discretion to make what use of it you shall think proper.

Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

Marcus Cælius to Cicero.

I congratulate you on your alliance* with so worthy a man as Dolabella; for such I sincerely think him. His former conduct, it is true, has not been altogether for his own advantage. But time has now worn out those little indiscretions of his youth: at least, if any of them should still remain, the authority and advantage of your advice and friendship, together with the good sense of Tullia, will soon, I am confident, reclaim him. He is by no means, indeed, obstinate in his errors; and it is not from any incapacity of discerning better, whenever he deviates from the right path. To say all in one word, I infinitely love him.

Do you know, my dear Cicero, what a victory Curio has lately obtained? He treated the province, in pursuance of a former order, having assembled to consider of the obstruction which some of the tribunes had given to their decree; Marcus Marcellus moved, that application might be made to those magistrates to withdraw their protest: but it was carried in the negative by a considerable majority. Pompey is at present in such delicate circumstances, that he will scarcely find any measures, I believe, perfectly to his satisfaction. The senate, however, seem to intend, by the resolution I just now mentioned, that Cæsar shall be admitted as a candidate for the consulship, notwithstanding he should refuse to resign his government. What effect this may have upon Pompey you shall know as soon as I can discover. In the mean time, it imports you wealthy veterans to consider what methods to pursue, in case the latter should appear either unable or unwilling to support the republic.

* See rem. 8 on the first letter of this book.

A This decree, together with the protest of the tribunes here mentioned, is inserted at large in the 7th letter of the 4th book.

C Cicero speaks of this resolution in a letter to Atticus, and produces it as a proof that the intentions of the senate were not true to the interest of the commons. For had the motion of Marcellus been vigorously supported, Curio's opposition, he says, would have been vain, and Cæsars must necessarily have resigned his command.—Ad Att. v. 7.

F There is evidently some error in the Latin text: which runs thus, "Quœmmodum hoc latores Pompeius sit, cum cognoscat, quidnam repulscere futurum sit, si aut non curen, vos unius, sec." I have ventured, though unsupported by any of the manuscripts or commentators, to read this passage in the following manner: "Quœmmodum hoc Pompeius latores sit, cum cognoscam, te extremam faciam. Quidnam repulscere futurum sit, si aut non possit, aut non curen, vos," sec. 6

Hortensius would have been considered as the noblest orator that ever shone in the Roman forum, if Cicero had not risen with superior lustre. There was a peculiar eloquence in his manner, as well as in his expression: and it was difficult to determine whether his audience beheld the grace of his action, or listened to the charms of his rhetoric, with greater admiration and pleasure. Cicero often celebrates him for the prodigious strength of his
LETTER IX.

To Appius Pulcher.

That I may answer your letter in due form, let me pay my congratulations to you in the first place, and then turn to what concerns myself. Be assured the account you gave me concerning the event of your trial on the information for bribery, afforded me great pleasure. Not because you were acquitted, for I never entertained the least doubt of the contrary, but to find that there was not a single judge who dared throw in a negative upon your innocence, even under all the secrecy and safety which the method of balloting would have secured to his malice. This is a circumstance altogether extraordinary: a circumstance, indeed, so little agreeable to the general principles and purposes of the present depraved generation, that the more I reflect on your high rank, on your public and private services, and on the distinguished honours to which they have exalted you, the more I consider it with astonishment. I can truly say, no occurrence has happened for a considerable time that surprised me more. And now, let me entreat you to imagine yourself, for a moment, in my situation with respect to the affair you mentioned; and, if you should then find that you are under no difficulties, I will not desire you to excuse mine. You will allow me to join in your own good-natured wishes that an alliance which was conducted without my knowledge, may prove happy both to me and to my daughter. I will venture to hope, too, that something may be derived not altogether unfavourable to my wishes, even from the particular conjecture wherein this transaction has happened; though I must add, that nothing encourages me in this hope so much as the sentiments I entertain of your candour and good sense. What farther to say I know not. On the one hand, you would not have me to suppose with more despondency of an affair to which you have kindly given your favourable presages; on the other, there are some lights in which I cannot view it without uneasiness. I am apprehensive, indeed, lest you should not be sufficiently persuaded that this treaty was managed without my privy; as, in truth, it was by some of my friends, to whom I gave a general commission to act in my absence as they should judge proper, without referring themselves at this great distance to me. But, if you ask what measures I would have taken had I been present, I will freely own I should have approved of the match, though, as to the time of consummating it, I should certainly have done nothing either without your advice or contrary to your inclination.

You have already discovered, I dare say, how terribly I am perplexed between apologising for a step which I am obliged to defend, and avoiding, at the same time, saying anything that may give you offence. Have an unquenchable, therefore, I beseech you, as to ease me of this embarrassment; for, in fair truth, I never pleaded a more difficult cause. Of this, however, be well persuaded, that, had I not, ere I was informed of this alliance, completed my good offices in your service, it would have induced me to defend your reputation, not, indeed, with more zeal, (for that would have been impossible,) but certainly with so much, the more conspicuous and significant testimonies of my friendship.

The first notice that was given me of this marriage, was by a letter which I received on the 3rd of August upon my arrival at Sida; at which city I touched in my voyage from the province. Your friend Servilius, who was then with me, seemed a good deal concerned at the news; but I assured him that the only effect it would have, with respect to myself, would be to give an additional strength to my future services in your behalf. To be short, though it cannot increase my affection for you, it has increased my endeavours of rendering that affection more evident: and as our former disunion made me so much the more cautious to avoid affording the least suspicion that my reconcilement with you was not thoroughly sincere, so this alliance will heighten my care not to give the world reason to think that it has in any degree impaired the strength of that perfect friendship I bear you. Farewell.

"Praise from thy lips 'tis mine with pride to boast: He best can give it who deserves it most."

2 Cleor had surely forgotten what he said to Appius in a former letter. For taking notice of the report which Dolabella had spread concerning this match, he affirms there was so little of truth in it, that he would much sooner reconcile all former correspondences with Dolabella, than enter into a new connexion with a man who had declared himself the enemy of Appius. "Ego citius cum eo, qui tuae inimicitias susciptisse, veterem congregationem disuensisse, quam novam conciliassisse."—Ep. Pam. iii. 10. THE LETTERS OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO

To Caius Marcellus, Consul.

I AM informed, by the letters of all my friends, that, indeed, I was sufficiently sensible of the effects, that you have exerted the same generous zeal in promoting my honours; now that you are consul, which you always discovered, in conjunction with your whole family, in every preceding station of your life. There is no good office, therefore, which you have not a full right to claim at my hands, as there is none which I shall not at all times be most warmly and joyfully ready to return. It is a point of much importance from whom one receives an obligation; but, believe me, there is not a man in the world I would rather choose he obliged to you than yourself. For, not to mention that I have been attached to you by a multitude of studies, and by the many generous services I have received both from yourself and your father; there is an additional inducement which, in my estimation, is, of all others, the most engaging; I mean the manner in which you act, and have ever acted, in the administration of public affairs. As nothing, then, is more dear to me than the commonwealth, can I scruple to be as much indebted to you in my own particular, as I am in common with every friend to the republic? And may your patriotic labours be attended, as I trust they will, with all the success they deserve.

If the Etesian winds, which usually begin to blow about this season of the year, should not retard my voyage, I hope to see you very speedily. Farewell.

LETTER XII.

To Appius Pulcher.

When the question concerning the military honours to be paid to your arms was formerly debated in the senate, I supported the cause of your glory with as much warmth and zeal as if I had foreseen that I should one day have occasion to use your good offices of the same kind to myself. Truth obliges me, however, to acknowledge that you have returned much more than you received. All my letters, indeed, from Rome agree in assuring me that you not only supported my interest by the authority of your eloquence, and the credit of your vote, (which was as much as I could in reason desire from a man of

Cicero was at this time well pleased with the part which Cato had acted towards him: for he told Atticus, what he likewise says in this letter, that "he looked upon the applause which the former had conferred upon him, in the senate, as preferable to all the triumphs in the world." But he seems changed his language: and, in his subsequent letters to Atticus, he expresses himself with great warmth and indignation against Cato's behaviour in this very article. Cato, it seems, had granted to Bibulus what he refused to Cicero, and voted that a general thanksgiving should be appointed, for the success of the former in Syria. This was a preference which Cicero could not digest, and he complains of it to Atticus in terms to the following purpose. "Cato, says he, is given me his applause, which I did not derive, but refused me his suffrage, though I earnestly requested it. Yet this ungrateful man has voted that a thanksgiving shall be appointed for twenty years, in honour of Bibulus. Pardon me for saying it; but I neither can nor will forgive so injurious a treatment." Cicero ascribes this conduct of Cato to envy; and this ingenious translator, Monstre Mon- guault, imputes it to partiality. On the contrary, I am persuaded it flowed neither from this nor the other, but was the pure result of that impartial justice which seems upon all occurrences to have invariably determined his actions. For Cicero had undoubtedly no claim to the honour he demanded: and for this reason, among others, because the number of the slain on the side of the enemy was not so great as the laws in these cases required. [Ep. Fam. viii. 11.] But it is probable that the claim of Bibulus was supported by all the legal requisites. For though the Parthians were driven out of Syria before his arrival in the province; yet Cassius, by whose bravery they were repulsed, acted under the auspices of Bibulus: sub ejus auspicio rer gesta erant, as they expressed it. Now the success of the lieutenant, without the subordinate officer, was always imputed to the general, notwithstanding he were not actually present; as being supposed to arise from the effect of these auspicia, or sacred rites, which he previously performed ere he set out on his intended expedi- tion.—Adv. Att. vii. 1, 2, 3; Resid. Antiq. Rom. 939.

letter, but by having signed the decree that has passed in my favour; for decrees of this kind, I know, are usually subscribed by those who are most in the interest of the person to whose honour they are voted. I will only add, that I hope to see your very shortly; and may I find the republic in a happier situation than I have reason to fear! Farewell.
your rank and character,) but that, by contributing your advice, by assisting at the meetings which were held upon my account, by your personal applications, and, in short, by your assiduity in general, you rendered the good offices of the rest of my friends altogether superfluous. These are circumstances far more to my credit than the honour itself for which you thus generously laboured. The latter, indeed, has frequently been obtained by those who had done nothing to deserve it, but no man was ever supported with so much zeal by an advocate thus illustrous, without merit to justify his claim. But the great benefit that I propose to myself by your friendship, arises entirely from the advantages which naturally flow from an intercourse of this kind; as nothing, in truth, can be attended with greater, especially between two persons, who, like you and me, are united by the same common pursuits; for I profess to act with you upon the same political principles in which our sentiments are perfectly agreed, as well as to be joined with you in an equal attachment to the same arts and sciences which we mutually cultivate. I sincerely wish that fortune had as strongly connected us in every other respect, and that you could think of all who belong to me with the same friendly sentiments I entertain for those who stand related to you. But I do not despair that even this may be effected. It is a point, however, in which you are no way concerned, and which it is my part alone to manage. In the mean time I beg you would be persuaded, as you will most certainly experience, that this alliance has, if possible, rather augmented than diminished the warmth of my zeal for your service.

But, as I hope I am now writing to a censor, I must have the modesty to shorten my letter, that I may not be guilty of a breach of respect to a magistrate who is the great superintendent of good manners. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

To Marcus Cælius, Curule-Aedile.

Nothing could be more judicious, nor more carefully conducted, than your management of Curio in relation to the thanksgiving. Indeed, the circumstances of that whole affair have proved entirely conformable to my wishes; not only as it passed the senate with so much expedition, but as our mutual competitor, the angry Hircus, expressed his assent to those divine encomiums with which Cato honoured my actions. I am inclined to flatter myself, therefore, that this will lead to a triumph; and I desire you would be prepared accordingly.

It is with great pleasure I find that Dolabella enjoys the happiness of your esteem and friendship. I was at no loss to guess the circumstance to which you alluded, when you mentioned your hopes that the prudence of my daughter Tuilia would temper his conduct. But what would you have said had you seen the letter I wrote to Appius immediately after I received yours upon that subject? Yet thus we must act, my friend, if we would live in the world. I hope the gods will give success to this match, and that I shall have reason to be well satisfied with my son-in-law; I am sure, at least, your addressable offices will extremely contribute to that end.

The dark prospect of public affairs fills me with great disquietude. I was well inclined towards Curio; it is my wish that Cæsar's achievements may meet with the honourable rewards they deserve; and I would willingly sacrifice my life in support of Pompey; still, however, none of my affections are superior to that which I feel for my country. But, I perceive, you do not take any great part in her contests; being divided, I suppose, between the different obligations of a patriot and a friend.

Upon my departure from the province, I left the administration in the hands of Cædus. You will be surprized, perhaps, that I should commit so great a trust to so young a man. But you will remember that he was my quaestor; that he is a youth of a noble family, and that I am justified in my choice by a practice almost universal. Besides, I had no other person near me of superior rank; for Pompey, I know, had long before quitting the province, and, as to my brother, I could by no means have prevailed upon him to accept the employment. Indeed, if I had placed the administration in his hands, the malicious part of the world would probably have said, that, instead of resigning my government in obedience to the decree of the senate, I still continued it in the person of one who may justly be considered as my second self. They might perhaps have added, too, that the intentions of the senate were, that those only should command in the provinces who had never enjoyed a government before; whereas, my brother had actually presided in Asia during three whole years. The method I have taken, therefore, secures me from all censure; whereas, if I had substituted my brother, there is no abuse I should not have had reason to expect. In fine, I was induc'd, I will not say to court, but, at least, to do justice to Cæsar's quality, not only by my own inclination, but by the example also of our two great potentates, who, in the same manner, and for the same reason, distinguished their respective quaestors, Cassius and Antonius. Upon the whole, my friend, I expect that you approve of my choice, for it is now out of my power to recall it.

The hint you dropped concerning Oscellus was so extremely obscure that I could make nothing of it, and had no mention of it in your newspaper.

You are become so wonderfully celebrated, that

LETTER XIV.

Marcus Calvius to Cicero.

I am ashamed to own how much occasion I have to complain of Appius. This ungrateful man singled me out as the object of his secret spleen, for no other reason but because he has received greater obligations from me than his narrow spirit would suffer him to return. However, he could not carry on his malicious purposes with so much concealment, as to prevent my receiving an intimation of them; and indeed I myself observed that he certainly did not mean well to me. Indeed, I found that he had been tampering with his colleague to my prejudice; as he soon afterwards openly avowed his injurious designs to some others of his friends. I discovered also, that he had entered into some consultations of the same kind with Lucius Domitianus; who is lately, I must inform you, become my most bitter enemy. In short, I perceived that he was endeavouring to recommend himself to Pompeius by his ill offices to me. Nevertheless I could not submit to enter into any personal remonstrances or intercessions, with a man whom I had reason to consider as indebted to me even for his life. I contented myself therefore with complaining to some of our common friends, who had been witnesses to the obligations he had received at my hands. But as this method I found was to no purpose, and that he would not design to give me the least satisfaction, I determined to apply to his colleague. I rather chose indeed to ask a favour of the latter, (notwithstanding I was sensible that my connexion with you had rendered him far from being my friend,) than undergo the mortification of engaging in a personal confidence with so ridiculous and contemptible a mortal as Appius. This step extremely exasperated him, and he was no sooner apprised of it, than he warmly complained that I was seeking a pretext to quarrel with him, merely in resentment, he said, for his not having fully gratified my avaricious expectations. Soon after this he openly endeavoured to procure Servius to exhibit articles of impeachment against me, and entered into several consultations with Domitianus for that purpose. But when they perceived that they could not succeed in their intended charge, they dropped this design, and resolved to encourage a prosecution of another kind; though at the same time they well knew that there was not the least shadow of evidence to support their accusation. However, towards the close of my Circensian games, these shameless

c Lucius Calpurnius Piso, the father-in-law of Cæsar, was colleague with Appius in the censorial office.

d An enmity had subsisted between Piso and Cicero, ever since the consulate of the former, who concurred with Clodius in those violent measures which terminated in Cicero's exile.—See rem. s. p. 341, and rem. 9, p. 399.

e Circensian games is a general name for these shows of various kinds, which were exhibited at different seasons to the people in the Circus; a place in Rome set apart for those purposes. But the particular games alluded to in this passage, are most probably the Manutius, with great confidence, caused me to be indicted on the Scænian law. But Pola, whom they had spirited up to be the informer, had scarce entered his action when I lodged an information against our worthy censor himself, for the very same crime. And nothing in truth could have been more happily concerted; for this retaliation was so universally applauded, and by the better sort too among the people, that the general satisfaction they have expressed, has mortified Appius even more than the disgrace of the information itself. I have charged him likewise with appropriating a little chapel to his private use, which belongs to the public.

It is almost six weeks since I delivered my former letter to the slave who now brings you both; and I am extremely vexed at the fellow's delay.—I think I have no farther news to send you, except that Domitianus is in great pain for the success of his approaching election.

As I earnestly wish to see you, I expect your arrival with much impatience. I will only add my request that you would show the world you are as sensible of the injuries done to me, as I have ever warmly resented those which have at any time been offered to yourself. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

From the same.

If you had taken the king of Parthia himself prisoner and pitched his metropolis, it would not make you amends for your absence from these diverting scenes. You have lost indeed a subject of inexhaustible mirth, by not being a spectator of the very ridiculous figure which the luckless Domitianus displayed when he lately found himself disappointed of his election.

The reason, (conjectures) these which they called the Roman. For these were exhibited by the sediles in September; and this letter seems to have been written some time in that or the following month. The nature of these games has been explained in a former note.

The author of this law was Marcus Scæninius, who was tribune of the people in the year of Rome 691. It prohibited that horrid and unnatural commerce, which, in after-ages of more confirmed and shameless corruption, became so general as to be openly avowed even by those who affected, in other respects, a decency of character. Horace and Pliny the consuls are both instances of this kind, and afford a very remarkable evidence, that the last dispositions are not proof against fashionable vices, how detestable soever, without a much stronger counterpart than a mere moral sense can supply.

Appius.

Manutius, in his remark upon this place, produces a passage from Livy, by which he proves, that it was the business of the censors to take care that those public chapels should not be shut up by private persons from the general and common use to which they were originally erected. Celius, therefore, informed against his adversary for having practised himself what it was incumbent upon him, by the duties of his office, to punish in others.—Manutius in loc.

This person, it is probable, is the same who is mentioned before in this letter. The commentators suppose that the election of which Celius speaks was for a member of the augural college, in the room of Hortensius, lately deceased. For it is said, in the next letter, that Mark Antony was his competitor; and it appears, from Hirtius, that the former was chosen augur about this time—Hirt. De Bell. Ga. vii. 50.

See the last note of the preceding letter.
assembly of the people was exceedingly numerous upon this occasion: but the force of party bore down all before it; and even carried away many of the friends of Domitius from his interest. This circumstance he imputes to my management: and as both of them, in the opinion given to his competitor as a real injury done to himself, he honours me with the same marks of his displeasure with which he distinguishes the most intimate of his friends. He is at present indeed a very diverting spectacle of indignant wrath: which he impotently discharges, in the first place against himself for promoting the election of Mark Antony, and in the next against the people, for expressing so much satisfaction in his repulse.

Under this article of news relating to Domitius, I must not forget to mention, that his son has commenced a prosecution against Saturninus: a man, it must be owned, whose conduct in the former part of his life has rendered him extremely odious. The public is waiting with great impatience for the event of this trial: but since the infamous Pidousus has been acquitted, there is a fair prospect that Saturninus will not meet with more inexcusable judges.

To political affairs, I have often mentioned to you that I imagined the public tranquillity could not possibly be preserved beyond the present year: and the nearer we approach to those contents which must inevitably arise, the more evident this danger appears. For Pompey is determined most strenuously to oppose Caesar’s being consul unless he resigns his command: and Caesar, on the contrary, is persuaded that he cannot be safe upon those terms. He has offered however to throw up his commission, provided Pompey will do the same. And thus their very suspicious friendship and alliance will probably end at last in an open war. For my own part I shall be extremely perplexed in what manner to act in that conjuncture: and I doubt you will likewise find yourself under the same embarrassment. On the one hand I have an interest and connexion with Pompey’s party: and on the other, it is Caesar’s cause alone and not his friends that I dislike. You are sensible, I dare say, that so long as the dissensions of our country are confined within the limits of debate, we ought ever to join with the more righteous side; but that as soon as the sword is drawn, the strongest party is always the best. With respect to our present divisions, I foresee that the senate, together with the whole order of judges, will declare in favour of Pompey: and that all those of desperate fortunes, or who are obnoxious to the laws, will list themselves under the banners of Caesar. As to their armies, I am persuaded there will be a great inequality. But I hope we shall have time enough to consider of and prepare against their respective forces, and to declare ourselves accordingly.

I had almost forgotten to mention a piece of news much too remarkable to be omitted. You must know that our worthy censor Appius is become the very prodigy of reformers, and is most outrageously active in restraining our extravagances in pictures and statues, in limiting the number of our acres, and abolishing frivolous contracts. The man imagines, I suppose, that the censorship is a kind of specific for discharging the stains of a blemished reputation. But I have a notion he will find himself mistaken: for the more pains he takes of this sort to clear his character, the more visibly the spots will appear. In the name of all the gods, my dear Cicero, hasten hither to enjoy the diverting spectacle of Appius sitting in judgment on extravagance, and Drusus on debauchery! It is a sight, believe me, well worth your expedition.

Curio is thought to have acted very prudently in withdrawing his protest against Caesar as a candidate for the province of Cappadocia. But to answer your question in a few words concerning my sentiments of public affairs: if one or other of our chiefs should not be employed against the Parthians, I am persuaded great dissensions will soon ensue: dissensions, my friend, which nothing can terminate but the sword, and which each of them seem well-inclined and prepared to draw. In short, if your own safety were not deeply concerned, I should say that Fortune is going to open to you a most entertaining scene. Farewell.

things. But this explanation is contrary to the concurrent sentiments of the best commentators, who agree that qui res judicat is a circumstance for judicibus. The phrase, it must be owned, is singular: and so is the style of Cicero in general. But what principally confirms the sense here adopted is, that it is most agreeable both to credibility and to fact. For it is by no means probable that every man of judgment was an enemy to Caesar: and it is most certain that the whole order of judges were friends to Pompey.—Ad Att. viii. 16; Life of Cicero, p. 85.

a It is proper to observe that Appius has remarkably transgressed the rules of moderation in this last article, as he undoubtedly had in the other two: for avareus is an attendant that seldom falls of accompanying luxury. It is certain, at least, that his own possessions were far above mediocrity. Caesar fre frequently, I believe, makes of him in the preceding letters as a man who, by his wealth as well as by his alliances and abilities, was of great weight in the republic. And as to his extravagance of the virtuosus kind, it appears that when he intended to offer himself as a candidate for the office of aedile, he plundered all the temples of Greece, as well as other less sacred repositories, in order to make a collection of statues and statues for the decoration of the games which were annually exhibited by those magistrates.—Ep. Fam. iii. 10; Pro Domo, 43; Vide et Pigh. Annal. in anno 666.

b The batteries of ridiculae are never more properly pointed, than when they are thus levelled at counterfeit virtue: as there is nothing that more justly rashes contempt and indignation than those reforming hypocrisies.

Qui Curius simulat et Bacchanalis vivunt.—Juven.

c It is supposed from what Cicero here says of him, that he was one of the preceptors this year. —Pigh. Annal. 703.

d The meaning of this seems to be (as one of the commentators has explained it) that if Cicero himself were not in danger from the dissension between Caesar and
THE LETTERS OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO

LETTER XVI.

To Terentia and Tullia.

The amiable young Cicero and myself are perfectly well, if you and my dearest Tullia are so.

We arrived here on the 14th of this month, after a very tedious and disagreeable passage, occasioned by contrary winds. Acetus met me upon my landing, with letters from Rome, having been so expeditious as to perform his journey in one and twenty days. In the packet which he delivered to me, I found yours, wherein you express some uneasiness lest your former letters should not have reached my hands. They have, my Terentia: and I am extremely obliged to you for the very full accounts you gave me of everything I was concerned to know. I am by no means surprised at the shortness of your last, as you had reason to expect us so soon. It is with great impatience I wish for that meeting: though I am sensible at the same time of the unhappy situation in which I shall find the republic.

All the letters indeed which I received by Acetus, agree in assuring me that there is a general tendency to a civil war: so that when I come to Rome I shall be under a necessity of declaring myself on one side or the other. However, since there is no avoiding the scene which fortune has prepared for me, I shall be the more expeditious in my journey, that I may the better deliberate on the several circumstances which must determine my choice. Let me entreat you to meet me as far on my way as your health will permit.

The legacy which Pescinus has left me is an acquisition that I receive with great concern: as I tenderly loved him, and extremely lament his death. If his estate should be put up to auction before my arrival, I beg you would recommend my interest in it to the care of Atticus: or in case his affairs should not allow him to undertake the office, that you would request the same favour of Camillus. And if this should not find you at Rome, I desire you would send proper directions thither for that purpose. As for my other affairs, I hope I shall be able to settle them myself: for I purpose to be in Italy, if the gods favour my voyage, about the 15th of November. In the mean time I conjure you, my amiable and excellent Terentia, and thou my dearest Tullia, I conjure you both, by all the tender regards you bear me, to take care of your healths. Farewell.

A freedman belonging to Cicero.

He was a favourite slave of Cicero, who trained him up in his family, and formed him under his own immediate tuition. The probity of his manners, the elegance of tance to my interest that I should hasten to Rome, yet I cannot but severely reproach myself for having thus deserted you. However, as you seemed altogether averse from pursuing your voyage till you should re-establish your health, I approved of your scheme: and I still approve of it, if you continue in the same sentiments. Nevertheless, if after having taken some refreshment, you should think yourself in a condition to follow me, I shall do so or not, as you shall judge proper. If you should determine in the affirmative, I have sent Mario to attend you: if not, I have ordered him to return immediately. Be well assured there is nothing I more ardently desire than to have you with me, provided I may enjoy that pleasure without prejudice to yourself. But be assured too, that if your continuing somewhat longer at Patrae should be thought necessary, I prefer your health to all other considerations. If you should embark immediately, you may overtake me at Leucas. But if you are more inclined to defer your voyage till your recovery shall be better confirmed, let me entreat you to be very careful in choosing a safe ship; and that you would neither sail at an improper season nor without a convoy. I particularly charge you also, my dear Tiro, by all the regard you bear me, not to suffer the arrival of Mario, or anything that I have said in this letter, in the least to influence your resolution. Believe me, whatever will be most agreeable to your health, will be most agreeable likewise to my inclinations; and therefore I desire you would be wholly governed by your own genus, and his uncommon erudition, recommended him to his master's peculiar esteem and affection: of which the letters addressed to him in this collection are a lasting and memorable memorial. They are many of them written, indeed, in a style so different from the ordinary language of friendship, that they probably gave strength and currency to a suspicion highly disadavantagous to Cicero's moral character. This imputation seems to have been first propagated by the son of the cele-ated Asinius Pollio; who, in a treatise which he published, was led by a desire to magnify his father's eloquence at the expense of Cicero's, inserted a wanton somet, which he pretended was composed by the latter on Tiro. But to speak impartially, there does not seem, from all that can be traced of Cicero's private conduct, the least sufficient evidence to charge him with having been indebted to this execrable vice of his degenerate countrymen. In passing judgment, therefore, on these letters to Tiro, it should be remembered that Cicero's temper was more than commonly warm: which infused a peculiar heat into all his expressions, whether of friendship or of animity. This, together with those notions of unity which were carried by the ancients, in general, so much higher than they have risen in modern ages, may account, perhaps, for those overflows of tenderness which are so very observable in the letters to Tiro.—Anl. Gall. xiii. 9. Plin. Epist. vii. 4.

* As Cicero was full of the hopes of obtaining a triumph, he was desirous of hastening to Rome before the dissensions between Caesar and Pompey should be raised to so great a height as to render it impossible for him to enjoy that honour.

A city in Peloponnesus, which still subsists under the name of Patras. Cicero had left Tiro indisposed in this place, the day before the date of the present letter.

A hill or promontory in the gulf of Corinth, called Saint Maure. It was on this island that the celebrated promontory stood, from whence the tender Sappho is said to have thrown herself in a fit of mournful despair; and which the Inimitable Addison has rendered still more celebrated by his legendary papers on the Lover's Leap—See Spectator, vol. iii. No. 293, 293.
prudence. It is true I am extremely desirous of your company, and of enjoying it as early as possible: but the same affecion which makes me wish to see you soon, makes me wish to see you well. Let your health therefore be your first and principal care; assuring yourself, that among all the numberless good offices I have received at your hands, I shall esteem this by far the most acceptable.

LETTER XVIII.
To the same.
I CANNOT describe to you (nor would I indeed if it were in my power) the uneasy situation of my mind. I will only say, that your speedy recovery and return to me will afford infinite satisfaction to both of us.

The third day after we parted brought me to this place. It lies within a hundred and twenty stadia of Leucas, where I promise myself that we shall meet, or at least that I shall find Mario there with a letter from you. In the mean while let me entreat you to be careful of your health, in proportion to the mutual tenderness we bear towards each other. Farewell.

Alyzia, Nov. the 5th.

LETTER XIX.
To the same.
I DESPATCHED a letter to you yesterday from this place, where I continued all that day in order to wait the arrival of my brother; and I write this before sunrise, just as we are setting out. If you have any regard for us, but particularly for me, show it by your care to re-establish your health. It is with great impatience I expect to meet you at Leucas; but if that cannot be, my next wish is that I may find Mario there with a letter. We all of us indeed, but more especially myself, earnestly long to see you; however, we would by no means, my Tiro, indulge ourselves in that pleasure, unless it may be consistent with your health. There is no necessity therefore of hastening your journey, as there will be days enough to enjoy your company when once you shall be thoroughly recovered. I can easily indeed forego your services; but your health, my dear Tiro, I would fain preserve, for your own sake in the first place, and in the next for mine. Farewell.

LETTER XX.
To the same.

Your letter produced very different effects on my mind, as the letter part somewhat alleviated my mind, the concern which the former had occasioned. I am now convinced that it will not be safe for you to proceed on your voyage till your health shall be entirely re-established; and I shall see you soon enough, if I see you perfectly recovered.

I find by your letter that you have a good opinion of your physician, and I am told he deserves it. However, I can by no means approve of the regimen he prescribed; for soups cannot certainly be suitable to so weak a stomach. I have written to him very fully concerning you, as also to Lyso. I have done the same likewise to my very obliging friend Curius; and have particularly requested him, if it should be agreeable to you, that he would remove you into his house. I am apprehensive indeed that Lyso will not give you proper attendance; in the first place, because carelessness is the general characteristic of all his countrymen; and in the next, because he has returned no answer to my letter. Nevertheless, as you mention him with esteem, I leave it to you to continue with him or not just as you shall think proper. Let me only enjoin you, my dear Tiro, not to spare any expense that may be necessary towards your recovery. To this end I have desired Curius to supply you with whatever money you shall require; and I think it would be proper, in order to render your physician the more careful in his attendance, to make him some present.

Numberless are the services I have received from you, both at home and abroad; in my public and my private transactions; in the course of my studies and the concerns of my family. But would you crown them all? Let it be by your care that I may see you (as I hope I soon shall) perfectly recovered. If your health should permit, I think you cannot do better than to take the opportunity of embarking with my questor Mesclinius; for he is a good-natured man, and seems to have conceived a friendship for you. The care of your voyage indeed is the next thing I would recommend to you, after that of your health. However, I would now by no means have you hurry yourself, as my single concern is for your recovery. Be assured, my dear Tiro, that all my friends are yours; and, consequently, as your health is of the greatest importance to me as well as to yourself, there are numbers who are solicitous for its preservation. Your assiduous attendance upon me has hitherto prevented you from paying due regard to it. But now that you are wholly at leisure, I conjure you to devote all your application to that single object; and I shall judge of the affection you bear me by your compliance with this request. Adieu, my dear Tiro, adieu! adieu! may you soon be restored to the perfect enjoyment of your health.

Lepta, together with all your other friends, salute you. Farewell.

Leucas, Nov. the 7th.

LETTER XXI.
To the same.

THOUGH it was but an hour or two that you and I spent with Xenomenes at Thyreum, yet he has conceived as strong an affection for you as if he had conversed with you his whole life, so wonderfully engaging is my Tiro! Accordingly he has promised to assist you in all your occasions; and it is a promise, I am well persuaded, he will punctually perform.

I should be glad, if you find yourself better, that you would remove to Leucas, in order to perfect your recovery. Nevertheless, I would not have you change your present situation without taking the sentiments of Curius and Lyso, together with those of your physicians.

I had some thoughts of sending Mario back to you, whom you might return to me with a letter as soon as your health should be somewhat mended. But I considered that this would be only securing the pleasure of hearing from you once; whereas, I hope to receive that satisfaction frequently. And if you have any regard for me, you may easily give it me by sending Actium every day to the quay, where he cannot fail of meeting with many who will readily charge themselves with conveying a letter to me. You may be assured, in return, that I shall not suffer any opportunity to escape me of sending a line or two by those who are going to Patrae.

I rely entirely upon the care of Curius for your recovery; as nothing, I am sure, can exceed either his friendship to myself or his humanity in general. I desire therefore you would be wholly resigned to his direction. As I am willing to sacrifice the pleasure of your company to the advantage of your health, I entreat you to have no other concern but what relates to your recovery; all the rest, be assured, shall be mine. Again and again I bid you farewell. I am this moment leaving Lucus.

Nov. the 7th.

LETTER XXII.
To the same.

This is the third letter I have written to you within these four-and-twenty hours; and I now take up my pen more in compliance with my usual custom than as having anything new to say. I can only repeat, indeed, what I have often requested, that you would proportion the care of your health to the affection you bear me. Yes, my Tiro, I conjure you to add this to the numberless good offices you have conferred upon me, as the most acceptable of them all. When you have taken, as I hope you will, all necessary measures for your safety, my next desire is, that you would use the proper precautions likewise to secure to yourself a safe voyage. In the mean time, you will not fail to write to me as often as you shall meet with any person who is coming into Italy, as I shall take all occasions of doing the same on my part, by those who may be going to Patras. In one word, take care of yourself, my dear Tiro, I charge you; and since we have been thus prevented from pursuing our voyage together, there is no necessity for resuming yours in haste. Let it be your single care to re-establish your health. Again and again farewell.

Actium, Nov. the 7th, in the evening.

LETTER XXIII.
To the same.

I have been detained here this whole week by contrary winds, which have likewise confined my brother and his son at Butrotum. I am full of anxiety about your health, though by no means surprised at not hearing from you, as the same winds which delay my voyage prevent the arrival of your letters.

Let me entreat you to exert your utmost care in regaining your health; and I hope, as soon as the season of the year and your recovery shall render it convenient for you to embark, you will return to him who infinitely loves you. Your arrival will be impatiently expected by numberless others as well as by myself; for all who bear any affection for me are tender well-wishers to you. Again and again, my dear Tiro, I conjure you to take care of your health. Farewell.

Corcyra, Nov. the 16th.

LETTER XXIV.

To the same.

We parted, you know, on the second of November; on the sixth I arrived at Lucus, from whence I went thence. I reached Actium the following day. I was detained there by contrary winds till the next morning, when I sailed for Corcyra, where I arrived on the ninth, having had a very favourable passage. The weather proving extremely tempestuous, I was obliged to continue in that place till the sixteenth, when I again proceeded on my voyage; and on the seventeenth I entered the bay of Cassiope, a maritime town in Corcyra, situated about a hundred and twenty stadia from my former port. Here, the wind shifting, I was detained till the 23d. In the mean time, those ships that had accompanied me thither, and were so impatient as immediately to put to sea again, were many of them lost. However, on the evening of the day I last mentioned we weighed anchor; and, having sailed all that night and the next day with a fair gale from the south and a very clear sky, we gained with great ease the port of Hydruns in Italy. The same wind carried us the following day, being the twenty-fifth, to Andronyxum. I was met at this place by Terentia (who desires me to assure you of her esteem), and we entered the town together. On the twenty-seventh, a slave of Plancius arrived here with your very acceptable letter, dated the thirteenth of this month; which, though it did not entirely answer my wishes, contributed greatly to alleviate the uneasiness I was under upon your account. I had the satisfaction likewise of hearing at the same time from your physician, who confirms me in the hope that you will soon be well.

And now, as I perfectly well know your prudence, your temperance, and the affection you bear me, can it be necessary that I should entreat you to employ your utmost care to re-establish your health? I am persuaded indeed you will do every thing in your power to return to me as soon as possible; however, I would by no means have you more expeditious than your strength will bear. I am sorry you accepted Lyso's invitation to his concert, lest your going abroad so soon should occasion a relapse on the fourth critical week. a a The ancients entertained a variety of superstitious notions concerning the mystical power of numbers, particularly the number seven with its several multiplications and divisions. Cicero, in one of his philosophical treatises calls this number rerum omnium fere nodus; and it is to have particular influence with regard to the crisis of diseas-

But, since you were willing to hazard your health rather than appear deficient in point of politeness, I hope you will guard against any ill consequence that may attend your complaisance.

I have written to Curius to assure he would make a proper acknowledgment to your physician, and supply you likewise with whatever money your occasions shall require, which I will repay to his order. You will find a horse and a mule at Brundisium, which I have left there for your service. I am proceeding on my journey to Rome, where I expect to see great commotions upon the entrance of the new consuls into their office. However, hence, that he alludes in the present passage. Macrobius has detailed abundance of absurd learning in relation to this wunder-working number, which he concludes with the following reflections:— "Unde non imperito hic numerus totius fabricae dispensator et dominus, segris quoque corporis periculum sanitatemque denuntiat." This opinion however is not altogether inconsistent with a more improved philosophy, and experience shows that the 74th, the 14th, and 16th, are frequently attended with certain determining symptoms in the progress of acute diseases.— Macrobi. in Somn. Scip. i. 6.

The consuls entered upon their office on the first day of the new year.

it is my resolution not to engage in the violent measures of either party. I have only to add my most earnest request, that you would not embark without taking all prudent precautions to secure a safe voyage. The masters of ships, I know, who are governed entirely by their hopes of gain, are always too hazardous and not disposed to run any imprudent risks in expeditions of this kind. But if your health should not permit you to embark so soon, let me desire you would look out for some other company in your voyage, whose public character may give him an authority with the commander of your ship. In a word, you cannot more effectually oblige me than by exerting your utmost care to return to me safe and well. Again and again, my dear Tiro, I bid you adieu.

I have recommended you in the strongest terms to the care both of Curius and Lyso, as well as of your physician. Adieu.

BOOK VII.

LETTER I.

To Tiro.

Notwithstanding that I feel the want of your services in every place and upon all occasions, yet I am not so much concerned, on my own account, than on yours. However, since it has terminated, as Curius informs me, in a quarantane, I hope, if you are not there now, it will prove a means of more firmly establishing your health. But just then, to the regard you owe me, as not to suffer any other concern to employ your thoughts but what relates to your recovery. I am sensible, at the same time, how much you suffer from this absence; but, believe me, all will be well whenever you are so. I would by no means, therefore, have you in so much haste to return to me, as to expose yourself to the dangers of a winter voyage; nor, indeed, to the fatigue of a sea-sickness, before you shall have sufficiently recovered your strength.

I arrived in the suburbs of Rome on the fourth of January, and nothing could be more to my honour than the manner in which I was met on my return to the city. But I am unfortunately fallen into the very midst of public dissention; or rather, indeed, I find myself surrounded with the flames of a civil war. It was my earnest desire to have composed these dangerous fermentes; and I probably might, if the passions of some, in both parties, who are equally eager for war, had not rendered my endeavours ineffectual. My friend Caesar has written a very warm and menacing letter to the senate. He has the assurance, notwithstanding their express prohibition, to continue at the head of his army, and in the government of his province; to which very extraordinary measures he has been instigated by Curin. The latter, in conjunction with Quintus Cassius and Mark Antony, without the least violence having beeen offered to them, have withdrawn themselves to Caesar. They took this step immediately after the senate had given it in charge to the consuls, the praetors, and the tribunes of the people, together with those

1 A quarantane was supposed by the ancients to be extremely salutary in its consequences. Aulus Gellius mentions a contemporary orator and philosopher who wrote a serious panegyrie upon this wholesome temperer, wherein he supported his opinion upon the authority of a passage in some writings of Plato, which are now lost.— Notc. Att. xvii. 12.

3 As Cicero claimed the honour of a triumph, he was obliged, till his pretensions should be determined, to take up his residence without the walls of the city, agreeably to a custom which has been frequently mentioned in the preceding observations. of us who are invested with proconsular power, to take care of the interests of the republic. And never, in truth, were our liberties in more imminent danger; as those who are disaffected to the commonwealth never were headed by a chief more capabile or better prepared to support them. We are raising forces with all possible diligence, under the authority and with the assistance of Pompey, who now begins, his somewhat too late I fear, to be alhensive of Caesar's power. In the midst, however, of these alarming commotions, the senate demanded, in a very full house, that a triumph should be immEDIATELY decreed to me. But the consil Lentulus, in order to appropriate to himself a greater share in confering this honour, told them that he would propose it himself in proper form, as soon as he should have despatched the affairs that were necessary in the present conjuncture. In the meantime I act with great moderation; and this concert renders my influence with both parties so much the stronger. The several districts of Italy are assigned to our respective protections; and Capua is the department I have taken for mine.
I thought it proper to give you this general information of public affairs; to which I will only add my request, that you would take care of your health, and write to me by every opportunity.
Again and again I bid you farewell.

LETTER II.

To Rufus.

have given you a meeting, if you had continued in your resolution of going to the place you first appointed; and though you were willing to spare me that trouble, yet be assured I should, upon the least notice, have shown you that I prefer your convenience to my own.

If my secretary, Marcus Tullius, were not absent
I should be able to send you a more explicit answer to your letter. This, however, I will assure you, that, with regard to exhibiting the accounts you mention (for I will not venture to be so positive as to any other instance), he has not intentionally taken any step injurious either to your interest or your reputation. As to my own share in this transaction, had the law formerly observed in matters of this kind been still in force, I should not, most certainly, have laid my accounts before the treasury, without having, agreeably to those con-a By this decree, the magistrates therein named were invested with a discretionary power of acting as they should judge proper in the present exigency of public affairs; a decree to which the senate never had recourse but in cases of the utmost danger and distress.—Cic. De Bell. Civ. i. 5.

b Lucius Mecrenius Rufus, the person to whom this letter is addressed, was questor to Cicero in Cilicia. His conduct in that office seems to have given occasion to the character we find of him in the letters to Atticus, where he is represented as a man of great levity, and of a most debased and avaricious turn of mind.—Ad Att. iv. 3.

C These were Cicero's accounts relating to the public expenses of the government in Cilicia; in which there seem to have been articles inserted not altogether favourable able to the reputation of Rufus as questor, and which he was desirous therefore should have been altered or sup-ppressed before they had been delivered into the treasury as Rome.

nexions that subsist between us previously examined and adjusted them with you. But the ancient usage in these cases being now superseded by the Julian law, which obliged me to leave a stated account in the province, and exhibit an exact copy of it to the treasury; I paid you that compliment in Cilicia, which I should otherwise have paid you at Rome. Nor did I at that time by any means endeavour to control your accounts by mine; on the contrary, I made concessions to you, which, I dare say, you will never give me reason to repent. The fact is, I resigned my secretary (whose conduct you now, it seems, suspect) entirely to your directions: and it was Tullius, together with your brother, (who you desired might be joined with him,) that settled these accounts with you in my absence.
I concerned myself, indeed, no farther than just to cast my eye over them; and I considered the copy, which I thus received from my secretary, as coming immediately from your brother's own hand.
In this whole transaction I have treated you with all possible respect and confidence; and it was not in my power to have employed a person to make up these accounts, who would have been more cautious than I can claim that nothing should appear to your disadvantage. That I have paid a necessary obedience to the Julian law, by depositing a copy of my stated accounts in the two principal cities of the province, is most certain. But though I had many reasons for being desirous of passing them as expeditiously as possible; yet I should have waited your return to Rome, had I not considered their being thus deposited in the province as just the same thing, with respect to you, as if they had been actually carried into the treasury
at Rome.

As to the article you mention relating to Volusius, it could by no means be inserted in the account.
For I am informed by those who are conversant in business of this kind, particularly by my most judicious friend Camillus, that Volusius cannot stand charged with the sum in question, instead of Valerius; but that the sureties of the latter are necessary to make the payment of the said sums.
Advantages, however, to no more than nineteen thousand sesterces, and not to thirty thousand, as you state it in your letter. For I had recovered part of it from Valerius, and it is only the remainder that I have charged. But you are unwiling, it should seem, to allow me the credit of having acted upon this occasion certainly with generosity in regard to my friends, or (what, indeed, I less value myself upon) even with common caution with respect to myself. Why else should you suppose that my lieutenant and prefect owe it to my secretary, rather than to myself, that they are eased of a very severe, and, in truth, a very unconscionable burden? and why else should you imagine a As proconsul and questor.

b See Rem. i., on letter 7, book vii.

The nature of this affair concerning Valerius and Volusius is utterly inexplicable, as it refers to a transaction of which we know neither the full circumstances, nor the particular laws to which it relates. Vain, therefore, would be the task of retelling the several opinions of the commentators upon this and the following passages, or the attempt to clear them up by any additional con-jectures; as it is better to remain quiet in the dark, than to blunder about in quest of a light which is so where to be found.

me so negligent in a point wherein both my duty and interest were equally and greatly concerned, as to suffer my secretary to settle this account just as he thought proper, without requiring him even to read it over to me? In short, though I flatter myself that I have taken no imprudent measures in this business, yet you will not believe, it seems, that I have bestowed upon it even a single thought. The truth, however, is, that the scheme of throwing off this debt from Volusius was entirely my own; as I am endeavouring, likewise, to discharge the sureties of Valerius, and even Marius himself, from so severe a penalty. And I have the satisfaction to find this my design not only generally approved, but applauded; though, to tell you the whole truth, it is not, I perceive, greatly relished by my secretary. Nevertheless, I thought it the duty of an honest man to spare the fortunes of such numbers of his friends and fellow-citizens, when he could do so without prejudicing the public interest.

In regard to what you mention concerning Lucceius, I have acknowledged that the money was deposited in the temple by my orders, in pursuance of Pompey's advice. The latter has received this sum for the public use, as Sestius possessed himself of that which was required, I have it to the explanation in this paper, I am very sensible that this is an affair in which you are in no sort concerned. However, I should be extremely sorry that I omitted to particularize this circumstance, if it did not most authentically appear, by the decree of the senate, and by the letters which passed between us, for whose use it was delivered into the hands of Sestius. If was the notoriety of this fact, and the certainty that it was of no importance to you, which prevented me from making particular mention of it. But since you wish that I had, I wish so too. I agree with you in thinking that it is proper you should insert this article into your accounts; nor will they by that mean appear in the least inconsistent with mine; as you will only add what I omitted, and vouch my express orders. I have no reason, most certainly, to deny them; nor should I indeed, if I had, when you desired the contrary.

As to the nine hundred thousand sesterces, they are specified in the manner that proves or proves not, stipulated. And if there is any item in respect to my lieutenant which you are dissatisfied with, and which (after having renounced the privilege I was entitled to by the decree of the senate) it is in my power to rectify, I will endeavour to do so as far as I legally may. In the mean time, he well assured I shall take no step in this affair, if I can possibly avoid it, that may prove inconsistent either with your interest or your inclination.

In answer to your inquiry concerning my honorary list, I must acquaint you, that I have only delivered in the names of my prefects and military tribunes, together with those who attended me as proconsular companions. I had conceived a notion that no certain time was limited for this purpose: but I have since been informed, that it is necessary to present this list within thirty days after exhibiting the accounts. I am sorry you had not the benefit of paying this compliment, as I have no ambitious views to serve by taking it upon myself. But it is still open to you, with respect to the cenzures and the companions of the military tribunes, the law not having fixed any time for presenting a list of that sort.

I have nothing farther, I think, to observe upon your letter, except in relation to the hundred thousand sesterces. I remember you wrote to me upon this subject before, in a letter dated from Myrina, and acknowledged it to be an error of your own: though, if there be any error in the case, it seems rather chargeable on your brother and not my secretary. But, he that looks well, the mistake was discovered too late to be corrected; for I had then quitted the province and deposited my accounts. I believe, therefore, that the answer I returned was agreeable to the disposition in which I always stand towards you, and to those hopes I had then conceived of my finances. I do not, however, remember that I carried my complaisance so far as to make myself your debtor for that sum, any more than I imagine that you intended this part of your letter as one of those important memorials so frequent in these times of general distress. You will consider, that I left in the hands of the farmers of the revenues at Ephesus all the money which legally accrued to me from my government; and that this whole sum, amounting to no less than two millions two hundred thousand sesterces, was seized for the use of Pompey. Whatever effect this great loss may have upon me, I am sure you ought not to be discomposed at my account. But, he that looks well, may still upon it dishe less at your table, or an inconceivable diminution of mean time, the modesty of Grevius, who closes his remark upon this place with the following ingenious acknowledgment, so unusual in a critic by profession: "Nihil in re tam obscura definio, (says he) nec mihi ipse satisfacio."

The proconsuls, upon their return to Rome, after the expiration of their provincial ministry, used to present a list of such of their officers and attendants who had particularly distinguished themselves by their zeal and fidelity in their respective functions.—Manutius.

These were generally young noblemen who attended the proconsul into his government as a sort of volunteers, in order to gain experience and acquit themselves with business.—Manutius.

A maritime city in Aolia, a province of Asia.

One may judge from hence what immense wealth those rapacious governors of the Roman provinces acquired, who did not scruple to oppose the people with their charges, and to abuse the most exemplary disinterestedness of their avaricious oravarious suggestion. For Cicero, who professed to conduct himself with the most exemplary disinterestedness in his province, was yet able, it appears, to acquire so large a sum in a single year as about 17,600, of our money, and that from a province by no means the most considerable of the republic's dominions.
tion of what you might otherwise have expected from my liberality. But had you actually advanced these hundred thousand sesterces to me out of your own purse, yet, to be sure, you are too complaisant to insist upon a security; and as to paying them, were I ever so well disposed for that purpose, you must know it is not in my power. You see I answer you in the same spirit of pleasantry in which I suppose that part of your letter was written to which this refers. But to be serious: if you think that Tullius can be of any service to you in this affair, I will send him as soon as he returns from the country. I have no objection to your destroying this letter when you shall have read it. Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Terentia and to Tullia.

In what manner it may be proper to dispose of yourselves during the present conjuncture, is a question which must now be decided by your own judgments as much as by mine. Should Caesar advance to Rome without committing hostilities, you may certainly, for the present at least, remain there un molested: but if this madman should give up the city to the rapine of his soldiers, I much doubt whether even Dolabella's credit and authority will be sufficient to protect you. I am under some apprehension, likewise, lest while you are deliberating in what manner to act, you should find yourselves so surrounded with the army as to render it impossible to withdraw, though you should be as much inclined. The next question is, (and it is a question which you yourselves are best able to determine,) whether any ladies of your rank venture to continue in the city; if not, will it be consistent with your character to appear singular in that point? But, be that as it will, you cannot, I think, as affairs are now situated, be more commodiously placed than either with me or at some of our farms in this district: supposing, I mean, that I should be able to maintain my present post. I must add, likewise, that a short time, it is to be feared, will produce a great scarcity in Rome. However, I should be glad you would take the sentiments of Atticus, or Camillus, or any other friend whom you may chose to consult upon this subject. In the mean while, let me conjure you both to keep up your spirits. The coming over of Labienus to our party, has given affairs a much better aspect. And Piso having withdrawn himself from the city, is likewise another very favourable circumstance: as it is a plain indication that he disapproves the impious measures of his son in law.

6 Labienus was one of Caesar's principal and most favourable lieutenants in Gaul, where he greatly distinguished himself by his military conduct. The Pompeian party therefore very assiduously in their applications to gain him over to their cause, as they promised themselves great advantages from his accession. But notwithstanding he appears to have attended it; and he, who in Caesar's camp had been esteemed a very considerable officer, seemed to have lost all his credit the moment he went over to Pompey's party in arms.

"Cesaris Labienus erat, nume trans fugae villa. Hier. De Bell. Gall. viii. 52; "Ad Att. viii. 2; Lucan, v. 345. Cicero, as he has been observed in a former note, has painted the character of Piso in the darkest and most odious colours. But sallies and invectives are not generally the most faithful memoirs, and it is evident, from Piso's conduct upon this occasion, that he was by no means what our author represents him in one of his orations, portentum et pane famus reipublicae: at least if Caesar's measures were really more unfavourable to liberty than those of Pompey. See letter 8, book 1.

6 A town in Campania. This letter, in some of the Latine editions, bears date in July; in others no month is specified. But it was undeniably written in January, as it appears by a letter to Atticus that Cicero's wife and daughter came to him at Formiae on the 2d of February. Ad Att. vii. 18.

This epistle seems to have been a sort of duplicate of the former, and though it is dated from a different place, it was probably written on the same day, and conveyed by some unexpected opportunity that occurred after he had despatched the foregoing.

LETTER V.

To Tiro.

You will easily judge of our distress, when I tell you that myself and every friend of the republic have abandoned Rome, and even our country, to all the cruel devastations of fire and sword. Our affairs, indeed, are in so desperate a situation, that nothing less than the powerful interposition of some favourite divinity, or some happy turn of chance, can secure us from utter ruin. It has been the perpetual purpose of all my speeches; indeed, and my actions, ever since I returned to Rome, to preserve the public tranquillity. But an invincible rage for war had unaccountably seized not only the enemies, but even those who are esteemed the friends, of the commonwealth: and it was in vain I remonstrated, that nothing was more to be dreaded than a civil war. Caesar, in the mean time, unmindful of his former character andhonours, and driven, it should seem, by a sort of frenzy, has taken possession of Ariminum, Piacenum, Ancona, and Arrétum. In consequence of this, the army has all deserted the city, but how prudently, or how heroically, it now avails not to examine. Thus you see our wretched situation! Caesar, however, has offered us the following conditions: in the first place, that Pompey shall retire to his government in Spain; in the next, that the army we have raised shall be disbanded, and our garrisons evacuated. Upon these terms he promises to deliver up the farther Gaed to the hands of Domitius, and the nearer into those of Cn. Nonnius, a person to whom these provinces have been respectively allotted. He farther engages to resign his right of suing for the consulship in his absence, and is willing to return to Rome in order to appear as a candidate in the regular form. We have accepted these propositions, provided he withdraws his forces from the several towns above mentioned, that the senate may securely assemble themselves at Rome in order to pass a decree for that purpose. If he should think proper to comply with this proposal, there are hopes of peace; not indeed of a very honourable one, as the terms are imposed upon us; yet anything is preferable to our present circumstances. But if he should refuse to stand to his overtures, we are prepared for an engagement; but an engagement which Caesar, after having incurred the general odium of retracting his own conditions, will scarce be able to sustain. The only difficulty will be to intercept his march to Rome: and this we have a prospect of effecting, as we have raised a very considerable body of troops; and we imagine that he will scarce venture to advance, lest he should lose the two Galles; every part of those provinces, excepting only the Transpapian, being utterly averse to him. There are, likewise, six of our legions from Spain, commanded by Afranius and Petreius, and supported by a very powerful body of auxiliaries that lie in his rear. In short, if he should be so mad as to approach, there is great probability of his being defeated, if we can but preserve Rome from falling into his hands. It has given a very considerable blow to his cause, that Labienus, who had great credit in his army, refused to be an associate with him in his impious enterprises. But if this person has not only deserted Caesar, but joined himself with us; and it is said that many others of the same party intend to follow his example.

I have still under my protection all the coast that extends itself from Formiae. I did not choose to enter more deeply at present into the opposition against Caesar, that my exhortations, in order to engage him to an accommodation, might be attended with the greater weight. If, however, must, after all, be our lot, it will be impossible for me, I perceive, to decline the command of some part of our forces. To this uneasy reflection I must add another: my son-in-law Dolabella has taken party with Caesar.

I was willing to give you this general information of public affairs; but suffer it not, I charge you, to make impressions upon your mind to the disadvantage of your health. I have strongly recommended you to Anius Varro, whose disposition to serve you, as well as the whole particular friendship to myself, I have thoroughly experienced. I have entreated him to be careful both of your health and of your voyage; and, in a word, to receive you entirely under his protection. I have full confidence that he will comply with my request, as he gave me his promise for that purpose in the most obliging manner.

As I could not enjoy the satisfaction of your company at a season when I most wanted your faithful services, I beg you would not now hasten your return, nor undertake your voyage either during the winter, or before you are perfectly recovered: for, he assured, I shall not think I see you too late, if I see you safe and well. I have — The favourable prospect which Cicero gives in this and the following passages of the senate's affairs is so little consistent with the despondency he expresses in the former part of this letter, that one would be apt to suspect they were two distinct epistles, which some negligent transcriber had blended together.

— See rem. 2, on letter 3 of this book.

— This, however, Cicero continued to avoid; and though, after much hesitation, he followed Pompey into Greece, he would accept of no command in his army, nor was he present at any engagement.
heard nothing of you since the letter I received by Marcus Valerius; but indeed I do not wonder at it, as I imagine the severity of the winter has likewise prevented my letters from reaching your hands. Take care of yourself, I conjure you, and do not sail till your health and the season shall be favourable. My son is at Formiae; but Tercatia and Tullia are still at Rome. Farewell. Capua, January the 29th.

LETTER VI.
Quintus Cicero to Tiro.
Your ill state of health occasions us great uneasiness; for though we have the satisfaction to hear that it is not attended with any dangerous symptoms, yet we are informed that your cure must be the work of time. But we cannot think, without much concern, of being longer separated from one whose agreeable company we learn to value by the regret we feel at his absence. However, notwithstanding I wish most earnestly to see you, yet I conjure you not to undertake so long a voyage till the season and your health shall render it safe. A tender constitution can ill defend itself against the severity of the weather even when sheltered under the covert of a warm roof, much less when exposed to all the inclemencies both of sea and land.

Foes to the weak are chilling blasts severe:
as Euripides assures us. What credit you may give to that divine poet, I know not; but for myself, I lock up his verses as so many indisputable maxims. In short, if you have any value for me, endeavour the re-establishment of your health, that you may as soon as possible return to us perfectly recovered. Farewell: and continue to love me.—My son salutes you.

LETTER VII.
Marcus Catillus to Cicero.
Was there ever a more absurd mortal than your friend Pompey, to act in so trifling a manner, after having raised such terrible commotions? Let me ask, on the other hand, whether 9 The brother of our author. Quintus Cicero, after having passed through the office of praetor, in the year of Rome 692, was elected governor of Asia, where he presided three years with little credit. He distinguished himself in Gaul as one of Caesar’s lieutenants, but at the breaking out of the civil war, he followed the fortune of Pompey. However, after the battle of Pharsalia, he made his peace with Caesar, and returned into Italy. He appears to have been of a haughty, imperious, penultate temper, and, in every view of his character, altogether unamiable. But what gives it a cast of peculiar dark thrown, is his conduct towards Cicero, whom he endeavoured to prejudice in the opinion of Caesar at a time when they were both the suppliants of his clemency. This, as far as can be collected from the letters to Atticus, was an instance of the basest and most aggravated ingratitude; for whatever Cicero’s failings might in other respects, he seems to have had none with regard to Quintus, but that of loving him with a tenderness he did deserve.—Ad Att. I. 15; vi. 6; xi. 8.

you ever heard or read of a general more undaunted in action, or more generous in victory, than our illustrious Caesar? Look upon his troops, my friend, and tell me whether one would not imagine, by the gaiety of their countenances, that, instead of having fought their way through the severest climates in the most inclement season, they had been regaling themselves in all the delicacies of ease and plenty! And, now, will you not think that I am immoderately elated? The truth of it is, if you knew the character of my heart, you would laugh at me for thus glorying in advantages in which I have no share. But I cannot explain this to you till we meet, which, I hope, will be very speedily: for it was Caesar’s intention to order me to Rome as soon as he should have driven Pompey out of Italy; and this I imagine he has already effected, unless the latter should choose to suffer a blockade in Brundisium.

My principal reason for wishing to be at Rome is in order to pour forth the fulness of my heart before you; for full, believe me, it is. And yet the joy of seeing you may perhaps make me, as usual, forget all my complaints, and banish from my thoughts whatever I intended to say. In the mean while, I am obliged (as a punishment, I suppose, for my sins) to march back towards the Alps. I am indebted for this agreeable expedition to a foolish insurrection of the Internelii. Bellicus, whose mother was a slave in the family of Demetrius, who commands the garrison there, was bribed by the opposite faction to seize and strangle a certain nobleman of that place, called Domitius, a person connected with Caesar by the rites of hospitality. The citizens, in resentment of this outrage, have taken up arms; and I have the mortification to be commanded to march thither, through a deep snow, with four cohorts, in order to quell them. Surely the Domitii are a curse wherever they exist. I wish, at least, that

7 The inhabitants of Intemelium, a maritime city in Liguria, now called Vintimiglia, in the territories of Genoa. Hospitality was considered from the earliest ages as in the number of the primary social duties. The sacred historian has recorded a remarkable instance of this kind in the story of Lot, who would rather have sacrificed his own daughters to the flagitious demands of his infamous fellow-citizens, than give up the supposed travellers whom he had invited to rest under the shadow of his roof. Agreeable to this Eastern practice, Homer frequently incalculates the maxim, that strangers are to be received as guests from heaven:

And Horace mentions the hospitable connexion among those of nearest and most tender regard:

Quo sit amores parentes, quo frater amandus et hospes. It will appear by several passages in the following letters, that this generous virtue subsisted among the Romans when every other was almost utterly extinct. The custom, indeed, of receiving strangers was so generally established, that travellers were scarce ever reduced to the necessity of taking up their lodgings at an inn. These who were thus entertained, or who exercised the same rites of humanity towards others, were called hospites, and mutually exchanged certain tokens which were termed testern hospitallitas. These were preserved in families, and carefully transmitted from father to son as memorials and pledges of the same good offices between their descendants.—Pest tac. Gen. xix.; Hor. Odys. xiv. 307. Hor. Ars poet. 313.
our heaven-descended chief had acted like this other of more humble lineage, and had treated Domitius at Coturnium in the same manner that his namesake has been treated at Intemelium. I salute your son. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

To Tiro.

I shall think myself indebted to you for all that I most value, whenever you give me the satisfaction of seeing you perfectly recovered.

A. U. 704.

In the mean time, I am in the utmost impatience for the return of Menander, whom I lately despatched with a letter to you. I conjure you, if you have any affections for me, to take care of your health, and let me see you as soon as it shall be thoroughly re-established. Farewell.

April the 10th.

LETTER IX.

To the same.

Menander returned a day later than I expected, which caused me to pass a miserable night in the most disquieting apprehensions. But though your letter did not remove my uncertainty as to your health, it in some measure, however, dispelled the gloom which had overcast my mind, as it was an evidence at least that you were still in being.

I have bidden adieu to all my literary amusements of every kind; nor shall I be capable of resuming them again till I see you here. Meanwhile, I expected that new misfortune which grieved the physician's demands may be satisfied; for which purpose I have likewise written to Curius. The former, I am told, attributes your distemper to that anxiety which I hear you indulge. But if you have any regard for me, awaken in your breast that manly spirit of philosophy for which I so tenderly love and value you. It is impossible you should recover your health if you do not preserve your spirits; and I entreat you to keep them up for every event as well as your own. I desire you likewise to retain Acastus, that you may be the more conveniently attended. In a word, my Tiro, preserve yourself for me.

Remember the time for the performance of my promise is approaching; but if you return to Italy before the day I fixed for that purpose, I will execute it immediately. Again and again I bid you farewell.

LETTER X.

To the same.

Egypta returned hither on the 12th of April. But though he assured me that you had lost your a. u. 704, fever, and were much mended, it gave me great uneasiness to find that you were not yet able to write; and the more so, as Hermia, whom I have treated the same day, is not yet arrived.

The concern I feel on account of your health is beyond all belief. Free me from this disquietude, I conjure you, and in return I will ease you of all your ills. I would write a longer letter, if I thought you were in a disposition to read one. I will therefore only add my request, that you would employ that excellent understanding, for which I so greatly esteem you, in studying what methods may best preserve you both to yourself and me. I repeat it again and again, take care of your health. Farewell.

Since I wrote the above, Hermia is arrived. He delivered your letter to me, which is written, I perceive, with a very unsteady hand. However, I cannot wonder at it, after so severe an illness. I despatch Egypta with this; and as he is a good-natured fellow, and seems to have an affection for you, I desire you would keep him to attend you. He is accompanied with a cook, whom I have likewise sent for your use. Farewell.

LETTER XI.

Quintus Cicero to the same.

I have strongly reproached you in my own mind for suffering a second packet to come away a. u. 704, without enclosing a letter to me. All your own rhetoric will be insufficient to avert the punishment you have incurred by this wanton neglect; and you must have recourse to some elaborate production of your patron's eloquence to appease my wrath. Though I doubt whether even his oratory will be able to persuade me that you have not been guilty of a very unpardonable omission. I remember it was a custom of my mother to put a seal upon her empty casks, in order, if any of her liquors should be purloined, that the servants might not pretend the vessel had been exhausted before. In the same manner, you should write to me though you nothing have to say, that your empty letters may be a proof, at least, that you would not defraud me of what I value. I value all, indeed, that come from you, as the very sincere and agreeable dictates of your heart. Farewell, and continue to love me.

Liberly, but restored to him a sum of money which he had lodged in the public treasury of the city. Some account of the occasion of this invertebrate enmity which Cælius expresses towards Domitius, may be seen in the 15th letter of the preceding book. Cæs. De Bell. Civ. i. 52.

w The commentators suppose, with great probability, that this alludes to a promise which Cicero had made to Tiro, of giving him his freedom.

x The time when this letter was written is altogether uncertain, and it is placed under the present year, not because there is any good reason for it, but because there is none against it.
LETTER XII.
To Servius Sulpicius.

I am informed by a letter from my friend Trebatius that you lately inquired after me, and expressed, at the same time, much concern that your indisposition had prevented you from seeing me when I was in the suburbs of Rome. To which he adds, that you are anxious if I should approach the city, of having a conference with me, in order to deliberate in what manner it becomes us to act in this critical season. I sincerely wish it had been in our power to have conferred together ere our affairs were utterly ruined, as I am persuaded we might have contributed somewhat to the support of our declining constitution. For, as you had long foreseen these public calamities, so I had the pleasure to hear, whilst I was in Sicilia, that both during your consulate and afterwards, you always stood forth an advocate for the peace of our country. But, though I totally concurred with you in these sentiments, yet, upon my return to Rome, it was too late to enforce them. I was, indeed, wholly unsupported in my opinion, and not only found myself among a set of men who were madly inflamed with a thirst of war, but was considered likewise as one who, by a long absence, was utterly unacquainted with the true state of the commonwealth. But, though it seems in vain to hope that our united counsels can now avail the republic, yet, if they can in any degree advantage ourselves, there is no man with whom I should more willingly confer. Not indeed with any view of securing the least part of our former dignities, but to consider in what manner we may most worthily deplore their loss; for I well know that your mind is amply stored with those examples of the great, and those maxims of the wise, which ought to guide and animate our conduct in this important conjuncture.

I should have told you before now that your presence in the senate, or, to speak more properly, in the convention of senators, would be altogether ineffectual, if I had not been apprehensive of giving offence to that person who endeavoured, by instigating your example, to persuade you. I very plainly assured him, however, when he applied to me for this purpose, that if I went to the senate, I should declare the same opinion concerning peace, and his expedition into Spain, which you had already delivered at your request.

The following year, you see, have spread themselves throughout the whole Roman dominions, and all the world have taken up arms under our respective chiefs. Rome, in the mean time, destitute of all rule or magistracy, of all justice or control, is wretchedly abandoned to the dreadful inroads of rapine and devastation. In this general anarchy and confusion, I know not what to expect; I scarcely know even what to wish. But, notwithstanding I had determined to retire to a farther distance from Rome, (as, indeed, I cannot even hear it named without reluctance,) yet I pay so great a regard to your judgment; that, if you think any advantage may arise from our interview, I am willing to return. In the mean time, I have requested Trebatius to receive your commands, if you should be desirous of communicating any to me by my mouth. I should be glad, indeed, that you would employ either him or any other of your friends whom you can trust with this occasion, as I would not lay you under the necessity of going out of Rome, or be myself obliged to advance much nearer to it. Perhaps I attribute too much to my own judgment, though I am sure I do not to yours, when I add, that I am persuaded the world will approve whatever measures we shall agree upon. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

Marcus Callius to Cicero.

The melancholy cast of your letter affects me with the deepest concern; and though you do not declare your intentions in direct and explicit terms, yet you leave me no room to doubt of what kind they are. I thus instantly, therefore, take up my pen, in order to conjure you, my dear friend, by the tenderness you bear to your children, and by all that is most valuable in your esteem, not to resolve upon any measures so totally inconsistent with your true welfare. Heaven and earth will be my witness that I have offered you no advice, nor sent you any prophetic admonitions, which I had not well and maturely considered. It was not, indeed, till after I had an interview with Caesar, and had fully discovered his sentiments, that I informed you in what manner he would most assuredly employ his victory. If you imagine he will be as easy in pardoning his enemies as he was reasonable in offering them terms of accommodation.

Cicero had an interview with Caesar, in the return of the latter to Brundisium, after Pompey had abandoned that city and fled into Greece. Caesar laboured to prevail with our author to return to Rome and take his seat in the senate. But Cicero acted upon this occasion with a spirit which we cannot but regret should have ever deserted him; he declared he would not attend the senate, but upon the terms of being at full liberty to deliver his sentiments, which, he confessed, were utterly against carrying the war into Spain, and altogether in favour of peace. Caesar as plainly assured him, that this was what he could not suffer; and recommending it to him to think a better of the matter, he conference ended, "very little," says Cicero, "to the satisfaction of Caesar, and very much to my own."—Ad Att. ix. 18.

tion, believe me, you will find that you have made a very erroneous calculation. His heart and his expressions breathe the severest resentment; and he left Rome highly incensed both against the senate and tribunes 4. In plain truth, he is by no means in a disposition to show the least favour to his adversaries. If you have any tenderness, therefore, to yourself, to your son, or to your family in general; if either my friendship, or the alliance of that worthy man who has married your daughter, can give us a claim to some influence over you, let me assure you, with the most profound respect, that they are attended with such uncommon success? Would it not be the highest indiscretion to join with those who are fleeing before his troops, after having refused to act in concert with them when they seemed inclined to resist? In fine, my friend, let me entreat you, whilst you are endeavouring to escape the imputation of being deficient in patriotism, to be careful lest you incur the censure of being deficient in prudence. But, after all, if I cannot wholly dissuade you from your resolution, suffer me at least to prevail with you to suspend the execution of it till the event of our expedition into Spain, which I shall venture, however, to assure you, will most certainly fall into our hands upon the very first appearance of Caesar's troops. And what hopes the opposite party can possibly entertain after the loss of that province, I am perfectly unable to discover. As far, likewise, is it beyond my penetration, what motive can induce you to join with those whose arts are thus evidently directed to render you incapable of attending with such success? But, after all, if I cannot wholly dissuade you from your resolution, suffer me at least to prevail with you to suspend the execution of it till the event of our expedition into Spain, which I shall venture, however, to assure you, will most certainly fall into our hands upon the very first appearance of Caesar's troops. LETTER XIV.
Cicero to Marcus Callius.

I SHOULD have been extremely affected by your letter, if reason had not banished from my heart all its disguisettes, and despair of seeing better days had not long since hardened it against every new impression of grief. Yet, strong as I must acknowledge my despondency to be, I am not sensible, however, that I said anything in my last which could justly raise the suspicion you have conceived. What more did my letter contain than general expressions of dissatisfaction at the sad prospect of our affairs? a prospect which cannot, surely, suggest to your own mind less gloomy apprehensions than it presents to mine. For I am too well persuaded of the force of your penetration, to imagine that my judgment can discover consequences which lie concealed from yours. But I am surprised that you, who ought to know me perfectly well, should believe me capable of acting with so little policy as to abandon a rising fortune for one in its decline, at least, if not utterly fallen; or so variable as not only to destroy at once all the interest I have established with Caesar, but to deviate even from myself, by engaging at last in a civil war, which it has hitherto been my determined maxim to avoid. Where, then, did you discover those unhappy resolutions you impute to me? Perhaps, you collected them from what I said of securing myself in some sequestered solitude. And, indeed, you are sensible how ill I can submit, I do not say to endure, but even to be a witness of the insolences of the successful party; a sentiment, my friend, which once, I am sure, was yours no less than mine. But in vain would I retire, whilst I preserve the title with which I am at present distinguished, and continue to be attended with this embarrassing parade of lictors. Were I eased of this troublesome honour, there is no part of Italy so obscure in which I should not be well contented to hide myself. Yet these my laurels, unwelcome as they are to myself, are the 4 Caesar, upon his return to Rome, after the siege of Brundisium, proposed to the senate that an embassy should be sent to Pompey, with proposals of peace. This the house agreed to; but when the question was moved concerning the persons to be appointed for this purpose, none of the members would undertake that commission. Caesar endeavoured, likewise, to procure a law for granting him the money in the public treasury, in order to carry on the war against Pompey. But Metellus, the tribune, interposing his negative, Caesar obtained his purpose by a shorter method. For, breaking open the temple of Saturn, in which this money was preserved, he first plundered his country of its patrimony, (says Florus,) and then of her liberty. Having thus possessed himself of an immense wealth, he immediately set out upon his expedition against Afranius and Petreus, the lieutenant of Pompey in Spain.—Cic. De Bell. Civ. i. 33; Dio. xii. Flor. iv. 2.

5 That of Imperator. See rem. b, on letter i, book i.

6 The lictors were a sort of beaides, who carried the ensigns of magistracy before the consuls, proconsuls, and other supreme officers of the state. These lictors continued to attend the proconsul after his return from his government, if he aspired (as Cicero did) to the honour of a triumph.

7 Cicero undoubtedly gave, upon this occasion, but too much colour to the censure of his enemies: for it could object both of the envy and the raiillery of my malevolent enemies. Nevertheless, under all these temptations of withdrawing from so disgusting a scene, I never once entertained a thought of leaving Italy without the previous approbation of yourself and some others. But you know the situation of my business, and as it is among these I am obliged to divide my time, that I may not incommodé my friends, the preference I give to those which stand on the sea-coast, has raised a suspicion that I am meditating a flight into Greece. If peace, indeed, were to be found in that country, I should not, perhaps, be unwilling to undertake the voyage: but to enter upon it in order to engage in a war, would be altogether inconsistent, surely, with my principles and character; especially, as it would be taking up arms, not only against a man who, I hope, is perfectly well satisfied with my conduct, but in favour of one whom it is now impossible I should ever render so. In a word, as I made no secret to you, when you met me at my Cuman villa, of the conversation which had passed between Amissus and myself, you could not be at a loss to guess my sentiments upon this head: and, indeed, you may say more, for you have known me too long to think that the scheme of Pompey's deserting Rome. Did I not then affirm that there was nothing I would not suffer, rather than be induced to follow the civil war beyond the limits of Italy? And has any event since happened, that could give me just reason of changing my sentiments? On the contrary, has not every circumstance concurred to fix me in them?k

Be assured (and I am well persuaded it is what you already believe) that the single aim of my actions, in these our public calamities, has been to convince the world that my great and earnest desire was to promote the peace of our country; and when this could no longer be hoped, that there was nothing I wished more than to avoid taking any part in the civil war. And I shall never, I trust, have reason to repent of firmly persevering in these sentiments. It was the frequent boast, I remember, of my friend Hortensius, that he had never taken up arms in any of our civil dissensions. But I may glory in the same honest neutrality with a much better grace: for that of Hortensius was suspected to have arisen from the timidity of his temper; whereas mine, I think, cannot be imputed to any motive of that unworthy kind. Nor am I in the least terrified by those considerations with which you so faithfully and affectionately endeavour to alarm my fears. The truth of it is, there is no calamity so severe to which we are not all of us, it should seem, in this universal anarchy and confusion. I, for my part, have nothing to fear. I could have averted this dreadful storm from the republic at the expense of my own private and domestic enjoyments, even of those, my friend, which you so emphatically recommend to my care, I should most willingly have made the sacrifice. As to my son, (who I rejoice to find has a share in your concern,) I shall leave him a sufficient patrimony in that honour with which my name will be remembered so long as the republic shall subsist: and if it be destroyed, I shall have the consolation, at least, to reflect that he will suffer nothing more than must be the common lot of every Roman. With regard to that dear and excellent young man my son-in-law, whose welfare you entreat me to consider, can you once doubt, knowing as you perfectly do the tenderness I bear, not only for him, but for Tullia, that I am infinitely more anxious upon this account? I am the more so, indeed, as it was my single consolation, amidst these general distractions, that they might possibly prove a means of protecting him from those inconveniences in which his too generous spirit had unhappily involved him.1 How much he suffered k Notwithstanding Cicero's strong assertions that he had no thoughts of joining Pompey, he had actually determined to do so a few days before he received the preceding letter from Cælius; as appears by an epistle to Atticus, wherein he expressly tells him that he was only waiting for a fair wind. But before he wrote the present letter, he had received some news not altogether favourable to Pompey's party; in consequence of which he renounced his former design, and was now determined (though he does not think proper to own it in this letter) to retire to Malta, as a neutral island. This resolution, however, he soon afterwards rejected, and resumed his first intentions of following Pompey into Greece. And this scheme he at length executed.—Ad Att. x. 8, 9. See rem. 1 on letter 15 of this book.

1 It should seem, by this passage, that Dolabella, who had contracted very considerable debts, was at this time under some difficulties from his creditors, from whom Cicero flattered himself that Caesar's power would have protected him. Some commentators, however, instead of liberalitate, adopted in this translation, read libertate, and suppose that Cicero alludes to the prosecution in which Dolabella had been engaged against Appius, of which a detail has been given in the preceding remarks.
from them during the time he continued in Rome, as well as how little that circumstance was to my credit, are points which I choose to leave to your inquiry.

Affairs in Spain, I doubt not, will terminate in the manner I have mentioned. But I neither wait the event of them in order to determine my conduct¹, nor am I acting in any other respect with the least artifice. If the republic should be preserved, I shall certainly hold my rank in it: but if it should be subverted, you yourself, I dare say, will join me in my intended solitude. But this latter supposition is perhaps the vain and groundless surmise of a disturbed imagination; and affairs, after all, may take a happier turn than I am apt to presage. I remember the despondency which prevailed in my earlier days amongst our patriots of more advanced years: possibly my present apprehensions may be of the same cast, and no other than the effect of a common weakness incident to old age. Heaven grant they may prove so! And yet you have heard, I suppose, that a role of magistracy is in the looms for Oppius; and that Curtius has hopes of being invested with the double-dyed purple²: but the principal workman, it seems, somewhat delays him. I throw in this little pleasantry to let you see that I cannot suppress the minds of my intimates.

Let me advise you to enter into the affair which I formerly mentioned concerning Dolabella, with the same warmth as if it were your own. I have

But whichever be the true word, the sentiment is observable. For surely it was utterly unworthy of Cicero, to find the least consolation amidst the calamities of his country, in the hope that they might prove a screen to Dolabella, either from the justice of his creditors, or the malice of his enemies.

The contrary of this was the truth: for Cicero was, at this time, determined to wait the event of Caesar's expedition against the lieutenant of Pompey in Spain. And for this purpose he had thoughts of retiring to Malta:—

"Multa muli, opinum, capassamus (says he to Atticus) dunn sit imperium...."—att. X. 6.

² Oppius and Curtius were persons who probably had distinguished themselves in no other manner than as being the servile instruments of Caesar's ambition. The former, however, appears to have been in high credit during Caesar's usurpation; but the latter is often mentioned in the letters to Atticus with great contempt. Servius, in his comment on the 7th book of the Aesop, informs us that the colour of the angular robe was a mixture of purple and scarlet: it is probable, therefore, from the expression which Cicero employs, that Curtius had a promise of being advanced into the sacred college. It might well discourage Cicero's hopes of better days, when he saw men of this character singled out to fill the most important dignities of the republic. And, indeed, it was an earnest of what Caesar afterwards practised, when he became the sole fountain of all preferment; which he distributed in the most arbitrary manner, without any regard to rank or merit. "Nullo honore, muli, accepimus (says one of the historians) ad libidinem cedit et dedit.—Civitate donatoc, et quosdam semilibaribus Gallorum, recept in curiam."—Suet. in Vit. Jul. Ces. 70.

only to add, that you may depend upon it I shall take no hasty or incon siderable measures. But to whatever part of the world I may direct my course, I entreat you to protect both me and mine, agreeably to your honour and to our mutual friendship. Farewell.

LETTER XV.
To Servius Sulpicius.

I received your letter at my Cuman villa, on the 29th of April. I find you shortened it upon the supposition that Philotimus would deliver it into my hands; whom, it seems, you had instructed to give me a more full and explicit information. But he did not execute his commission with the care he ought; for, instead of bringing your letter to me himself, he sent it by another person. However, this omission was supplied by a visit from your wife and son, who are both of them extremely desirous you should come hither, and indeed pressed me to write to you for that purpose.

You desire to know what measures I would recommend to you in this critical juncture. Believe me, I am in a situation of mind which renders me much more in need of a guide myself, than capable of conducting another. But were it otherwise, how should I venture to offer my advice to a man of your distinguished wisdom and dignity? This, however, I will say, that if the question be, in what manner it becomes us to act, the answer is plain and obvious: but what will be most expedient for our interest, is a point far less easy to determine. In short, if we think, as I am sure we ought, that honour and true interest must ever point the same way, there can be no dispute what path we have to pursue.

You imagine that we are both of us in the same circumstances; and most certainly we both committed the same mistake, when we honestly declared our opinions in favour of peace. All our counsels indeed equally tended to provide for civil war: and as this was the true interest of Caesar, we thought he would consider himself as obliged to us for supporting pacific measures. How much we were deceived is evident, you see, from the present posture of affairs. But you look, I know, much farther, and take into your view not only what has already happened or is now transacting, but the whole future progress and final tendency of these commotions. If, then, you should determine to remain in Rome, you must either approve the measures which are there carrying on, or be present at a scene which your heart condemns. But the former seems an unworthy part, and the latter, I think, altogether an unsafe one. My opinion is consequently for retiring: and the single point is, whether to direct our course? But as public affairs were never in a more desperate situation, so never was there a question attended with greater difficulties: whichever way one turns it, some important objection occurs. If you have resolved upon any scheme which is not consistent with mine, I could wish you would spare yourself the trouble of a journey hither: but if you are inclined to participate of my measures, I will wait your arrival.⁴

⁴ Sulpicius had an interview with Cicero at his Cuman villa, soon after the date of this letter; but the former was so much dispirited and so full of fears, that Cicero could
I beg you would be as expeditious for that purpose as you conveniently can; a request in which both Servius and Posthumia equally join. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.

To Rufus.

Though I never once doubted that I enjoyed the highest rank in your friendship, yet every day's experience strengthens me in that persuasion. You assured me, I remember, in one of your letters, that you should be more assiduous in giving one proof of your affection now than when you were my guest, as they would more indisputably appear to be the free result of a disinterested esteem. And though nothing, I thought, could exceed your good offices to me in the province, yet you have since fully evinced the sincerity of this promise. Accordingly, it was with great pleasure I observed the friendly impatience with which you expected my arrival in Rome when I had thought of going thither. The best evidence is that you afterwards expressed at my having laid aside that design when affairs had taken a different turn from what you imagined. But your last letter was particularly acceptable to me, as an instance both of your affection and your judgment. It afforded me much satisfaction, indeed, to find, on the one hand, that you consider your true interest (as every great and honest mind ought always to consider it) as inseparably connected with a constitution of conduct; and on the other, that you promise to accompany me whithersoever I may determine to steer. Nothing can be more agreeable to my inclination, nor, I trust, to your honour, than your executing this resolution. Mine has been fixed for some time, and it was not with any design of concealing it from you that I did not acquaint you with it before. My only reason was, that in public conjunctures of this kind, the communication of one's intentions to a friend looks like admonishing, or rather indeed pressing him to share in the difficulties and the dangers of one's schemes. I cannot, however, but willingly embrace an offer which proceeds from so affectionate and generous a disposition: though I must add, at the same time, (that I may not transgress the modest limits I have set to my requests of this nature,) that I by no means urge your compliance. If you shall think proper to pursue the measures you propose, I shall esteem myself greatly indebted to you; if not, I shall very readily excuse you. For though I should look upon the former as a tribute which you could not well refuse to my friendship, yet I shall consider the latter as the same reasonable concession to your fears. It must be owned, there is great difficulty how to act upon this occasion. It is true, what honour would direct is very apparent; but the prudential part is far from being a point so clear. However, if we would act up, as we ought, to the dictates of that philosophy we have mutually cultivated, we cannot once hesitate in thinking that the worthiest measures must, upon the whole, be the most expedient. If you are inclined, then, to embark with me, you must come hither immediately; but if it should not suit you to be thus expeditious, I will send you an exact account of my route. To be short, in whatever manner you may decide, I shall always consider you as my friend; but much more so if you should determine as I wish. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

To Terentiana and Tullia.

I am entirely free from the disorder in my stomach; which was the more painful, as I saw it occasioned both you and that dear girl at. 0. 704. whom I love better than my life so much uneasiness. I discovered this cause of this complaint the night after I left you, having discharged a great quantity of phlegm. This gave me so immediate a relief, that I cannot but believe I owe my cure to some heavenly interposition: to Apollo, no doubt, and AESCUPLIS. You will offer up your grateful tributes therefore to these restoring powers with all the ardency of your usual devotion.

I am this moment embarked1, and have procured

1 in order to join Pompey in Greece, who had left Italy about three months before the date of this letter. A late learned and most able panegyrist of Cicero assures us, that he took this measure, as choosing to follow the cause which he thought of the best, and for the consideration of duty to that of his safety. Cicero deserves so highly from every friend to genius and literature, that it is no wonder Dr. Middleton should not always speak of him with the cool impartiality of an unbiassed historian. But it is the principal purpose of these remarks to inquire, without prejudices of any kind, into the real merits of Cicero's political character: and as his conduct during this important crisis will evidently show the strength and measure of his patriotism, I shall trace it from the breaking out of the civil war to the present period, and then leave the facts to speak for themselves.

Upon the news that Caesar was marching into Italy, Pompey was appointed general-in-chief of the republican forces, and the principal magistrates, together with those who were invested with procurel power, were distributed into different cantons of Italy in order to raise troops for the defence of the common cause. Cicero had his particular district assigned him among the rest; but instead of executing this important commission with spirit and vigour, he remained altogether inactive at his several villas in that part of Italy. And this he signified to Caesar, by means of their common friend Trebatius, who had written to him in Caesar's name, in order to prevail with him to return to Rome. "Rescripti ad Trebatium quot lumbo horrendo tempore asero difficile: mei non per mead easce, neque deculum ulum, neque nostrum suscepsisse."—[AD Att. vi. 37.] Pompey, in the mean times, was pressing Cicero to join him; but he excused himself by representing that whilst he was actually on the road for that purpose, he was informed that he could not proceed without the danger of being intercepted by Caesar's troops. [Epist. 2; Cicor. ad Pompey and Epist. ad Att. viii.] Cicero, however, is so ingenuous as to acknowledge, in the same letter to Pompey, that so long as there were hopes that the negotiations for a peace would be attended with success, he thought it a justifiable plea of prudence not to be too active in forwarding the preparations that were carrying on against Caesar; remembering, he says, how much he had formerly suffered from the restiveness of the latter in the affair of his exile. This was explaining, a ship which I hope is well able to perform her voyage. As soon as I shall have finished this letter, I propose to write to several of my friends, recommending you and our dearest Tullia in the strongest terms to their protection. In the mean time I should exhort you to keep up your spirits, if I did not know that both of you are animated with a more than manly fortitude. And, indeed, I hope there is a fair prospect of your remaining in Italy without any inconvenience, and of my returning to the defence of the republic, in conjunction with those who are no less faithfully devoted to its interest.

After earnestly recommending to you the care of your health, let me make it my next request, that you would dispose of yourself in such of my villas as are at the greatest distance from the army. And if provisions should become scarce in Rome, I should think you will find it most convenient to remove with your servants to Arpinum.

at once, the true principle of his whole conduct, and he avows it more expressly in a letter to Atticus. "Non solumcum Pompeius, sed etiam cum Pompeio, non potius est; exact ratio dorum, sed tamen (fatemur tamen) quod est) feletit eae mens, quae forte nee debuit; sed fedelt; pacem putavi fore; quae si esset, iratum mihi Caesaris esse, cum idem amicus esset Pompeio, nulli. Sane enim quam animadvertet. Hor. Venes in hanc tarditatem incidit." [AD Att. x. 6.] Pompey, having no sooner set sail for Greece, than Cicero was struck with the consciousness of his having acted an unworthy part:-"Postquam Pompeius et consultes ex Italia, excut, non est animus (saei) sed ardeo dolores; sed sum, quaerar mihi eadem causam, qua animadvertit mihi dedocete, rum admittere video." [AD Att. ix. 6.] After several deliberations, therefore, he was determined, he tells Atticus, to follow Pompey, without waiting the event of Caesar's arms in Spain. [AD Att. ix. 19; x. 6.] This resolution, nevertheless, soon gave way to a second; for having received some accounts which contradicted a former report that had been spread concerning the advantageous posture of Pompey's affairs, Cicero renounced his intention of joining him, and now purposed to stand neutral. [AD Att. x. 12.] In favour of Pompey, he had brought Cicero back to his former scheme; for, in a subsequent letter to Atticus, wherein he mentions some reasons to believe that Pompey's affairs went well in Spain, and takes notice, likewise, of some disgraces which the populace expressed towards Caesar in the theatre, we find him resuming his design of openly uniting with Pompey; and accordingly he resolved to join those who were maintaining Pompey's cause in Sicily. [AD Att. x. 12.] It does not appear, by any of his letters, upon what motive he afterwards exchanged his plan for that of sailing directly to Pompey's camp in Greece; which, after various debates with himself, he at length, we see, executed. There is a passage, however, in Caesar's Commentaries, which, perhaps, will render it probable that the new resolve, which he conceived at Rome, that Caesar's army had been almost totally defeated in Spain, was the determining reason that sent Cicero to Pompey. The fact was, that Afranius and Petreus had gained some advantages over Caesar; but as they magnified them, in their letters to Rome, much beyond the truth, several persons of note, who had hitherto been fluctuating in their resolutions, thought it was now high time to declare themselves, and went off immediately to Pompey. ..."Cic. De Domit. C. 3. 53.

The amiable young Cicero most tenderly salutes you. Again and again I bid you farewell.

June the 11th.

LETTER XVIII.

Marcus Caius to Cicero.

Was it for this that I followed Caesar into Spain? Why was I not rather at Formiae, that I might have accompanied you to Pompey? But I was infatuated; and it was my aversion to Appius*, together with my friendship for Curio, that gradually drew me into this cursed cause. Nor were you entirely unnecessary to my error: for that night, when I called upon you in my way to Ariminum, why did you forget the friend when you were gloriously acting the patriot, and not dissuade me from the purpose of my journey, at the same time that you commissioned me to urge Caesar to pacific measures? Not that I have an ill opinion of the cause; but, believe me, perdition itself was preferable to being a witness of the insufferable behaviour of these insolent partisans. They have rendered themselves so generally odious, that we should long since have been driven out of Rome, were it not for the apprehensions which people have conceived of the cruel intentions of your party. There is not, at this juncture, a man in Rome, except a few rascally usurers, who does not wish well to Pompey; and I have already brought over to your cause not only those among which now comprehends part of the Campagna di Roma, and of the Terra di Lavoro. Cicero was born in this town, which still subsists under the name of Arpinum.

* This letter confirms the character that has been given of Cicero in a former remark; [See rem. b, p. 389.] and shows him to have been of a temper extravagantly warm and impetuous. The resentment and indignation with which it is invested, was owing to the great disappointment that he had met with from Caesar, who had not distinguished him agreeably to his expectations. Cicero, therefore, who was one of the praetors for the present year, endeavoured to take his revenge by opposing the execution of certain laws which Caesar had proposed. His attempts for this purpose having created great disturbances in Rome, he was not only deposed from his office, but expelled the senate; and the present letter seems to have been written immediately upon that event.—Dio, xlii. p. 190; Cic. De Bell. Civ. vii. 50.

* Appius engaged on the side of Pompey, as Curio was a warm partisan of Caesar. For the occasion of Cicero's resentment against Appius, see book vi. letter 14.

* In order to join Caesar, Cicero was one of the party with Curio and Antony, when they fled to Caesar. [Dio, xli. p. 153.]—See the first letter of this book, and rem. 1 on the same.

* The chiefs of Caesar's party at Rome.

* When Pompey left Rome, upon the approach of Caesar, he declared that he should trust all those as enemies who did not follow him: a declaration, it was imagined, which he would most rigorously have fulfilled, if fortune had put it in his power.—Ces. De Bell. Civ. I.; Cic. Epist. passim.
the plebeian families who were in the interest of Caesar, but the whole populace in general. But you will ask, perhaps, what can this avail us now? Wait the event, my friend; victory shall attend you in spite of yourselves. For surely a profound lethargy has locked up all the senses of your party, as they do not yet seem sensible how open we lie to an attack, and how little capable we are of making any considerable opposition. It is by no means an interested motive that I offer my assistance, but merely in resentment of the unworthy usage I have received; and resentment is a passion which usually carries me, you know, the greatest lengths. But what are you doing on the other side, the water? Are you imprudently waiting to give the enemy battle? What Pompey's forces may be, I know not; but Caesar's, I am sure, are accustomed to action, and incurred to all the hardships of the most severe campaigns. Farewell.

LETTER XIX.

_Dolabella_ to Cicero.

I shall rejoice to hear you are well: I have the satisfaction to inform you, that both Tullia and myself are perfectly so. Terentia, indeed, has been somewhat indisposed, but is now, I am assured, perfectly recovered. As to the rest of your family, they are all of them in the state you wish.

It would be doing me great injustice to suspect that I have at any time advised you to join with me in the cause of Caesar, or at least to stand near him, in view to the advantage of my own party than of your interest. But now that fortune has declined on our side, it is impossible I should be supposed to recommend this alternative for any other reason but because the duty I owe you will not suffer me to be silent. Whether my advice, therefore, shall meet with your approbation or not, you will at least be so just as to believe that it proceeds, my dear Cicero, from an honest intention, and from a heart most sincerely desirous of your welfare.

You see that neither the lofty title with which Pompey is distinguished, nor the credit of his former illustrious actions, nor the advantages he so frequently boasted of having kings and nations in the number of his clients, have anything availled him. On the contrary, he has suffered a disgrace which never, perhaps, attended any other Roman general. For, after having lost both the Spaniards, together with a veteran army, and after having also been driven out of Italy, he is now so strongly invested on all sides, that he cannot execute what the meanest soldier has often performed; he cannot make even an honourable retreat. You will consider, then, agreeably to your usual prudence, what hopes can possibly remain either to him or yourself; and the result will evidently point out the measures which are most expedient for you to pursue. Let me entreat you, if Pompey has already extricated himself out of the danger in which he was involved, and taken refuge in his fleet, that you would now at least think it time to consult your own interest in preference to that of any other man. You have performed everything which gratitude and friendship can expect, or the party you approved can require. What remains, then, but to sit down quietly under the republic, as it now subsists, rather than, by vainly contending for the old constitution, to be absolutely deprived of both? If Pompey, therefore, should be driven from his present post and obliged to retreat still farther, I conjure you, my dear Cicero, to withdraw to Athens, or to any other city unconcerned in the war. If you should comply with this advice, I beg you would give me notice, that I may fly to embrace you, if by any means it should be in my power. Your own interest with Caesar, together with the natural generosity of his temper, will render it extremely easy for you to obtain any honourable conditions you shall demand; and I am persuaded that my solicitations will have no inconsiderable weight for this purpose.

I rely upon your honour and your humanity to take care that this messenger may safely return to me with your answer. Farewell.

LETTER XX.

_To Terentia._

I am informed, by the letters of my friends, as well as by other accounts, that you have had a sudden attack of a fever. I entreat you, therefore, to employ the utmost care to re-establish your health. The early notice you gave me of Caesar's letter was extremely agreeable to me; and let me desire you would send me the same expeditious intelligence, if anything should hereafter occur that concerns me to know. Once more I conjure you to take care of your health. Farewell.

June the 24th.

2 This country was divided by the Romans into the Near and the Farther Spain; that part which lay near the Pyrenees and the river Iber being comprehended under the former appellation, and all beyond that river, under the latter.

3 It is probable that some slight success which Caesar had obtained before Dyrichium, had but very lately magnetized him at Rome: for Pompey was so far from being in the situation which Dolabella here represents to him, that Caesar found himself obliged to abandon the siege of this city, and to retire into Thessaly.—_Dio_, xiii. p. 177.

4 This letter was written by Cicero, in the camp at Dyrichium, for there is one extant to Atticus later than this, and dated from the camp. _Ad Att. xii_.18.— _Ros._
LETTER XXI.
To the same.
I ENTREAT you to take all proper measures for the recovery of your health. Let me request, likewise, that you would provide whatever may be necessary in the present conjuncture, and that you would send me frequent accounts how everything goes on. Farewell.

A. V. 704.

LETTER XXII.
To the same.
I HAVE seldom an opportunity of writing, and scarce anything to say that I choose to trust in a letter. I find, by your last, that you cannot meet with a purchaser for any of our farms. I beg, therefore, you would consider of some other method of raising money, in order to satisfy that person who, you are sensible, I am very desirous should be paid.¹

I am by no means surprised that you should have received the thanks of our friend, as I dare say she had great reason to acknowledge your kindness.

If Pollux¹ is not yet set out, I desire you would exercise your authority, and force the loiterer to depart immediately. Farewell.

July the 19th.

LETTER XXIII.
To the same.
May the joy you express at my safe arrival in Italy² be never interrupted! But my mind was so much discomposed by those atrocious injuries I had received,³ that I have taken a step, I fear, which may be attended with great difficulties⁴. Let me, then, entertain your utmost assistance; though I must confess, at the same time, that I know not whereon it can avail me.

I would by no means have you think of coming hither; for the journey is both long and dangerous, and I do not see in what manner you could be of any service. Farewell.

Brundisium, Nov. the 5th.

LETTER XXIV.
To the same.
The ill state of health into which Tullia is fallen, is a very severe addition to the many and great disquietudes that afflict my mind.⁵ But A. V. 704. I need say nothing farther upon this subject.¹²

¹ After the battle of Pharsalia, Cicero would not engage himself any farther with the Pompeian party; but, having endeavoured to make his peace with Caesar by the mediation of Dolabella, he seems to have received no other answer than an order to return immediately into Italy. And this he accordingly did a few days before the date of the present letter.—Ad Att. xi. 7.²

Cicero, who was somewhat indisposed and much out of humour, did not attend Pompey when he marched from Dyrrachium in order to follow Caesar. Cato was likewise left behind, with fifteen cohorts, to conduct the baggage; but upon the news of Pompey's defeat in the plains of Pharsalia, he pressed Cicero to take upon himself the command of those troops, as being of superior rank in the republic. Cicero, who had all along declined accepting any commission in Pompey's army, was not disposed, it may well be imagined, to be more active against Caesar, when the latter had just obtained a most signal victory. Accordingly, he absolutely refused this offer which Cato made; declaring, at the same time, his resolution of withdrawing from the common cause. This exasperated the young Pompey and his friends to such a degree, that they would have killed Cicero upon the spot, if Cato had not generously interposed, and conducted him safely out of the camp. It is probably to this outrage that he here alludes,—Ad Att. xi. 4; Plut. in Vit. Cicer.³

¹ It has been observed, that Cicero scarce ever executed an important resolution of which he did not immediately repent. This, at least, was the situation of his mind in the present instance, and he was no sooner arrived in Italy, than he began to condemn himself for having too hastily determined upon that measure. The letters which he wrote to Atticus at this period, and which comprise almost the 11th book of those epistles, contain little else than so many proofs of this assertion. Cicero imagined, after the decisive action that had lately happened in the plains of Pharsalia, that the chiefs of the Pompeian party would instantly sue for peace. But Caesar, instead of directly pursuing his victory, suffered himself to be diverted by a war altogether foreign to his purpose, and in which the charms of Cheapside, perhaps, carried him farther than he at first intended. This gave the Pompeians an opportunity of collecting their scattered forces, and of forming a very considerable army in Africa. As this circumstance was utterly unexpected by Cicero, it occasioned him infinite disquietude, and produced those reproaches which he is perpetually throwing out upon himself in the letters above-mentioned to Atticus. Per, if the republican party should, after all, have returned triumphant into Italy, he knew he should be treated as one who had merited their utmost resentment.

² On the following letters in this book to Terentius were written during the interval of Cicero's arrival at Brundisium, and Caesar's return into Italy, which contains a period of about eleven months.

³ The anxiety which Cicero laboured under, at this juncture, was undoubtedly severe. Besides the uneasiness...
subject, as I am sure her welfare is no less a part of your tender concern than it is of mine.

I agree both with you and her in thinking it proper that I should advance nearer to Rome; and I should have done so before now, if I had not been prevented by several difficulties which I am not yet able to remove. But I am in expectation of a letter from Atticus, with his sentiments upon this subject; and I beg you would forward it to me by the earliest opportunity. Farewell.

LETTER XXV.

To the same.

In addition to my other misfortunes, I have now to lament the illness both of Dolabella and Tullia. The whole frame of my mind is, indeed, so utterly discomposed, that I know not what to resolve, or how to act, in any of my affairs. I can only conjure you to take care of yourself and of Tullia. Farewell.

LETTER XXVI.

To the same.

If anything occurred worth communicating to you, my letters would be more frequent and much longer. But I need not tell you the situation of my affairs; and as to the effect they have upon my mind, I leave it to Lepta and Trebius to inform you. I have only to add my entreaties that you would take care of your own and Tullia's health. Farewell.

LETTER XXVII.

To Titius.

There is none of your friends less capable than I am to offer consolation to you under your present affliction,—as the share I take in your loss renders me greatly in need of the same good office myself. However, as my grief does not rise to the same extreme degree as yours, I should not think I discharged the duty which my connexion and friendship with you require if I remained altogether silent at a time when you are thus overwhelmed with sorrow. I determined, mentioned in the last remark, he was, likewise, under great disquietude from the uncertainty of the disposition in which Caesar stood towards him. And, to add yet more to the discomposure of his mind, it was at this time that he received the cruel usage from his brother, of which an account has been given in rem. P. p. 452. He had still greater misfortunes of a domestic kind to increase the weight of his sorrows, which will be pointed out as they shall occasionally offer themselves in the remaining letters to Terentius.

Cicero was still at Brundisium, from which place all the following letters in this book to Terentius, except the last, seem to have been written.

It is altogether uncertain who the person is to whom this letter is addressed; perhaps the same to whom the 16th of the third book is written. [See rem. c. p. 384.]

The precise date, likewise, is extremely doubtful: however, the opinion of Darsfeld is here followed, who, in his edition of these epistles, has placed it under the present year.

so many approaching calamities are in prospect, cannot possibly, it should seem, be a loser by the exchange. Let me ask, not only where honour, virtue and probity, where true philosophy and the useful arts, can now fly for refuge, but where even our liberties and our lives can be secure? For my own part, I have never once heard of the death of any youth during all this last sad year, whom I have not considered as kindly delivered by the immortal gods from the miseries of these wretched times. If, therefore, you can be persuaded to think that their condition is by no means unhappy whose loss you tenderly deplore, it must undoubtedly prove a very considerable abatement of your present affliction; for it will then entirely arise from what you feel upon your own account, and have no relation to the persons whose death you grieve. Now it would ill agree with those wise and generous maxims which have ever inspired your breast, to be too sensible of misfortunes which terminate in your own person, and affect not the happiness of those you love. You have upon all occasions, both public and private, shown yourself animated with the firmest fortitude; and it becomes you to act up to the character you have thus justly acquired. Time necessarily wears out the deepest impressions of sorrow; and the weakest mother that ever lost a child has found some period to her grief; but we should wisely anticipate that effect which a certain revolution of days will undoubtedly produce, and not wait for a remedy from time which we may much sooner receive from reason.

If what I have said can anything avail in lessening the weight of your affliction, I shall have obtained my wish; if not, I shall at least have discharged the duties of that friendship and affection which, believe me, I ever have preserved, and ever shall preserve towards you. Farewell.

LETTER XXVIII.
To Terentia.

My affairs are at present in such a situation, that I have no reason to expect a letter on your part, A. D. 706, and have nothing to communicate to you on mine. Yet I know not how it is, I can no more forbear flattering myself that I may hear from you, than I can refrain from writing to you whenever I meet with a conveyance.

Volumnia ought to have shown herself more zealous for your interest; and in the particular instance you mention, she might have acted with greater care and caution. This, however, is but a slight grievance amongst others which I far more severely feel and lament. They have the effect upon me, indeed, which those persons undoubtedly wished, who compelled me into measures utterly opposite to my own sentiments. Farewell.

December the 31st.

The commentators are divided in their opinions concerning the persons to whom Cicero here alludes, as they are likewise as to the year when this letter was written. There are two periods; indeed, of Cicero’s life, with which this epistle will equally coincide: the time when he was in banishment, and the time when he returned into Italy, after the defeat of Pompey. The opinion, however, of Victories has been followed, in placing this letter under the present year; who supposes, not without probability, that the persons here meant are the same of whom Cicero complains in the 230th letter of this book.

LETTER XXIX.
To Acilius, Proconsul.

Lucius Manlius Sobir was formerly a citizen of Catania; but having afterwards obtained the freedom of Naples, he is at present one of the members of their council. He is likewise a citizen of Rome; having been admitted to that privilege with the rest of the Neapolitans, in consequence of the general grant which was made for that purpose to our allies and the inhabitants of Latium. He has lately succeeded to an estate at Catina by the death of his brother, and is now in actual possession. But though I do not imagine that his right is likely to be controverted; yet, as he has other affairs of consequence in Sicily, I recommend his concerns of every kind in that island to your protection. But I particularly recommend himself to you as a most worthy man; as one with whom I am intimately connected; and as a person who excels in those sciences I principally admire. Whether, therefore, he shall think proper to return into Sicily or not, I desire you would consider him as my very particular friend, and that you would treat him in such a manner as to convince him that this letter proved greatly to his advantage. Farewell.

LETTER XXX.
To Terentia.

Tullia arrived here on the 12th of this month. It extremely affected me to see a woman of her singular and amiable virtues reduced (and reduced too by my own negligence) to a situation far other than is agreeable to her rank and filial piety.*

I have some thoughts of sending my son, accom-

* He was governor of Sicily; which is all that is known of his history. The laborious and accurate Pignius places his administration of that island under the present year; and Mr. Ross assigns it to a very good reason for being of the same opinion. For it appears (as that gentleman observes) that Cicero’s correspondence with Acilius was carried on when the latter was proconsul of Sicily, and during the time that Caesar had the supreme authority. It is probable, therefore, that these letters were written in the present year; because, in all the others that fall within that period, the persons who severally resided in Sicily are known to have been Posthumius Albinus, Aulus Aelianus, and Titus Fureanius. See Mr. Ross’s Remarks on the Epist. Famil. vol. iv. p. 629.

† A maritime city in Sicily, now called Catania. It continued to be a town of considerable note, till the eruptions of Mount Etna in 1669 and 1693, which almost entirely laid it in ruins.†

† June.

§ Dolabella was greatly embarrassed in his affairs; and it seems by this passage as if he had not allowed Tullia a maintenance, during his absence, sufficient to support her rank and dignity. The negligence with which Cicero reproaches himself, probably relates to his not having secured a proper settlement on his daughter, when he made the second payment of her fortune to Dolabella. For in a letter written to Atticus about this time, he expressely condemns himself for having acted imprudently in that affair. ‘‘In pensioni secundis (says he) cæs tui vuimus.”

—Ad Att. xi. 19.
panied by Sallustius, with a letter to Caesar; and if I should execute this design, I will let you know when he sets out. In the mean time, be careful of your health, I conjure you. Farewell.

LETTER XXXI.
To the same.
I had determined, agreeably to what I mentioned in my former, to send my son to meet Caesar on his return to Italy; but I have since altered my resolution, as I hear no news of his arrival. For the rest I refer you to Sicela, who will inform you what measures I think necessary to be taken; though I must add, that nothing new has occurred since I wrote last. Tullia is still with me.—Adieu, and take all possible care of your health.

June the 20th.

LETTER XXXII.
To Aeilius, Proconslul.
Caius Flaviius, an illustrious Roman knight, of an honourable family, is one, with whom I live in great intimacy; he was a very particular friend likewise of my son-in-law Piso. Both he and his brother Lucius show me the strongest instances of their regard. I shall receive it, therefore, as an honour done to myself, if you will treat Caius with all the marks of favour and distinction that shall be consistent with your character and dignity; and be assured you cannot, in any article, more effectually oblige me, than by complying with this request. I will add, that the rank which he bears in the world, the credit in which he stands with those of his own order, together with his polite and grateful disposition, will afford you reason to be extremely well satisfied with the good offices you shall confer upon him. When I say this, believe me I am not prompted by any interested motives, but speak the sincere dictates of truth and friendship. Farewell.

LETTER XXXIII.
To Terentia.
I wrote to Atticus (somewhat later indeed than I ought) concerning the affair you mention. When you talk to him upon that head, he will inform you of my inclinations; and I need not be more explicit here, after having written so fully to him.
Let me know as soon as possible what steps you take in that business; and acquaint me at the same time with everything else which concerns me. I have only to add my request, that you would be careful of your health. Farewell.

July the 9th.

LETTER XXXIV.
To the same.
In answer to what you object concerning the divorce I mentioned in my last, I can only say, that I am perfectly ignorant what power Dolabella may at this time possess, or what quarrels there may be among the populace. However, if you think there is anything to be apprehended from his resentment, let the matter rest; and perhaps the first proposal may come from himself. Nevertheless, I leave you to act as you shall judge proper; not doubting that you will take such measures in this most unfortunate affair as shall appear to be attended with the fewest unhappy consequences. Farewell.

July the 10th.

LETTER XXXV.
To Aeilius, Proconsul.
Marcus and Caius Clodius, together with Archagathus and Philo, all of them inhabitants of the noble and elegant city of Halles, are persons with whom I am united by every tie of friendship and hospitality. But I am afraid if I recommend so many at once to your particular favour, you will be apt to suspect that I write merely from some motive of an interested kind; though, indeed, both myself and my friends have reason to be abundantly satisfied with the regard you always pay to my letters of this nature. Let me assure you, then, that both Archagathus and Philo, as also the whole family of the Clodi, have, by a long series of affectionate offices, a right to my best assistance. I very earnestly entreat you, therefore, as an obligation that will be highly agreeable to me, that you would promote their interest upon all occasions, as far as the honour and dignity of your character shall permit. — Farewell.

* Between Tullia and Dolabella. The occasion of this divorce is so darkly hinted at in the letters to Atticus, that it is altogether impossible to penetrate into the reasons that produced it; one, however, seems to have arisen from an intrigue that was carrying on between Dolabella and Metella. This lady was wife to Lentulus Spinther (to whom several letters in the first and second book of this collection are addressed), and is supposed to be the same person whom Horace mentions in his epistles to the son of the celebrated tragic poet, — See vol. ii. p. 208; Ad Att. xi. 20.

b Mr. Ross supposes that the letters to which Cicero refers is the 19th of the 11th book to Atticus. If this conjecture be right, (as it is highly probable,) the business hinted at concerned the making of Terentia's will, and also the raising of the money towards the support of Tullia, by the sale of some plate and furniture.—Ad Att. xi. 18, 20.

c The passage in the original is extremely corrupt. The translator has adopted the reading proposed by Mr. Ross; — sed si metuendus iuratus est: quibus; tum ab illo forti: nescetur.
LETTER XXXVI.

To Cassius.

It was the hope that peace would be restored to our country, and the abhorrence of spilling the blood of our fellow-citizens, that equally induced both you and myself to decline an obstinate perseverance in the civil war; but though these sentiments were common to us both, yet, as I am considered as having been the first to inspire you with them, it is more my part, perhaps, to render you satisfied with having adopted them, than it is yours to perform the same friendly office towards me. But, to say the truth, (and it is a circumstance upon which I frequently reflect,) we mutually convinced each other in the free conversations we held upon this subject, that a single battle, if it should not wholly determine our cause, ought to be the limits, however, of our particular opposition. And these sentiments have never been seriously condemned by any but those alone who think it more eligible that our constitution should be totally destroyed, than in any degree impaired. But my opinion was far otherwise: for I had no views to gratify by its extinction, and had much to hope from its remains. As to the consequences which have since ensued, they lay far beyond the reach of human discernment; and the wonder is, not so much how they escaped our penetration, as how it was possible they should have happened. I must confess my own opinion always was, that the battle of Pharsalia would be decisive; and I imagined that the victors would act with a regard to the common preservation of all, and the vanquished to their own. But both the one and the other, I was well aware, depended on the expedition with which the conquerors should pursue their success. And had they pursued it immediately, those who have since carried the war into Africa would have experienced (and experienced too, if I do not flatter myself, by my intercession) the same clemency with which the rest of our party have been treated, who retired into Asia and Achaea. But the critical opportunity (that season so important in all transactions, and especially in a civil war) was unhappily lost; and a whole year intervening, it raised the spirits of some of our party to hope they might recover the victory, and rendered others so desperate as not to dread the reverse. Fortune, however, must be answerable for the whole train of evils which this delay has produced. For who would have imagined either that the Alexandrine war could have been drawn out to so great a length, or that the paltry Pharracnes, could have struck such a terror throughout Asia? But though we both acted by the same measures, our particular situations, however, are extremely different. The scheme which you thought proper to execute, has given you admission into Caesar's councils, and opened a prospect to you of his future purposes; an advantage, most certainly, that must spare you all the unseasiness which attends a state of doubt and suspense. Whereas, for myself, as I imagined that Caesar would immediately after the battle of Pharsalia have returned into Italy, I hastened hither in order to encourage and improve that pacific disposition which he had discovered by his generosity to so many of his illustrious enemies; a word, that you would inform me what we are to expect, and how you would advise me to act. Be assured, I shall lay great stress upon your sentiments; and had I wisely followed those you gave me in your first letter from Luceria, I might, without difficulty, have still preserved my dignities. Farewell.

Pharaces was son of the famous Mithridates, king of Pontus. [See rem. c, p. 333.] This young prince, taking advantage of Caesar's being engaged in the Alexandrine war, made an incursion into Cappadocia and the Lesser Armenia, the dominions of Deiotarus, a tributary king to the Romans. Domitius Calvinus, whom Caesar had appointed to command in Asia and the neighbouring provinces, having received notice of this invasion, marched immediately to the assistance of Deiotarus. The two armies came to action, but in which Caesar had the superiority. Calvinus, at the same time, being called away by Caesar, who had occasion for those troops to complete the conquest of Alexandria, Pharaces took that opportunity of forcing Pontus, which he seized as his hereditary dominions, and where he committed great cruelties and devastations. This letter seems to have been written soon after the transaction above related, and probably while Caesar himself was on the march in order to chastise the insolence of Pharaces. It was in giving an account of this expedition that Caesar made use of that celebrated expression in a letter to one of his friends, Veni, vidi, vici.—Hirt. De Bell. Alexander. 31; Plut. in Vit. Caesar.

Caesar, after the battle of Pharsalia, sent Mark Antony into Italy, as his master of the horse (an office, in the absence of the dictator, of supreme authority in the commonwealth; but Antony abused the power with which he was thus invested, and taking advantage of the disturbances mentioned in rem. d, p. 464, turned them to his private purposes, by enriching himself with the spoils of his fellow citizens. This seems to have been the occasion of these general complaints to which Cicero here alludes—Plut. in Vit. Anton.; Oic. Phil. ii. 24, 25.

Now called Lucera, a city of Italy, situated in the Céphtan, a part of the ancient Apulia.
LETTER XXXVII.

To Acilius, Proconsul.

There is no man of the same rank as Octavius Naso, with whom I more intimately converse; as, indeed, the polite and virtuous cast of his mind renders my daily intercourse with him extremely pleasing to me. After having thus acquainted you with the terms upon which we live together, I need add nothing further to recommend him to your good opinion. He has some affairs in your province which he has entrusted to the management of his freedmen Hilarus, Antigonus, and Demonstratus: these, therefore, together with all the concerns of Naso, I beseech you to receive under your protection. I ask this with the same warmth as if I were personally interested; and be assured, I shall think myself highly obliged if I should find that this letter shall have bad great weight with you. Farewell.

August the 11th.

LETTER XXXVIII.

To Terentia.

I have not yet heard any news either of Caesar’s arrival, or of his letter which Philotimus, I was informed, had in charge to deliver to me. But be assured, you shall immediately receive the first certain intelligence I shall be able to send you. Take care of your health. Adieu.

August the 11th.

LETTER XXXIX.

To the same.

I have at last received a letter from Caesar, and written in no unfavourable terms. It is now said that he will be in Italy much sooner than was expected. I have not yet resolved whether to wait for him here, or to meet him on his way; but, as soon as I shall have determined that point, I will let you know. I beg you would immediately send back this messenger; and let me conjure you, at the same time, to take all possible care of your health. Farewell.

August the 12th.

LETTER XL.

To Acilius, Proconsul.

I have been an old and hereditary guest at the house of Lyso, of Lilybaeum, ever since the time of his grandfather, and he accordingly distinguishes me with singular marks of his respect; as, indeed, I have found him to be worthy of that illustrious ancestry from which he descends. For this reason, I very strenuously recommend both himself and his family to your good offices, and entreat you to let him see that my recommendation has proved much to his honour and advantage. Farewell.

LETTER XLI.

To Terentia.

I am in daily expectation of my couriers, whose return will, perhaps, render me less doubtful what course to pursue. As soon as they shall arrive, I will give you immediate notice. Meanwhile be careful of your health. Farewell.

September the 1st.

LETTER XLII.

To the same.

I purpose to be at my Tuscan villa about the 7th or 8th of this month. I beg that everything may be ready for my reception, as I shall, perhaps, bring several friends with me; and I may probably, too, continue there some time. If a vase is wanting in the bath, let it be supplied with one: and I desire you would, likewise, provide whatever else may be necessary for the health and entertainment of my guests. Farewell.

Venusia, October the 1st.

LETTER XLIII.

To Acilius, Proconsul.

Caius Avianus Philoxenus is my old host. But, besides this connexion, he is, likewise, my particular friend; and it was in consequence of my good offices that Caesar admitted him into the corporation of Novocomum. It was upon this occasion he assumed the family name of his friend Flaccus Avianus, whom I believe you to know, to be, likewise, extremely mine. I mention these circumstances as so many proofs that my recommendation of Philoxenus is not founded upon common motives. I entreat you, then, to receive him into the number of your friends; to assist him in every instance that shall not break in upon your own convenience; and, in a word, to let him see that this letter proved of singular service to him. Your compliance with this request will be obliging me in the most sensible manner. Farewell.

a A sea-port town in Sicily, now called Marsala.

b Whether to wait at Brundisium the arrival of Caesar, or to set out in order to meet him.

C Cicero continued at Brundisium till Caesar arrived in Italy, who came much sooner than was expected, and landed at Tarentum some time in September. They had an interview with each other, which ended much to the satisfaction of Cicero, who, intending to follow Caesar towards Rome, wrote this letter to his wife, to prepare for his reception at his Tuscan villa."—Ross, Remarks on Cic. Epistles.

TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

LETTER XLIV.

To Trobonius.

I read your letter, but particularly the treatise that attended it, with great pleasure. It was a pleasure, nevertheless, not without its alloy; as I could not but regret that you should leave us at a time when you had thus inflamed my heart, I do not say with a stronger affection (for that could admit of no increase), but with a more ardent desire of enjoying your company. My single consolation arises from the hope that we shall endeavour to alleviate the pain of this absence by a mutual exchange of long and frequent letters. Whilst I promise this on my part, I assure myself of the same on yours; as indeed you have left me no room to doubt how bittersweet a war I stand in your regard. Need I mention those public instances I formerly received of your friendship, when you showed the world that you considered my enemies as your own; when you stood forth my generous advocate in the assemblies of the people; when you acted with that spirit which the consuls ought to have shown, in maintaining the cause of liberty, by supporting mine; and, though only a quatorzox, yet left behind you a name to the superior authority of a tribune, whilst your colleague, at the same time, mainly yielded to his measures? Need I mention (what I shall always, however, most gratefully remember) the more recent instances of your regard to me, in the solicitude you expressed for my safety when I engaged in the late war; in the joy you showed when I returned into Italy; in your friendly participation of all those cares and disquietudes with which I was at that time oppressed; and, in a word, in your kind intent of visiting me at Brundium, if you had not been suddenly ordered to Spain? To omit, I say, these various and inestimable proofs of your friendship, is not the treatise you have now sent me a most conspicuous evidence of the share I enjoy in your heart. It is so, indeed, in a double view; and, not only friendly to my particular person and concern, but, and, perhaps, single, admirer of my wit, but as you have placed it, likewise, in so advantageous a light as to render it, whatever it may be in itself, extremely agreeable. The truth of it is, your manner of relating my pleasantry is not less humorous than the conceits you celebrate, and half the reader's mirth is exhausted ere he arrives at my joke. In short, if I had no other obligation to you for making this collection than your having suffered me to be so long present to your thoughts, I should be utterly insensible if we were not to impress upon me the most affectionate sentiments. When I consider, indeed, that nothing but the warmest attachment could have engaged you in such a work, I cannot suppose any man to have a greater regard for himself than you have thus discovered for me. I wish it may be in my power to make you as amply a return in every other instance, as I most certainly do in the affection of my heart; a return with which I trust, however, you will be perfectly well satisfied.

But to return from your performance to your very agreeable letter: full as it was, I may yet answer it in few words. Let me assure you, then, in the first place, that I no more imagined the letter which I sent to Calvus would be made public, than I suspect that this will; and you are sensible that a letter designed to go no farther than the hand to which it is addressed, is written in a very different manner from one intended for general inspection. But you think, it seems, that I have spoken in higher terms of his abilities than truth will justify. It was my real opinion, however, that he possessed a great genius, and, notwithstanding that he misapplied it by a wrong choice of that particular species of eloquence which he adopted, yet he certainly discovered great judgment in his execution. In a word, his compositions were marked with a vein of uncommon erudition; but they wanted a certain strength and spirit of colouring to render them perfectly finished. It was the attainment, therefore, of this quality that I endeavoured to recommend to his pursuit; and the seasoning of advice with applause, has a wonderful

1 He was tribune in the year of Rome 608, at which time he distinguished himself by being the principal promoter of those unconstitutional grants that were made by the people to Pompey, Caesar, and Crassus, for the enlargement of their power and dignities. After the expiration of his tribunitian, he went into Gaul, in quality of Caesar's lieutenant; and on the breaking out of the civil war, he was honoured by Caesar with the command at the siege of Marseilles. In the year before the date of this letter, he was elected to the office of praetor, in which he discovered great spirit and judgment in opposing the factious measures of his colleague, the turbulent Catulus, of whose attempts mention has been made in rem. v. p. 459. In the present year he was appointed proconsul of Spain, to which province he was either just setting out or actually upon the road when this letter was written. — Dio, xxxix. p. 105; Caesar De Bell. 2 A collection of Cicero's bons mots.

3 Trobonius was quaestor in the year of Rome 603, when Lucius Afranius and Quintus Metellus Cesar were consuls. It was at this time that Clodius (desirous of obtaining the tribunitian, in order to oppress Cicero with the weight of that powerful magistracy) made his first effort to obtain a law for ratifying his adoption into a plebeian family, none but plebeians being entitled to exercise that office. The tribune to whom Cicero here alludes is Herennius, whom Clodius had prevailed upon to propose this law to the people, and whose indigence and principles qualified him for undertaking any work for any man that would give him his price. Both the one were likewise favourers of this law when it was first proposed; but Metellus, when he discovered the factious designs which Clodius had in view, thought proper, afterwards, most strongly to oppose it. The collegaue of Trobonius in the quaestorship was Quintus Caecilius Metellus, of whose particular enmity to Cicero an account has been given in rem. 1, on letter 2, of book i., and by Cicero himself in the third letter of the same book. — Ad Att. i. 18, 19; Dio, xxxvii. p. 53; Pbg. Annal. 693.

6 When he was waiting the arrival of Caesar.

7 A very celebrated orator, who, though not much above thirty when he died, (which was a short time before this letter was written,) yet left behind him a large collection of orations; he was concerned with Cicero in most of the principal causes that came into the forum during the short time in which he flourished. The letter here mentioned was probably part of a correspondence carried on between Cicero and Calvis on the subject of eloquence, the whole of which was extant long after the death of our author, though none of these epistles have reached our times. — Quint. Inst. x. 1; Auct. Dialog. de Caus. corrupt. Elocuent. 18. 21.
efficacy in firing the genius and animating the efforts of those one wishes to persuade. This was the true motive of the praises I bestowed upon Calvis, of whose talents I really had a very high opinion.

I have only farther to assure you, that my affectionate wishes attend you in your journey; that I shall impatiently expect your return; that I shall faithfully preserve you in my remembrance; and that I shall soothe the uneasiness of your absence by keeping up this epistolary commerce. Let me entreat you to reflect, on your part, on the many and great offices I have received at your hands; and which, though you may forget, I never can, without being guilty of a most unpardonable ingratitude. It is impossible, indeed, you should reflect on the obligations you have conferred upon me, without believing, not only that I have some merit, but that I think of you with the highest esteem and affection. Farewell.

LETTER XLV.

To Aelius, Proconsul.

I HAVE long had obligations to Demetrius Magus for the generous reception he gave me when I was A. U. 706, in Sicily: indeed there is none of his countrymen with whom I ever entered into so strong a friendship. At my particular instances, Dolabella prevailed with Caesar to grant him the freedom of Rome, and I assisted at the ceremony of his admission; accordingly he now takes upon himself the name of Publius Cornelius. The ill use which some men, of a mean and avaricious turn, had made of Caesar's confidence, by exposing priviliges of this kind to sale, induced him to make a general revocation of these grants. However, he assured Dolabella, in my presence, that he had no reason to be under any apprehension with respect to Magus; for his benefaction, he said, should still remain to him in its full force. I thought proper to mention this, that you might treat him with the consideration which is due to a Roman citizen; and it is with the utmost zeal that I recommend him to your favour in all other respects. You cannot, indeed, confer upon me a higher obligation than by convincing my friend that this letter procured him the honour of your peculiar regard.—Farewell.

x "It is but allowing a man to be what he would have the world think him, (says Sir Richard Steele,) to make him anything else that one pleases." This judicious piece of scepticism, however, deserve to be highly applauded in the present instance, as it proceeded entirely from a desire of benefiting the person on whom it was employed. But what renders it more remarkably generous is, that Calvis contested, though very unequally indeed, the palm of eloquence with Cicero. Yet the latter, we see, generously endeavoured to correct the taste of his rival, and improve him into a less inadequate competitor. For Cicero was too conscious of his sublime abilities, to be infected with that low jealousy so visible in wits of an inferior rank, who seem to think they can rise in fame in proportion as they shall be able to sink the merit of contemporary geniuses.—Senece. Controvers. lib. 19.

7 See rem. 1, p. 466.

LETTER XLVI.

To Sextilius Rufus, Quaestor.

I RECOMMEND all the Cyprians in general to your protection, but particularly those belonging to the district of Paphos: and I shall hold myself obliged to you for any instance of your favour that you shall think proper to show them. It is with the more willingness I apply to you in their behalf, as it much imports your character (in which I greatly interest myself) that you, who are the first quaestor that ever held the government of Cyprus, should form such ordinances as may deserve to be followed as so many precedents by your successors. It will contribute, I hope, to this end, if you shall pursue that edict which was published by your friend Lentulus, together with those which were enacted likewise by myself, as your adopting them will prove, I trust, much to your honour. Farewell.

LETTER XLVII.

To Aelius, Proconsul.

I STRONGLY recommend my friend and host Hippia to your good offices: he is a citizen of A. U. 706, Calactina, and the son of Philocenus. His estate (as the affair has been represented to me) has been illegally seized for the use of the public; and if this should be the truth, your own equity, without any other recommendation, will sufficiently incline you to see that justice is done him. But, whatever the circumstances of his case may be, I request it as an honour to myself, and an honour too of the most obliging kind, that you would in this, and in every other article in which he is concerned, favour him with your assistance; so far, I mean, as shall not be inconsistent with the honour and dignity of your character. Farewell.

LETTER XLVIII.

To the same.

Lucius Bruttius, a young man of equestrian rank, is in the number of those with whom I am most particularly intimate: there has been a great friendship, likewise, between his father and myself; ever since I was quaestor in Sicily. He distinguishes me by peculiar marks of his observance, and is adorned with every valuable accomplishment. He is at present my guest; but I most earnestly recommend his family, his affairs, and his agents, to your protection. You will confer upon me a most acceptable obligation, by giving him reason to find (as, indeed, I have ventured to assure him) that this letter proved much to his advantage. Farewell.

LETTER XLIX.

To Lucius Papirius Petus.*

Is it true, my friend, that you look upon yourself as having been guilty of a most ridiculous piece of folly, in attempting to imitate the thunder, as you call it, of my eloquence? With reason, indeed, you might have thought so, had you failed in your attempt; but, since you have excelled the model you had in view, the disgrace surely is on my side, not on yours. The verse, therefore, which you apply to yourself, from one of Trabea’s comedies, may with much more justice be turned upon me, as my own eloquence falls far short of that perfection at which I aim. But tell me what sort of figure do my letters make? are they not written, think you, in the true familiar? They do not constantly, however, preserve one uniform manner; as this species of composition bears no resemblance to that of the oratorical kind; though, indeed, in judicial matters, we vary our style according to the nature of the causes in which we are engaged. Those, for example, in which private interests of little moment are concerned, we treat with a suitable simplicity of direction; but where the reputation or the life of our client is in question, we rise into greater pomp and dignity of phrase. But, whatever may be the subject of my letters, they still speak the language of conversation.

How came you to imagine that all your family have been plebeians, when it is certain that many of them were patricians, of the lower order? To begin with the first in this catalogue, I will instance Lucius Papirius Magillanus, who, in the year of Rome 312, was censor with Lucius Sempronius Atratinus, as he before had been his colleague in the consulate. At this time your family name was Papirius. After him there were thirteen of your ancestors who were curule magistrates, before Lucius Papirius Crassus, who was the first of your family that changed the name of Papiris. This Papirius, in the year 315, being chosen dictator, appointed Lucius Papirius Castor to be his master of the horse, and four years afterwards he was elected consul, together with Caius Dulinius. Next in this list appears Cursor, a man highly honoured in his generation; and after him we find Lucius Masso, the orator, together with several others of the same appellation; and I could wish that you had the portraits of all these patricians among your family-pictures. The Carhones and the Turdi follow next. This branch of your family were all of them plebeians, and they by no means reflect any honour upon your race. For, excepting Caius Carbo, who was murdered by Damassippus, there is not one of his name who was not an enemy to his country. There was another Caius, whom I personally knew, as well as the buffoon, his brother: they were both of them men of the most worthless characters. As to the son of Rubria, he was my friend, for which reason I shall pass him over in silence, and only mention his three brothers, Caius, Cneius, and Marcus. Marcus, having committed numberless acts of violence and oppression in Sicily, was prosecuted for those crimes by Publius Flaccus, and found guilty: Caius being, likewise, impeached by Lucius Crassus, is said to have poisoned himself with caustic acids. He was the author of great disturbances during the time that he exercised the office of tribune, and is supposed to have been concerned in the murder of Scipio Africanus. As to Cneius, who was put to death by my friend Pompey, as Livy says, there never existed, I believe, a more infamous character. It is generally imagined that the father of this man, in order to avoid the consequences of a prosecution which was commenced against him by Marcus Antonius, put an end to his life by a draught of vitriol. Thus, my friend, I would advise you to claim your kindred among the patricians; for you see the plebeian part of your family were but a worthless and sedulous race. Farewell.

LETTER L.

To Atticus, Proconsul.

I have long had a friendship with the family of the Titurnii; the last surviving branch of which is Marcus Titurnius Rufus. He has a claim, therefore, in my best good offices, and it is in your power to render them effectual. Accordingly I recommend him to your favour, in all the most unfeigned warmth of my heart; and you will extremely oblige me by giving him strong proofs of the regard you pay to my recommendation. Farewell.

* This Caius Papirius Carbo was three times consul; the last of which was in the year of Rome 671. Having exercised his power in a most oppressive and tyrannical manner, he was deposed, to the great satisfaction of the republic, by Sylla, who was immediately declared dictator. Carbo soon afterwards appeared, with a considerable fleet, upon the coast of Sicily; and being taken prisoner by Pompey, whom Sylla had sent in pursuit of him, he was formally arraigned before the tribunal of Pompey, and publicly executed by his orders at Lilybæum.—Plut. in Vit. Pom.

1 The time when this poet flourished is uncertain. His topographical writings seem to have been in great repute, as Cicero frequently quotes them in his Tusculan Disputations.

2 The patrician families were distinguished into the higher and the lower order. Of the former set were those who derived their pedigrees from the two hundred senators who composed the senate, as it was originally established by Romulus: of the latter, were the descendants of the members which, above a century afterwards, were added to this celebrated council, by T. Quinctius Florus—Bouin. Anq. R. p. 687.

3 The curule magistrates were those particular officers of the state who had the privilege of being drawn in a car. These were the consuls, the censors, the proconsuls, and curule aediles.

4 See Rom. ii, on letter 2, book vi.

5 It may be proper to apprise the reader, in this place, that there is one epieth from Cicero to Petus, which is omitted in this translation. Cicero takes occasion, in this rejected letter, to explain to his friend the notion of the Sibyl concerning obscenity; and, in order to illustrate their absurd reasoning upon this subject, he introduces a great variety of double-entendres, which, as they turn upon ambiguities that hold only in the Latin language, it is utterly impossible to translate. But, had they been reconcileable to our idiom, the translator would nevertheless have declined the office of being their interpreter; as he would not have deprived himself of the satisfaction to think that there is nothing in this volume unfit for the perusal of the fair part of his readers—Ep. Fam. 1x. 22.
BOOK VIII.

LETTER I.

To Marcus Marius. 1

WHENEVER I reflect, as indeed I frequently do, on those public calamities we have thus long endured, and are still likely to endure, it always brings to my thoughts the last interview we had together. It made so strong an impression upon my mind, that I can name the very day; and I perfectly well remember it was on the tenth of May, in the consulate of Lentulus and Marcellus, 2 that, upon my arrival at my Pompeian villa, 3 I found you waiting for me with the most friendly solicitude. Your generous concern arose from a tenderness both for my honour and my safety; as the former you feared would be endangered if I continued in Italy; and the latter, if I went to Pompey. I was myself, likewise, as you undoubtedly perceived, so greatly perplexed as to be incapable of determining which of these measures was most advisable. However, I resolved to sacrifice all considerations of personal safety to the dictates of my honour; and accordingly I joined Pompey in Greece. But I no sooner arrived in his army than I had occasion to repent of my resolution; not so much from the danger to which I was myself exposed, as from the many capital faults I discovered among them. In the first place, Pompey's forces were neither very considerable in point of numbers, 4 nor by any means composed of warlike troops; and in the next place, (I speak, however, with exception of Pompey himself, and a few others of the principal leaders,) they carried on the war with such a spirit of rapacionsness, and breathed such principles of cruelty in their conversation, that I could not think even upon our success without horror. To this I must add, that some of the most considerable officers were deeply involved in debt; and, in short, there was nothing good among them but their cause. Thus despairing of success, I advised (what, indeed, I had always recommended) that proposals of accommodation should be offered to Caesar; and when I found Pompey utterly averse to all measures of that kind, I endeavoured to persuade him, at least, to avoid a general engagement. This last advice he seemed sometimes inclined to follow, and probably would have followed, if a slight advantage, which he soon afterwards gained, 5 had not given him a confidence in his troops. From that moment all the skill and conduct of this great man seems to have utterly forsaken him; and he acted so little like a general, that, with a raw and inexperienced army, he imprudently gave battle 6 to the most brave and martial legions. The consequence was, that he suffered a most shameful defeat; and, abandoning his camp to Caesar, he was obliged to run away, unaccompanied even with a single attendant. 7 This event determined me to lay down my arms, being persuaded that if we could not prevail with our united forces, we should scarce have better success when they were broken and dispersed. I declined, therefore, to engage any farther in a war, the result of which must necessarily be attended with either of the following unhappy consequences:

friends, after the action was over, that the enemy would have obtained a complete victory, had they been commanded by a general that knew how to conquer.—Plut. in Vit. Pomps.

7 In the plains of Pharsalia. The principal officers of Pompey's army were so elated by their late success before Dyrachium, that they pursued Caesar as to certain conquest; and, instead of concerning measures for securing their victory, were employed in warmly contesting among themselves their several proportions of the spoils. Pompey was not less confident of success than the rest; and he had the imprudence to declare, in a council of war, which was held a few days before this important battle, that he did not doubt of entirely defeating Caesar by the single strength of his cavalry, and without engaging his legions in the action.—Cass. De Bell. Civ. lib. 83, 86.

It is very observable, that the day on which this memorable battle was fought is nowhere recorded, and that it was not known even in Lucan's time:—

"Tempora signavi leviorum Roma malorum, Hune velut nascire diam."—Lucan, vii. 410.

6 Plutarch resembles Pompey's flight to that of Ajax before Hector, as described in the 11th book:—

"Zeus δὲ πατὴρ Αἴανθος ἔφυβος ἐν ψαλιν ἀφρός, Σθῆ δὲ τοῖχος," k. τ. λ.

"—Partial Jove, espousing Hector's part, Shot heav'n-born horror thro' the Grecian's heart; Confused, unnerved in Hector's presence grown, Amazed he stood, with horrors not his own. O'er his broad back his moody shield he threw, And, glaring round, by tardy steps withdrew."—Pope.

In fact, however, it was attended with all the circumstances of disgrace which Cicero mentions. Pompey, after various deliberations, resolved to take shelter in Egypt, where he had reason to hope for a protector in Ptolemy, whose father he had formerly assisted in recovering his dominions. [See rem. 1, on letter 19, book 1.] But Theodotus, a sort of tutor to this young prince, not thinking it prudent either to receive Pompey, or to refuse him admissence, proposed, as the best policy, that he should be destroyed. Accordingly the persons who were sent to conduct him from his ship had directions to be his executioners; which they performed, by stabbing him, as he was stepping out of the boat, in order to land. These assassins, having severed Pompey's head, left his body on the shore, where it was burned with the planks of an old fishing-boat, by a faithful freedman, who had been the unhappy spectator of this affecting tragedy. Pompey's ashes were afterwards conveyed to his wife Cornelia, who deposited them in a family monument near his Alban villa.—Plut. in Vit. Pomps.
either to perish in the field of battle, to be taken prisoner by the conquerors, to be sacrificed by treachery; to have recourse to Juba, to live in a sort of voluntary exile, or to fall by one's own hand. Other choice was most certainly there, one, if you would not, or could not, stoop to the self-scrutiny of the victor. Banishment, it must be owned, to a mind that had nothing to reproach itself with, would have been the most eligible of all these evils; especially under the reflection of being driven from a commonwealth, which presents nothing to our view but what we must behold with pain. Nevertheless, I chose to remain with my own; if anything now, indeed, can with propriety be called our own; a misfortune which, together with every other calamity that this fatal war has produced, I long since foretold. I returned, therefore, to Italy, not as to a situation perfectly desirable, but in order, if the republic should in any degree subsist, to enjoy somewhat that had, at least, the semblance of our country; and if it were utterly destroyed, to live as if I were to all essential purposes in a real state of exile. But though I saw no reason that could justly induce me to be my own executioner, I saw many to be desirous of death. For it is an old and true maxim, that "life is no better envied than the way in which he is no longer what he once was." A blameless conscience, however, is undoubtedly a great consolation; especially as I can add to it the double support that arises to my mind, from a knowledge of the noblest sciences, and from the glory of my former actions; one of which can never be torn from me so long as I live; and of the other, even death itself has not the power to deprive me.

I have troubled you with this minute detail, from

1 This seems to allude to the fate of Pompey.
2 He was a very considerable prince, whose dominions extended not only over that part of Africa which is now called the coast of Barbary, but southward beyond mount Atlas, and from the Strait's mouth along the Atlantic ocean to the Canary islands. Upon the first breaking out of the civil war, he distinguished himself in supporting the Pompeian party, in Africa, against the army commanded by Cæsar, whom he entirely defeated. [See Rem. i. p. 105, p. 111.]——Lucan has given a very poetical description of the several tributary nations which, upon this occasion, were led to battle——

"Autoëlusa, Numidicae vaga, nemperque parasita Inculto Genus quoq;

"With him nummum'd nations march along,
'T Autoëlusa with wild Numidians throng;
The rough Gentilum, with his ruder steed,
The Moor, resembling India's swarthy breed:
Poor Namaons, and Garumantes joa'd,

With swift Maranides that match the wind;
The Marax bred the trembling dart to throw,
Sure as the shaft that leaves the Parthian bow;
With these Massylia's nimble horseman ride;
They nor hit, nor curving rein provide,
But go as fast as they do cease to ride.

From lonely cots the Libyan hunters came,
Who still unarm'd invade the salvage game,
And with spread mantles tawny lions tame."——Rowe.

After the battle of Pharsalia, Scipio, who commanded the remains of Pompey's army that had assembled in Africa, applied to Juba for assistance; who, accordingly, joined him with a very considerable body of men. But their united forces were not sufficient to withstand the force of Caesar; who, having defeated their combined troops, Juba was too high-spirited to suffer the disgrace, and, at his own request, was stabbed by one of his attendants.—

3 Pompey.
4 Rhodes, the metropolis of an island in the Mediterranean, and Mytilene, the principal city of Lesbos, an island in the Egean sea, were places to which Marius and some others of the Pompeian party retired after the battle of Pharsalia. These cities were esteemed by the ancients for the delightful temperature of their respective climates, and for many other delicacies with which they abounded; and, accordingly, Horace, in his ode to Pharsalia, mentions them in the number of those which were most admired and celebrated by his countrymen:—

"Laudabant urbem clarum Rhodon, urbem Mytilenam."——

Both Vitruvius and Cicero, likewise, speak of Mytilene in particular, with the highest encomiums on the elegance, beauty, and magnificence of its buildings. It should seem, therefore, that the text is corrupted in this place; and that, instead of—_non incommoda loco_ the true reading is—_non commodum_. Cicero, indeed, would make use of a very odd sort of justification, if we suppose him to have said that he had not chosen a more commodious place for his residence than Rhodes or Mytilene; whereas it was much to his purpose to assert, that the exiles in those cities were full as conveniently situated as himself. For the rest, it will appear in the progress of these letters, that Cicero was far from living at Rome as in a state of exile, during Caesar's usurpation.—Hor. Od. i. 7; Vir. L. 16; Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 16.
LETTER II.

To Cneius Plancius.

I AM indebted to you for two letters, dated from Coreya. You congratulate me in one of them on the account you have received, that I still preserve my former influence in the commonwealth, and wish me joy in the other of my late marriage. With respect to the first, if to mean well to the interest of my country, and to approve that meaning to every friend of its liberties, may be considered as maintaining my influence, the account you have heard is certainly true. But if it consists in rendering those sentiments effectual to the public welfare, or, at least, in daring freely to support and enforce them, alas! my friend, I have not the least shadow of influence remaining. The fact is, it will be sufficient honour if I can have so much influence over myself as to bear with patience our present and impending calamities; a frame of mind not to be acquired without difficulty, when it is considered that the present war is such, that if one party is successful, it will be attended with an infinite effusion of blood; and if the other, with a total extinction of liberty. It affords me some consolation, however, under these dangers, to reflect that I clearly foresaw these and that part of the greatness I dreaded our victory as well as our defeat: I was perfectly aware of the hazard to which our liberties would be exposed, by referring our political contentsions to the decision of the sword. I knew, indeed, if that party should prevail which I joined, not from a passion for war, but merely with the hopes of facilitating an accommodation, what cruelties were to be expected from their pride, their avarice, and their revenge. On the contrary, should they be vanquished, I was sensible what numbers of the best and most illustrious of our fellow-citizens would inevitably perish. And yet, when I fore warned these men of our danger, and justly advised them to avoid it, instead of receiving my admonitions as the effect of a prudential caution, they chose to treat it as the dictates of an unreasonal timidity.

But to turn to your other letter: I am obliged to you for your good wishes in regard to my marriage, as I am well persuaded that they are perfectly sincere. I should have had no thoughts, in these miserable times, of entering into any new engagement of this sort, if I had not, upon my return into Italy, found my domestic affairs in no better a situation than those of the republic. When I discovered that, through the wicked practices of those whom I had infinitely obliged, and to whom my welfare ought to have been infinitely dear, that there was no security for me within my own walls, and that I was surrounded by treachery on all sides, I thought it necessary to protect myself against the perfidiousness of my old connexions, by having recourse to a more faithful alliance.—But enough of my private concerns: and perhaps too much. As to those which relate to yourself, I hope you have the opinion of them which you justly ought, and are free from all particular uneasiness on your own account. For I am well persuaded, that whatever may be the event of public affairs, you will be perfectly secure: as one of the contending parties, I perceive, is already reconciled to you; and the other you have never offended. With respect to my own disposition towards you: though I well know the narrow extent of my power, and how little my services can now avail, yet you may be assured of my most considerate wish, and least anxious concern, wherein either your character or your interest is concerned. In the mean time, let me know as soon as possible how it fares with you, and what measures you purpose to pursue. Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Toranius.

Although I imagine this miserable war is either already terminated by some decisive engagement; or at least is approaching to its conclusion; yet I am.

7 Cicero had very lately divorced his wife Terentia, on occasion of some great offence she had given him in her economical conduct. The person to whom he was now married, was called Pufilia, a young lady to whom he had been guardian, and of an age extremely disproportionate to his own. His principal inducement to this match seems to have been her fortune, which, it is said, was very considerable. However, he did not long enjoy the benefit of it; for, finding himself uneasy, likewise, under this second marriage, he soon parted with his young wife, and consequently with her portion. This very unequal match exposed Cicero to much censure; and Calenus warmly reproached him with it, in that bitter invective which he delivered, as Dio, at least, pretends, in reply to one of Cicero's against Mark Antony.—Ad Att. xiii. 34; Dio, lix. p. 303.

6 Sextonius mentions a person of this name, who was elected into the office of aedile with Octavius, the father of Augustus, and who afterwards, notwithstanding he had been guardian to Augustus himself, was in the number of those who persisted by the sanguinary proscriptions of that emperor. One of the commentators upon that historian supposes him to be the same person to whom this letter is addressed; and indeed the conjecture is extremely probable. However, all that can be affirmed with any certainty concerning Teranius is, that he took part in the civil war on the side of Pompey, and that,
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

LETTER IV.

To Marcus Terentius Varro.4

ATTIUS lately read a letter to me that he had received from you, by which I was informed that you are, and in what manner employed: but it mentioned no circumstance that could lead me to guess when we might expect to see you. I hope, however, that the time of your coming hither is approaching, and that your company will afford me consolation under our general misfortunes: though, indeed, they are so numerous and so severe, that it is a folly to expect anything will be sufficient for that purpose. Nevertheless, there are some instances, perhaps, in which we may prove of mutual assistance to each other. For since my return to Rome, you must know, I am reconciled to those old companions of mine, my books. Not that I was estranged from them out of any disgust; but that I could not look upon them without some sort of shame. It seemed, indeed, that I had ill observed their precepts, when I joined with pernicious associates in taking part in our publiccommotions. They are willing, however, to pardon my error, and invite me to renew my former acquaintance with them; applauding, at the same time, your superior wisdom, in never having forsaken their society. Thus restored, therefore, as I am, to their good graces, may I not hope, if I can unite your company with theirs, to support myself under the pressure of our present and impending calamities? Wherever, then, you shall choose I should join you, be it at Tusculum, atCumae, or at Rome, I shall most readily obey your summons. The place I last named would, indeed, be the least acceptable to me. But it is of no great consequence where we meet; for if we can but he together, I will undertake to render the place of meeting equally agreeable to both of us. Farewell.

4 Marcus Terentius Varro had been lieutenant to Pompey in the punic war; in which he distinguished himself with so much advantage, as to be honoured with a naval crown: an honour usually conferred on those who had signalised their valour in a sea engagement. He was afterwards appointed, in conjunction with Afranius and Petreus, lieutenant to Pompey in Spain: and he was serving, in that quality, when the civil war broke out. He was at that time the head of two legions in the farther Spain: but his colleagues having been defeated by Cesar, he found himself in no condition to resist, and accordingly surrendered himself and his army into the hands of the conqueror. He seems from that time to have withdrawn from public affairs, and to have consecrated the remainder of his life (which he is said to have preserved, with all his senses entire, to the age of a hundred) wholly to philosophical studies. His genius and talents, indeed, were principally of the literary kind: in which he was universally acknowledged to hold the first rank among his contemporaries. He published many treatises in all the various branches of human science; one or two of the least considerable of which, at those not entire, are the whole that now remain of his numberless compositions.—Curs. De Bell. Civ. 17, & c.; Val. Max. viii. 7; Cic. Acad. 1. 3.

Varro's books were his companions, it seems, in the camp as well as in the closet; and he was never wholly separated from them, it appears, even amidst the most active engagements of public life.

Varro had a villa near each of these places.
LETTER V.
To Toranius.

As I wrote to you three days ago by some domestics of Plancius, I shall be so much the shorter at present; and as my former was a letter of consolation, this shall be one of advice.

I think nothing can be more for your advantage than to remain in your present situation, till you shall be able to learn in what manner you are to act. For, not to mention that you will by this mean avoid the danger of a long winter-voyage in a sea that affords but few harbours, there is this very material consideration, that you may soon cross over into Italy, whenever you shall receive any certain intelligence. Nor do I see any reason for your being desirous of presenting yourself to Caesar's friends in their return. In short, I have met many objections to your scheme, for the particulars of which I refer you to our friend Chilo. You cannot, indeed, in these unfortunate times, be more conveniently placed than where you now are; as you may, with great facility and expedition, transport yourself from thence to whatever other part of the world you shall find it necessary to remove. If Caesar should return at the time he is expected, you may be in Italy soon enough to wait upon him; but should anything happen (as many things possibly may) to prevent or retard his march, you are in a place where you may receive an early information of all that occurs. To repeat it therefore once more, I am altogether of opinion that you should continue in your present quarters.

I will only add, (what I have often exhorting you in my former letters to be well persuaded of,) that you have nothing to fear beyond the general danger to which every citizen of Rome is equally exposed. And though this, it must be owned, is sufficiently great, yet we can both of us look back with so much satisfaction upon our past conduct, and are arrived at such a period of life, that we ought to bear with particular fortitude whatever unmerited fate may attend us.

Your family here are all well, and extremely regret your absence, as they love and honour you with the highest tenderness and esteem. Take care of your health, and by no means remove without duly weighing the consequences. Farewell.

LETTER VI.
To Domitius.

If you have not heard from me since your arrival in Italy, it is not that I was discouraged from writing on my part, by the profound silence you have observed on yours. The single reason was, that I could find nothing to say. For, on the one hand, I was in every respect too much distressed, as well as too much at a loss how to act myself, to offer you either assistance or advice; and, on the other, I knew not what consolation to suggest to you under these our severe and general misfortunes. However, notwithstanding public affairs are so far from being in a better situation at present, that they are growing every day more and more desperate; yet I could not satisfy myself with being silent any longer, and rather chose to send you an empty letter than not to send you any.

If you were in the number of those who tenaciously persevere in the defence of the republic beyond all possibility of success, I should employ every argument in my power to reconcile you to these conditions, though not the most eligible indeed, which are offered to our acceptance. But, as you judiciously terminated the noble struggle you made in support of our liberties, by those limits which fortune herself marked out to our opposition, let me conjure you by our long and mutual amity, to preserve yourself for the sake of your friends, your mother, your wife, and your children: for the sake of those, in short, to whom you have ever been infinitely dear, and whose welfare and interest depend entirely upon yours.

Let me entreat you to call to your aid, in this gloomy season, those glorious precepts of philosophy in which you have been conversant from your earliest youth; and to support the loss of those with whom you were united by the most tender ties of affection and gratitude; if not with a mind perfectly serene, at least with a rational and manly fortitude.

How far my present power may reach, I know not; or rather, indeed, I am sensible that it cannot extend far. This, however, I will assure you, (and it is a promise which I have likewise made to that excellent woman your affectionate mother,) that, in whatever instance I imagine my services can be of any honour or your welfare, I shall exert them with the sparest zeal which you have always shown in regard to myself. If there is anything, therefore, in which you shall be desirous to employ them, I beg you will let me know, and I will most punctually perform your commands. Indeed, without any such express request, you may depend upon my best offices on every occasion wherein I shall be capable of promoting your interest. Farewell.

a Probably the third letter of this book.
° From Africa. See rer. 5, p. 472.
1 Cicero was at this time about 68 years of age.
2 The person to whom this letter is addressed, is supposed to have been the son of Domitius Ahenobarbus, who commanded the garrison of Corfinium at the breaking out of the civil war. See letter 7, book vii. The father was killed in his flight from the battle of Pharsalia; [Cas. De Bell. Civ. iii. 80.] after which his son, as it should seem by this letter, returned into Italy. He is mentioned in the list of those who were concerned in assassinating Caesar. "But he managed his affairs (as Mr. Ross observes) with so much address, that, after the death of Brutus and Cassius, he first made his peace with Antony, and then, upon the decline of his power, took an occasion to leave him and join himself with Augustus. And though he did not live long enough to enjoy the benefit of that union, yet he left a son, who recovered the ancient splendour of the family, and laid a foundation for the empire, which took place in the person of his grandson Nero."

3 It looks by this passage as if Domitius had been suspected at this time of an intention to destroy himself.
4 The father and friends of Domitius, who had perished in the civil war.
LETTER VII.

To Cneius Plancius

I have received your very short letter, which informs me of what I never once questioned, but leaves me entirely ignorant in a point that was extremely desirable of knowing. I had not the least doubt, indeed, of the share I enjoy in your friendship, but wanted much to hear what resolution you submit to our common calamities; a circumstance, of which if I had been apprised, I should have adapted my letter accordingly. However, though I mentioned in my last what I thought necessary to say upon that subject, yet it may be proper at this juncture just to caution you again, not to imagine that you have anything particular to fear. It is true, we are every one of us in great danger: but the danger, however, is general and equal. You ought not, therefore, to complain of your own fortune, or think it hard to take your part in calamities that extend to all.

Let us then, my friend, preserve the same mutual disposition of mind which has ever subsisted between us. I am sure I shall on my part, and I have reason to hope that you will do likewise on yours.

Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

To Lucius Plancus

You are sensible I dare say, that amongst all those friends whom you claim as a sort of paternal inheritance, there is not one so closely attached to you as myself. I do not mean in consideration only of those more conspicuous connexions of a public kind in which I was engaged with your father; but in regard, likewise, to that less observable intercourse of private friendship which I had the happiness, you well know, of enjoying with him in the highest degree. As this was the source from whence my affection for the son originally took its rise, so that affection, in its turn, improved and strengthened my union with the father; especially, when I observed you distinguishing me with peculiar marks of respect and esteem as early as you were capable of forming any judgment of mankind. To this I must add, (what is of itself, indeed, a very powerful cement,) the similitude of our tastes and studies; and of those particular studies, too, which are of a nature most apt to create an intimacy between men of the same general cast of temper. And, now, are you not impatient to learn the purpose of this long introduction? Be assured, then, it is not without just and strong reason that I have thus enumerated the several motives which concur in forming our amity; as it is in order to plead before you with more advantage the cause of my very intimate friend Atius Capito. If I need not point out to you the variety of fortune with which my life has been chequered; but, in all the honours and disgraces I have experienced, Capito has ever most zealously assisted me with his power, his interest, and ever in his pursuance. Titus Antistius, who was his near relation, happened to be questor in Macedonia (no person having been appointed to succeed him) when Pompey marched his army into that province. Had it been possible for Antistius to have retired, it would have been his first and most earnest endeavour to have returned to Capito, whom he loved with all the tenderness of a filial affection: and, indeed, he was so much the more desirous of joining him, as he knew the high esteem which Capito had ever entertained for Cesar. But, finding himself thus unexpectedly in the hands of Pompey, it was not in his power wholly to decline the functions of his office: however, he acted no farther than he was absolutely constrained. I cannot deny that he was concerned in coining the silver at Apollonia. But he was by no means a principal in that affair; and two or three months were the utmost that he engaged in it. From that time he withdrew from Pompey's camp, and totally avoided all public employment. I hope you will credit this assertion, when I assure you that I know it to be fact: for, indeed, Antistius saw how much I was dissatisfied with the war, and consulted with me upon all his measures. Accordingly, that he might have no part in it, he withdrew as far as possible from Pompey's camp, and concealed himself in the interior parts of Macedonia. After the battle of Pharsalis, he retired to his friend Aulus Flavius, in Bithynia. It was here that he had an interview with Cesar, who received him without the least mark of displeasure, and ordered him to return to Rome. But he soon afterwards contracted an illness, which he carried with him into Corcyra, where it put an end to his life. By his will, which was made at Rome in the consulate of Paulus and Marcellus, he has left ten-twelfths of his estate to Capito. The remaining two parts, amounting to 300,000 sesterces, he has devised to those for whose interest no mortal can be concerned; and, therefore, I am not in the least solicitous whether Cesar shall think proper, or not, to seize it as forfeited to the public. But I most earnestly conjure you, my dear Plancus, to consider the cause of Capito as my own, and to employ your influence for its accomplishment.

P. Fightus supposes that this is the same Atius Capito who devoted Caesarius to destruction when he set out upon his Parthian expedition: of which the reader has already met with an account in rem. 4, p. 360.—Figh. Annal. iii. 362.

with Caesar, that my friend may be permitted to inherit this legacy, agreeably to the will of his relation. I entreat you by all the various ties of our friendship, as well as by those, likewise, which subsisted between your father and myself, to exert your most zealous and active offices for this purpose. Be assured, if you were to grant me all that lies within the compass of your extensive credit and power, you could not more effectually oblige me than by complying with my present request. I hope it may be a means of facilitating your success upon this occasion, that Capito, as Caesar himself can witness, has ever held him in the highest esteem and affection. But Caesar, I know, never forgets anything: I forbear, therefore, to furnish you with particular instances of Capito's attachment to him, and only desire you to make a proper use of those which are fresh in Caesar's memory. It may not, however, be unnecessary to point out one proof of this sort, which I myself experienced: and I will leave it to your own judgment to determine how far the mentioning of it may avail. I need not tell you by what party my interest had been supported, nor whose cause I espoused in our public divisions. But, believe me, whatever measures I pursued in this war, which were unacceptable to Caesar, (and I have the satisfaction to find that he is sensible of it himself,) were most contrary to my own inclinations, and merely in compliance with the persuasions and authority of others. But, if I conducted myself with more moderation than any of those who were joined with me in the same cause, it is principally owing to the advice and admonitions of Capito. To say truth, if the rest of my friends had been influenced by the same spirit with which he was actuated, I might have taken a part that would have proved of some advantage, perhaps, to my country; I am sure, at least, of much to myself. In one word, my dear Plancus, your gratifying my present request will confirm me in the hope that I possess a place in your affection, and, at the same time, extremely contribute to your own advantage, in adding, by a very important obligation, the most grateful and worthy Capito to the number of your friends. Farewell.

The part which Cicero here accuses his friends (and surely with some want of generosity), that they would not suffer him to act, seems to have been that of standing neutral in the war between Pompey and Caesar. And it must be owned that this conduct would have been far less exceptionable, if, instead of faintly joining with one side, he had determined to engage with neither. This too, in the event proved, might have been most praiseworthy in point of interest: for a neutrality was all that Caesar desired of him. But that it could in any sort have advantaged his country, appears to be a notion altogether improbable, and advanced only to give a colour to his not having entered with more spirit into the cause of the republic. Cicero often intimates, indeed, that by preserving a neutrality, he might have been more likely to have facilitated an accommodation between Pompey and Caesar. But it is utterly incredible, from the temper and character of these contending chiefs, that either of them entertained the least disposition for this purpose: as it is certain, from Cicero's own confession in his letters to Atticus, that he was well persuaded Pompey would never listen to any pacific overtures.—Ad Att. vii. 8; viii. 15.

LETTER IX.

To Atticus, Proconulx.

Democritus of Sicyon is not only my host, but (what I can say of few of my countrymen) beside he is likewise my very intimate friend. He is a person, indeed, of the highest probity and merit; and distinguished for his most generous and polite hospitality towards those who come under his roof; in which number I have received particular marks of his affection and esteem. In one word, you will find him a man of the first and most valuable character amongst his fellow-citizens, I had almost said in all Achaia. I only mean, therefore, by this letter, to introduce him to your acquaintance; for I know your sentiments and disposition so well, that I am persuaded nothing more is necessary to make you think him worthy of being received both as your guest and friend. Let me entreat you, in the mean time, to favour him with your patronage, and to assure him that, for my sake, he may depend upon all the assistance in your power. If after this you should discover (as I trust you will) that his virtues render him deserving of a nearer intercourse, you cannot more sensibly oblige me than by admitting him into your family and friendship. Farewell.

To Lucius Messinius.

Your letter afforded me great pleasure, as it gave me an assurance (though indeed I wanted none) that you earnestly wish for my company. Believe me, I am equally desirous of yours; and, in truth, when there was a much greater abundance of patriot citizens and agreeable companions who were in the number of my friends, there was no man with whom I rather chose to associate, and few whose company I liked so well. But now that death, absence, or change of disposition has so greatly contracted this social circle, I should prefer a single day with you to a whole life with the generality of those with whom I am at present obliged to live*. Solitude itself, indeed, (if solitude, alas! I were at liberty to enjoy;) would be far more eligible than the conversation of those who frequent my house; one or two of them, at most, excepted. I seek my relief, therefore, (where I would advise you to look for yours,) in amusements of a literary kind, and in the consciousness of having always intended well to my country. I have the satisfaction to reflect, (as I dare say you will readily believe,) that I never sacrificed the public good to my own private views; that, if a certain person (whom for my sake, I am sure, you never loved,) had not

*He was at this time proconsul, or governor of Sicily, and distinguished himself by his care and diligence in transporting the troops which Caesar received from Thence in order to carry on the present war in Africa. There is a silver coin still extant, on which is inscribed, A. ALLIENVS. PRO. COS. and on the reverse, G. CESAR. IMP. COS. ITER.—Pigh. Annal. iii. 453.

looked upon me with a jealous eye, both himself and every friend to liberty had been happy; that I always endeavoured that it should not be in the power of any to disturb this public tranquillity; and, in a word, that when I perceived those arms, which I had ever dreaded, would prove an overmatch for that patriot-coalition I had myself formed in the republic, I thought it better to accept of a safe peace, upon any terms, than impossibly to contend with a superior force. But I hope shortly to talk over these, and many other points, with you in person. Nothing, indeed, detains me in Rome but to wait the event of the war in Africa; which, I imagine, must now be soon decided. And though it seems of little importance on which side the victory shall turn, yet I think it may be of some advantage to be near my friends when the news shall arrive, in order to consult with them on the measures it may be advisable for me to pursue. Affairs are now reduced to such an unhappy situation, that though there is a considerable difference, it is true, between the cause of the contending parties, I believe there will be very little as to the consequence of their success. However, my spirits were too much dejected to disturb me, whilst I was suspended in suspense, I find myself much more composed now that they are utterly desperate. Your last letter has contributed to confirm me in this disposition, as it is an instance of the magnanimity with which you support your unjust disgrace. It is with particular satisfaction I observe, that you owe this heroic calmness, not only to philosophy, but to temper. For I will confess, that I imagined your mind was softened with that tender sensibility which we, who passed our lives in the ease \[\text{b} \] Pompey; who being jealous of the popularity which Cicero had acquired during his consulship, struck in with the designs of Caesar, and others, who had formed a party against our author. It was by these means that Pompey laid the principal foundation of Caesar's power, which, without them, as he himself said, the former would never have prevailed to the destruction both of himself and of the republic. [See Rem. c. p. 331.] The censure which Cicero herecasts upon Pompey's conduct towards him, is undoubtedly just; but it is a proof, at the same time, how unwarranted his character was. The son of a familiar man, he always affected to the prosperity of both himself and of the republic; and being also the constant farmers of all the revenues of the empire, and had a great part of the inferior people dependent upon them. Cicero imagines that the united weight of these two orders would always be an overbalance to any other power in the state, and a secure barrier against any attempts of the popular and ambitious upon the common liberty.—Life of Cicero, p. 4.

\[\text{d} \] Cicero would have had great occasion for the advice of his friends, if the remains of Pompey's army had defeated Caesar's in Africa. For he had reason to expect, and would probably have experienced, the severest effects of their resentment, if they had returned victorious into Italy.—Ep. Fam. ix. 6.

and freedom of Rome, were apt in general to contract. But as we bore our prosperous days with moderation, it becomes us to bear our adverse fortune as properly, indeed, irretrievable ruin, with fortitude. This advantage we may, at least, derive from our extreme calamities, that they will teach us to look upon death with contempt; which, even if we were happy, we ought to despise, as a state of total insensibility; but which, under our present afflictions, should be the object of our constant wishes. Let not any fears then, I conjure you by your affection for me, disturb the peace of your retirement; and, be well persuaded, nothing can heal a man that deserves to raise his dread and horror, but (what I am sure ever was, and ever will be, far from you) the reproaches of a guilty heart.

I purpose to pay you a visit very soon, if nothing should happen to make it necessary for me to change my resolution: and if there should, I will immediately let you know. But I hope you will not, whilst you are in so weak a condition, be tempted by your impatience of seeing me, to remove from your present situation: at least, not without previous permission. In the mean time, continue to love me, and take care both of your health and your repose. Farewell.

\[\text{f} \] Cicero expresses himself to the same purpose, in two or three other of these letters. Thus, in one to Torquatus: "si non ero, sensu omnino carebo; " and in another to Torquatus: " Una ratio videtur, quaeque evemetor forte moderate; presentem illum omnium rurum moris sit exterior.

From whence it has been inferred, that Cicero, in his private opinion, respected the doctrine of his country's immortality. In answer to which it may be observed, in the first place, that these passages, without any violence of construction, may be interpreted as affirming nothing more, than that death is an utter extinction of all sensibility with respect to human concerns: as it was a doubt with some of the ancients whether departed spirits did not still retain a knowledge of what passed in this world. In the next place, admitting these several passages to be so many clear and positive assertions, that the soul perishes at death, it yet would not appear clear, that Cicero's real belief. It is usual with him to vary his sentiments in these letters, in accommodation to the principles or circumstances of his correspondents. Thus, in a letter to Dolabella, he does not scruple to say, "sum satis mecum," and in another to a friend, he represents himself of a disposition entirely the reverse: "ipsus quidem gloriam per se munquam putavi expen- dam." In a letter to Torquatus, when he is endeavouring to reconcile him to his banishment from Rome, he lays it down as a maxim, that " in malis omnibus ascetii est videor quam audire": but, in another letter to Marcellus, written in order to persuade him to return to Rome, he reasons upon a principle directly opposite, and tells him, " non est tam uno sensu oculorum austori: cura idem illud, cuncti praestet "—these parallel passages, as well as the doctrine of the soul's immortality.—Dr. Fam. xiii. 4; xviv. 4; vi. 4; Jr. 9; Ad Att. x. 8; see also Life of Cicero, p. 306.
LETTER XI.

To Atticus, Proconsul.

As you are no stranger, I imagine, to the esteem I entertained for Avianus Flaccus; so I have often heard him acknowledge the generous manner in which you formerly treated him; and, indeed, no man ever possessed a more grateful or better heart. His two sons, Calus and Marcus, inherit all the virtues of their father; and I most warmly recommend them to your protection, as young men for whom I have a very singular affection. Cains is now in Sicily, and Marcus is at present with me. I entreat you to show every mark of honour to the former, and to take the affairs of both under your patronage; assuring yourself, that you cannot render me in your government a more acceptable service. Farewell.

LETTER XII.

To Varro.

Though I have nothing to write, yet I could not suffer Cninius to pay you a visit without taking the opportunity of conveying a letter by his hands. And now I know not what else to say, but that I propose to be with you very soon: an information, however, which I am persuaded you will be glad to receive. But will it be altogether decent to appear in so gay a scene, at a time when Rome is in such a general flame? And shall we not furnish an occasion of censure to those who do not know that we observe the same sober philosophical life, in all seasons, and in every place? Yet, after all, what imports it? since the world will talk of us in spite of our utmost caution. And, indeed, whilst our censurers are immersed in every kind of flagitious debauchery, it is much worth our concern, truly, what they say of our innocent relaxations! In just contempt, therefore, of these illiterate barbarians, it is my resolution to join you very speedily. I know not how it is, indeed, but it should seem that our arts have attended their much greater advantages in these wretched times than formerly: whether it be that they are now our only resource, or that we were less sensible of their salutary effects when we were in too happy a state to have occasion to experience them. But this is sending owls to Athens, as we say, and suggesting reflec-

e Varro seems to have requested Cicero to give him a meeting at Baiae, a place much frequented by the Romans on account of its hot baths; as the agreeableness of its situation on the bay of Naples rendered it, at the same time, the general resort of the pleasureable world. The tender Propertius has addressed some pretty lines to his Cynthia at this place, which sufficiently intimate in what manner the Roman ladies were amused in that dangerous scene of gallantry and dissipation.

"Tu modus quam primum corrupta desere Baiae, Multae ista dubia litora disdictum: Litora quae fuerant castis linumque pulchra," &c.

"Fly, fly, my love, soft Baiae's tainted coast, Where many a pair commingled peace have lost; Where many a maid shall guilty joys deplore: Ah fly, my fair, destitute Baiae's shore!"

A proverbial expression of the same import with that of "sends coals to Newcastle." It alludes to the Athenian tions which your own mind will far better supply. All that I mean by them, however, is, to draw a letter from you in your return, at the same time that I give you notice to expect me soon. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

To the same.

Our friend Caninius paid me a visit, some time ago, very late in the evening, and informed me that he purposed to set out for your house the next morning. I told him I would give him two or three lines to deliver to you, and desired he would call for them in the morning. Accordingly I wrote to you that night: but as he did not return, I imagined he had forgotten his promise; and should, therefore, have sent that letter by one of my own domestics, if Caninius had not assured me of your intention to leave Tusculum the next morning. However, after a few days had intervened, and I had given over all expectations of Caninius, he made me a second visit, and acquainted me that he was instantly setting out to you. But, notwithstanding the letter I had written was then become altogether out of date, especially after the arrival of such important news, yet, as I was unwilling that any of my profound labours should be lost, I delivered it into the hands of that very learned and affectionate friend of yours, who, I suppose, has acquainted you with the conversation which passed between us at the same time.

I think it most prudent for both of us to avoid the view at least, if we cannot so easily escape the remarks, of the world: for those who are elevated with this victory look down upon us with an air of triumph, and those who regret it are displeased that we did not sacrifice our lives in the cause. But you will ask, perhaps, (as it is in Rome that we are particularly exposed to these mortifications,) why I have not followed your example in retiring from the city? But tell me, my friend, superior as your judgment confessedly is, did you never find yourself mistaken? Or who is there, in times of such total darkness and confusion, that can always be sure of directing his steps aright? I have long thought, indeed, that it would be happy for me to retire where I might neither see nor hear what passes in Rome. But my groundless suspicions discouraged me from executing this scheme; as I was apprehensive that those who might accidentally meet me on my way would put such constructions upon my retreat as best suited with their own purposes. Some, I imagined, would suspect, or at least pretend to suspect, that I was either driven from Rome by my fears, or withdrew in order to form some revolution abroad; and perhaps, too, would report, that I had actually provided a ship for that purpose. Others, I feared, who knew me best, and might be disposed to think most favourably of my actions, would be apt to impute my recess to an abhorrence of a certain party. It is these apprehensions that have hither, contrary ods, which was stamped (as Manlius observes) with the figure of an owl.

2 Concerning Caesar's defeat of Sulpicius in Africa.

3 The Cesarina.
to my inclinations indeed, detained me in Rome: but custom, however, has familiarised the unpleasing scene, and gradually hardened me into a less exquisite sensibility.

Thus I have laid before you the motives which induce me to continue here. As to what relates to your own conduct, I would advise you to remain in your present retirement, till the warmth of our public exaltation shall be somewhat abated, and it shall certainly be known in what manner affairs abroad are terminated: for terminated, I am well persuaded, they are. Much will depend on the general result of this battle, and the tenor in which Caesar may return. And though I see, already, what is abundantly sufficient to determine my sentiments as to that point, yet I think it most advisable to wait the event. In the mean time, I should be glad you would postpone your journey to Baiae, till the first transports of this clamorous joy is subsided; as it will have a better appearance to meet you at those waters, when I may seem to go thither rather to join with you in lamenting the public misfortunes, than to participate in the pleasantries of the place. But this I submit to your more enlightened judgment: only let us agree to pass our lives together in those studies which were once, indeed, nothing more than our amusement, but must now, alas! prove our principal support. Let us be ready, at the same time, whenever we shall be called upon to contribute not only our counsels, but our labours, in repairing the ruins of the republic. But if none shall require our services for this purpose, let us employ our time and our thoughts upon moral and political inquiries. If we cannot benefit the commonwealth in the forum and the senate, let us endeavour, at least, to do so by our studies and our writings; and after the example of the most learned among the ancients, contribute to the welfare of our country, by useful disquisitions concerning laws and government.

And now, having thus acquainted you with my sentiments and purposes, I shall be extremely obliged to you for letting me know yours in return. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

To the same.

You must know, my friend, that I am one of those philosophers who hold the doctrine of Diodorus concerning contingencies. Accordingly I maintain, that if you should make us a visit here, you are under an absolute necessity of so doing; but if you should not, that it is because your coming hither is in the number of those things which cannot possibly happen.—

1 When this letter was written, there seems to have been only some general accounts arrived of Caesar’s success in Africa; but the particulars of the battle were not yet known.

2 Diodorus was a Greek philosopher who lived in the court of Ptolemaus Soter, and flourished about 280 years before the Christian era. He is said to have died with grief for not being able immediately to solve a philosophical question which that prince put to him in conversation. He maintained that nothing could be contingent; but the lessor of the two possible must not be one of his choice. Cicero ludicrously applies this absurd doctrine to the intended visit of his friend.—Cic. de Fato, 7.

Now tell me which of the two opinions you are most inclined to adopt: whether this of the philosopher I just now mentioned, whose sentiments, you know, were so little agreeable to our honest friend Diodotus, or the opposite one of Chrysippus? But we will reserve these curious speculations till we shall be more at leisure; and this, I will agree with Chrysippus, is a possibility which either may or may not happen.

I am obliged to you for your good offices in my affair with Coccetus, which I likewise recommend to Atticus. If you will not make me a visit, I will pay you one; and as your library is situated in your garden, I shall want nothing to complete my two favourite amusements—reading and walking. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

To Apuleius, Proquastor.

Lucius Egnatius, a Roman knight, is a very particular friend of mine, whose affairs in Asia, together with his slave Anchialus, who superintends them, I recommend to you with as much zeal as if they were my own. For he assured we are united to each other, not only by a daily intercourse of the highest friendship, but by many good offices that have been mutually exchanged between us. As he has not the least doubt of your disposition to oblige me, let me earnestly entreat you to convince him, by your services in his favour, that I warmly requested them. Farewell.

3 Diodorus was a Stoic philosopher, under whom Cicero had been educated, and whom he afterwards entertained for many years in his house. He died about thirteen years before the date of this letter, and left his friend and pupil a considerable legacy.—Cic. Academ. ii.; Ad Att. ii. 90.

4 Chrysippus was successor to Zeno, the celebrated founder of the Stoic school. It appears, by a list of some of his writings, which Laertius has given, that he published a treatise on Fate; and probably it was in this book that he opposed the ridiculous notions of Diodotus. Seneca represents him as a penetrating genius, but one whose speculations were somewhat too subtle and refined. He adds, that his diction was so extremely close, that he never employed a superfluous word; a character he could scarce deserve, if what is reported of him be true, that he published no less than 511 treatises upon logic, and above 400 upon other subjects.—One cannot hear, indeed, of such an immoderate flux of pen, without being in some danger of suffering the same fate that attended this inexhaustible genius, who is said to have died in a fit of excessive laughter.—Laertius in Vit.; Senec. de Benefic. l. 3; Stanley’s Hist. of Philos. 486.

5 In the text he is called Coecitus; but, perhaps, (as one of the commentators imagine,) it should be Coccetus. For Cicero, in a letter to Atticus, supposed to have been written about the same time with the present, requests his assistance in procuring the payment of a sum of money owing to him from Coccetus; which is not unlikely to be the same affair he alludes to in this passage.—Ad Att. xii. 13.

6 It is wholly uncertain both who this person was, and when he exercised the office of proquastor.
LETTER XVI.

To Varro.

The 7th seems to be a very proper time, not only in consideration of public affairs, but I regard also to the season of the year: I approve, therefore, of the day you have named, and will join you accordingly.

I should be far from thinking we had reason to reproach ourselves for the part we have lately acted, even were it true that those who pursued a different conduct had not repented of their measures. It was the suggestions of duty, not of interest, that we followed, when we entered into the war; and it was a cause utterly desperate, not the duty we owed our country, that we deserted when we laid down our arms. Thus we acted, on the one hand, with greater honour than those who would not leave Italy in order to follow the war abroad; and, on the other hand, with more prudence than those who, after having suffered a total defeat, would not be prevailed upon to return home. But there is nothing that I can hear with less patience than the affected severity of our inglorious neutrals: and, indeed, whatever might be the final event of affairs, I should be much more inclined to venerate the memory of those mistaken men who obstinately persisted in battle, than to be in the least concerned at the reproaches of those who only lament that we are still alive.

If I should have time, I purpose to call upon you at Tusculum before the 7th: if not, I will follow you to Cumae, agreeably to your appointment. But I shall not fail to give you previous notice, that your bath may be prepared. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

To the same.

Your letters to Seius and myself were delivered to us, whilst we were at supper together, in his house. I agree with you in thinking that this is a very proper time for your intended expedition; which, to own my artifice, I have hitherto endeavoured to retard by a thousand pretences. I was desirous, indeed, of keeping you near me, in case any favourable news should have arrived.3 For, as Homer sings,

"The wise new wisdom from the wise acquire."

But now that the whole affair is decided, beyond all doubt, you should set forward with the utmost speed.

When I heard of the fate that has attended Lucius Caesar,4 I could not forbear saying to myself, with the old man in the play, "What tenderness then may not I expect?" For this reason, I am a constant guest at the tables of our present potentates; and what can I do better, you know, than prudently swim with the current of the times? But, to do serious, (for serious, in truth, we have reason to be,) "See vengeance stalk o'er Afric's trembling plain; And one wide waste of horror ruin s'dan."

A circumstance that fills me with very uneasy apprehensions.

I am unable to answer your question, when Caesar will arrive, or where he proposes to land. Some, I find, doubt whether it will be at Baiae; and they now talk of his coming home by the way of Sardinia. It is certain, at least, that he has not yet visited this part of his demesnes; and though he has not a worse farm5 upon all his estate, he is far, however, from holding it in contempt. For my own part, I am more inclined to imagine he will take Sicily in his return. But these doubts we will settle soon enough, I think, as the very moment expected. I believe, therefore, I must take my instructions from my disciple,6 as many a pupil, you know, has become a greater adept than his master. However, if I knew what you had determined upon, I should chiefly regulate my measures by yours; for which purpose I expect a letter from you with great impatience. Farewell, and gave private orders to have him assassinated—Dio, xiii. p. 219.

V this alludes to a passage in the "Andria" of Terence, where Simeo, the father of Paphilius, giving an account of his son's conduct, and his resolution to avenge his injuries, can, but not for the sake of vengeance, says—quid mihi facit patri? But Cicero applies it in a different sense, and means that, if Caesar acted towards his own relations with so much cruelty, he had little reason to expect a milder treatment.

These lines are quoted from Baulius, a poet, of whom some account has been given in the foregoing remarks. The troops of Caesar pursued their victory over those of Scipio with great cruelty:—"acior Caesarianorum impetum saltavit (says Florus) indignationis post Pompeium creviam bellum." Numbers, indeed, of Scipio's army must necessarily have been massacred in cold blood: for the historians agree that Caesar's loss amounted only to 50 men; whereas 10,000 were killed on the side of Scipio, according to the statement which is related of this action, and five times that number if we may credit Plutarch.—Flor. lv. 2; Hirt. De Bell. Afric. 8; Phiz. in Vit. Caesar.

The island of Sardinia was, in the time of the Romans, (what it still is,) extremely barren and unwholesome. Martial has a pretty allusion to this latter circumstance, in one of his epigrams:

"Nullo foeto loco possis excludere: cum mora Venerit, in medio Tharre Sardinae est."—lv. 60.

7 Delolabella attended Caesar in the African war, and those Cicero means that he should learn from Delolabella, where Caesar purposed to land, and in what temper he was returning into Italy, together with such other circumstances as it was necessary he should be apprised of, in order to pay his personal congratulations to the conqueror in the most proper and acceptable manner. It seems probable, from this passage, that Delolabella had formed his eloquence under Cicero, accordingly to an excellent custom which prevailed in Rome, of introducing the youth, upon their first entrance into business, to the acquaintance and patronage of some distinguished orator of the forum, whom they constantly attended in all the public exercises of his profession.—Auct. Dialog.de caus. corrupt. Eloquent. 34.
LETTER XVIII.

To Apuleius, Proconsul.

Lucius Zosimus was appointed, by the will of his patron, co-heir in conjunction with me. I mention this only to show, on the occasion of our friendship with him, but as an evidence likewise of his merit, by being thus distinguished by his patron. I recommend him, therefore, to your favour as one of my own family; and you will oblige me in letting me see that you were greatly influenced to his advantage by this letter. Farewell.

LETTER XIX.

To Varro.

Our friend Caninus acquainted me with your request that I would write to you whenever there was any news which I thought it concerned you to know. You are already informed that we are in daily expectation of Cæsar's arrival; but I am now to tell you that as it was his intention, it seems, to have landed at Alcium; his friends have written to dissuade him from that design. They think that his coming on shore at that place will prove extremely troublesome to himself, as well as very much inconvenient many others; and have therefore recommended Ostia as a more convenient port. For my part, I can see no difference. Hirtius, however, assures me that himself as well as Balbus, and Oppius, (who, let me observe by the way, are every one of them greatly in your interest,) have written to Cæsar for this purpose. I thought proper, therefore, to send you this piece of intelligence for two reasons. In the first place, that you might know where to engage a lodging; or rather, that you might secure one in both these towns: for it is extremely uncertain at which of them Cæsar will disembark. And in the next place, in order to induce you to make use of your own lodgings, by showing you that I am so well with these favourites of Cæsar as to be admitted into their private council. To speak seriously, I see no reason to decline their friendship; for, surely, there is a wide difference between submitting to evils we cannot remedy, and approving measures that we ought to condemn. Though, to confess

the truth, I do not know there are any that I can justly blame, except those which involved us in the civil wars; for these, if they must be owned, were altogether voluntary. I saw, indeed, (what your distance from Rome prevented you from observing,) that our party were eager for war; while Cæsar, on the contrary, appeared less inclined than afraid to have recourse to arms. Thus far, therefore, our calamities might have been prevented, but all beyond was unavoidable; for one side or the other must necessarily prove superior. Now, we both of us, I am sure, always lamented those infinite mischiefs that would ensue. Which of the two contending armies should happen to fall in battle; as we were well convinced, that of all the complicated evils which attend a civil war, victory is the supreme. I dreaded it, indeed, even on that side which both you and I thought proper to join, as they threatened most cruel vengeance on those who stood neutral, and were no less offended at your sentiments than at my speeches. But had they gained this last battle, we should still more severely have experienced the effects of their policy; as our late conduct had incensed them to the highest degree. Yet what measures have we taken for our own security, that we did not warmly recommend for theirs? And how have they more advantaged the republic by having recourse to Juba and his elephants, than if they had perished by their own swords, or submitted to live under the present system of affairs, with some hopes, at least, if not with the fairest. But they may tell us, perhaps, (and, indeed, with truth,) that the government under which we have chosen to live is altogether turbulent and unsettled. Let this objection, however, have weight with those who have treasured up no stores in their minds to support themselves under all the possible vicissitudes of human affairs; a reflection which brings me round to what I principally had in view when I undesignedly wandered into this long digression. I was going to have said, that an admiration, upon your character with great admiration, so nothing raises it higher in my esteem than to observe that you are almost the only person, in these tempestuous times, who has wisely retreated into harbour, and are enjoying the happy fruits of those important studies which are attended with more public advantage, as well as private satisfaction, than all the ambitious exploits or voluptuous indulgences of these licentious victors. The contemplative hours you spend at your Tuscan villa are, in my estimation, indeed, what alone deserve to be called life; and I would willingly renounce the whole wealth and splendour of the world to be at liberty to pass my time in the same philosophical manner. I follow your example in approving of measures which we ought to condemn; and though it may be policy, most certainly it is not patriotism. It ill agrees, at least, with that sort of abstracted life which Cicero, in the first letter of this book, declares he proposed to lead, if the republic should be destroyed.—Ep. Fam. vii. 3.

Varro, at the breaking out of the civil war, was in Spain; where he resided in quality of one of Pompey's lieutenants.

1 These elephants were drawn up in the front of the right and left wing of Seipio's army. But being driven back upon the line behind them, they put the ranks into great confusion; and, instead of proving any advantage to Seipio, contributed to facilitate his defeat.—Hist. De Bell. Afric. 83.
pler, however, as far as the circumstances in which I am placed will permit, and have recourse, with great satisfaction of mind, to my favourite studies. Since our country, indeed, either cannot or will not accept our services, who shall condemn us for returning to that contemplative privacy which many philosophers have thought preferable (I will not say with reason, however, they have preferred,) even to the most public and patriots labour? And why should we not indulge ourselves in those learned inquiries, which some of the greatest men have deemed a just dispensation from all public employments, when it is a liberty, at the same time, which the commonwealth itself is willing to allow us? But I am going beyond the commission which Caninius gave me: and while he only desired that I would acquaint you with those articles of which you were not already apprised, I am telling you what you know far better than I can inform you. For the future I shall confine myself more strictly to your request, and will not fail of communicating to you whatever intelligence I may learn, which I shall think it imports you to know. Farewell.

LETTER XX.
To Papirius Paelus.

Your letter afforded me a very agreeable instance of your friendship, in the concern it expressed lest a. v. 707. I should be uneasy at the report which had been brought hither by Silius. I was before, indeed, perfectly sensible how much you were disturbed at this circumstance, by your care in sending me duplicates of a former letter upon the same subject; and I then returned such an answer as I thought would be sufficient to abate, at least, if not entirely remove, this your generous solicitude. But, since I perceive, by your last letter, how much this affair still dwells upon your mind, let me assure you, my dear Paelus, that I have employed every artifice (for we must now, my friend, be armed with cunning as well as prudence,) to conciliate the good graces of the persons you mention; and, if I mistake not, my endeavours have not proved in vain. I receive, indeed, so many marks of respect and esteem from those who are most in Caesar’s favour, that I cannot but flatter myself they have a true regard for me. It must be confessed, at the same time, that a pretended affection is not easily discernible from a real one, unless in seasons of distress. For adversity is to friendship what fire is to gold, the only infallible test to discover the genuine from the counterfeit; in all other circumstances they both bear the same common signatures. I have one strong reason, however, to persuade me of their sincerity; as neither their situation nor mine can by any means tempt them to dissemble with me. As to that person1 in whom all power is now centred, I am not sensible that I have anything to fear from him; or nothing more, at least, than what arises from that general precarious state in which all things must stand where the fence of laws is broken down; and, from its being incapable to pronounce

2 Silius, it should seem, had brought an account from the army, that some witticisms of Cicero had been reported to Caesar, which had given him offence.

3 Caesar,

contain a caution altogether unnecessary. For tell me, my friend, what jealousies can I possibly create? Or who will look with envy upon a man in my humble situation? But, granting that I were in ever so enviable a state, yet let me observe, that it is the way of those philosophers who alone seem to have understood the true nature of virtue, that a good man is answerable for nothing farther than his own innocence. Now, in this respect, I think myself doubly irreproachable: in the first place, by having recommended such public measures as were for the interest of the commonwealth; and in the next, that, finding I was not sufficiently supported to render my counsels effectual, I did not deem it advisable to contend for them by arms against a superior strength. Most certainly, therefore, I cannot justly be accused of having failed in the duty of a good citizen. The only part, then, that now remains for me, is to be cautious not to expose myself, by any indirect word or action, to the resentment of those in power; a part which I hold likewise to be agreeable to the character of true wisdom. As to the rest; what liberties any man may take in imputing words to me which I never spoke; what credit Caesar may give to such reports; and how far those who court my friendship are really sincere; these are points for which it is by no means in my power to be answerable. My tranquillity arises, therefore, from the conscious integrity of my counsels in the times that are past, and from the moderation of my conduct in these that are present. Accordingly, I apply the simile you quote from Accius; not only to Envy, but to Fortune; that weak and inconstant power, whom every wise and resolute mind should resist with as much firmness as a rock repels the waves. Grecian story will abundantly supply examples of the greatest men, both at Athens and Syracuse, who have, in some sort, preserved their independence amidst the general servitude of their respective communities. May I not hope, then, to be able so to comport myself, under the same circumstances, as neither to give offence to our rulers on the one hand, nor to injure the dignity of my country on the other?

But to turn from the serious to the jocose part of your letter.—The strain of pleasantry you break into, immediately after having quoted the tragedy of Oenomaus, puts me in mind of the modern method of introducing at the end of those grave and dramatic pieces the humour of our mimes, instead of the old Atelian farces.

Why else do you talk of your palate polypus, and your mouldy cheese? In pure good nature, it is true, I formerly submitted to sit down with you to such homely fare; but more refined company has improved me into a better taste. For Hircius and Dolabella, let me tell you, are my preceptors in the science of the table; and, in return, they are my disciples in that of the bar. But I suppose you have already heard, at least if all the town-news is transmitted to you, that they frequently declaim at my house, and that I as often sup at theirs. You must not, however, be led by this visit, or by pleading poverty in bar to the admission of so luxurious a guest. Whilst you were raising a fortune, indeed, I bore with your parsimonious humour; but now that you are in circumstances to support the loss of half your wealth, I expect that you receive me in another manner than you would one of your compounding debtors. And though your finances may somewhat suffer by my visit, remember it is better they should be impaired by treating a friend than by lending to a stranger. I do not insist, however, that you spread your table with so unbounded a profusion as to furnish out a splendid treat with the remains: I am so wonderfully moderate as to desire nothing more than what is perfectly elegant and exquisite in its kind. I remember to have heard you describe an entertainment which was given by Phæmus. Let yours be the exact copy of his: only I should be glad to sit down to it so long. Should you still persist, after all, to invite me, a most generous and chivalrous supper, dish’d out by the sparing hand of maternal economy; even this, perhaps, I may be able to support. But I would fain see that hero hold who should dare to set before me the villainous trash you mention, or even one of your boasted polypuses, with a hue as florid as vermilion Jove! Take my word for it, my friend, your prudence will not suffer you to be thus adventurous. Fame, no doubt, will have proclaimed at your villa my late conversion to luxury, long before my arrival; and you will shiver at the sound of her tremendous report. Nor must you flatter yourself with the hope of abating the edge of my appetite by your cloying sweet-wines before supper: a silly custom, which I have now entirely renounced; being much wiser than when I used to damp my stomach with your antepasts of olives and Leucad's shrimps. The red vinous wine of the island in this jocose strain; my only serious wish is, that I may be able to make you a visit. You may compose your countenance, therefore, and return to your mouldy cheese in full security; for my being your guest will occasion you, as usual, no other expense than that of heating your baths. As

1 & 2 Grecii had lately instituted a kind of academy for eloquence in his own house, at which several of the leading young men in Rome used to meet in order to exercise themselves in the art of oratory. Gerei himself will acquaint the reader with his motives for instituting this society, in the 22d letter of the present book.

3 This alludes (as Manutius observes) to a law which Caesar passed in favour of those who had contracted debts before the commencement of the civil war. By this law, as appears from the passages which that commentator has cited, commissioners were appointed to take an account of the estate and effects of these debtors, which were to be assigned to their respective creditors according to their valuation before the civil war broke out: and whatever sums had been paid for interest, was to be considered as in discharge of the principal. By this ordinance, Furtii, it seems, had been a particular sufferer.—Cæs. De Bell. Civ. iii. 1; Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cæs. 49.

4 Pliny, the naturalist, mentions a statue of Jupiter, erected in the Capitol, which, on certain festival days, it was customary to paint with vermilion.—Manutius.
for all the rest, you are to look upon it as mere pleasantry.

The trouble you have given yourself about Selicus's villa is extremely obliging, as your description of it was excessively droll. I believe, therefore, from the accounts you give me, I shall renounce all thoughts of making that purchase: for though the country, it seems, abounds in salt, the neighbourhood, I find, is but insipid. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

To Volumnius.

You have little reason, believe me, to regret the not being present at my declamations; and if you should really envy Hirtius, as you assure me you should, if you did not love him, it must be much more for his own eloquence than as he is an auditor of mine. In truth, my dear Volumnius, either I am utterly void of all genius, or incapable of exercising it to my satisfaction, now that I have lost those illustrious fellow-lawyers at the bar that fired me with emulation when I used to gain your judicious applause. If ever, indeed, I displayed the powers of eloquence with advantage to my reputation, let me send a sigh when I reflect with the fallen Philoctetes in the play, that

These potent shafts, the heroes' wanted dreed,
Now only on an empty war their force
Aim'd at the wing'd inhabitants of air!

However, if you will give me your company here, my spirits will be more enlivened, though I need not add that you will find me engaged in a multitude of very important occupations. But if I can once get to the end of them (as I most earnestly wish), I shall bid a long farewell both to the forum and the senate, and chiefly devote my time to you and some few others of our common friends. In this number are Cassius and Dolabella, who are united with us in the same favourite studies, and to whose performances I with great pleasure attend. But we want the assistance of your refined judgment, and of that uncommon erudition which has often struck me with awe when I have been delivering my sentiments before you. I have determined, then, if I should obtain the consent, or at least the permission, of Cassius, to retire from that stage on which I have frequently performed a part that he himself has applauded. It is my resolution, indeed, totally to conceal myself in the secret shades of philosophy, where I hope to enjoy, with you, and some others of the same contemplative disposition, the honourable fruits of a studious leisure.

I am sorry you shortened your last letter in the apprehension that I should not have patience to read a longer. But assure yourself for the future, that the longer yours are, the more acceptable they will always prove to me. Farewell.

LETTER XXII.

To Papirius Patus.

Your very agreeable letter found me wholly disengaged at my Tuscan villa. I retired hither during the absence of my pupils, whom A. v. 707. I have sent to meet their victorious friend, in order to conclude his good graces in my favour. As Dionysius the tyrant, after he was expelled from Syracuse, opened a school, it is said, at Corinth; in the same manner, being driven from my dominions in the forum, I have erected a sort of academy in my own house; and I perceive, by your letter, that you approve the scheme. I have many reasons for approving it too, and principally as it affords me what is highly expedient in the present conjuncture, a mean of establishing an interest with those in whose friendship I may find a protection. How far my intentions in this respect may be answered, I know not: I can only say, that I have hitherto had no reason to prefer the different measures which others of the same party with myself have pursued; unless, perhaps, it would have been more eligible not to have sustained the ruin of our cause. It would so, I confess, had I died either in the camp or in the field: but the former did not happen to be my fate; and as to the latter, I never was engaged in any action. But the inglorious manner in which Pompey, together with Scipio, Afranius, and your friend Lentulus,

An embassy therefore was sent to Philoctetes to engage him on their side, who accordingly consented to attend their expedition. But being disabled from proceeding with these heroes in their voyage, by an accidental wound which he received in the foot from one of his own arrows, they ungenerously left him on a desolate island, and it was here that he was reduced to the mortifying necessity of employing these formidable shafts in the humble purposes of supplying himself with food. severally lost their lives, will scarcely, I suppose, be thought a more desirable lot. As to Cato's death, it must be acknowledged to have been truly noble; and I can still follow his example, whenever I shall be so disposed. Thus one's endeavours, as in fact I do, not to be compelled to it by the same necessity; and this is my first reason for engaging in my present scheme. My next is, that I find it an advantage, not only to my health, which began to be impaired by the inter-

—Hirt. De Bell. Afric. 35.

This is not the same person to whom the letters in the first and second book of this collection are addressed; but Lucius Lentulus, who was consul with Marcellus A. U. 704, the year in which the civil war broke out. After the defeat at Pharsaullus, he fled to the island of Cyprus, where receiving intelligence that Pompey was safe at Tinteri Re, he immediately set sail in order to join him. He arrived on the next day after that unfortunate general had been cruelly assassinated, and being seized the moment he landed, he underwent the same fate with that of his illustrious friend, in the execution of an order of a tyrannical purpose from Ptolemy.—Plut. in Vit. Pomp.; Cass. De Bell. Civ. Ill. 102, 104.

The manner and circumstances of Cato's having destroyed himself, are too well known to be particularised in this place. A Latin or Hille writer is of opinion that Cato abandoned the cause of liberty too soon, and that he would have died with a better grace at Munda than at Utica. This censure, it must be owned, has the appearance of being just, if we consider it only in respect to the event; but not in respect to the real foundation for that reproach, which can scarce be supposed that it should have escaped one of the ancient writers who speak of this illustrious Roman's exit; and that Cicero, in particular, who most certainly did not love Cato, should have made an honourable exception of his death, out of that list which he here condemns. It is true the republican party, after the defeat of Scipio in Africa, made a very powerful struggle against Cesar under the command of young Pompey in Spain. But it is highly probable that there was not the least national expectation of this circumstance, when Cato thought it became him to put an end to his life. It appears from Plutarch that he would have defended Utica to the last, if he could have persuaded the principal Romans in that garrison to have supported him; and it was not till after all his remonstrances for that purpose proved utterly ineffectual, and that he had secured the retreat of those who did not choose to surrender themselves to Caesar, that this exemplary patriot fell upon his own sword. Thus died this truly great and virtuous Roman! He had long stood forth the sole uncorrupted opposer of those vices that proved the ruin of this degenerate commonplace, and supported, as far as a single arm could support, the declining constitution. But when his services could no farther avail, he scorned to survive what had been the labour of his whole life to preserve, and bravely perished with the liberties of his country. This is the purport of that noble eulogy which Seneca, in much stronger language, has justly borrowed upon Cato:—

"Adversus vitia degenerantis, civilitas (say he), stetit, solus, et cadentem republicam, quantum modo una retrahit manu pectoral, retrinit; denuo comitum as di sustenta ruinae simulque extintae sunt que sefas erat dividit. Neque enim Cato post libertatem xit, nee libertas post Catonem."

The only necessity which Cato was under of putting an end to his life, arose from that uniform opposition he had given to the dangerous designs of the conqueror; and it must be allowed that Cicero took sufficient care not to fall under the same.

A mere English reader will be surprised to hear Cicero talk of eloquence as an exercise. There is nothing indeed mission of exercises of this kind, but also to my oratorical talents, if any I ever possessed, which would have totally lost their vigour if I had not had recourse to this method of keeping them in practice. Indeed, I shall mention (and the principal one, I dare say, in your estimation) that it has introduced me to the demolishing of a greater number of delicious peacocks than you have had the devouring of paltry pigeons in all your life. The truth of it is, whilst you are humbly sipping the meagre broths of the sneaking Aterius, I am luxuriously regaling myself with the savoury soups of the magnificent Hirtius. If you have any spirit, then, fly hither, and learn, from our elegant bills of fare, how to refine your own: though, to do your talents justice, this is a sort of knowledge in which you are much superior to our instructions.

However, since you can get no purchasers for your mortgages, and are not likely to fill those pitchers you mention with denarii, it will be your wisest scheme to return hither; for it is a better thing, let me tell you, to be sick with good eating at Rome, than for want of victuals at Naples. In short, I plainly perceive that your finances are in a flourishing situation; and I expect to hear the same account from all your neighbours: so that famine, my friend, most formidable famine, must be your fate, if you do not provide against it in due time. And since you have been reduced to sell your horse, 'en mont your mule (the only animal, it seems, belonging to you which you have not yet sacrificed to your table), and convey yourself immediately to Rome. To encourage you to do so, you shall be honoured with a chair and cushion next to mine, and sit the second great pedagogue in my celebrated school. Farewell, more indelent and immovable than a British orator: for if he ventures into action, his gestures are generally such as would render the finest speech that Demosthenes or Cicero ever delivered, absolutely powerless or ridiculous. You may see many a smart rhetorician (says the inimitable Mr. Addison) turning his hat in his hands, moulding its into different caps, examining sometimes the lining and sometimes the button, during the whole course of his harangue: A deaf man would think he was cheapening a beaver; when, perhaps, he is talking of the fate of the British nation. But among the orators of Greece and Rome it was far otherwise: they studied the eloquence of action as much as that of diction, and their rhetoricians have laid down rules for the graceful management of the shoulders, the arms, the hands, and the feet, which were each of them engaged by turns in the emphatical exercise of ancient eloquence.—Spectator, vi. p. 50; Quint. xi. 3.

This bird was esteemed by the Romans amongst the most refined delicacies of the table, and no entertainment was thought completely elegant where a peacock did not make one of the dishes. Thy bore a most incredible price: Varro assures us that a hundred peacocks produced to the owner the annual profit of about three hundred pounds sterling.—Var. De Re Rustic. iii. 6.

1 The denarius was a silver coin, equivalent to about eight-pence of our money. Cicero's balladry alludes to the loss which Fasts (such as were suffered by the late edict of Caesar concerning the use of gold); of which an account has been given in rem, i. p. 483.

3 Petua had a house in Naples, where he appears to have been when this letter was written.
THE LETTERS OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO

LETTER XXIII.

To the same.

Your satirical humour, I find, has not yet forsaken you; and I perfectly well understand your rillery, when you gravely tell me that Balbus contented himself with your humble fare. You insinuate, I suppose, that since these our sovereign rulers are thus wonderfully temperate, much more does it become a discarded consular to practise the same austerities. But now, my dear friend, if I have artfully drawn from Balbus himself the whole history of the reception you gave him? He came directly to my house the moment he arrived in Rome: a circumstance, by the way, somewhat extraordinary. Not that I am surprised at his wanting the politeness to call first at yours; but my wonder is, that he should not go directly to his own. However, after the two or three first salutations had passed, I immediately inquired what account he had to give of my friend Patus. "Never (he protested) was he better entertained in his whole life." Now, if you merit this compliment by your wit, I desire you to remember that I shall bring as elegant a taste with me as Balbus himself. But if he alluded to the honours of your table, let it never be said that the family of the Stammerers were more splendidly regaled by Patus than the sons of eloquence.

Business has prevented me, from time to time, in my design of paying you a visit: but if I can despatch my affairs, so as to be able to come into your part of the world, I shall take care that you shall have no reason to complain of my not having given you timely notice. Farewell.

LETTER XXIV.

To the same.

Are you not a pleasant mortal to question me concerning the fate of those estates? you mention, a. v. 707, when Balbus had just before been paying you a visit? It is from him, indeed, that I derive my whole fund of intelligence; and you may be assured, that where he is ignorant, I have no chance of being better informed. I might with much more propriety desire you would tell me what is likely to be the fate of my own possessions, since you have so lately had a person under your roof, from whom, either in or out of his cups, you might certainly have discovered that secret. But this, my dear Patus, is an article that makes no part of my inquiry; for, in the first place, I have reason to be well satisfied, having been in alliance with my life, if life or indulgence it may be called, to be the sad survivor of our country's ruins. In the next place, I believe it is a question I may easily answer myself. For I know it will be just as it shall seem meet to the men in power; and the men in power, my friend, will ever be those whose swords are the most prevailing. I must rest contented, therefore, with whatever grace it shall be their pleasure to show me; for he who could not tamely submit to such wretched terms ought to have taken refuge in the arms of death. Notwithstanding, therefore, that the estates about Veii and Capena are actually divided out, (and these, you know, are not far distant from Tusculum,) yet it gives me no sort of disgust. I enjoy my property whilst I may, and please myself with the hope that I shall never be deprived of that privilege. But should it happen, otherwise, I am satisfied, since it was my noble maxim (hero and philosopher as I was) that life is the fairest of all possessions, I cannot, undoubtedly, but love the man by whose bounty I have obtained the continuance of that enjoyment. It is certain, at the same time, that how much sooner he may be disposed, perhaps, to restore the republic (as we ought all of us most certainly to wish,) yet he has entangled himself in such a variety of different connexions, that he is utterly embarrassed in what manner to act. But this is going farther into these points than is necessary, considering the person to whom I am writing. Nevertheless, I will add, that our chief himself is as absolutely ignorant what measures will finally be resolved upon, as I am, who have no share in his councils. For Caesar is no less under the control of circumstances than we are under the control of Caesar; and it is as much impossible for him to foresee what these may require, as it is for us to penetrate into what he may intend.

You must not impute it to neglect (a fault, you are sensible, of which I am seldom guilty in the article of writing) that I have not said thus much to you before. The single reason for my not sooner answering your inquiry was, that as I could only speak from conjecture, I was unwilling, without a just foundation, either to increase your fears, or to encourage your hopes. But this I can with truth assure you, that I have not heard the least hint of 1 Balbus was a sort of prime minister and chief confidant of Caesar.

2 The consulars were those who had passed through the office of consul.

3 There is undoubtedly some rillery in this passage, either upon Patus or Balbus; but, it is impossible to discover of what nature, as it alludes to circumstances utterly unknown.

4 In the original it is, "no pluris esse Balbos, quam disertae putes;" i.e. witicism which could not possibly be preserved in the translation. For it turns upon the equivocal sense of the word Balbus, which was not only the name of the person of whom Cicero is speaking, but signifies likewise a man who labours under that defect of speech called stuttering.

5 Probably the estates of the Pompeians that lay about Naples, where Patus seems to have been when this letter was written. It appears that Patus had been alarmed with a rumour that Caesar intended to seize these estates, and therefore had applied to Cicero to learn the truth of this report.

1 One of the commentators, who conceals his true name under that of Rapsanius, collects from this passage, that the present letter was written A. D. 707, whereas it seems to prove, on the contrary, that its date cannot be placed earlier than the year 706. For Cicero appears, evidently, to allude to the pardon he had received from Caesar. Now this could not have been till after the battle of Tharses, A. D. 705; and the fourth year from that period brings us down to 709. In the beginning, therefore, of that year, this latter ought to have been placed; but the error of its present situation was not discovered till it was too late to be rectified.

6 Veii and Capena were cities in that part of Italy called Etruria, which is now comprehended under the name of Tuscan'y.

7 Where Cicero had a villa.

that I frequently venture to invite to my table those refined friends of yours, the delicate Verrius and Camillus. Nay, I am holder still, and have presumed to give a supper even to Hirius himself; though, I must own, I could not advance so far as to honour him with a peacock. To tell you the truth, my honest cook had not skill enough to imitate any other part of his splendid entertainments, except only his smoking soups.

But to give you a general sketch of my manner of life; I spend the first part of the morning in receiving the compliments of several both of our departed patriots and our gay victors; the latter of whom treat me with great marks of civility and esteem. As soon as that ceremony is over, I retire to my library, where I employ myself either with my books or my pen. And here I am sometimes surrounded by an audience who look upon me as a man of most profound erudition, for no other reason, perhaps, than because I am not altogether so ignorant as themselves. The rest of my time I wholly devote to indulgences of a less intellectual kind. I have sufficiently, indeed, paid the tribute of sorrow to my unhappy country; the miseries whereof I have longer and more bitterly lamented than ever tender mother bewailed the loss of her only son.

Let me desire you, as you would secure your magazine of provisions from falling into my hands, to take care of your health; for I have most unmercifully resolved that no pretence of indisposition shall preserve your larder from my depredations. Farewell.

LETTER XXVI.

To the same.

I arrived yesterday at Cumae a, and perhaps I may pay you a visit to-morrow; but I shall take care to give you a short notice beforehand. I am determined, indeed, not only to see you, but to sup with you too. For though I had the misfortune to be informed by Marcus Ceparius, whom I met on the road, that you were laid up with the gout, yet I suppose your cook is not disabled as well as his master. You may expect, therefore, very speedily to receive a guest who, as he is remarkable for having a wondrous puny stomach, is equally famous likewise for being an irreconcilable enemy to all sumptuous entertainments. Farewell.

LETTER XXVII.

To Marcus Marius.

I arrived at Cumae on the 24th, accompanied by our friend Libo, and purpose to be at my Pompeian villa a very shortly: but I will give you previous notice when I shall have fixed the day. I wish you the enjoyment of your health at all times, but particularly whilst I am your neighbour. If you have an assignation, therefore, with your old companion, the gout, pray contrive to put it off to some other opportunity.

In good earnest, let me desire you to take care of your health, and expect to see me in two or three days. Farewell.

LETTER I.

To Servius Sulpicius:

I am continually receiving accounts from various hands, that you are in a more than common degree affected by the general calamities of our country. This is by no means a matter of surprise to me, as it in some measure corresponds with what passes in my own bosom. Nevertheless, I cannot but regret that a man of your superior understanding should not rather enjoy his own good fortune, than vainly disquiet himself with the misery of others. As for myself, there is none who has more bitterly lamented the general desolation of the commonwealth: yet there are many reflections from which I now derive great relief, particularly from a consciousness of the integrity of my former counsels. I long foreseaw, as from some advantageous eminence, the storm that was gathering around us: and I foresaw it not only by the force of my own discernment, but much clearer by the assistance of your prophetic admonitions. For though I was absent during the greater part of your consulate, yet I was not unapprised how often you foretold this fatal war, and what measures you recommended for its prevention. In the commencement, indeed, of your consulary administration, I was myself present in the senate when you prudently endeavoured to awaken our fears by enumerating those civil wars that had happened within our own memories. And if the authors of these, you told the house, unsupported by a single example of the same kind, to give a colour to their conduct, had exercised such dreadful cruelties, whoever in future times should successfully turn his arms against the republic, would most assuredly prove a much more intolerable tyrant. For they that act by precedent, you observed, generally think they act by right, and in cases of this nature seldom fail of improving upon their model. You should remember, therefore, that those who refused to follow your judicious advice owe their destruction entirely to their own imprudence. But you will ask, perhaps, what relief can I derive from this consideration aforesaid to your mind, amidst the universal wreck of the republic? It must be acknowledged, indeed, that our misfortunes will scarce admit of consolation; but total and so irrecoverable is the ruin we deplore! However, Caesar having himself, as well as every citizen of Rome besides, looked upon you as shining forth, amidst this general extinction of the great lights of the republic, in all the lustre and dignity of wisdom and virtue. These considerations, therefore, ought greatly to alleviate the generous disquietude of your heart. 'Tis true you are absent from your friends and family: but this you have the less reason to regret, as you are removed at the same time from many very disagreeable circumstances. I would particularly point them out to you, but that I am unwilling you should have the pain of hearing what you are so happy as not to see: an advantage which renders your situation, I think, so much the more eligible than ours.

I have thus far laid before you, in the warmest friendship of my heart, those reasons which may justly contribute to lighten and compose your uneasiness. The rest are to be found within yourself, and they are consolations which I know, by daily experience, to be of the best and most efficacious kind. I well remember that you passionately cultivated the whole circle of sciences from your earliest youth, and carefully treasured up in your mind whatever the wisest philosophers have delivered concerning the best and happiest regulation of human life. Now these are contemplations both useful and entertaining, even in seasons of the greatest calm and prosperity; but in the present calamitous situation of public affairs, there is nothing else that can soothe and compose our minds. I would not be so arrogant as to take upon myself to exhort a man of your sense and knowledge to have recourse to those studies to which I know you have your whole life been devoted. I will only say with respect to myself, (and I hope I shall be justified by your approbation,) that I consecrated my time and attention to philosophy, when I perceived there was no farther employment either in the forum or the senate for my favourite art. Scarcely more room is there for the exercise of that excellent science in which you, my friend, are so eminently distinguished. I am persuaded, therefore, that I have no occasion to admonish you to apply your thoughts to the same philosophical contemplations; which, if they were attended with no other advantage, would have this, at least, to

C Some account has already been given of Sulpicius, in orig. 7, p. 454. Upon the breaking out of the civil war he was a considerable time in suspense on which side to declare himself, (see rom. 9, p. 467,) but at length he determined to join Pompey. However, soon after the battle of Pharsalia, he made his peace with Caesar, and was appointed by him governor of Greece. It was during his administration of this province that the present letter, together with the rest of those which are addressed to him in this and the following book, were written.

Sulpicius was consul in the year 707; and it was about the latter end of April, or the beginning of May in the same year, that Cicero left Rome, in order to proceed to his government in Cilicia.—Ad Att. v. 2.

e About two-and-twenty years before the date of this letter, the dissensions between Marcus and Sylla broke out into an open civil war, which terminated in the perpetual dictatorship of the latter.

f Both Marcus and Sylla perpetrated, in their turns, the most horrid outrages against the partisans of each other; but particularly Sylla, whose sanguinary proscriptions, during his usurpation, afforded the most dreadful instances, perhaps, of human cruelty, that are to be met with in the whole annals of despotic power.—Sallust. Bell. Cat. 51.

Your son applies himself to all the polite arts in general with great success: but he particularly excels in those philosophical studies from whence I just now professed to derive the principal consolation of my life. I know not any man, except yourself, for whom I have conceived a stronger affection: and, indeed, he very amply returns the warmth of my friendship: but he evidently shows, at the same time, that in distinguishing me with the marks of his respect and esteem, he imagines that he is acting in the most agreeable manner to your inclinations. Farewell.

LETTER II.
To Publius Servilius Isauricus1, Proconsul.
I received the account you sent me of your voyage with much pleasure, as it was a proof that you are not unmindful of our friendship; than which nothing, be assured, can afford me a more real satisfaction. Would you still oblige me more? let it be by freely communicating to me the state of your province, and the plan of government with which you are at present charged, the fame of your administration will undoubtedly reach me by many other ways, yet I shall be most pleased in being made acquainted with it by your own hand. As for myself, the hazards to which my letters are exposed will not suffer me to be so frequent in giving you my sentiments of public affairs, as I shall be in apprising you of what passes amongst us. I have hopes, however, that our colleague Caesar2 intends, and, indeed, that he actually has it under his consideration, to establish a republican form of government in some kind; and it is of much importance that you should be present in his council for this purpose. But if it be more for your own glory to preside over Asia, and preserve that ill-affected part of the republic in its allegiance, I ought to regulate my inclinations by yours, and prefer what will most contribute to the advancement of your interest and your honour. Be assured, I shall employ my utmost zeal to promote both by every mean that shall appear conducive to that end; among which, it shall be my principal care to distinguish your illustrious father3 with all possible marks of my observance.

1 Caesar nominated him joint consul with himself, in the year 707; and Servilius exercised the consular functions at Rome, whilst his colleague was employed in carrying on the war against Pompey in Macedonia. He was, at the same time, proconsul of Asia Minor, to whose province he succeeded at the expiration of his consulate. —Cæs. De Bell. Civ. iii. 1.
2 Caesar was a fellow-member of the college of augurs with Cicero and Servilius.
3 Servilius the father, after having passed through the office of consul in the year 673, was elected governor of Cilicia, where he greatly distinguished himself in several obstinate and successful engagements with the piratical nations that infested the Roman commerce in this part of the world, and particularly against the Issauri, a people situated between Cilicia and Lycaonia; and having penetrated as far as their capital, he not only laid it level with the ground, but demolished several strong forts which the pirates possessed in the maritime parts of that kingdom. It was upon this occasion that he obtained the title of Invictus; and at his return to Rome, he was honoured, likewise, with a triumph. He did not long after this letter was written, in an ex-

This, indeed, is what I justly owe him, not only in regard to his high character, and the friendship in which we have been long united, but in return, likewise, for the many favours which you and he have conferred upon me. Farewell.

LETTER III.
To Nigidius Figulus1.

THOUGH I have long been looking out for an occasion of writing to you, yet I have not only been unable to meet with any particular subject for that purpose, but find myself utterly at a loss even to furnish out a common letter. The calamities of our country have spoiled me for those jocose epistles with which, in happier days, I used to entretenue my friends; as fortune has rendered me incapable of writing, or, in truth, of thinking, upon any subject of a cheerful nature. There remains another species of letters of a grave and serious cast, peculiarly adapted to these miserable times. But, as a letter of this kind ought to contain either some promise of assisting you to surmount your misfortunes, or some arguments to support you under them; from these, too, I am likewise excluded. Sunk, indeed, as I am, into the same abject fortune as yourself, what assistance can I possibly offer you? In sad truth, I am obliged to have recourse myself to the aid of others, and I have much more reason to lament that I live upon these disgraceful terms, than to rejoice that I am still in being. I say not this from any extraordinary injuries which I have suffered in my own person; indeed, there is nothing which, in the present conjuncture, I could wish for myself, but that Caesar has not voluntarily offered me. Nevertheless, the sorrows that oppress my heart are of so severe a nature, that I think myself guilty of a crime in still continuing to live. For I live deprived of many of my most intimate friends, whom death, or those public calamities which have driven them from their country, have separated from me; as I have, likewise, lost by the same means all those whose goodtreme old age, and is said to have preserved his health and senses entire to his last moments.—Liv. Epit. 30; Flor. iii. 6; Dio, xiv. p. 277.

1 Nigidius Figulus was a person of great distinction, not only in the civil, but literary world. He had passed through the office of tribune and praetor, with much honour; and was at this time in the number of those who were suffering exile for having taken up arms on the side of Pompey. He was extremely well versed in all the liberal sciences, but his studies were principally consecrated to moral and natural knowledge; in the latter of which he seems to have made such extraordinary discoveries, as to have occasioned a suspicion that he practised the magic art. He was much addicted to judicial astrology; and it is said, that being inspired of the birth of Octavius, he immediately pronounced that he was destined to empire. Lucan has celebrated him for his learning of this kind, and represents him as prophetically declaring the future calamities of his country:

At Figulus, cui cura dux sacerdotum celli
Noseo fulce, &c.

One of the commentators asserts, (though it does not appear upon what authority,) that Figulus died in exile, the year following the date of this letter.—Ad Quint. Fret. l. 2; Cíc. Fragm. de Divin. in Princip. ; Dio, xiv. p. 270; Suet. in Vit. Aug. 84; Lucan, l. 693.
will I formerly conciliated, when, by your assistance, I successfully stood forth in defence of the republic. I have the unhappiness, at the same time, to be placed in the midst of the general wreck and plunder of their fortunes; and not only have the pain to bear, but (what is far more affecting) am a spectator of the dissipation of the estates which belonged to those illustrious associates who assisted me in extinguishing the flames of that dangerous conspiracy. In a word, I have the mortification to find myself utterly divested of all credit, authority and honours in that republic, where I once flourished in the full possession of those glorious distinctions. Caesar, 'tis true, acts towards me with the utmost generosity; but his generosity cannot restore what I have lost by the general violence and confusion of the times. Thus bereaved of those advantages to which I was habituated by genius, by inclination, and by custom, I imagine that the world is no less dissatisfied with me than I am with myself. Formed, indeed, as I was by nature, to be perpetually engaged in the noblest and most important occupations, I am now deprived of every mean, not only of acting, but of thinking, to any public purpose. There was a time when my assistance could have raised the obscure, and protected even the guilty; but now I cannot so much as send a favourable promise to Nigidius; to the virtuous, the learned Nigidius; to the man who once flourished in the highest credit, and who was always my warmest friend! Thus you see that I am totally disqualified from writing letters to you of this kind.

The only subject that remains to me, then, is to endeavour to draw off your mind from its inquietudes, by laying before you such arguments as may afford you a well-grounded consolation. But, if over any man was peculiarly qualified to employ the strongest reasonings of this nature, either for his own use or for that of others, most undoubtedly it is yourself. Such, therefore, as may be drawn from the refined sources of philosophy, I will not pretend to touch; but shall leave them entirely to your own suggestions. Whatever is worthy of a man of true wisdom and fortune; whatever is already accomplished to that character you have sustained in the world, and to those studies in which you so early excelled; whatever, in short, is expected from a great and exalted mind in the circumstances wherein you are placed, your own reflections will best supply. I will only take upon myself, therefore, to inform you of what I have been able to discover from my being situated in Rome, and giving a particular attention to every occurrence that passes. I will venture, then, with confidence to assure you, that your present troubles (perhaps, too, I might add, that those of the republic itself) will not be of long continuance. For, in the first place, Caesar seems well inclined to recall you from exile; and trust me, I speak this from no hasty conjecture. On the contrary, I examine his sentiments and dispositions so much the more strictly, as I am less biased in his favour by any personal attachment to that character you have sustained. When I think of the single reason for his delaying to restore you, is, that he may with a better grace refuse the same favour to others against whom he is more warmly incensed. I am sure, at least, that all his most intimate friends and favourites both think and speak of you highly to your advantage.

In the next place, the populace, or rather, I should say, the whole community in general, are strongly in your interest. And, let me add, that the republic herself, whose power at present, it must be confessed, is certainly incomconsiderable, but who must necessarily, however, recover some degree of credit; the republic herself, believe me, will soon obtain your restoration from those who at this time hold her in subjection. In this respect, therefore, I may venture even to promise you some assistance. With this view, I shall closely attach myself to Caesar's favourites, who are all of them, indeed, extremely fond of me, and spend much of their time in my company; as I shall insinuate myself into an intimacy with Caesar, to which my own modesty has hitherto proved the single obstruction. In short, I shall pursue every probable mean of this kind, (and some, too, that I dare not commit to paper,) in order to obtain your return. As to other articles of assistance, I am sensible there are many who are perfectly well inclined to offer you their services; but you may depend upon me as the first and forwardest in that number. The sincere truth is, there is not part of my estate which is not as freely at your disposal as it is at mine. But I will say the less upon this subject, as I would rather encourage you to hope, (what I am well persuaded will be the case,) that you will soon have it in your power to make use of your own. In the mean while, let me conjure you to preserve a firm and unbroken spirit, remembering not only the sublime precepts you have received from other celebrated philosophers, but those likewise which have been the produce of your own judicious reflections. If you attend to these, they will teach you to hope the best, and, at the same time, to meet whatever may happen with a wise composure of mind. But these are sentiments which no man is so capable to suggest to you as yourself. I will only add, then, that you may be assured of my carefully and zealously embracing \footnote{It requires, perhaps, no ordinary portion of faith to believe it was modesty that kept Cicero at a distance from Caesar. The true reason, indeed, appears from Cicero's own account in the first paragraph of the following letter, where he touches upon this article in a more ingenuous manner than he thought proper in the present instance. See the 17th and 22d letters of this book.}

\footnote{This alludes to the affair of Catiline's conspiracy; in which, as in every other article of public concern, Cicero was principally determined in his conduct by the sentiments and advice of Nigidius.—Plut. in Vit. Cic.}

\footnote{Nigidius published many treatises on different branches of human and theological science, the subjects of which Manutius, with his usual learning and industry, has collected from the several ancient writers wherein they are cited. It is probable, from the present passage, that he had published also some treatise concerning fortune, upon the Pythagoric principles. It is certain, at least, that Nigidius (and it is a circumstance greatly to the honour of his character) attempted to bring the philosophy of Pythagoras into credit with his countrymen, which, after having flourished in Italy during some centuries, was now grown almost entirely out of repute. It is no wonder, indeed, that a system which, in consequence of the Persians, had to have approached very near to the divine morality of the Christian institution, was rejected in an age in which the only fashionable principles were, to acquire wealth by every means of avarice and injustice, and to dissipate it by every method of luxury and profusion.—Cic. Frug. de Univ. in Princip.} very opportunity of promoting your welfare; as I shall always retain a grateful remembrance of the generous services you conferred upon me during my severe afflictions. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Marcus Marcellus.

I will not venture to condemn, though I have not myself pursued those measures in which I find you still persevering: as I have too high an opinion of your judgment to think the preference is due to my own. The friendship, however, in which we have so long been intimately united, together with those singular marks of affection you have shown towards me from your earliest youth, induce me to recommend to you what seems conducive to your interest, at the same time that it appears by no means inconsistent with your honour.

I am sensible that you long foresaw, no less than myself, those calamities that have fallen upon our country; and I well remember the patriot conduct you displayed during your glorious administration of the consular office. But I remember, too, that you disapproved of the manner in which the civil war was conducted; and that, far from being satisfied either with the strength or nature of Pompey’s forces, you were always extremely diffluent of their success; in which, I need not add, I entirely agreed with you. In conformity to these mutual sentiments, as you did not enter very far into the war on your part, so I always endeavoured as much as possible to avoid it on mine. The point in contest between the adverse parties was not to be decided, indeed, by the force of their counsels, and the justice of their cause, in which we had undoubtedly the advantage, but by the single strength of their swords, wherein we were evidently inferior. Vanquished, therefore, we accordingly are; or, if virtue never can be vanquished, yet certainly, at least, we are fallen. Your conduct cannot but be greatly and universally applauded, in having renounced the spirit of contention, when you lost the hopes of success; and you showed, by your own example, that as a wise and honest patriot will always enter into a civil war with reluctance, so will I never choose to carry it on to its last desperate extremity. Those who did not pursue the same measures formed themselves into two different parties; and while some retreated into Africa, in order to renew the war, others, and myself among the rest, submitted to the conqueror. But you thought proper to steer a middle course, imagining, perhaps, that it was mean to yield, and obstinacy to resist. In this, I must confess, you are thought by many (I might say by the world in general) to have given a proof of your virtue; while there are summers who admire it likewise as an instance of great magnanimity. Nevertheless, there is a time, it should seem, when this measure may cease to be any longer justifiable; especially as nothing, I am persuaded, is wanting to establish you in the full possession of your fortunes but your own concurrence. For be it in whom all power is centered

1 has no other objection, I find, to granting you this favour, but that he is apprehensive you are by no means disposed to think it one. What my own sentiments are as to that point, is too evident by my conduct to render it necessary to explain them. But this, however, I will say, that although you should prefer a state of perpetual exile rather than be a spectator of what you cannot but disapprove, yet you should reflect that it is impossible, in any part of the world, to be placed out of the reach of his power whom you desire to avoid. And, even granting it probable that he should suffer you to live free and unmolested in a voluntary banishment, yet it deserves your consideration, whether it would not be more eligible, whatever the situation of public affairs may be, to spend your days in Rome than at Rhodes or Mitylene. But, since that power which we dread extends itself over every part of the globe, is it not better to live securely under your own roof, than in perpetual danger under that of another? For myself, at least, if even death were my resolution, yet I would rather choose to expire in my own country and in my own mansion, than at a stranger’s house and in a foreign land.

All who love you (and your illustrious virtues have rendered that party extremely numerous) join with me in these sentiments. In this we have a regard likewise to the preservation of your estate, which we should be sorry to see dissipated. For though neither that person who governs the republic, nor, indeed, the republic itself, would suffer any injuries of this kind to remain always unrepressed, yet I would not, in the mean time, have your estate exposed to the depredations of certain lawless invaders, whom I should not scruple to name, if I were not persuaded that you perfectly well know to whom I allude.

Your Your excellent relation Caius Marcellus

2 discovers a singular zeal in his frequent and earnest applications to Caesar on your behalf. And, though I am not in a situation to second these his solicitations, I claim, however, the next rank in my anxiety for your welfare. The truth is, I have

2 It is probable that Brutus was in the number of those who were in Cicero’s thoughts upon this occasion, as he may have been collected from a passage in Seneca. This noble moralist relates, that Brutus, in a treatise which he wrote concerning virtue, mentioned his having paid a visit to Marcellus at Mitylene, where he found him in the utmost tranquillity, pursuing, with all his usual taste and spirit, the moral and polite arts. “And I could not forbear thinking,” added Brutus, “when I took my leave of Marcellus in order to return to Rome, that it was myself, and not my friend, who deserved to be lamented as the exile.” Seneca takes occasion from hence to introduce a soliloquy, which he puts into the mouth of this illustrious exile; and he concludes it with a sentiment that raises the highest kind of Brutus and Marcellus. “Let conquered nations (the suppose Marcellus to have said to himself) look with wonder upon Caesar; but live thou, Brutus mira torre contemptus, satisfied with having gained the admiration of Brutus!”—Senec. Consol. ad Helvid. B. 3

stood too much in need of an advocate myself, to take the liberty of acting that part for another; as all the merit I can plead, is to have yielded after having been conquered. Nevertheless, as far as my advice and endeavours can be of any avail in your affairs, they are not wanting to Caesar. The rest of your family do not think proper to consult me, though they may always be assured of finding me ready to exert my best services wherever your interest is concerned. Farewell.

LETTER V.

To Trebiusanns.*

I should have written to you sooner, if it had been either in my power to have promised you any intellectual assistance or necessary to have offered you any consolation; one or the other being the part of every friend in so unhappy a conjuncture as the present. But I forbore the latter, as I was informed by many hands of the resolute and philosophical spirit with which you support the unjust persecution you are suffering from the violence of the times, and of the strong consolation you receive from the consciousness of that integrity by which all your counsels and actions towards the public were directed. If this account be true, (and let me earnestly exhort you to verify it,) you reap the happy fruits of those noble contemplations in which, I well know, you have ever been conversant. I will venture at the same time to assure you, (how unnecessary soever that assurance may be to a man so perfectly well acquainted with the present age, and so thoroughly versed in the annals of all the past,) that the cruel injuries under which you are oppressed cannot possibly continue long. And this conjecture you may safely take from one who, if he is less a politician in theory, perhaps, than he wishes, is certainly much more so by experience than he desires. Caesar, indeed, seems to be every day more and more inclined to adopt those equitable measures which our public affairs require; and he, like- wise, for which you suffer is of such a nature, that it must necessarily revive and flourish with the republic; which most undoubtedly cannot always remain in its present state of subjectation. To which I will add, that Caesar is continually giving proofs of greater moderation and generosity than we once imagined he would have shown. But as instances of this kind are generally produced by particular conjunctures, and frequently too depend upon very minute circumstances, I shall watch every favourable moment, and endeavour to improve it to your best advantage; for you may be assured I shall neglect no opportunity of assisting and alleviating your misfortunes. I hope likewise that the time is approaching when I shall be enabled to promise you some more effectual service; of which, however, I had much rather give you proofs than professions. In the mean while, be persuaded that, as far as I have been capable of observing, there is no man who either is or has been under the same misfortune with yourself that can boast of so many zealous and faithful friends; in which number I claim the principal rank.

Let me conclude with entreating you to preserve a firm and unbroken fortitude; for this is a possession which depends entirely upon yourself. As to what is in the disposal of fortune, it must be governed by particular circumstances; and I shall exert all my prudence to turn them in the most advantageous manner for your interest. Farewell.

LETTER VI.

To Gallus.*

I am much surprised at your reproaches, as I am sure they are altogether without foundation.

v. u. 707.

But were they ever so just, they would come with a very ill grace from you, who ought to have remembered those marks of distinction you received from me during my consulate. It seems, however, (for so you are pleased to inform me,) that Caesar will certainly restore you. I know you are never sparing of your boasts; but I know, too, that they have the ill luck never to be credited. It is in the same spirit you remind me, that you offered yourself as a candidate for the tribunial office merely in order to serve me. Now, to show you how much I am in your interest, I wish you were a tribune still; as in that case you could not be at a loss for an intercessor. You go on to reproach me with not daring to speak my sentiments. In proof, however, of the contrary, I need only refer you to the reply I made when you had the front to solicit my assistance.

Thus, (to let you see how absolutely impotent you are, where you most affect to appear formidable,) I thought proper to answer you in your own style. If you had made your remonstrances in the spirit of good manners, I should with pleasure, as I could with ease, have vindicated myself from your charge; and, in truth, it is not your conduct, but your intrigue of which I have reason to regret. I am astonished, indeed, that you, of all men living, should accuse me of want of freedom, who are sensible it is by my means that there is any freedom.

w Manutius conjectures, that this Gallus is the same with Publius Sestius, to whom the fifth letter of the first book is addressed; whose family name he supposes (from a passage which he cites out of the oration for Milo) to have been Gallus. That learned commentator supports this opinion with some very plausible reasons: but as the point in question is of little consequence, the reader will readily excuse me that I save him the trouble of considering them. Gallus seems to have been in the number of the Pompeian exiles, and to have drawn upon himself this letter, in answer to one wherein he had reproached Cicero with ingratitude in refusing to assist him with his good offices.

y Cicero's witicism in this passage turns upon the double sense of the word intercessor, which, besides its general meaning, has relation likewise to a particular privilege annexed to the tribunial office. For every tribune had the liberty of interposing his negative upon the proceedings of the senate; which act was called intercessio, and the person who executed it was said to be the intercessor of the particular law, or other matter in deliberation.
left in the republic. I say, you of all men living; because, if the informations you gave me concerning Catiline’s conspiracy were false, where are the services of which you remind me? If they were true, you yourself are the best judge how great those obligations are which I have conferred upon every Roman in general. Farewell.

LETTER VII.

To P. Servilius Isauricus, Proquestor.

Whilst I was proconsul of Cilicia, (to which, you know, three Asiatic departments a were annexed,) there was no man with whom I entered into a stricter intimacy than with Andro, the son of Artemon, of Laodicea. I was his guest during my residence in that city, as his temper and manner of life extremely well accorded with mine. But my esteem for him rose still higher after I left the province, having, upon many subsequent occasions, experienced the gratitude with which he preserved me in his remembrance. Accordingly, it was with great pleasure I lately saw him in Rome: as you will easily believe, who know, by the many good offices you have yourself conferred upon his countrymen, how few of them are disposed to be thus sensible of obligations. I mention these circumstances to show you, in the first place, that it is not without reason I interest myself in his concerns; and in the next, that his merit well entitles him to a generous reception under your roof. I shall be greatly indebted to you, therefore, for giving him a proof of the regard you bear me, by receiving him into your protection, and assisting him in all his affairs: so far, I mean, as may be consistent with your convenience and your honour. And this I most earnestly request, as an instance of your friendship that will be exceedingly agreeable to me. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

To Trebiannus.

I am no less sensible of the share you allow me in your friendship than I am conscious of that affection which I have ever entertained for you in return. Agreeably to these sentiments, I always lamented that it was your choice, or rather, I should say, your fate, to persevere in our civil wars; and I now feel the same concern at the unjust delay you meet with in being restored to your estate and honours, as you have always shown in my misfortunes. I have frequently, and fully opened my heart upon this subject, not only to Pius Thunus, to Servilius, and to our common friend Atticus, but lately also to your friend Thunda; to each of whom I have given repeated assurances that it is my earnest desire to serve both you and your children to the utmost of my ability. I beg, therefore, when you write to the latter, that you would assure them they may most readily command me, upon every occasion wherein my purse, my pains, or my sincere advice, (for these, at least, are still in my power) can be of any advantage to their affairs. If I enjoyed that influence and authority in the commonwealth to which the public services I have performed most justly entitle me, you, who deserve every honour that can be conferred, as well as confessedly the first of that illustrious order to which you belong b, should retain the same distinguished rank in the republic you once possessed. But since we both of us fell at the same time and in the same cause c, I can only promise you what yet remains in my power and the small assistance I mentioned above, together with that little degree of credit which I still, perhaps, have in some sort preserved from the general wreck of my former dignities. I have reason, indeed, from many instances, to believe that Caesar is not averse to me: and almost all his principal favourites, who happen to be persons to whom I have formerly rendered very considerable services, distinguish me with peculiar marks of their esteem and consideration. If, therefore, I should find a favourable opportunity of applying to Caesar in your behalf (which I am more and more inclined to hope, from what I can discover by the conversation of these my friends), I shall not fail very strenuously to solicit him in person for your restoration, as it is upon the obtaining of this point that the recovery of your estate must depend. It is unnecessary to enter into particulars upon this article: let me only assure you, in one word, that I am wholly and most affectionately devoted to your service. But as it much imports me that all your family should be apprised of this truth, I hope your letters will acquaint them that Trebiannus may command whatever is in the power of Cicero to perform. I particularly mention this, as I am desirous they should be persuaded that there is nothing so difficult which I should not with pleasure undertake in order to render you any service. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

To Quintus Gallius d.

Though I hope to receive many instances hereafter of the regard you bear me (of which, a. u. 707.) indeed, you have long since rendered me sufficiently sensible, yet there is one which at present occurs, wherein you may give me a very convincing proof of your friendship. Lucius b The eques trium.

c That of Pompey.
d Who this person was, is entirely unknown. He seems to have been setting out for the government of one of the eastern provinces when this letter was written.
Oppius, the son of Marcus, is a merchant in Philomelum, with whom I am extremely intimate. But, besides warmly recommending him as a man I love, I must likewise claim your kindness to him, as he is an agent for Egnatius Rufus, a Roman knight, with whom I am most affectionately connected, not only by a daily intercourse, but by many and great good offices. I beseech you, then, to take the person of Oppius, together with the affairs of Egnatius, into your protection: a request which I make with as much zeal as if my own interest were concerned. Again and again, therefore, I entreat your compliance. I beg, likewise, that you would give two or three lines to be presented to you as a memorandum, when you shall arrive in your province. But I desire you would express them in such terms as may strongly remind you very earnestly I applied in behalf of these my friends. Farewell.

To Marcus Marcellus.

I DARE not pretend to advise, or to animate a man of your distinguished judgment and magnanimity; much less shall I attempt to send you any consolation. If it be true, indeed, that you bear the sad events which have lately happened in the manner I am informed, I have more reason to congratulate your fortitude than to soothe your affliction. But were the fact entirely otherwise, and you had sunk under the pressure of our public misfortunes, yet I am so far from being qualified to alleviate your sorrows, that I am altogether incapable of assuaging my own. The single testimony, therefore, that I can give you of my friendship is, to convince your family, by my readiness in complying with all their requests, that there are no services so great which they have not reason to expect from me on your account.

But, notwithstanding I just now disclaimed all right of sending you my admonitions, yet I cannot forbear saying (and you may consider it either as my advice, my opinion, or what my friendship would not suffer me to suppress) that I wish you would prevail with yourself to adopt the same measures which I have pursued, and return to Italy. I wish, indeed, you would be persuaded to think, that if the republic should in any degree subsist, you ought to live in it, as one who, though justly, and in the general estimation of the world, is deserving of the highest rank, yet wisely submitted to the irresistible necessity of the times; and if the republic should be totally destroyed, that you would look upon Rome as the most proper scene of exile. For, tell me, my friend, if liberty be the object of our pursuit, what part of the world is exempted from the present dominion? or if some place of retirement be what we seek, where can we find a more eligible retreat than in our native country? And, believe me, he who holds the supreme power is not only a friend to genius and literature, but disposed, as far as the circumstances and situation of his affairs will permit, to pay a particular regard to those who are distinguished by their worth and dignities. But this is this letter rather than I intended. To return, therefore, to the single purpose of my letter: let me assure you that I am wholly yours, and ready to co-operate with your relations in every instance wherein they shall approve themselves such. But if they should not, you may depend, at least, upon my acting, upon all occasions, agreeably to our friendship. Farewell.

LETTER XI.
To Papirius Patus.

I RECEIVED a letter from you some time since by your courier Phileros, as also another three days ago by the hands of Zethus; both which I will now answer. It was with much satisfaction I found, by the former, that you were extremely sensible of the concern I expressed for your health. Believe me, however, a letter could but faintly represent the unassuaged I suffered upon that account. For though I cannot but acknowledge that there are many from whom I receive great marks of esteem and affection, yet there is not one in that number whom I prefer to yourself. It is a very great—perhaps I might say, a principal inducement for my holding you in this rank, that you have long distinguished me with an unvaried friendship; yet this is a circumstance which you share in common with many others. But your amiable disposition, and those agreeable qualities of every kind which you possess, are claims to my heart in which you are without a rival. To these I must add, I will not call it the Attic, but (what is far more spirited) the true old Roman wit, which so elegantly embellishes your conversation. I will not scruple, indeed, to acknowledge (whatever you may think of me from the confession) that I am wonderfully delighted with humour; especially with that sort which is of our own domestic growth. I esteem this latter kind so much the more, as it is now become extremely uncommon; for, by the admission some years since of the Latians into Rome, and lately even of the Gauls themselves, our native humour has been tainted with the infusion of foreign cant, and is almost entirely extinct. For

* A city of Phrygia, upon the borders of Galatia.
† The family of Marcellus was one of the noblest in Rome.—See Sim. v. p. 389.
‡ It appears from this and other passages in these letters, that some part of Marcellus's family discovered less warmth in promoting his welfare than seems to have been due to the merit of so illustrious a relation.
§ The inhabitants of Latium, a part of Italy which is now called the Campagna di Roma. They obtained the honour and advantage of being made free of Rome, towards the close of the Italian war, A. D. 664.—See Sim. v. p. 340; Pigh. Annal. ii. 226.

I Caesar, in the wantonness of his power, had lately admitted several of the Gauls into the privileges of Roman citizens, and had even introduced some of them to a seat in the senate.—Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cae. 76.

II It is difficult, if not altogether impossible, to determine, with any precision, what it was that distinguished the spirit of this true old Roman wit and humour which Cicero here represents as almost entirely extinct. But, in general, as far as can be collected from other parts of our author's writings, it seems to have consisted in what they call urbanity: a term, however, which they themselves did not well know how to explain. For when Brutus, in his reason, whenever I converse with you, I imagine myself transported back into former times, and to be talking with the Grani, the Luculli, or, a truth, even with the Crassil and the Lefli of id. There is not a single person, indeed, except yourself, in whom I can discover the least indication of that original simplicity and that distinguished pleasantry of our forefathers. But since to these uncommon charms of wit, you add the attractions, likewise, of so singular a friendship as my own, can you wonder that I was greatly alarmed at your late very dangerous indisposition?

As to your other letter, in which you acquit yourself of all intention to dissuade me from my Neapolitan purchase, and the assurance you give me that you only meant to advise my continuance in Rome, I understood you in no other sense. But I suppose (and your letter now before me confirms the supposition) that you did not agree with me in thinking I might be justified, I will not say in wholly renouncing, but in seldom taking a part in public affairs. With this view I imagine it was, that you reminded me of those times in which Catulus acted so distinguished a part, in the dialogue concerning the most celebrated orators, inquires, "Qui est iste, tandem urbanitas color?" Cicero replies, "Nescio, inquam. Tamque equidem seco." Nevertheless, it appears, by what he immediately subjunges, to have resulted from a certain refinement of expression and elegance of pronunciation which was to be found only amongst the most polite and cultured natives of Rome. Perhaps, therefore, it was this inexplicable grace of language so gloriously and so manfully was高等院校 distinguished the Romans and distinguished these strangers into Rome; who, probably, had introduced, among the little pretenders to wit and humour, a foreign tone of voice, together with an exotic turn of phraseology. A prevailing fashion of this kind would necessarily extinguish that spirit which seasoned the old Roman pleasantry with a nescio quo capere vernaculo (as Cicero somewhere calls it), a certain exquisite taste and flavour peculiar to its native soil.—Cic. de Clar. Orator. Orig. ii. 18.

The several persons here mentioned were celebrated wits, who flourished about the time that Cicero was born, that is, in the consulate of C. Atius Serranus and Q. Servilius Caepio, U. C. 647. The reader has already had some account of Caepio in the notes on the previous pages. Lucullus was the most distinguished orator of his times, and signified his elevation when he was only twenty-one years of age, at the trial of C. Carbo, who was concerned in the disturbance which were raised by the Gracchi. Catulus was a Roman knight, and great-uncle to Pompey. He consider- ably improved upon that kind of satirical poetry, which received its utmost perfection in the following century from the hands of Horace. Some fragments of his writings still remain. Granius was a person of low rank; being only a praecox, or sort of crier, in the courts of justice. Cicero, however, has immortalized his memory by the frequent encomiums he passes upon the singular elegance and pleasantry of his wit and humour.—Cic. de Clar. Orator. Orig. 190, 190, 190, &c.; Daider, Pref. sur les Stat. d'Hercule, i. 268.

See the last paragraph of letter 20, book vii.

Q. L. Catulus was consul in the year 675, and died about the year 698: during which period he had many opportunities of exerting his patriotism, by rising against the gradual encroachments of Pompey and Caesar upon the public liberty. Thus he opposed, with a spirit worthy the best times of ancient Rome, that unlimited and unconstitutionall commission which was granted to Pompey under a pretence of the piratic war; and rendered himself illustrious by two laws, one to Cæsar, that the latter endeavoured, though unsuccessfully, to blast his well-established credit by an impeachment for embezzling the public treasure. In short, the welfare of his country was the great and constant object of his unwearied labours; in which he persevered with a zeal and resolution which no fears or hopes could shake, and which Cato, of all his contemporaries, seems alone to have equaled.—Pig. Annal. ii. 279; Dii, xxxvi. p. 18, 49, 50; Orig. pro Sest. 47.

The consolate of Cicero fell within the period men- tioned in the preceding remark; that is, in the year 690.

Cæsar.

? It was usual, in drawing up the decrees of the senate, to prefix the names of those senators who were principally concerned in pronouncing them.

? It was the custom of foreign princes to obtain an acknowledgment of their regal title from the senate, and to be declared friends and allies of the republic; an honour which, in the more regular times of the Roman government, was but rarely granted, and only in consideration of some signal services. But in that general corruption which preceded the ruin of the commonwealth, this honour became venal, as it supplied a very plentiful stream of wealth to those leading men in the state who were not ashamed to prostitute the most sacred privileges to their insatiable avarice. Cæsar, in particular, drew immense riches from this single source; a strong instance of which has already been produced in rem. i. p. 334; Cæs. De Bell. Gall. i. 43; Suev. in Vit. Jul. Cæs. 44.

This dish was chosen from the great esteem which it was invested with all the power of the censorial office, without the name. It does not appear for what reason he chose this appellation rather than that of censor. Some have supposed that it was from an affection of modesty; but they who assign this reason seem to forget that Cæsar did not blash to be associated with the gods in the public worship of his degenerate Romans. —Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cæs. 70; Appian. De Bell. Civ. iii. p. 494.

Cæsar was at this time preparing to set out upon his expedition to the East, and chose as his treasurer, a man, who had assembled a very considerable army in Spain.
you must know, to live so abstemiously, that what our late sumptuary law allows for one day's expense shall suffice me for ten. But if I cannot meet with one to my satisfaction, I intend to be your guest; and I am sure it is not in my power to oblige you more.

Though I mentioned in my last that I almost despaired of Sylla's house, yet I have not absolutely given up all thoughts of that purchase. Agreeably to your offer, I beg you would take some workmen with you in order to survey it; for if the walls and roof are in a good repair, I shall perfectly well approve of all the rest. Farewell.

LETTER XII.
To Trebonius.

THOUGH I had always a great affection for Dolabella, yet I never received any favour from him till now. Indeed, he never before had an opportunity of repaying those good offices he owed me for having more than once stood forth in his defence. But his late zeal in protecting your estate, together with his present assistance in promoting your restoration, have so abundantly satisfied every claim I have to his services, that there is no man to whom I think myself more strongly obliged. I take so sincere a part with you in the joy of this event, that in stead of your thanks, I expect your congratulations.
The former, indeed, I by no means desire; but the latter you may, with great propriety, send me.

Since your distinguished merit has thus removed all obstructions to your return, it will be agreeable to your good sense and greatness of mind, to forget all that you have lost, and reflect only on the advantages you have recovered. You will remember, then, that you are restored to your family and to your friends; and that whatever you have suffered in your estate is considerably overbalanced by the glory you have acquired; which, I am persuaded, would be still more acceptable to you if the republic had in any degree subsisted.

I have received a letter from my friend Vestorius, wherein he informs me of the grateful mention you make of my services. I am extremely obliged to you for your professions of this kind in general, but particularly for those you expressed to our friend Syro; as I am greatly desirous to approve my conduct upon all occasions to every sensible and judicious man. I hope to see you very soon.

Farewell.

v This law was enacted by Caesar soon after his return from the African war. It regulated the expenses of the Romans, not only with regard to their tables, but also their dress, equipage, furniture, and buildings. But Caesar seems to have found it a much easier task to corrupt than to reform; for though he was very desirous of enforcing this salutary law, yet it appears to have been extremely ill observed.—Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cæs. 43; A. D. Att. xvi. 7.

LETTER XIII.
To Marcus Brutus.*

I AM persuaded that your question, Marcus Varro*, who is setting out to Attica, you need no recommendation to your favour; for I
A. v. 707. doubt not, that in conformity to the maxims of our forefathers, you look upon his office as giving him a sufficient title to your regard. And I need not tell you, that it was the policy of ancient times to consider the relation between a proconsul and his qnestor, as next to that of a father and son. However, as Varro imagines that a letter from me will have great weight, and has pressed me to write to you in the strongest terms, I willingly perform an office which he believes will prove so much to his advantage. That you may be sensible I ought not to refuse this request, I must inform you that he cultivated my friendship from his first appearance in the forum; as, in his more mature years, two circumstances conmurred which extremely increased the affection I had conceived for him: the one, that he distinguished himself by that well-known side of great genius and application in that persuasive art in which I still take particular pleasure; the other, that he early became a member of the society for farming the public revenues. I wish, indeed, that he had never embarked in their concerns, as he has been a considerable sufferer by his engagements of this sort. However, his union with a company for whose interests I have so great a regard was one means of more strongly cementing our friendship.

Marcus Brutus was nephew to Cato, whose virtues he had the just ambition to copy. He seems, however, in some points, to have fallen short of the model he proposed to imitate; as he by no means acted up to that inflexible uniformity of conduct which renders the character of Cato so gloriously singular. Thus, though Brutus, at the battle of Pharsalia, engaged on the side of Pompey, yet, immediately after the unsuccessful event of that action, he not only made his peace with Caesar, but was willing to contribute to the ruin of that cause in which he had so lately engaged. For when Cesar was doubtful what route Pompey had taken in his flight, it was by the advice and information of Brutus that he followed him into Egypt.
Cesar, just before he set out for Africa, appointed Brutus governor of Caislina Gaul, which he administered with great moderation and integrity. It was during his residence in this province, that the present and following letters addressed to him in this book appear to have been written.—[In, Vit. Brut.

Some of the commentators have supposed that this is the celebrated Marcus Terentius Varro, to whom several letters in the preceding book are addressed. But Cullarius has justly observed, that the age and dignity of that Illusrious Roman render it highly improbable he should at this time have been questor to Brutus, who was a much younger man than himself. Perhaps the person recom-manded in this letter is the same whom Horace mentions in an unreasoning admiration in his elegy:

"Hoc erat, expero frater Varro Atacinu, Atque quibusdam aliis, melius poeta scribere potest."—
Sat. x. lib. i. 46.

For the commentators upon these lines inform us, that the poet here spoken of was Terentius Varro, a native of the city of Atacinum, in the Narbonensis Gaul, from which he was called Atacinus, and who was born in the year of Rome 673. He must, consequently, in the present year have been thirty-four, which perfectly well coincides with the age one may justly suppose the person to have been in whose favour this letter is written.
After having acted with the highest integrity and applause, both as an advocate and a judge, he turned his ambition (long indeed before this revolution in the commonwealth had taken place) upon obtaining some employment in the magistrate; and he esteemed the honour of this kind, which his country should confer upon him, as the noblest reward of all his former services. During my late residence at Brundisium⁷, he obligingly offered me to bear a letter and a message from me to Cæsar; and he gave me a very strong proof of his affection, in the zeal and fidelity with which he undertook and executed this generous commission.

I purposes, after having thus assigned the reasons which induce me to give Varro my friendship, to have particularly pointed out the virtues of his heart; but I think I must have sufficiently rendered you sensible of these, by declaring upon what motives he has so strongly engaged my affection. Nevertheless, I will here, in a more distinct and explicit manner, assure you, that you will receive much satisfaction and advantage from the company and assistance of your friend. You will find him, indeed, to be a man of singular modesty and good sense, as well as of indefatigable application to business, at the same time that he is an entire stranger to immoderate desires of every kind. I know not whether I ought to promise thus far in his behalf, as his character, after all, must be referred to your own experience. But in forming new connexions of every sort, it is of much importance in what manner the first approaches are made, and by whose hands the avenues of friendship (if I may so express myself) are laid open. It is this office that I have here undertaken; and though the employment in which Varro stands related to you may well render my services unnecessary, yet they certainly cannot render them prejudicial. If, then, I possess that share in your esteem which Varro imagines, and which I myself am persuaded I enjoy, let me soon have the satisfaction of hearing that my friend has received all the advantages from this letter that are agreeable to his own hopes, and to my firm expectations. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

To Ligarius.*

Though, agreeably to the friendship which subsists between us, I ought to have offered you either assistance or consolation under your misfortunes; yet I have hitherto forbore writing, in the belief that it was not in the power of mere words to remove or alleviate your afflictions. But, as I have now reason to entertain the strongest hopes of shortly seeing you restored to your country, I cannot any longer omit to acquaint you with my sentiments and inclination concerning your affairs. In the first place, then, I am well convinced that you will by no means find Cæsar inexorable. The situation of public circumstances, of his character in the world, length of time, together with what appears to me to be his natural temper, these all concur to soften his resentment every day more and more. This, I imagine, will appear to be his disposition towards all in general who have offended him; but that it is particularly so with respect to yourself, I will assure you upon the authority of his most intimate friends. I have never ceased to solicit them in your behalf ever since we received the first news from Africa⁸; and your brothers have, with equal assiduity, joined me in these applications. Their virtues, indeed, together with that affectionate and unwearied zeal with which they enter into your cause, are so extremely engaging, that I am persuaded even Cæsar himself cannot refuse anything to their requests⁹. But if we do not advance with all the expedition we wish, it must be imputed to those numberless and important occupations which render Cæsar difficult of access; as it is to him alone that he assigns the greatest power and goodwill, as well as of indefatigable application to business, at the same time that he is an entire stranger to immoderate desires of every kind. I know not whether I ought to promise thus far in his behalf, as his character, after all, must be referred to your own experience. But in forming new connexions of every sort, it is of much importance in what manner the first approaches are made, and by whose hands the avenues of friendship (if I may so express myself) are laid open. It is this office that I have here undertaken; and though the employment in which Varro stands related to you may well render my services unnecessary, yet they certainly cannot render them prejudicial. If, then, I possess that share in your esteem which Varro imagines, and which I myself am persuaded I enjoy, let me soon have the satisfaction of hearing that my friend has received all the advantages from this letter that are agreeable to his own hopes, and to my firm expectations. Farewell.

† Ligarius was lieutenant to C. Considius, proconsul of Africa, in the year 703; in which post he gained the general esteem of the whole province. Accordingly, at their unanimous request, Considius, upon his departure for Rome, resigned the administration into the hands of Ligarius. During his residence in that station, the civil war broke out; and he was at this time suffering evils, for having set upon that occasion on the side of Pompey.—Orat. pro Ligar. 1; see rem. § on letter 26 of this book.

* Concerning Cæsar's victory over Sulpio.

† The two brothers of Ligarius seem to have stood neutrals in the civil war. But one of them had something more than a mere negative merit to plead, as he had distinguished himself, during his questorship, by promoting the honours and interest of Cæsar.—Orat. pro Ligar. 12.

LETTER XV.

To Marcus Brutus.

I have always had the satisfaction to observe, that you were particularly inquisitive into every circumstance relating to me. I doubt not, therefore, of your being apprised, not only that Arpinum is the place of my nativity, but that, upon all occasions, I zealously patronise the interests of this city. The whole of their revenues for religious purposes, as also for the repairs of their temples and other public buildings, arises entirely from their estates in Gaul. Accordingly, we have despatched Quintus Fufidius, Marcus Fuscus, and Quintus Mamerus, each of them persons of equestrian rank, in order to collect the rents, and to inspect our affairs in that province. I therefore recommend them to your particular protection, exterting you, by our mutual friendship, to assist them in the speedy and successful discharge of their commission, and to distinguish their persons, agreeably to your usual politeness, with every possible mark of honour. You will, by these means, add three very worthy men to the number of your friends, as well as oblige a community extremely sensible of the good offices they receive. Let me add, too, you will perform a service highly acceptable also to myself; who, as I have at all times stood forth the patron of the Arpinates, am in a more especial manner engaged to take their interests under my protection during the present year. For, in order to the better government of this corporation, I have procured my son and nephew, together with my friend Marcus Cæsius, to be chosen adiles; the only magistrates which our city admits. It will be much, therefore, to the credit of their administration, as well as a particular honour to myself, if the affairs of this community, during their office, should, by the assistance of your generous services, be placed in a more advantageous posture. For which purpose I must again most earnestly conjure you to comply with my present request. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.

To the same.

I have, in a separate letter, recommended to you, with all possible warmth, the commissioners appointed by the city of Arpinum. But I shall here single out one of them in particular, and desire your peculiar regards to Q. Fufidius, a person with whom I am united by every friendly tie. I do not mean, however, by thus distinguishing him from the rest, to lessen the weight of my general recommendation, but only to add this as a sort of supplement to what I have there said. Fufidius, who is son-in-law to my particular friend Marcus Cæsius, acted under me in Cilicia, in quality of military tribune; and he acquitted himself so much to my satisfaction, that I had reason to think I received a favour, instead of bestowing one, when I nominated him to that employment. To this I must add, what I know will considerably raise him in your estimation, that he has a taste and genius for my favourite studies. Let me entreat you, then, to receive my friend with the most distinguishing marks of your politeness, and to assist him in the more effectual discharge of an office which he accepted merely in compliance with my persuasions, and contrary to his own convenience. But as it is the ambition of every man of a generous mind to be approved in all his actions, Fufidius is desirous of executing this commission in such a manner as to merit not only my applause in particular, who engaged him to undertake it, but that, likewise, of our whole community, in general. Now this he will undoubtedly receive, if my recommendation should procure him your friendly offices. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

To Servius Sulpicius.

The excuse you allege for so frequently sending me duplicates of your letters, I very readily admit; and so far, I mean, as it relates to your caution of guarding against the negligence or treachery of those who undertake to deliver them. But when you add, that a poverty of genius likewise (to use your own expression) obliges you to continual repetition, it is an apology I can neither approve nor allow. On the contrary, I who am enriched, as you ironically tell me (for in that sense I understand your compliment) with all the treasures of eloquence, and who, in good earnest, do not think myself wholly destitute of them; even I am far from pretending to equal the delicacy and elegance of your compositions.

I always approved of your having accepted the government of Achaia; but much more so after I had read your last letter. The several reasons you mention are every one of them perfectly just, and altogether worthy of that prudence and dignity which distinguishes your character. But I can by no means agree with you in thinking that this affair has proved so different from what you expected as to give you just occasion to condemn the step you have taken. The truth of it is, the dreadful confusion and desolation which this detestable civil war has universally spread, includes every man, so that it is impossible to imagine that both himself, and the scene in which he happens to be placed, are, of all others, the most completely miserable. Hence it is that you repeat of the choice you have made, and look upon us as much happier who remain at Rome; whereas we, on the contrary, though we do not suppose your situation is wholly without its inconveniences, yet think it greatly preferable to our own. In one respect I am sure it is so, as you have at least the happiness of daring to write your complaints; which is more than we can do with any safety. This, however, is not to be imputed to the conqueror, who conducts himself, it must be acknowledged, with the utmost moderation; but is entirely owing to that general spirit of insolence which victory, in all civil wars, never fails to inspire. The single point in which our situation can pretend to have had the advantage of yours, is, that it gave us the satisfaction not only of knowing somewhat earlier than you could, that your colleague Marcellus has obtained his pardon, but of being witnesses in what manner that whole affair was conducted. For, be assured, it is the only honourable transaction of a public nature that has passed amongst us since the breaking out of this calamitous civil war. Caesar, after having complained of the cerimony (as he called it) with which Marcellus had opposed him, and mentioned, with the highest applause, the equity and prudence of your conduct in the transaction, on a particular occasion, and much beyond our expectations, declared, that notwithstanding he had so much reason to complain of Marcellus, he could not refuse to pardon him at the general request of the senate. For I should have told you, that as soon as Lucius Piso had mentioned in the senate the affair of Marcellus, and his relation Cains Marcellus had thrown himself at Caesar's feet, the whole house unanimously rose up, and approaching towards Caesar, joined in one common intercession. In short, there was something so truly glorious in the transaction of that day, that I could not but look upon it as a sort of symptom that the republic was again reviving. All the senators who had been asked their opinion before me, severally returned their acknowledgments to Caesar, except Volcatius, who declared that he would not have made them, even if he had been in the place of Marcellus himself. But when it came to my turn, I instantly changed a resolution which I had long formed. I had determined, not from indolence, believe me, but as being sensible of the want of that authority which once attended my eloquence, to preserve a perpetual silence in public. But the greatness of mind which Caesar discovered upon this occasion, together with that noble zeal which broke forth at the same time in the senate, entirely overcame the strength of my resolution, and I addressed my acknowledgments to Caesar in a long harangue. This, I fear, may prove the occasion, in other instances, of drawing me out from that literary retirement, which affords the single consolation I receive under our general misfortunes. Nevertheless, since I have, by this means, avoided giving Caesar offence, who, perhaps, would have interpreted my silence into - proof that I considered the republic as no longer subsisting, I shall now and then resume this practice: I shall resume it, however, extremely seldom, and only just enough to comply with his inclinations, without interrupting my philosophical studies. For though I was early devoted to all the liberal arts and sciences, and particularly to philosophy, yet I find my passion for her growing still stronger upon me every day I live: perhaps it is because age has rendered me more mature for the lessons of wisdom, and that the misery of the times has deprived me of every other relief. I perceive by your letters that you are called off by numberless occupations from studies of this kind: I hope, however, that the long nights will now afford you some leisure to resume them.

Your son (and let me call him also mine) distinguishes me with great marks of his consideration; as in return I admire him not only for his probity and virtue, but for his learning and genius. He frequently confers with me in relation to your resigning, or continuing in your government; and I still remain in the same opinion, that we should neither of us take any measures but such as shall be perfectly agreeable to Caesar. Affairs are so situated at Rome, that you could find no other satisfaction in being here than what would arise from enjoying the company of your friends and family. For though Caesar's conduct is unexceptionable, yet with respect to all the rest, both of persons and circumstances, I am sure you would much rather (if one or other must necessarily be your choice) receive an account of them from others than he a spectator of them yourself. When I say this, it is in preference of your interest to my own; as upon all other considerations I am extremely desirous of seeing you amongst us. Farewell.

LETTER XVIII.

To Marcus Brutus.

Lucius Castronius Petus is by far the most considerable person in the city of Lucca; but not a v. 707. more distinguished, however, by his birth and rank, than by the solidity of his understanding, and the friendliness of his disposition. In one word, he is in every respect a most worthy man. I might add, too, (if it were of any importance to his character,) that he is not only conspicuous for his eminent virtues, but for his affluent fortunes. I converse with him upon terms of the most unreserved intimacy; and, indeed, there is no man of senatorian rank whom he treats with greater marks of esteem. I therefore recommend him to you, not only as my friend, but as worthy of being yours. And I am very sure, that whatever service you shall render him will afford a satisfaction to yourself, as well as confer an obligation upon me. Farewell.

LETTER XIX.

To Marcus Marcellus.

I sent you a long letter, a very few days ago, by Quintius Mucius; wherein I fully explained my sentiments with respect to the disposition and conduct which I thought would become you in the present conjuncture. Nevertheless, as your freedman Theophilus (of whose faithful affection towards you I have been a witness) is setting out for Greece, I was unwilling he should wait upon you without bringing a letter from me.

To repeat what I urged in my last: let me again most earnestly exhort you, whatever the form of our government be, to return to Rome as soon as possible. It is true, you will have the mortification, perhaps, to see many things that will give you pain; but not more, however, than you every day learn from common report. Now, it would be unwise to judge of your character, to be affected only with what passes before his view, when he can hear the very same facts related (and probably magnified too) with less concern. But you will tell me, perhaps, that should you return to Rome, you must submit either to act or to speak in contradiction to the sentiments of your heart. In answer to which, I must observe, in the first place, that it has ever been deemed the part of true wisdom, to yield to the circumstances of the times; or, to express the same thing in other words, to comply with unavoidable necessity: and, in the next place, that, as matters now stand, the constraint you fear is in no sort among the number of our present grievances. It is possible, indeed, that you may not be at liberty openly to declare your opinions; but totally silent you may undoubtedly be. For the sole cognizance of all affairs is centred in a single person; and he determines as seems good to himself, without consulting any of his party. And this would have been pretty much the case, had that other chief, whose cause we chose to follow, been now in possession of the commonwealth. For at a time when we were all embarked with him in the same common danger, he admitted none into his council but those that were ill qualified as his advisers. And can it be supposed that he would have placed himself more upon a level with us after victory than when his success was altogether doubtful? Is it to be imagined, that he who rejected those most prudent measures you recommended in your consolate, and refused, likewise, to follow the concurrent sentiments of you and your relation who succeeded you in that office, and administered it by your counsel, is it to be imagined that such a man, were he now at the head of the commonwealth, would consult either your opinion or mine? All civil wars abound with numberless calamities: a truth which though our ancestors were so happy as never once to have experienced, the present generation too frequently has. But amidst its many miserable consequences, none is more justly to be dreaded than victory itself. For though it should turn on the more meritorious side, yet it will be apt to inspire even these with a spirit of insolence and cruelty: and if they should not be so by inclination, they at least will yield by necessity. For, in many instances, the victor is forced to find himself constrained to comply with the will of those who assisted him in his conquest. Tell me, my friend, did we not both foresee what cruelties would have been exercised if our party had proved successful? And would you, in that case, have lived an exile from your country, that you might not have been a spectator of so sad a scene? I know you will reply in the negative; and will assure me, that you should then have remained in the undisturbed possession of your estate and honours. Yet certainly it would have become a man of your patriotic spirit to have been far less concerned for his own interest than for that of the republic.

But to what purpose, let me farther ask, should you persevere in banishing yourself from Rome? Hitherto, indeed, the world has approved your conduct, in having entered into the civil war with reluctance, and in having wisely declined pushing it to its last desperate extremity. The world admires, too, your good fortune (as it may justly be called, considering the distracted state of the times) in having been able to maintain your dignity and reputation in an honourable retreat. But the time is now arrived when you ought to think no place more desirable than your native country. If she appears less beautiful than formerly, this circumstance should not diminish your affection, but rather raise your compassion: and as there are so many illustrious citizens whose loss she deplores, you should spare her the additional sorrow of being deprived likewise of you. If you discovered a true greatness of spirit in scorning to be the suppliant of Caesar's power, may you not betray too much pride in contemning the offers of his clemency? And if you acted wisely in withdrawing from your country, may it not be thought on reflection that you should return now? In a word, though you should take no satisfaction in public affairs, yet surely it is imprudent to abandon your own. But, above all, let me entreat you to consider whether your present situation is as secure as it may perhaps be agreeable. Violences are everywhere committed with great licentiousness; but more particularly in foreign countries, where villany is less restrained by awe and shame from its cruel purposes. I mention this from my concern for your welfare; which is so great, indeed, that if it be not equal, it is certainly, at least, inferior only to that of your relation Marcellus. Believe me, then; it becomes you to act agreeably to the circumstances of the times, and with a rational regard to the preservation of your life and fortunes. Farewell.

affectuout relation Calus Marcellus had not only entreated, but earnestly conjured me to act in the manner you recommend, yet his persuasions could by no means prevail, till I found them supported by yours.

I am indebted to your letter for a particular account of the manner in which this affair has been transacted; and I am extremely obliged to you for your congratulations thereupon, as I know they proceed from an excellent heart. But among the very few friends and relations who have sincerely endeavoured to promote my recall, nothing in this whole transaction affords me so true a joy as to have experienced your singular zeal and good-will towards me. Everything else, indeed, the calamities of the times have taught me to resign with great tranquillity and indifference: but to be deprived of the friendship of men of your worth and character, would render life, under every circumstance, altogether insupportable. It is upon the enjoyment, therefore, of this privilege that I chiefly congratulate myself; and I shall endeavour to convince you, that you have conferred your good offices upon one who is most sincerely and warmly your friend. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

To Marcus Brutus.

LUCIUS TITIUS STRABO is one of the most illustrious and most distinguished of our Roman knights. I live with him in the strictest familiarity, as indeed we are united by every kind of friendly connexion. He claims a debt which is owing him in your province, from Publius Cornelius: but Volatus, who presides in our court of justice at Rome, having refused to take cognizance of the cause, has directed it to be tried in Gaul. I request your assistance, therefore, in bringing this affair to a speedy determination; and I request it so much the more earnestly than if it were my own, as a man may with a better grace be more anxious for the pecuniary concerns that relate to his friend than to himself. Let me entreat you, then, to take the whole conduct of this business under your immediate direction. And I hope you will endeavour, as far as justice shall permit, that Strabo's freedman, who is employed to manage this suit, may recover the money in question with as little trouble and expense as possible. In this you will greatly oblige me: and you will find, likewise, that Strabo is extremely deserving of your friendship. Again and again, therefore, I conjure you to take his interest under your protection, with the same care you are wont to exert in every instance that you know will be agreeable to me. Farewell.

LETTER XXII.

To L. Papirius Ptitus.

I write this letter in great haste upon my tablets, in the midst of an entertainment at the house of Volumnius. We lay down about A. u. 707, the ninth hour; and I am placed with your friends Atticus on my right hand, and Verrius on my left. You will wonder to find that I can pass my time thus jovially in the midst of servitude. Yet tell me, my friend, who are the disciple of a philosopher, what else should I do? And to what purpose should I torment myself with endless disgustitudes? "Spend your days," you will probably reply, "in literary occupations." But can you imagine I have any other? or that, without them, my very being would not be utterly insupportable? However, though employments of this kind cannot satiate, there is a certain time, nevertheless, when it is proper to lay them aside. Now, at such intervals, though a party at supper is not altogether a point of so much importance to me as it was to you, when you made it the single subject of your arch query to the philosopher; yet I know not in what manner I can more agreeably dispose of myself till the hour of sleep. But I was going to name the rest of our company, and to tell you that Cytheris is reclined at the left hand of Entsphus. You will be astonished, I suppose, to find your grave and philosophical friend in such society, and will be apt to cry out with the poet

"And is this he, the man so late renown'd? Whom virtue honou'rd, and whom glory crown'd; This the famed chief, of every tongue the praise: Of Greece the wonder, and of crowds the gaze."

The truth of the matter is, I had not the least suspicion that this fair lady was to be of our party. However, I have the example of the Socratic Aristippus, to keep me in countenance; who, when

The time of meals seems a very extraordinary season for the purpose of writing letters. However, it was customary with the Romans to employ themselves in this manner between the several courses: and they usually carried their letters about with them for that use. Plutarch informs us that Caesar generally signed his despatches at table.—Plut. in Vit. Jul. Cæs.

The Romans reclined themselves upon couches at their meals. The ninth hour answers to our three o'clock in the afternoon, and was the usual time when they made their last and principal meal.

The story to which Cicero here alludes is more explicitly mentioned in a subsequent part of this letter.

A celebrated courtesan, who, a few years before the date of this letter, had been a very favourite mistress of Mark Antony. If the authority of Servius may be relied upon, she is the Lycuria whose infidelity to the poet Gallus is the subject of the last of Virgil's pastorals.—Plut. in Vit. Anton. Serv: in Virg. Eclog. 10.

The reclining posture, at table, was esteemed indolent for women, and only practised by those of a loose character; as the Roman ladies of modesty always sat at their meals.

Martial supposes that the verses here quoted are from a tragedy of the poet Ennius, entitled "Telamon;" which is frequently mentioned by the ancient grammarians.

He was a disciple of Socrates; but, either mistaking or perverting the traditions of his excellent master, he maintained that "sensual pleasure was the supreme and ultimate good." His practice was agreeable to his doctrine, and he spent his life (a great part of which he passed at the court of Dionysius, the Sicilian tyrant) in every kind, he was reproached with having a commerce of gallantry with the Corinthian courtiers, 'Tis true, replied the philosopher, (without being in the least disconcerted) I possess Lais, but Lais possesses not me.
The expression is much stronger in the original\,* and I leave you, if you think proper, to render it in its full import. In the mean time, let me assure you that I never had any passion of this sort even when I was a young fellow, and much less now that I am an old one. But my great delight is in these festive meetings, where I throw out just what comes uppermost, and laugh away the sighs and sorrows of my heart. Nor were you yourself in a more serious mood, my friend, when even a venerable philosopher could not escape your ralliery, to whom, when he was inquiring if the company had any questions to propose to him,\,* you replied, with great gravity, that "it had been a question with you the whole morning, where you should fix a party to sup?" The formal pedant expected, perhaps, that you were going to ask him whether there was one heaven only, or heavens innumerable: whereas it was at that time, it seems, much more your concern to be resolved in the humorous problem you proposed.

Thus you see in what manner I pass my time.
I devote part of every day to reading or writing;
after which, that I may not entirely seclude myself from the society of my friends, I generally sup in their parties. But upon these occasions I am so far from transgressing our sumptuary law, (if any law, alas! can now be said to subsist) that I do not even indulge myself to the full extent it allows.
You need not be alarmed, therefore, at my intended visit: you will receive a guest who jokes much more abundantly than he eats. Farewell.

LETTER XXIII.

To Ampius.\,*

Believe me, my dear Ampius, it is with the utmost reason that I congratulate you on the success of your affairs. I am by no means, indeed, so imprudent as to flatter of luxurious indulgence.—Cic. de Oratore. i. 16, 17; Athen.

Deipn. 12.

*"Εχω Δαίβα οίκον Εχομαι, was the answer of Aristippus; where the verb Εχω, as Mauutius observes, conveys a more obscure sense than the word habeo, into which Cicero translates it.

* The conceitfulness of the ancient sophists was so extravagant, that they pretended to be possessed of all knowlledge, human and divine; Insomuch that one of them pub-lily boasted, at the Olympic games, that he was not only master of the whole circle of liberal sciences, but of the meanest mechanic crafts. Accordingly, it was customary with them to call upon their audience to propone any question whatever in which they were desirous to be informed; which was no sooner delivered out, than these philological mountebanks harangued upon it in that fluent jargon with which schoolmen in all ages have been so liberally endowed. The first who assumed these impious, shall they be termed, or ridiculous pretensions to omn) ience, was one Gorgias, a Grocian: and who, this man, who in more enlightened days would have been looked upon with the utmost contempt by all true philosophers, was held in such esteem by his countrymen, that they erected a statue to his memory, of solid gold.—Cic. de Oratore. iii. 32; De Finith. ii.

* Titus Ampius had gradually risen through the several employments of the state, till he arrived at the prtcenyou with false hopes; for an unexpected disappointment would probably so depress your spirits that nothing would ever be capable of raising them again.

I have solicited your cause with more freedom than was altogether suitable perhaps to a man in my circumstances; as the invariable friend ship which I have ever borne towards you, and which you have always most faithfully cultivated, taught me to surmount the difficulties that fortune, by impairing my credit, had thrown in my way. Accordingly the promise of your pardon is obtained, and all preliminaries are adjusted and confirmed that relate to your restoration. I speak this upon my own certain knowledge, having been a witness to the whole transaction. It happens indeed, very luckily, that I am connected with all Cæsar's favourites; insomuch that, next to Cæsar, there is no one who stands so high in their friendship as myself. Pansa, Hirtius, and Oppius, Balbus, Matius, and Postu-mius, have each of them distinguished me with particular marks of their esteem. If I had endeavoured to establish this interest merely with a view of serving you in the present conjuncture, I should by no means think I had reason to be ashamed.
But I did not cultivate their good graces upon any motive of this temporising kind: on the contrary, every one of these whom I incessantly solicited in your behalf, are my old friends. In this number we are principally obliged to Pansa, who, as he has the greatest credit and influence with Cæsar, so he showed himself extremely zealous for your interest, and very desirous likewise of obliging me. I must mention Tullius Cimmer\,* also as one with whose good offices, upon this occasion, I have great reason to be satisfied. He employed them more successfully upon your account than he possibly could in favour of any other man; for it is not interested solicitations so much as those which proceed entirely from friendship and gratitude, that prevail with Cæsar. Your warrant, however, is not yet actually signed, for there are certain malevolent spirits (who affect to talk as if they were not secretly pleased that this civil war broke out, and who represent you as the principal fomenter of it) that would be excessively offended if they knew you had obtained your pardon. It was thought advis-table, therefore, to manage this affair with great caution and secrecy; nor by any means, at present, to suffer our success to be publicly known.
It soon, however, will; and I doubt not that every thing will be ripe for that purpose, before this letter shall reach your hands; for Pansa, whose word may be depended upon, has promised me, in the strongest terms, that he will in a very few days procure your warrant. In the mean time, I thought proper to send you this previous account of the prosperous state of your affairs. For I find, by ship: from which post he was elected, in the year 606, to the government of Cilicia. As he had distinguished himself during his tribunate by promoting the interest and honours of Pompey, so he appears to have been a warm partisan of his cause in the civil wars; in consequence of which, he was at this time in exile.—Pigh. Annal. iii.

726.

* This person, though greatly in favour with Cæsar, was afterwards one of the principal conspirators against him.
It was he that gave the signal to the rest of his associates, when they assassinated Cæsar in the senate; and Cimmer held him, by the gown, while Cassius gave him the first stab.—Stuck in Phil. Hist. Cæs. 32.
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

talking with your wife Epula, and by the tender tears of your daughter Ampia, that you are more dispirited than your letters intimate; and they are apprehensive that your uneasiness will be increased by their absence. In order, therefore, to compose this anxiety of your mind, I thought it incumbent on me thus to anticipate a piece of good news, which most assuredly will be verified. You are sensible, that in my former letters I have rather employed such arguments of consolation as were proper to affect a man of your philosophical magnanimity, than encouraged you to entertain any other certain hopes than those of being restored with the republic when these flames should subside. And here let me remind you of your letters to me, in which you have always discovered the most heroic determination to meet with firmness and fortitude whatever it might be your fate to suffer. I was by no means surprised to find that you were animated with these manly sentiments, when I reflected that you had been conversant in the affairs of the world from your earliest youth; that you had exercised some of the most important employments of the commonwealth, at a time when our lives and liberties were in the utmost danger; and that you entered into the present war, not merely with the pleasing prospect of victory, but with a mind prepared to bear the reverse with a wise and philosophical resignation. In fine, as you are employed in recording the deeds of illustrious heroes, it particularly concerns you to copy out, in your own conduct, that magnanimity which you are celebrating in others. But this is talking in a style more suitable to your late circumstances than to your present. Let me only, then, exhort you to come prepared to endure those calamities which you must suffer here in common with every citizen of Rome; calamities, for which, if I had discovered any remedy, I should most certainly impart it to you. The only refuge from them is in those philosophical studies, in which we have both of us ever been conversant; and these, though in more prosperous days they were only our amusement, must now prove likewise our strongest support. But, to end as I began, let me desire you to be well persuaded that all things are completely settled concerning your full pardon and restoration. Farewell.

LETTER XXV.
To Curius.

There was a time when I thought you made a very injudicious choice, by preferring a foreign country to your own. I imagined that Rome (while yet, alas! it was Rome) must be far more suitable, I will not only say to Patre, but even than the noblest city in the Peloponnesus, to a man of your amiable and elegant turn of mind. But now, on the contrary, I look upon your having retired into Greece, when our affairs were well-nigh desperate, as a strong proof of your great penetration; and I consider your absence, not only as a very judicious, but a very happy resolution. Yet, why do I call it happy? when it is impossible that happiness should be the portion of any man in these wretched times, who possesses the least degree of sensibility. However, that desirable privilege which you, who were at liberty to leave Italy, enjoy by travelling, I have procured by another method; and I can in some sort say, no less than yourself, that I live "Where nor the name nor deeds accrued I hear Of Polopes' impious rage."

For, as soon as my leave is over, (which is somewhat more frequent than formerly, a patriot being now looked upon as a sight, of all others, the most uncommon*), I shall myself up in my library. And it is there, my friend, that I am employed in compositions which you will find, perhaps, to be animated with all that spirit you once said so ill

* He was one of the city quaestors in the year 69, and about five years afterwards was elected into the post of tribune. It does not appear that he advanced any farther in the offices of the state. On the contrary, it seems probable that he turned his pursuits into a humbler channel, and engaged in some branch of commerce. It was for this purpose, perhaps, that about the time when the dissensions between Pompey and Cesar broke out, he retired into Greece, and settled at Patre. See letter 2 of the following book; Figh. Annal. ii. 334.

The sons of Polopis were Atreus and Thysto, whose impious and cruel acts are recorded in fabulous history. The dramatic poet Attius wrote a tragedy entitled "Atreus," from which play, it is probable, this line was quoted, and which Cicero seems to apply to the violence committed by some of the leading men in the successful party. That Cicero, however, by no means lived the recluse he here represents himself, has already appeared by several letters in the present and preceding book, by which it is evident that he mixed, with great freedom and gaiety, among the chiefs of the victorious faction.

A true patriot was a sight in all ages too uncommon, it must be owned, not to have been worth remembering; but, whether those who visited Cicero, in order to view so singular a curiosity, were disappointed or not, is a question which every reader by this time, perhaps, may be able very clearly to determine.
agreed with my desolation and despair, when you reproached me, at your house, for not acting up to the fortitude that appeared in my writings. I must confess, I could not at that time forbear lamenting the wretched fate of the republic; to which I was the more tenderly attached, as I had not only been distinguished with its honours, but had greatly assisted it by my services. And even now, that time (which wears out the sorrows of the weakest minds), together with reason (which ought to have the strongest influence for that purpose), have jointly contributed to compose my breast; yet I still lament to see the commonwealth of which I have such hope of ever rising more! There is nothing, however, that can present itself to Him, in whom all power is now vested; unless, perhaps, it be that he has more than he ought. And as to what is past, our fate and our follies have had so large a share in all that has happened, that we cannot complain with a good grace. As little reason is there to hope that affairs will mend. I cannot, therefore, but conclude my letter as I began it, with admiring your judgment if it were choice, or your fortune if it were chance, that led you from this unpleasing scene. Farewell.

LETTER XXVI.

To Ligarius.

Be assured that I am exerting my utmost efforts of every kind in order to procure your restoration.

true, the singular and pious affection of your brothers, for whom I bear the same warm friendship that I entertain for yourself, will not suffer me to neglect any opportunity of employing my best offices in your behalf. But I had rather you should learn from their letters than from mine, what I have already performed, and what I am still endeavouring to perform, in your affairs. I will only, therefore, acquaint you myself with the strong and well-grounded hopes I have conceived, that your restoration will soon be effected. Let me previously observe, that my fears in all doubtful cases of importance are ever apt to be much superior to my hopes; a fault, if it be a fault, which I am very ready to acknowledge. Nevertheless, the last time I waited upon Caesar, I came away with a full persuasion that there was not the least reason to doubt of his granting you a pardon. I attended him for this purpose, at the request of your brothers, on the 26th of November last; in the morning, not without encountering all the usual difficulties and indignities before I could gain admittance. Your brothers, and the rest of your relations, having thrown themselves at his feet, I supported their petition with such arguments as I thought suitable to the occasion. And I could plainly perceive, not only by the gracious answer which Caesar returned, but by the whole air of his countenance, together with several other little circumstances, much easier to remark than describe, that he was extremely well inclined in your favour. Preserve, then, my friend, a firm and vigorous frame of mind; and if you bore the dark and tempestuous season of your affairs with fortitude, let their present more serene and favourable aspect fill your heart with cheerfulness. As for myself, I shall continue to act with as much assiduity in your cause as if there were still many obstacles to surmount. To this end, I shall very zealously persevere in my applications not only to Caesar, but to all those who are most in his favour; every one of whom I have experienced to be much my friend. Farewell.

and the translator confesses, that he has himself, in the letters published under the name of Sir Thomas Fitz esbourn, produced it for that purpose. But, upon a stricter inquiry, the supposed fact seems to be extremely questionable. For, in the first place, there is not the least trace of it in any part of Cicero's writings. Now this his total silence seems to furnish a very strong presumptive argument to destroy the credit of the story; for it is altogether improbable that a man of Cicero's character should have omitted any opportunity of disburdening himself so exceedingly to the honour of his oratorial powers. In the next place, it is very observable, that Valerius Maximus, who has a chapter expressly to show the force of eloquence, and who mentions a particular instance of this kind with regard to Caesar himself, yet takes not the least notice of the fact in question. But if it had been true, is it credible either that it should never have reached his knowledge, or that, knowing it, lie should have passed it over in silence? especially as it afforded him a much stronger instance for his purpose than any he has thought proper to enumerate. It is remarkable, likewise, that Quintilian, though he frequently cites the very passage in this celebrated oration which is supposed to have raised the strongest emotions in Caesar's breast, yet gives not the least intimation of the effect which it is presumed to have wrought. Plutarch is the only ancient writer who relates this story, and he introduces it with a ἑγεται ἄρι, an expression which seems to imply that he did not copy it from any earlier historian, but received it only from Cicero's own tradition. Now it might be sufficient to give rise to such a report, if Caesar had been seized during the course of this trial with one of his usual epileptic fits, which were attended with that change of colour and trembling of the nerves that Plutarch ascribes to the force of Cicero's rhetoric. And the fact itself, as I have already said, was of truth in the case, is rendered probable by the testimony of Suetonius, who informs us that Caesar was twice seized with these fits when he was engaged in judicial affairs.—Val. max. viii. 9; Quint. Inst. Orat. viii. 4, 6; le. 2; Plut. in Vit. Cesar.; Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cesar. 45. &c.

 Cicero had, shortly afterwards, a more public occasion of testifying his zeal for his friend. For Tiberius, though he had himself engaged in the same party with Ligarius, having from private grief opposed the recall of Ligarius, Cicero defended him before Csesar in the forum, in a noble oration which is still extant. It was upon this occasion, that the pomp and energy of the Roman orator's rhetoric is said to have had such a wonderful effect, that it not only made Cesar tremble, but, what is yet more extraordinary, it made him change his determined purpose, and acquit the man he had resolved to condemn. This story has often been alleged in proof of the power of ancient eloquence;
LETTER XXVII.

To P. Servilius Isauricus, Proconsul.

I took occasion, when we were walking in your gardens, to recommend to you, with all possible earnestness, the Asiatic affairs of my friend Ciceroa. And, agreeably to your usual disposition, and to those many great and good offices I have perpetually received at your hands, you very generously assured me of your utmost assistance. This circumstance, I persuade myself, you have not forgotten; I am sure, at least, it is not customary with you to be unmindful of my requests. However, the agents of this lady inform her, in their letters, that the numerous occupations in which so extensive a province engages you, render it necessary that you should be reminded, from time to time, of your promise. I entreat you, therefore, to recollect that you gave me full assurances of employing your good offices in favour of Cicero, so far as should be consistent with your honour; and I think your powers for this purpose are very extensive. For, if I mistake not, the decree of the senate, which passed in relation to the heirs of Vannutus, is expressed in such terms as to admit of an interpretation extremely advantageous to Cicero's interest. But this must be submitted entirely to your own judgment; which, I doubt not, will construe this decree in the sense in which it was intended by the senate, as I know the respect you always bear for the resolutions of that assembly. I will only add, therefore, that I desire you would believe that every instance in which you shall favour Cicero will be a singular obligation conferred upon myself. Farewell.

LETTER XXVIII.

To Aulus Cæcina1.

I was informed, by your zealous friend Largus, that the time limited for your continuance in Sicily expires on the first of January next.a v. 707. Having, therefore, upon all occasions, observed that Caesar ratifies whatever Balbus and Oppius act in his absence,1 I very strenuously solicited, this lady was not only a particular friend of Cicero, but a great reader and admirer of his moral writings. But neither her philosophy nor her age, though she was ten years older than Cicero, could secure her character from censure; and slander has said that her intercourse with our author did not always turn upon matters of speculation. But if the reader has the curiosity to see this charge entirely overthrown, he will find a very satisfactory confusion of it in Monsieur Monguillot's fourth remark on the 15th letter of the 19th book to Atticus. 2 Aulus Cæcina was a person of great and amiable virtues in private life; and he was distinguished, likewise, in public for his genius, his eloquence, and his erudition. He seems to have particularly excelled in the science of divination; upon which subject he wrote a treatise, which is often cited by Senece. In the civil wars, he not only drew his sword, but his pen against Caesar: having published an invective upon that general, which appears to have extremely offended him. Cæcina was accordingly banished; and the third and following acts of him were written during his exile in Sicily.—Cic. Orat. pro Cæcin. 35, 36; Senece. Natural. Quaest. ii. passim. 3 Caesar was, at this time, in Spain, pursuing the war against the sons of Pompey; whilst Oppius and Balbus were acting as his viceregents at Rome. cited them that you might be permitted to remain in that island as long as you should think proper. In all my applications of this kind, they have either instantly complied with my desire, if it happened not to be particularly disagreeable to them, or have assigned their reasons for refusing: but in the present instance, they did not give me an immediate answer. However, they called upon me again the very same day, in order to acquaint me, that in consequence of my request, you were at liberty to continue in Sicily during your own inclination: and this, in answer to my last. Caesar would not be displeased. Thus you see how far your licence extends: and I need not tell you what use it would be most advisable for you to make of it.

After I had written thus far, your letter was given into my hands, wherein you desire my opinion whether you should remain in Sicily, or go into Asia in order to settle your affairs in that province. I do not well know how to reconcile this question to the account which I mentioned above to have received from Largus. For he talked to me as if you were not at liberty to reside any longer in Sicily: whereas your query seems to imply the contrary. Be this as it may, my sentiments are, that you should, by all means, continue in that island. The nearness of its situation renders it extremely convenient for the more expeditiously receiving and returning letters and expresses during the negotiation of your pardon, as you will be so much the earlier, likewise, amongst us, if you should, as I hope, obtain leave to return to Rome, or at least, into Italy. For these reasons, therefore, I am altogether against your removing from your present quarters.

I shall not fail to recommend you, in the strongest terms, to Furius Posthumus and his lieutenants, when they arrive here: but, at present, they are all at Mutina. They are every one of them my friends, and not only persons of singular merit, but great admirers of men of your character. You may, without any particular application to me, depend upon my best assistance in every other article wherein I imagine my services can avail you. And should there be any of which I may be ignorant, if you will point them out to me, you will find that you could not have employed any other of your friends who would have acted in your affairs with so warm a zeal.

Though I shall speak so effectually to Furius that there will be no necessity for your delivering a letter to him on my part, yet, as some of your family were desirous you should have one, I could not refuse their request: and I have added, at the bottom of this, a copy of my letter. Farewell.

LETTER XXIX.

To Titus Furius, Proconsul.

It is impossible to be more intimately united with any man, than I have ever been with Aulus Cæcina. I lived in great familiarity with his illustrious father: and the early presages I observed in the son, of the most exalted probity and eloquence, won my affections to him. He was appointed by Caesar proconsul of Sicily for the following year; in which post he is said to have conducted himself with great clemency and moderation.—Quartier, from his youth. We were attached to each other, not only by the mutual exchange of many friendly offices, but by the same common tastes and studies: insomuch, that there is no man for whom I ever entertained a more tender regard. After this, I need only add, that I am under the strongest obligations, as you see, to protect both his person and his fortunes, to the utmost of my power. As I know, by many instances, the sentiments you entertain both of the calamities of the republic, and of those who suffer for its sake, I am sure your own inclinations will lead you to assist Cicero. I will only entreat you, therefore, to suffer my recommendation to increase that favourable disposition in proportion to the esteem which I am sensible you hear me; and be well persuaded, that you cannot give me a more sensible proof of your friendship. Farewell.

LETTER XXX.
Aulus Cæcina to Cicero.

I hope you will not only pardon the fears, but pity the misfortunes, which prevented your resuming my performance so soon as I intended; but my son was apprehensive, I hear, that the publication of this piece might prove to my prejudice. And, indeed, as the effect of compositions of this kind depends more upon the temper in which they are read than on that in which they are written, his fears were by no means irrational; especially as I am still a sufferer for the liberties of my pen. In this respect my fate, sure, is somewhat singular. For the errors of an author are generally either reformed by a blot, or punished by the loss of his fame; whereas banishment, on the contrary, has been thought the more proper method of correcting mine. And yet the whole of my crime amounts only to this—that I poured forth my invectives against the man with whom I was openly at war. Now, there was not a single person, in the same party with myself, who was not in effect guilty of the same offence; as there was not one who did not send up his vows for success to our cause, or that offered a sacrifice, thoup upon an occasion ever so foreign to public affairs, without imploring the gods that Caesar might soon be defeated. If he imagines otherwise, he is extremely happy in his ignorance. But if he knows this to be fact, why am I marked out as the particular object of his wrath, for having written something which he did not approve, whilst he forgives every one of those who were perpetually invoking Heaven for his protection?

But I was going to acquaint you with the reason of those fears which I mentioned in the beginning of my letter. In the first place, then, I have taken notice of you in the piece in question; though, at the same time, I have touched upon your conduct with great caution and reserve. Not that I have, by any means, changed my sentiments concerning it; but, as being afraid to say all that they dictated to me. Now it is well known, that in compositions of the panegyric kind, an author should not only deliver his applause with a full and unlimited freedom, but heighten them, likewise, with a suitable strength and warmth of expression. In satire, indeed, though great liberties are generally thought allowable, yet, a writer must always be upon his guard, lest he degenerates into petulance and scurrility. An author is still more restrained in speaking advantageously of himself; as, without much care and circumspection, he will appear arrogant and conceited. Of a piece, therefore, of a personal nature it is perhaps the more within a writer may expatiate uncontrolled: as he cannot be sparing in the encomiums he bestows upon another, without incurring the imputation of envy or inability. But, in the present instance, you will think yourself, perhaps, obliged to me. For as I was not at liberty to represent your actions in the manner they deserve, the next favour to be was to be silent concerning them, was to mention them as little as possible. But difficult as it was to contain myself upon so copious a subject, I however forbore: and as there were various parts of your conduct I did not venture even to touch upon, so, in the revival of my work, I not only found it necessary to strike out several circumstances I had inserted, but to place many of which I suffered to remain in a less advantageous point of view. But should an architect, in raising a flight of steps, omit some, cut away part of those he had fixed, and leave many of the rest loose and ill joined together, might he not more properly be said to erect a ruin, than an easy and regular ascent? In the same manner, where an author is constrained, by a thousand unhappy circumstances, to break the just coherence of his piece and destroy its proper gradation, how can he hope to produce anything that shall merit the applause of a refined and judicious ear? But I was still more embarrassed where my subject led me to speak of Caesar: and I will own that I trembled whenever I had occasion to mention his name. My fears, however, did not arise from any apprehension that what I wrote might draw upon me his farther chastisement, but lest it should not be agreeable to his particular sentiments, with which, indeed, I am by no means well acquainted. But with what spirit can a man compose when he is obliged to ask himself, at every sentence, Where is Caesar? Will not, even this expression appear of suspicious import? Or will he not think it still worse if I change it thus?" But, besides these difficulties, I was perplexed, likewise, in regard to the applause and censures which I dealt out to others: as I was afraid I might apply them where they would not, perhaps, be very agreeable to Caesar, though they might not actually give him offence. I reflected, that if his vengeance pursued me for what I wrote, whilst I had my sword in my hand; what might be the consequence, should I displease him now that I am a disarmed exile? These fears increased upon me, when I considered the cautious manner in which you thought it necessary to deliver your sentiments in your treatise entitled the Orator; where you modestly apologise for venturing to publish your notions upon the subject, by ascribing it to the request of Brutus. But if you, whose eloquence has rendered you the general patron of every Roman, deemed it expedient to be thus artfully guarded, how much more requisite is it for your old client, who is now reduced to implore that protection from every citizen in general, which he once received from yourself in particular? An author who writes under the constraint of so many doubts and fears, though fears, perhaps, that are altogether groundless; who is forced to adjust almost every sentence, not to his own judgment, but to the impression it may probably make upon others; will find it extremely difficult to execute any composition with success. And though this isa difficulty which you have never, it is possible, experienced, as your exalted genius is equal to every undertaking; yet I am sure I experienced it very sensibly myself. Nevertheless, I ordered my son to read my performance to you; but not to leave it in your hands, unless you would promise to correct it; that is, unless you would new-model it in all its parts.

As to my Asiatic expedition: notwithstanding my affairs require my presence in that province, yet, in obedience to your advice, I have laid aside my intended voyage. And now, as you are sensible that my fate must necessarily, one way or other, be sooner determined, I need not, I am persuaded, particularly exhort you to assist me with your good offices. Let me only entreat you, my dear Cicero, ot to defer them in expectation of my son’s arrival.
For his youth, his tenderness, and his fears, render him ill able to think of every measure which may be proper to be taken for my advantage. The whole management, therefore, of my cause, must rest entirely upon you, as it is upon you, in truth, that all my hopes depend. Your judicious observation has enabled you to penetrate into the recesses of Caesar’s heart; and you are acquainted with all the most probable methods of prevailing with him:
so that each successful step that shall be made in this affair, from its commencement to its conclusion, must proceed altogether from you. I am sensible, likewise, that you have great interest with Caesar, and still greater with all his favourites. I doubt not, then, of your effecting my restoration, if you will exert yourself for that purpose, not only in such instances wherein I shall particularly request your assistance (though that, indeed, would be a very considerable obligation), but by taking the whole conduct of this matter into your own hands.
Perhaps my judgment is blinded by my misfortunes, or I expect more from your friendship than in modesty I ought, when I venture thus to impose upon you so heavy a burthen. But whichever may be the case, your general conduct towards your friends will furnish me with an excuse; for the zeal which you exert upon all occasions where their interest is concerned, has taught them not only to expect, but even to claim your services.

With regard to the book which my son will deliver to you, I entreat you either not to suffer it to be published, or to correct it in such a manner that it may not appear to my disadvantage. Farewell.

LETTER XXXI.
To P. Servilius Isauricus, Proconsul.

I need not inform you, that Curtius Mithres is the favourite freedman of my very intimate friend A. V. 707. Postumus: but let me assure you, that he binds me more from your friendship than in modesty I ought, when I venture thus to impose upon you so heavy a burthen. But whichever may be the case, your general conduct towards your friends will furnish me with an excuse; for the zeal which you exert upon all occasions where their interest is concerned, has taught them not only to expect, but even to claim your services.

With regard to the book which my son
will deliver to you, I entreat you either not to suffer it to be published, or to correct it in such a manner that it may not appear to my disadvantage. Farewell.

LETTER XXXII.
To Aulus Caecina.

As often as I see your son (and I see him almost every day) I never fail to assure him of my zealous assistance, without any exception of time,
A. V. 707. of labour, or of business: and I promise him likewise my credit and interest, with this single limitation, that he may rely upon them as far as the small share I possess of either can possibly extend.

I have read your performance 1, and still continue to read it, with much attention; as I shall preserve it with the greatest fidelity. Your affairs, indeed, of every kind are my principal concern;
and I have the pleasure to see them every day appear with a more and more favourable aspect. You have many friends who contribute their good offices for this purpose: of whose zeal your son, I am assured, has already acquainted you, as well as of his own hopes that their endeavours will prove effectual.

In regard to what may be collected from appearances,
I do not pretend to discern more than, I am persuaded,
you see yourself: but as you may reflect upon them, perhaps, with greater discomposure of mind, I think it proper to give you my sentiments concerning them. Believe me, then, it is impossible, from the nature and circumstances of public affairs, that either you, or your companions in adversity, should long remain under your present misfortunes: yes, my friend, it is impossible that so severe an injury should continue to oppress the honest advocates of such a cause. But my hopes are particularly strong with respect to yourself: not merely in consideration of your rank and virtues (for these you possess in common with many others), but particularly from your singular learning and genius. The man in whose eye we all of us are, holds these shining qualities in much esteem: and I am well persuaded, you would not have remained, even a single moment, in your present situation, if he had not imagined himself wounded 2 by those talents claimed the honour of being the birth-place of Homer.

he admires. His resentment, however, seems daily cooling: and it has been intimated to me by some of his most particular friends, that you will undoubtedly find advantage in the high opinion he has conceived of your abilities. Let me conjure you, then, in the first place, to preserve a firm and unshaken fortitude of mind, as what you owe to your birth, to your education, to your learning, and to that character you have universally obtained; and, in the next place, that, for the reasons I have already assigned, you would entertain the strongest and most favourable hopes. Be well persuaded, likewise, that I shall always most readily contribute my warmest services both to you and to your family. You have, indeed, a full right to expect from them, that affection which has so long subsisted between us, from the conduct I ever observe towards all my friends, and from the numberless good offices I have received at your hands. Farewell.

LETTER XXXIII.
To P. Servilius Isauricus, Proconsul.

As the share you allow me in your friendship is by no means a secret to the world, it occasions no difficulty to apply to me for recommendations. My letters to you, therefore, of this kind, are sometimes sent to me, in other than the tributes of common compliment. They are much more frequently, however, the dictates of a real affection; as in the case, be assured, in the present instance, when I recommend to you Ammius Menander, the freedman of my friend Aemius Balbus. He is a very worthy, modest man, and highly in the esteem both of his patron and myself. You will much oblige me, then, by assisting him with your good offices; and I assure you, that shall not be inconvenient to you: and, believe me, it is with great earnestness that I make this request. Farewell.

LETTER XXXIV.
To Attius Cecina.

I am afraid you will think that I am a more negligent correspondent than I ought, considering the union between us as partisans of the same cause, as being joined in the same studies, and as having mutually conferred upon each other many obliging good offices. The sincere truth, however, is, that I should much sooner and much often have written to you, if I had not been in daily expectation of seeing your affairs in a better train; and I rather chose, instead of confirming you in the spirit with which you bear your misfortunes, to have some part of my congratulations on their being ended. I still hope to have that pleasure very shortly. In the mean time, I think it incumbent upon me to endeavour, if not with all the authority of a philosopher, at least with all the influence of a friend, to confirm and strengthen you in that manly spirit with which I hear, and believe, you are animated. For this purpose, I shall not address you as one whose misfortunes are without hope; but as a person of whose restoration I have conceived the same well-grounded confidence which you formerly, I remember, entertained of mine.

For when I was driven from my country by a set of men who were convinced they could never effect their destructive purposes so long as I continued in the commonwealth, I was informed by many of my friends who were more fortunate, where you then resided, that you strongly assured them of your speedy and honourable recall. Now, if the principles of the Etruscan science, in which you were instructed by your illustrious and excellent father, did not deceive you with respect to me, neither will my presages be less infallible with regard to you. They are derived, indeed, not only from the maxims and records of the most distinguished sages, whose writings, you well know, I have studied with great application, but from a long experience in public affairs, and from having passed through various scenes both of prosperity and adversity. I have the stronger reason to confide in this method of divination, as it has never once deceived me during all these dark and disastrous times: insomuch, that were it to mention my predictions, I am afraid you would suspect that I framed them after the events I pretend to have foretold. However, there are many who can bear me witness, that I forewarned Pompey against entering into any association with Caesar; and that I afterwards as strongly endeavoured to dissuade him from breaking that union. I clearly saw, indeed, that their conjunction would considerably impair the strength of the Senate, and that their separation would as inevitably kindle the flames of a civil war. I lived at that time in great familiarity with Caesar, and was entertained the highest regard to Pompey; and, accordingly, the faithful advice I gave to the latter was equally to the benefit of both. I forbear to instance several other articles, in which my prophetic admonitions have been verified. For, as I have received great obligations from Caesar, I am unwilling he should know, that had Pompey followed my counsels, though Caesar would still have been the first and most distinguished person in the republic, he would not have had the possession of that extensive power he now enjoys. I will confess, however, that I always gave it as my opinion, that Pompey should go to his government in Spain; with which, if he had happily complied, we should never have been involved in this fatal civil war. I contended,

\footnote{1 The Romans derived their doctrines and rites of divination, and probably, indeed, many other of their religious and civil institutions, from the Etruscans, a very ancient, learned, and powerful nation, who were once masters of almost all Italy, and who inhabited that part which is now called Tuscany. Cecina, who was a native of this province, and well skilled in that pretended prophetic art for which his countrymen were particularly famous, foretold, it seems, that Cicero's banishment would soon end, as in fact it did in a glorious restoration.—Val. Max. i. 1; Liv. v. 33; Figg. Annal. i. p. 430. See rem. 1, p. 505.}

\footnote{2 Cicero's wonderful reach of judgment, in penetrating far into the consequences of events, is by no means exaggerated in the present passage. On the contrary, it is confirmed by the testimony of an historian who knew him well, and who assures us that Cicero pointed out, with a prophetic discernment, several circumstances that were fulfilled not only in his own life-time, but after his death.—Corn. Nep. in Vit. Attic. 17.}

\footnote{3 The motives which induced Pompey to enter into this union with Caesar have been already explained in rem. 6, p. 306.}

likewise, not so much that Cæsar should be received as a candidate for the consulate during his ab- sence under the pretense of his being maintained for that purpose, and enacted too at the earnest solicitation of Pompey in his consulate, should be religiously observed. It was the rejecting of this advice that gave occasion to the civil war; which I still laboured to extinguish by every method of remonstrance in my power, and by warmly representing that in contests of this kind, though ever so justly founded, even the most disadvantageous terms of accommodation were preferable to having recourse to arms. But such resolutions were overruled; not so much by Pompey himself (upon whom they seemed to make some impression), as by those who, depending upon his victory, thought it would afford them a very favourable opportunity of extiricating themselves from the difficulties of their private affairs, and of gratifying their immoderate ambition. The war, therefore, commenced without my participation, and I still continued in Italy as long as I possibly could, even after Pompey was drove from the Rubicon; and was commanded to withdraw his forces out of Italy by a certain day therein named, and in case of disobedience, that he should be considered as a public enemy. —Cæs. De Bell. Gall. viii. 36; Cæs. De Bell. Civ. i. 9.

Pompey, when he was consul the third time, in the year 701, procured a law empowering Cæsar to offer himself as a candidate for the consulate, without appearing personally at Rome for that purpose. This was contrary to the fundamental principles of the Roman constitution, and was opposed, not on the occasion of its being utterly destroyed; as it furnished Cæsar with the only spurious pretence for turning his arms against the republic. Cicero affirms, in one of his Philippics, that he endeavoured to dissuade Pompey from suffering this law to pass.

But if what Cicero here asserts be true, he acted a most extraordinary part indeed. For, at the same time that he laboured to dissuade Pompey from suffering this law to pass, he persuaded Cicero, who was one of the tribunes of the people, to promote it, or at least not to oppose it; agreeably to a promise which he had given to Cæsar for that purpose. This appears by a passage in one of his letters to Atticus, where, speaking of Cæsar's claim to sue for the consulate, without personally attending at Rome, he tells Atticus, "Ut illi hoc liceret, adjutor; regatum ab ipso Ravnenna de Cassio tribuno placita." —Ad Att. vii. 1.

Whether this law should, or should not, be superseded, was a question upon which Cicero found the republic divided at his return from Cicilia, just before the civil war. I endeavoured to dissuade the people. And although he certainly acted an extraordinary part in opposing this law, yet, after it had once passed, it seemed to have been right policy in him to advise that it should be observed; as it was the only probable means of preserving the public tranquillity.

distress, who had not abandoned me in mine. Partly, therefore, upon a principle of duty, partly, to gratify the murmurs of my relations towards my parent; and partly as being ashamed to foresee my friend, I went, as is fabled of Amphiaratus, to that ruin which I clearly foresaw. And, indeed, there was not a single misfortune attended us during that whole campaign, which I did not point out before it arrived. You see, therefore, that I have the same right of being credited which augurs and astrologers are wont to urge, and may claim your belief of my present predictions in consequence of the veracity of my former. But I do not find these my prophecies in your favour on those intimations of futurity which are taught by our augural science. I derive them from observations of a different sort; which, though not more certain in themselves, are less obscure, however, and consequently less liable to be misinterpreted. The signs, then, from whence I draw my presages, are of two kinds: the one taken from Cæsar himself, the other from the nature and circumstances of public affairs. With respect to the former, they result, in the first place, from that general clemency of Cæsar's disposition which you have celebrated in that ingenious performance entitled your Complaints; and, in the next place, from that extraordinary regard he discovers for men of your distinguished genius and abilities. To this I must add, that he will certainly yield to those numberless solicitations in your favour which proceed, not from any interested motives, but from a real and just esteem; among which the unanimous application of Etruria will, undoubtedly, have great weight with him. If you ask, whence it has happened that these considerations have hitherto proved ineffectual? I answer, that Cæsar thinks if he should immediately grant a pardon to you, against whom he may seem to have a more reasonable ground of complaint, he could not refuse it to others whom he is less inclined to forgive. But you will say, perhaps, "If Cæsar is thus incensed, what have I to hope?" Undoubtedly, my friend, you have much; as he is sensible he must derive the brightest splendour of his fame from the hand which once somewhat sufficed its lustre. In fine, Cæsar is endowed with a most acute and penetrating judgment; and as he perfectly well knows, not only the high rank you bear in a very considerable district of Italy?, but that there is no man in the commonswealth, of your age, who is superior to you in reputation, abilities, or popularity, he cannot but be convinced that it will be impossible for him to render your exile of any long duration. He is too politic, therefore, to lose the merit of voluntarily conferring upon you, at present, what will otherwise most unquestionably be extorted from him hereafter.

Having thus marked out the favourable prog-

* Amphiaratus was a Grecian prophet, as the poets feign, who, foreknowing that he should be killed if he went to the Thessalian war, concealed himself; in order to avoid that expedition. But his wife being bribed to disclose the place of his concealment, he was forced to the war, and his death confirmed the truth of his prediction —with justice.

This seems to be the performance concerning which Cæcina writes to Cicero in the 36th letter of this book.

* Cæcina was a native of Etruria, and a person of great consideration in that part of Italy.

niotics which I collect from circumstances respecting Caesar, I will now acquaint you with those which I gather from the temper and complexion of the times. There is no man, then, so averse to that cause which Pompey espoused with more spirit, indeed, than preparation, as to venture to arraign the principles or the patriotism of those who joined in his party. And I cannot but observe to you, that I have often occasion to admire the justice and judgment of Caesar, who never speaks of Pompey but in terms of the highest honour. Should it be said, that whatever regard he may shew to his memory, he treated his person upon many occasions with great asperity, let it be remembered that these instances cannot reasonably be imputed to Caesar, but were the natural consequences of war. But how favourably has he received many of us, and myself in particular, who were engaged in the same party? Has he not appointed Cassius to be his lieutenant? has he not given the government of Gaul to Brutus, and that of Greece to Cæcina? In a word, highly incensed as he was against Marcellus, has he not, in the most honourable manner, restored him to his friends and to his country? What I would infer, therefore, from the whole, is this,—that whatever system of government may prevail, good policy will never permit, in the first place, that a difference should be made among those who were equally involved in the same cause; and, in the next, that a set of honest and worthy citizens, who are free from all imputation on their moral characters, should be banished from their country, at the same time that such numbers of those who have been exiled for the most infamous crimes are suffered to return.

These are the pressages of your friend; and they are pressages, of which, if I had the least doubt, I would by no means have laid them before you. On the contrary, I should, in that case, rather have employed such consolatory arguments as would unquestionably have proved effectual for the support of a great and generous mind. I should have told you, that if you were induced to take up arms in defence of the republic (as you then imagined) merely from a confidence of success, small indeed would be your merit; and that if, under a full conviction of the very precarious event of war, you thought it possible that we might be defeated, it would be strange that you should have so much depended upon victory as to be utterly unprepared for the reverse. I should have reasoned with you on the consolation you ought to receive from reflecting on the integrity of your conduct, and reminded you of the satisfaction which the liberal arts will afford in the adverse seasons of life. I should have produced examples, not only from history, but in the persons of our leaders and associates in this unhappy war, of those who have suffered the most severe calamities; and should have also cited several illustrious instances of the same sort from foreign story. For to reflect on the misfortunes to which mankind in general are exposed, greatly contributes to alleviate the weight of those which we ourselves endure. In short, I should have described the confusion of that turbulent scene in which we are here engaged; as undoubtedly the being driven from our Western wealth in ruins, is much less to be regretted than from one in a flourishing and a happy situation. But these are arguments which I have by no means any occasion to urge, as I hope, or rather indeed as I clearly foresee, that we shall soon welcome your return amongst us. In the mean while, agreeably to the promise I have often given you, I shall continue to exert my most active offices in the service of yourself and your excellent son; who, I must observe with pleasure, is the very express resemblance of his father both in person and genius. I shall now, indeed, be enabled to employ my zeal more effectually than heretofore, as I make great and daily advances in Caesar's friendship; not to mention my interest also with his favourites, who distinguish me with the first rank in their affection. Be assured I shall devote the whole of my influence, both with Caesar and with his friends, entirely to your service. In the mean time, let the pleasing hopes you have so much reason to entertain, together with your own philosophical fortitude, support you with cheerfulness under your present situation. Farewell.

LETTER XXXV.

To P. Servilius Isauricus, Prætorian.

I PERFECTLY well know the general compassion of your heart for the unfortunate, and the inviabile fidelity you observe towards those who have any particular claim to your protection. As Cæcina, therefore, is a family client of yours, I should not recommend him to your favour, if the regard I pay to the memory of his father, with whom I lived in the strictest intimacy, and the unhappy fate which attended him, with whom I am united by every tie of friendship and gratitude, did not affect me in the manner it ought. I am sensible that your own natural disposition, without any solicitations, would incline you to assist a man of Cæcina's merit, in distress; but I earnestly entreat you that this letter may render you still more zealous to confer upon him every good office in your power. I am persuaded, if you had been in Rome, you would effectually have employed it also in procuring his pardon; which, in confidence of your colleague's elevation, we still strongly hope to obtain. In the mean time, Cæcina has retreated into your province, not only as thinking it will afford him the securest refuge, but in pursuit likewise of that justice which he expects from the equity of your administration. I most warmly request you, therefore, to assist him in recovering those debts which remain due to him upon his former negociations, and in every other article to favour him with your patronage and protection; than which you cannot confer upon me, be assured, a more acceptable obligation. Farewell.

a It appears by this letter, which is a recommendation of Cæcina to the governor of Asia, that he had resumed the design of going into that province; which, in the 39th epistle of this book, he tells Cicero he had laid aside in pursuance of his advice.

b Accordingly Cæcina, some time afterwards, received his pardon from Cæsar; which Suetonius mentions as an instance, amongst others, of that conqueror's singular clemency—Suet. in Vit. Jul. Ces. 75.

c Cæcina had, probably, been concerned in farming some branch of the Asiatic revenue.
LETTER XXXVI.

To Publius Sulpicius

Notwithstanding it is very seldom, in the present situation of public affairs, that I attend the senate, yet, after having received your letter, I thought it would not be acting agreeably to our long friendship, and to those many good offices that have passed between us, if I did not contribute all in my power to the advancement of your honours. It was with much pleasure, therefore, I went to the house, and voted for your public thanksgiving; which has been decreed accordingly. You will always find me equally zealous in whatever concerns your interest or your glory: and I should be glad you would, in your letters to your family, assure them of this my disposition towards you; that they may not scruple to claim my best services, if, in any future instance, you should have occasion for them.

I very strongly recommend to you my old friend Bolanus, as a man of great spirit and probity, and adorned, likewise, with every amiable accomplishment. As you will extremely oblige me by letting him see that my recommendation proved of singular advantage to him, so you may depend upon finding him of a most grateful disposition, and one from whose friendship you will receive much satisfaction.

I have another favour likewise to ask, which, in confidence of our friendship, and of that disposition

To Aulus Torquatus

Although every one is apt, in these times of universal confusion, to regret his particular lot as singularly unfortunate, and to prefer any situation to his own, yet undoubtedly a man of patriot sentiments can nowhere, in the present conjuncture, be so unhappily placed as in Rome. 'Tis true, into whatever part of the world he might be cast, he must still retain the same bitter sensibility of that ruin in which both himself and his country are involved. Nevertheless, there is something in being a spectator of those miseries with which others are only acquainted by report, that extremely enhances one's grief; as it is impossible to divert our thoughts from misfortunes which are perpetually obtruding themselves in view. Among the many other losses, therefore, which many must necessarily sit heavy upon your heart, let it not be your principal concern (as I am informed collar, which he took from the neck of a gigantic Gaul, whom he slew in single combat.—Ad Att. v. 1; Clu. De Finih. ii. 22; Phtig. Annal. ii. p. 411; Liv. vii. 10.

it is) that you are driven from Rome. For, notwithstanding that you are thus exceedingly uneasy at being separated from your family and fortunes, yet they still continue in their usual situations; which, as they could by no means be improved by your presence, so neither are they exposed to any particular danger. Whenever, therefore, your family are the subject of your thoughts, you should neither lament them as suffering any calamities peculiar to themselves, nor consider it as a hardship that they are not exempted from those which are common to us all.

As to what concerns your own person, you ought not, my dear Torquatus, to indulge those gloomy reflections which either fear or despair may suggest. It is certain that He, from whom you have hitherto received a treatment unworthy of your illustrious character, has lately given very considerable marks of a more favourable disposition. It is equally certain, that while we are looking up to Caesar for our preservation, he is far from being clear by what methods he may best secure his own. The event of every war is always precarious; but with regard to the present, as I well know that you yourself never imagined you had anything to fear if the victory should turn on one side, so I am persuaded, should it fall on the other, you can only suffer in the general ruin. The single circumstance, then, that can give you much disquietude, is that which in some sort I look upon as a kind of consolation: I mean, that the danger to which you are exposed is no other than what threatens the whole community. And this, it must be acknowledged, is so extremely great, that whatever philosophers may pretend, I question whether anything can effectually support us under it, except one consideration alone: a consideration which is always more or less efficacious, in proportion to the strength and firmness of a man's own mind. But, if to mean honestly and to act rightly be all that is necessary to constitute human happiness, it should seem a sort of impiety to call that man miserable who is conscious of having always regulated his conduct by the best intentions. It was not to ourselves, any private advantage which we promised ourselves from the success of our arms, that induced us lately to abandon our fortunes, our families, and our country: it was the just sense of that sacred regard we owed both to the commonwealth and to our own characters. Nor, when we acted thus, were we so absurdly sanguine as to flatter ourselves with the prospect of certain victory. If the event, then, has proved agreeable to what, upon our first entrance into the war, we were well aware it possibly might, we ought, by no means, surely, to be as much displeased as if the reverse of all that we expected had fell upon us. Let us, then, my friend, cherish those sentiments which true philosophy prescribes, by esteeming it our only concern in this life to preserve our integrity; and so long as we are void of all just reproach, has been attended with revolutions of human affairs with calmness and moderation. The sum of what I would say, in short, is this,—that virtue seems sufficient for her own support, though all things else were utterly lost. Still, however, if any hopes should yet remain to the republic, you should by no means despair, whatever its future situation may be, of holding the rank in it you deserve.

And here, my friend, it occurs to me, that there was a time when you, likewise, used to condemn my despondency; and when I was full of apprehensions, and altogether undetermined how to act, you inspired me by your advice and example with more spirited and vigorous resolutions. At that season, it was not our cause, but our measures, I disapproved. I thought it much too late to oppose those victorious arms which we ourselves had long been contributing to strengthen; and I lamented that we should refer the decision of our political disputes, not to the weight of our counsels, but to the force of our swords. I do not pretend to have been inspired with a spirit of divination, when I foretold what has since happened. I only saw the possibility and destructive consequences of such an event. And it was this that alarmed my fears; especially as it was a contingency of all others the most likely to take effect. For the strength of our party, I well knew, was of a kind that would be of as little avail as in the old days our troops were far inferior, both to force and experience, to those of our adversaries. The same spirit and resolution, then, which you recommended to me at that juncture, let me now exhort you, in my turn, to assume in the present.

I was induced to write to you upon this subject by a conversation I lately had with your freedman Philargyrus. In answer to the very particular inquiries I made concerning your welfare, he informed me (and I have no reason to suspect his veracity) that you were at some seasons exceedingly dejected. This is a state of mind you should by no means encourage. For if the republic should in any degree subsist, you have no reason to doubt of recovering the rank you deserve; and should it be destroyed, your particular condition will be no worse, at least, than that of every Roman in general. As to the important affair now depending, and for the event of which we are all of us so much anxiety; this is a circumstance which you ought to bear with the greater tranquillity, as you are in a city where philosophy, that supreme guide and governor of human life, not only received her birth, but her best and noblest improvements.

But, besides this advantage, you enjoy the company likewise of Sulpicius, that wise and favourite friend, from whose kind and prudent offices you must undoubtedly receive great consolation. And had we all of us lately been so politic as to have followed his advice, we should have chosen rather to have submitted to the civil, than to the military power of Caesar.

1 The war in Spain.

2 The Athenians (among whom Torquatus, as has been observed above, at this time resided) were supposed to have been the first who instructed mankind, not only in the refinements of poetry, oratory, and philosophy, but in manufactures, agriculture, and civil government. Athens, in short, was esteemed by the ancients to be the source, as it was unquestionably the seat, of all those useful or polite arts which most contribute to the ease and ornament of human life—see Plutarch, Life of Cato, in. 6; Lactant. de i. 4, &c.

3 Sulpicius was at Athens, as governor of Greece. See Cic. Cael. 25, 481.

4 This alludes to the opposition which Sulpicius made...
But I have dwelt longer, perhaps, upon this subject than was necessary; I will despatch, therefore, what is more material in fewer words. How much I owed to some of those friends, whom the fite of this cruel war has snatched from me, you perfectly well know; but I have now none remaining from whom I have received greater obligations than from yourself. I am sensible, at the same time, how little my power can at present avail; but as no man can be so totally fallen as not to be capable of effecting somewhat at least by his earnest endeavours, he assured that both you and yours have an unquestionable right to the best and most zealous of mine. Farewell.

LETTER II.

To Servius Sulpicius.

Manius Curius, a merchant of Patras, is a person whom I have many and great reasons to value. The friendship between us has long continued: so long, indeed, as from his first appearance in the forum. He has formerly, at different junctures, and lately, during this unhappy civil war, offered me as asylum at Patras; and I should have used his house with the same freedom as my own, if I had found occasion. But my strongest connexion with him results from a motive of a more sacred kind, as it arises from his intimacy with my friend Atticus, for whom he entertains a very singular affection and esteem. If Curius is known to you, I imagine I am paying him the tribute of my good offices somewhat too late; for I dare say his polite and elegant manners have already recommended him to your regard. However, should this prove to be the case, I very earnestly entreat you to suffer this letter to confirm and increase the favourable disposition you have conceived towards him. But if his modesty has concealed him from your notice, or you have only a slight acquaintance with him, or for any other reason, a farther recommendation may be necessary, I most warmly and most deservedly give him mine. I will be answerable, too (as every one ought, indeed, whose offices of this kind are sincere and disinterested), that you will experience so much kindness and prosperity in Curius, as to convince you that he is worthy both of my recommendation and of your friendship. In the mean time, be assured you will very sensibly oblige me, if I should find that this letter shall have had all the influence with you which I confidently expect. Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Aulus Terquatus.

It was more in compliance with the affection of my heart, than as thinking in the least necessary, that I detained you so long in my last⁴; to the proposal of recalling Caesar from his government in Gaul, just before the commencement of the civil war. See rem. ³, p. 454.

In any respect too much distressed myself, to be capable of encouraging another. But, whatever reason there might or might not have been for the length of my former letter, I am sure it may well excuse me from extending my present, nothing new having since occurred. For as to the various and contradictory reports which are every day propagated amongst us, concerning affairs in Spain, I imagine they are spread likewise into your part of the world. They will all terminate, however, in some fatal catastrophe; a catastrophe which I no less clearly discern (and I am well assured it is equally visible to yourself) than if it were now actually before my view. 'Tis true no one can determine what will be the event of the approaching battle; but as to that of the war in general, I have no manner of doubt; at least, none with respect to its consequences: for one side or the other must certainly be victorious; and I am well convinced of the use that either party will make of their success. Such a use, indeed, that I had rather suffer what is generally esteemed the most terrible of all evils, than live to be a spectator of so dreadful a scene. Yes, my friend, life, upon the terms on which we must then endure it, would be the completion of human misery; whereas death was never considered by any wise man as an evil, even to the happy themselves. But you are in a city where the very walls will inspire you with these and other reflections of the same tendency, in a far more efficacious manner than I can suggest them⁵. I will only, therefore, assure you (unsubstantially as the consolation is which arises from the misfortunes of others), that you are at present in no greater danger than any of those of the same party, who have either totally renounced the war, or who are still in arms, as they are both under equal apprehensions from the victor. But there is another and far higher consolation, which I hope is your support, as it certainly is mine. For so long as I shall preserve my innocence, I will never whilst I exist be anxiously disturbed at any event that may happen; and if I should cease to exist, all sensibility must cease with me⁶. But I am again returning to my unnecessary reflections, and, in the language of the old proverb, am "sending owls to Athens." To put an end to them, be assured that the welfare of yourself and family, together with the success of all your concerns, is my great and principal care, and shall continue to be so to the end of my days. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Servius Sulpicius.

Your very polite and obliging letter to Atticus afforded him great satisfaction; but not more than I received from it myself. It was, indeed, equally agreeable to us both. But although we neither of us doubted that you would readily comply with any request he should make, yet your having voluntarily and unexpectedly offered him your services, was a consideration, I must acknowledge, that raised Atticus's admiration less than mine. As you have given him the most ample assurances, therefore, of your good offices, it is unnecessary that I should desire you to add anything to them from your regard to me. It would be no less impertinent, likewise, to send you my acknowledgments upon this occasion, as your offer was entirely the spontaneous result of your particular friendship to Atticus. This, however, I will say, that as such an uncommon proof of your esteem for a man whom I singularly love and value, could not but be highly agreeable to me, so it is an obligation I must necessarily place to my own account. And, indeed, as I may take the liberty, from the intimacy between us, to transgress the strict rules of propriety, I shall venture to do the two things which I just now declared were both improper and unnecessary. Accordingly, let me request, in the first place, that you would add as much as possible to those services, for my sake, with which you have shown yourself willing to favour Atticus for his own; and, in the next place, desire your acceptance of my acknowledgments for those which you have already so generously promised him. And be assured, whatever good offices you shall render to Atticus in regard to his affairs in Epirus, or upon any other occasion, will be so many obligations conferred upon myself. Farewell.

LETTER V.

To the same.

I have long been united with Lyso, a citizen of Patrae, by ties which I deem of sacred obligation; the ties, I mean, of hospitality. This is a sort of connexion, it is true, in which I am engaged also with many others; but I never contracted with any of my hosts so strict an intimacy. The many good offices I received from Lyso, together with the habits of a daily intercourse, improved our acquaintance to the highest degree of friendship; and, indeed, during the whole year he resided here, we were scarce ever separated. We neither of us doubted that my former letter would have the effect I find it has, and induce you to take his affairs under your protection in his absence. Nevertheless, as he had appeared in arms in favour of our party, we were under perpetual apprehensions of his resentment, in whom all power is now centred. But Lyso’s illustrious rank, together with the zealous applications of myself and the rest of those who have shared in his generous hospitality, have at length obtained all that we could wish, as you will perceive by the letter which Caesar himself has written to you. I am so far, however, from thinking him in circumstances that will allow me to release you from any part of my former solicitation, that I now more strongly request you to receive him into your patronage and friendship. Whilst his fate was yet in suspense, I was less forward in claiming your good offices, being cautious of giving you a trouble which possibly might prove to no purpose. But as his pardon is absolutely confirmed, I most ardently entreat your best services in his behalf. Not to enumerate particulars, I recommend to you his whole family in general, but more especially his son. My old client Memnius Gemellus, having been presented with the freedom of the city of Patrae during his unhappy banishment, adopted this young man according to the forms prescribed by the laws of that community; and I beseech you to support him in his right of succeeding to the estate of his adoptive father. But, above all, as I have thoroughly experienced the merit and grateful disposition of Lyso, let me conjure you to admit him into a share of your friendship. I am persuaded, if you should do so, you will hereafter look upon him with the same affection, and recommend him with as much zeal, as I have expressed in the present instance. There is nothing, indeed, I more earnestly wish than to raise in you this disposition towards him; as I fear, if you should not consider upon him your best services, he will suspect, not that you are unmindful of my recommendations, but that I did not sufficiently enforce them. For he must be perfectly sensible, not only from what he has frequently heard me declare, but from your own obliging letters to me, of the singular share I enjoy in your friendship and esteem. Farewell.

LETTER VI.

To the same.

Asclapo, a physician of Patrae, is my very particular friend; to whose company, as well as skill in his profession, I have been much indebted. I had occasion to experience the latter in my own family; and had great reason to be satisfied with his knowledge, his integrity, and his tenderness. I recommend him, therefore, to your favour; and entreat you to let him see, by the effects of this letter, that I did so in the strongest manner. Your compliance with this request will oblige me exceedingly. Farewell.

LETTER VII.

To the same.

Marcus Aemilius Avianus has distinguished me, from his earliest youth, with peculiar marks of affection and esteem. He is a man not only of great politeness but probity; and, indeed, in every view of his character, is extremely amiable. If I imagined he were at Sicyon, I should think it utterly unnecessary to add anything farther to his behalf, being well persuaded that the elegance and integrity of his manners would be sufficient of themselves to recommend him to the same degree of your affection which he possesses, not only of mine, but of every one of his friends in general. But as I hear he still continues at Cybira, where I left him some time ago, I most strongly recommend his affairs and family at Sicyon to your favour and protection. Among these, I must particularly single out his freedman, Hammonius, as one who has a claim to my recommendation upon his own account. He has gained my good opinion, a Epirus was contiguous to Greece, and annexed to the government of that province. It is now called Aetolia, and is under the dominion of the Turks. A considerable part of Attica's estate lay in this country.—Corm. Nep. in Vit. Att. 14.

not only by his uncommon zeal and fidelity towards his patron, but by the very important services likewise which he has conferred upon myself. Indeed, and it is to be noted that he had been indebted for the privilege of his freedom, he could not have acted with a more faithful and affectionate assiduity than I experienced from him in my troubles. In the first place, then, I entreat your protection of Hammonius, as agent in the affairs of his patron: and, o the next, I recommend him upon his own account, as worthy to be received into the number of your friends. Believe me, you will find him of a modest, obliging temper, and well deserving a place in your affection. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

To the same.

I HAVE a very great regard for Titus Manlius, a merchant of Thespiae; not only as one from whom I have always received singular marks of consideration and esteem, but as he is an admirer also of our favourite studies. To this I must add, that my friend Varro Mureua very warmly expouses his interest: and though Mureua has full confidence in the effect of that letter which he has himself written to you in favour of Manlius, yet he is persuaded that my recommendation likewise may somewhat increase your disposition to assist him. In compliance, therefore, with my desire of seeing both Mureua and Manlius, I recommend the letter to you in the strongest terms: and you will greatly oblige me by promoting the interest and honours of Manlius in every instance consistent with your own character and dignity. I will venture to assure you likewise, from the knowledge I have of his polite and humanised disposition, that your good offices towards him will be attended with all the satisfaction you can promise yourself from the gratitude of a worthy man. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

To the same.

My friend and tribe-fellow, Lucius Cossinius, is one whom I have long lived in great intimacy: and which his connexion with Atticus has contributed still farther to improve. I enjoy the affection of his whole family; but particularly of his freedman Anchialus, who is highly in the esteem not only of his patron, but of all his patron’s friends; in which number I have already mentioned myself. I recommend Anchialus therefore to your favour, with as much warmth as if he stood in the same relation to me as he does to Cossinius. You will oblige me, indeed, in a very sensible manner, by receiving him into your friendship, and giving him any assistance he may require—so far, I mean, as your own convenience will admit.

And you will hereafter, I am persuaded, receive much satisfaction from your compliance with this request, as you will find Anchialus to be a man of the greatest politeness and probity. Farewell.

LETTER X.

To the same.

The pleasure I took in the reflection of having written to you in behalf of my friend and host, Lyso, was much increased when I read his letter: and I particularly rejoiced in having so strongly recommended him to your esteem, when I found he had before been a sufferer in your good opinion; for my recommendation, he tells me, was of singular advantage in removing the groundless suspicion you had entertained of him, from a report that he had frequently, whilst he was at Rome, treated your character in a disrespectful manner. Let me, in the first place, then, return you those thanks which I so justly owe you, for suffering my letter to efface every remaining impression of this injurious calumny. And, in the next place, although Lyso assures me that, agreeably to your well-natured and generous disposition, he has entirely satisfied you of his innocence, yet I entreat you to believe me when I protest, not only in justice to my friend, but to the world in general, that I never heard any man mention you without the highest applause. As to Lyso in particular, in all the daily conversations we had together whilst he continued here, you were the perpetual subject of his encomiums; both as he imagined that I heard them with pleasure, and as it was a topic extremely agreeable likewise to himself. But though he is fully satisfied with the effects of my former letter, and I am sensible that the generous manner in which you treat him renders all farther application perfectly unnecessary, yet I cannot forbear renewing my earnest solicitations that you would continue your favours towards him. I would again also represent to you how well he deserves them, if I did not imagine you were by this time sufficiently acquainted with his merit. Farewell.

LETTER XI.

To the same.

HAGESARETUS of Larissa having received considerable honours from me during my consulate, has ever since distinguished me with singular marks of gratitude and respect. I strongly recommend him, therefore, to you as my host and friend; as a man of an honest and grateful heart; as a person of principal rank in his native city, and, in short, as one who is altogether worthy of being admitted into your friendship. And I shall be exceedingly obliged to you for letting him see that you pay regard to this my recommendation. Farewell.

Antiq. Rom.
LETTER XII.

To the same.

The connexion between Lucius Mescinius and myself results from no less powerful a tie than that of his having been formerly my request. But, though I always considered a relation of this kind in the high regard it was viewed by our ancestors, yet the refined and elegant virtues of Mescinius rendered it still more justly sacred. Accordingly, there is no man with whom I live in a higher degree of intimacy, or from whose friendship I derive greater satisfaction. He doubts not of your disposition to serve him upon every occasion that shall comport with your honour; however, he is persuaded that a letter from my hand will considerably strengthen your inclinations for that purpose. This he collects not only from his own observation, but from those frequent declarations he has heard me make of the very pleasing and intimate friendship in which you and I are so strictly joined. I am to inform you, then, that his late brother, who was a merchant in Elis, has left him his estate; and I entreat you, with all the warmth which you are sensible ought to animate me in the concerns of a friend to whom I am so strongly and closely attached, that you would assist him with your power, your influence, and your advice, in settling these his affairs in your province. In view to this, we have sent directions to his agent, that if any disputes should arise concerning the estate or effects of the testator, that they shall be guided by your sentiments, and (if it be not troubling you too much) determined by your arbitration; an office which I earnestly entreat you to undertake, and the acceptance of which I shall esteem an honour done to myself. But if any of the claimants should be so obstinate as to refuse your award, I shall receive it as a singular obligation if you will refer their pretensions (provided you shall not think it a derogation from your dignity) to be determined in the courts at Rome; as the matter in contest is with a Roman senator. That you may the less scruple to comply with this request, I have procured a sort of recommendatory letter to you from the consul Lepidus. I say a recommendatory one; for to have desired him to write in a more authoritative style, would not, I thought, be treating your high station with the deference which is so justly due to it. I would add, that your obliging Mescinius in this instance, will be laying out your favours to much advantage; if I were not, on the one hand, well persuaded that this is a circumstance of which you are already apprised; and, on the other, were I not soliciting you as for an affair of my own. For, be assured, I take an equal concern with Mescinius in every article wherein he is interested. As I am very desirous, therefore, that he may obtain his right with as little trouble as possible, so I am solicitous likewise that he should have reason to think that my recommendation has greatly contributed to this end. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

To the same.

The regard you pay to my recommendations has given me, and will hereafter give me, I dare say, frequent occasions of repeating my acknowledgments. However, I will attempt, if possible, to convey my thanks to you in a style as various as the several instances that demand them; and, in imitation of you lawyers, express the same thing in different words. I have received a letter from Hammonius, full of the strongest expressions of gratitude for the service you have rendered both to him and Avisanus, in consequence of my recommendation; and he assures me that nothing can be more generous than the personal civilities you have shown to himself, as well as the attention you have given to the affairs of his patron. This would afford me a very sensible pleasure, were I to consider it only as a benefit to those to whom I have the strongest attachments; as indeed Avisanus has distinguished himself above all my friends by his superior sensibility of the many and great obligations I have conferred upon him. But my satisfaction still increases when I view it as an instance of my standing so high in your esteem, as to incline you to serve my friends more efficaciously than I myself should, perhaps, were I present for that purpose. Possibly the reason of your having this advantage over me, may be, that I should not yield altogether so easily to their requests as you comply with mine. But whatever doubt I may have as to that point, I have none of your being persuaded that I entertain the sentiments of your favours they deserve; and I entreat you to believe (what I will be answerable is the truth) that both Avisanus and Hammonius have received them with the same grateful disposition. I beseech you then, if it be not engaging you in too much trouble, that you would endeavour that their affairs may be settled before you leave the province. I live in a most agreeable intimacy with your son, whose genius and uncommon application, but, above all, his probity and virtue, afford me a very sensible pleasure. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

To the same.

It is always with much pleasure that I apply to you in behalf of my friends; but I find a still greater in expressing my gratitude for those favours you yield to my solicitations. This indeed is a pleasure with which you never fail of supplying me; and it is incredible what acknowledgments I receive, even from persons whom I have but slightly mentioned to you. I think myself greatly indebted for these instances of your friendship; but particularly for those good offices you have conferred upon Mescinius. He informs me that immediately upon the receipt of my letter, you gave his agents full assurance of your services; and have since performed even more than you promised. Believe me, (and I cannot too often repeat it,) you have, by these means, laid an obligation upon me of the most acceptable kind; and it affords me so much the higher satisfaction, as I am persuaded Mescinus will give you abundant reason to rejoice in it yourself. Virtue and probity, in truth, are the prevailing motives of his heart; as an obliging and friendly officiousness is his distinguishing characteristic. To this I must add, that he is particularly devoted to our favourite speculations; those philosophical speculations, my friend, which were always the delight, as they are now also the support and consolation, of my life. Let me entreat you, then, to give him fresh instances of your generosity upon every occasion, wherein it shall not be inconsistent with your dignity to interpose. But there are two articles in which I will particularly request it. The first is, that if those who are indebted to the estate of his testator, should insist upon being indemnified in their payments to Mescinus, that my security may be accepted; and the next is, that as the greatest part of the testator's effects are secreted by his wife, that you would assist in concerting measures for sending her to Rome. Should she be once persuaded that this method will be taken with her, we doubt not of her settling everything to the satisfaction of Mescinus; and, that it may be so, I most strongly again request the interposition of your good offices. In the mean time, I will be answerable for what I just now assured you, that the gratitude and other amiable qualities of Mescinus will give you reason to think your favours were not ill bestowed, which I mention as a motive on his own account, to be added to those which induced you to serve him upon mine.

I am persuaded that the Lacedaemonians doubt not of being sufficiently recommended to your justice and patronage, by their own and their ancestors' virtues, and I know you too well to question your being perfectly acquainted with the national rights and merit of every people who are connected with the republic. Accordingly, notwithstanding the great obligations I have received from the citizens of Lacedaemon, yet, when Philippus requested me to recommend them to your protection, I was diffident of Mescinus could not possibly stand in need of an advocate with Sulpicius. The truth is, I look upon it as a circumstance of singular advantage to all the cities of Achaia, in general, that you preside over them in these turbulent times; and I am persuaded that you, who are so peculiarly conversant, not only in the Roman but in Grecian annals, cannot but be a friend to the Lacedaemonians for the sake of their heroic descent. I will only, therefore, entreat you that, when you are acting towards them in consequence of what your justice and honour requires, you would, at the same time, intimate that you receive an additional pleasure from indulging your own inclinations of that sort, by knowing them to be agreeable likewise to me. As I think myself obliged to show this city that their concerns are part of my care, it is with much earnestness I make this request. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

To Leptis.

This moment I received your letter from the hands of Seleucus, I despatch a note to Balbus, to inquire the purport of the law you mention. His answer was, that such persons as at present exercise the office of praeco, are expressly excluded from being decurii, but this prohibition extended not to those who had formerly been engaged in that employment. Let not our friends, then, be discouraged. It would, indeed, have been intolerable that a parcel of paltry fortune-tellers should be thought worthy of being admitted into the senate of Rome, at the same time that having formerly acted as a praeco should disqualify a man for being member of the council of a country corporation.

We have no news from Spain: all that we know with certainty is, that young Pompey has drawn together a very considerable army. This we learn from a letter of Paciucus to Caesar, a copy whereof Caesar himself has transmitted to us; in which it is affirmed that Pompey is at the head of eleven legions. Messalia, in a letter he lately wrote to Quintus Salassus, informs him that his brother, Publius Curtius, has been executed by the command of Pompey, in the presence of his whole army. This man had entered, it seems, into a conspiracy with some Spaniards, by which it was agreed, in case Pompey should march into a certain village for provisions, to seize upon his person, and deliver him into the hands of Caesar.

In relation to the security in which you stand engaged for Pompey, you may depend upon it, as soon as Galba, who is jointly bound with you, returns hither, I shall not fail to consult with him about measures for settling that affair. He seemed, I remember, to imagine that it might be adjusted; and you know he is a man who spares no pains where his money is concerned.

1 Cicero mentions a person of this name in a former letter, who appears to have been his praefectus faborum, or what might be called, perhaps, in modern language, the commander of his train of artillery, when he was governor of Cilicia. It is probable, therefore, as Manutius conjectures, that he is the same person to whom this letter is addressed.—Ep. Fam. iii. 7.

2 Manutius very justly observes, that this could not be a law which Caesar had actually passed, but one which he intended, perhaps, to enact, when he should return from Spain: for if it had been actually promulgated, Cicero could have had no occasion to apply to Balbus for his intelligence.

1 The office of praeco seems to have been much in the nature of a clerk in our courts of justice, but not altogether so low in repute. 1

2 A decurio was, in a corporate city, the same as a senator of Rome; that is, a member of the public council of the community.

3 This is a person upon Caesar, who had introduced persons of the lowest rank and character into the Roman senate. See rem., p. 457.

4 He was a native of Spain, and a person of great note in that province. Caesar entrusted him with a very considerable command in the expedition against the sons of Pompey.—Hirt. De Bell. Hisp. 3.

5 The number of horse and foot in a Roman legion varied in different periods of the republic. In its lowest compass, it is said to have consisted of 500 horse and 200 foot; and, in its highest, to have risen to 6000 of the former, and 400 of the latter.—Rosin. Antiq. Rom. 964.
It gives me much pleasure to find that you so highly approve of my Orator. Whatever skill I have in the art, I have displayed it all in that treatise; and, if the commendations you bestow upon it are not too partial, I cannot but set some value upon my judgment. To speak truth, I am willing to rest all my reputation of this kind upon the merit of that performance. I hope my little favourite, your son, already discovers some relish for writings of this sort; and although he is yet too young to enter far into these studies, yet it will be no disadvantage to him to begin thus early to form his taste by compositions of this nature.

I have been detained at Rome on account of my daughter Tullia's lying-in. But though she is now, I hope, out of all danger, yet I still wait here in expectation of my first payment from the agents of Dolabella; and, to tell you the truth, I am not so fond of changing the scene as formerly. The amusement I found in my country houses, together with the sweets of retirement, were wont heretofore to draw me frequently out of Rome. But the situation of my present house is altogether as pleasant as that of any of my villas. I am, indeed, as much retired here as if I lived in the most unfrequented desert, and carry on my studies without the least interruption. I believe, therefore, that I have a better chance of a visit from you in Rome than you have of seeing me in the country.

I would recommend Hesiod to the agreeable little Lepta as an author which I ought to retain by heart; and particularly let him always have in his mouth those noble lines,

Farewell.

High on a rugged rock, &c.

LETTER XVI.

To Aulus Torquatus.

There is no news to send you: and, indeed, if there were any, yet all accounts of that kind, I know, are usually transmitted to you by your own family. As to what may hereafter happen, though it is always difficult to determine concerning future events, yet, when they are not placed at too great a distance, one may sometimes form a tolerable guess. At present, however, all I can conjecture is, that the war is not likely to be drawn out into any great length; though I must acknowledge there are some who think differently. I am even inclined to believe that there has already been an engagement; but I do not give you this as a fact; I mention it only as extremely probable. The event of war is always precarious; but, in the present instance, the number of forces is so considerable on each side, and there is such a general spirit, it is said, in both armies, of coming to action, that it will not be matter of surprise, whichever side should obtain the victory. In the mean time, the world is every day more and more persuaded, that although there may be some little difference in the cause of the contending parties, there will be scarcely any in the consequence of their successes. As to one of them, we have already in some sort experienced their disposition; and, as to the other, we are all of us sufficiently sensible how much is to be dreaded from an incoerced conqueror.

If, by what I have here said, I may seem to increase that grief which I should endeavour to alleviate, I must confess that I know but one reflection capable of supporting us under these public misfortunes. It is a reflection, however, of sovereign efficacy, where it can be applied in its full force, and of which I every day more and more experience the singular advantage. It is, indeed, the greatest consolation under adversity, to be conscious that the cause was always meant well, and to be persuaded that nothing but guilt deserves to be considered as a severe evil. But as you and I are so far from having anything to reproach ourselves with, that we have the satisfaction to reflect that we have ever acted upon the most prudent principles; as it is not our measures, but the ill success of those measures, which the world regrets; in a word, as we have faithfully discharged that duty we owed to our country, let us bear the event with calmness and moderation. But I pretend not to teach you how to support these our common calamities. It is a lesson which requires much greater abilities than mine to inculcate, as well as the most singular fortitude of soul to practise. There is one point, however, in which any man is qualified to be your instructor, as it is easy to show that you have no reason to be particularly afflicted. For with respect to Caesar, though he has appeared somewhat more low in grantig your pardon than was generally imagined, yet I have not the least doubt of his consenting to your restoration; and as to the other party, you perfectly well know how your interest stands with them, without my telling you. Your only remaining discontent, then, must arise from being thus long separated from your family: and it is a circumstance, I confess, that justly merits your concern, especially as you are by this mean deprived of the company of

This elegant and judicious piece is inscribed to Brutus, and was written in answer to a question he had often proposed to Cicero, concerning the noblest and most perfect species of eloquence.

This seems to intimate that there had been a divorce between Dolabella and Tullia: as it was usual, in cases of that kind, for the husband to return the portion he had received from his wife, at three annual payments. See rec. 3 and 4, on letter 3, book xi.

The passage is Hesiod, in which Cicero hints, is to the following purpose:

High on a rugged rock the gods ordain,
Majestic Virtus shall her throne maintain:
And many a sturdy path her sons must press,
Even the glad summit shall their labours bless.
There joys accrue to arduous toils succeed,
And peace eternal is the victor's need.

This letter was probably written very early in the present year, as it was on the 17th of March that the two armies came to a general engagement. This decisive battle was fought under the walls of Munda, a city which still subsists in the province of Granada. Caesar obtained a complete victory; but it was disputed by the Pompeians with so much courage and obstinacy, that it was long doubtful on which side the advantage would turn; or, as Florus most elegantly expresses it, "It deserved instead necessit quod deliberaret Fortuna."—Hirt. De Bell. Hisp. 81; Flor. iv. 2.

The Cesaricam party.

Young Pompey, who, if he had succeeded, would undoubtedly have acted with great severity towards Cicero, and the rest of those who had deserted the cause of his

those most amiable youths, your sons. But, as I observed in a former letter, it is natural for every man in these unhappy times to look upon his own condition as of all others the most miserable, and to deem that place the least eligible in which it is his fortune to be situated. For my own part, indeed, I think that we who live at Rome are most to be lamented; not only as in misfortunes of every kind a spectator must be more sensibly affected than he who is acquainted with them merely by report, but as we are more exposed to the danger of sudden violations than those who are placed at a greater distance.

Yet, after all my endeavours to reason you out of your disquietudes, I cannot but acknowledge that I am more obliged to thee than to that philosophy which I have ever cultivated, for the mitigation of my own; and how greatly they once were, you perfectly well know. But, in the first place, I have the consolation to reflect, that when I was so desirous of peace as to think even a bad one preferable to a civil war, I saw farther into consequences than some of my countrymen. And although I do not pretend to a spirit of divination and it was chance alone that verified my predictions, yet I will own that I take great satisfaction in the empty honour of my fruitless penetration. In the next place, I have the consolation, in common with yourself, that should I now be called upon to lay down my life, I shall not be cut off from a commonwealth which I can by any means regret to leave; especially as the same blow that deprives me of my life will deprive me likewise of all sensibility. Besides, I am already arrived at a fulness of years; and, as I can look back with entire satisfaction on the course I have completed, so I have nothing to fear from any violence which may be offered to me, since nature herself has now well-nigh conducted my days to their final period. In a word, when I reflect upon that great man, or rather, indeed, upon those many illustrious personages who perished in this war, it would seem a want of modesty to regret submitting to the same fate, whenever I shall find it necessary. The truth is, I represent to myself all that can possibly happen to me; as, indeed, there is not calamity so severe, which I do not look upon as actually impending. However, since to live in perpetual fear is a greater evil than any we can dread, I check myself in these reflections, especially as I am approaching to that state, which is not only unattended with any pain in itself, but which will put an end to all painful sensations for ever. But I have dwelt longer upon this subject, perhaps, than was necessary. However, if I run out my letters to an unreasonable extent, you must not impute it to impertinence, but affection.

I am sorry to hear that Sulpicius has left Athens; as I am persuaded that the daily company and conversation of so wise and valuable a friend afforded you great relief under your afflictions. But I hope you will continue to bear them as becomes you, and support yourself with your usual fortitude. In the mean time, be assured I shall promote, with the utmost zeal and care, whatever I shall think agreeable to the interest or inclination either of you or yours. And in this I can only imitate you in your disposition to serve me, without being able to return your generous offices in the same efficacious manner. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

To Caius Cassius.

I SHOULD not send you so short a letter, if your courier had not called for it just as he was setting out. But I have still another reason; for I have nothing to write to you in the way of pleasantry, and serious affairs are topics in which it is not altogether safe to engage. You will, therefore, wonder, perhaps, that I should be in any humour to be jocose; and indeed it is so very easy matter. However, it is the only expedient left to divert our uneasy thoughts. But where, then, you will probably ask, is our philosophy? Why, yours, my friend, is in the kitchen, I suppose; and as to mine, it is much too troublesome a guest to gain admittance. The fact is, I am heartily ashamed of being a slave; and, therefore, that I may not hear the severe reproaches of Plato, I endeavour to turn my attention another way.

We have hitherto received no certain intelligence from Spain. I rejoice, upon your account, that you are absent from this unpleasing scene, though I greatly regret it upon my own. But your courier presses me to despatch, so that I can only bid you adieu, and entreat the continuance of that friendship you have ever shown me from your earliest youth.

LETTER XVIII.

To Dolabella.

I WOULD not venture to omit writing to you by our friend Salvius; though I have nothing more to say than what you perfectly well know already, that I infinitely love you. I have much more reason, indeed, to expect a letter from you, than you can have to receive one from me, as I imagine there is nothing going forward in Rome which you will think of importance enough to raise your curiosity, unless, perhaps, that I am to sit in judgment between two learned grammarians; our friend Nicias, and his antagonist Vidianus. The latter, you must know, has produced a certain manuscript, relating to an account between them, to which Nicias, like a second Aristarchus, very peremptorily insists that some of the lines are altogether spurious. Now I, like a venerable ancient critic, am to determine whether these suspected interpolations are genuine or not. But you will question,

\[b\] He was, at this time, with Caesar, in Spain.
\[c\] Whatever disagreement there was between Dolabella and Tullia, it did not, in appearance at least, occasion any coolness between him and his father-in-law; a circumstance, which, considering the tenderness of Cicero for his daughter, can only be accounted for by Dolabella's great credit with Caesar.
\[d\] A celebrated Greek critic. See rovn. i, p. 431.
perhaps, whether I have sufficiently forgotten the delicious mushrooms and those noble prawns1 with which I have been so often regaled by Nicias and his gentle spouse, to be qualified for an impartial judgment in this important cause. Let me ask you, in return, whether you imagine I have so entirely thrown off all my former severity, as to retain nothing of my old solemnity of brow, even when I am sitting in grave tribunal. You may be sure, however, that my honest host shall be no great sufferer. Though, let me tell you, if I should pass sentence of banishment upon him, I shall by no means allow him that Bursa should be supplied with a pedagogue to teach him his letters. But I am running on in this ludicrous style, without reflecting that you, who are in the midst of a campaign, may perhaps be too seriously engaged to relish these humorous sallies. When I shall be certain, therefore, that you are in a disposition to laugh, you shall hear farther from me.
I cannot, however, forbear adding, that the people were extremely solicitous concerning the fate of Sulla2, till the news of his death was confirmed; but now that they are assured of the fact, they are no longer inquisitive how it happened, well contented with their intelligence that he is undoubtedly defunct. As for myself, I bear this deplorable accident like a philosopher; my only concern is, lest it should damp the spirit of Cesar’s auctions.3

LETTER XIX.

To Aulus Torquatus.

I hope you will not imagine that you have been out of my thoughts, by my having lately been a more remiss correspondent than usual.

A. V. 708.
The true occasion of my silence has partly arisen from an ill state of health, which, however, is now somewhat mended, and partly has been evoking to my absence from Rome, which prevented me from being informed when any courier was despatched to you. Be assured that I constantly and most affectionately preserve you in my remembrance, and that your affairs of every kind are as much my concern as if they were my own.

Believe me, you have no reason, considering the unhappy situation of public states, to be uneasy that yours still remain in a more dubious and unsettled posture than was generally hoped and imagined. For one of these three events must necessarily take place; either we shall never see an end of our civil wars; or they will one day subside, and give the republic an opportunity of recovery; or, if perhaps they will terminate in its utter extinction. If the sword is never to be sheathed, you can have nothing to fear either from the party which you formerly assisted, or from that by which you have lately been received.4 But should the republic again revive, either by the contending factions mutually agreeing to a cessation of arms; or by their laying them down in mere lassitude; or by one side being vanquished; you will undoubtedly be again restored both to your rank and to your fortunes. And should our constitution be totally destroyed, agreeably to what the wise Marcus Antoninus5 long since apprehended, when he imagined that the present calamities were even then approaching, you will have the consolation, at least, to reflect, that a misfortune which is common to all cannot be lamented as peculiar to any. If you, therefore, shall be again called to the career of your country’s virtue,6 it is a consolation, however, to which we must necessarily have recourse.

If you well consider the full force of these few hats, (and I do not think it prudent to be more explicit in a letter,) you must be convinced, without my telling you, that you have something to hope, and nothing to fear, so long as the republic shall subsist, either in its present, or any other form. But should it be entirely subverted, as I am sure you would not, if you were permitted, survive its ruin; so I am persuaded you will patiently submit to your fate, in the conscious satisfaction of having in no sort deserved it. But I forbear to enter farther into this subject, and will only add my request, that you would inform me how it is with you, and where you purpose to fix your quarters, that I may know where a letter or a visit will find you. Farewell.

LETTER XX.

To Caius Cassius.

Surely, my friend, your couriers are a set of most unconscionable fellows. Not that they have given me any particular offence; but as they never bring me a letter when they

1 Torquatus was now in Italy, having obtained the permission of returning, by means of Dolabella, with whom Cicero had employed his good offices for that purpose; as appears by several passages which Manutius has produced from the letters to Atticus. But whether Torquatus, af-wards, procured a full pardon from Cesar, and was restored to his estates and honours, is uncertain; all that is farther known of him, is, that he was in the army of Brutus and Cassius, at the battle of Philippi, and in the number of those whom Atticus generously assisted in their distress after the event of that unfortunate action.—
Ad Att. xiiii. 9, 20, 21; Corn. Nep. in Vit. Att. ii.

2 In the original, it is colinarum, which convey no sense, or, at least, a very forced one. In my translation, I have represented by Gronovius, is adopted in the translation, who imagines the true word was squillarum; for prawns was a fish in great repute amongst the Roman epicures.

3 Bursa was a particular enemy of Cicero, and had been banished for his victorious attempts to revenge the murder of Closius, from which banishment he was lately recalled.

4 See rem. a. p. 387.

5 This man had rendered himself extremely and gene-really odious by the purchases he had made of the con-flagrated estates, during the proscriptions both of Sylla and Cesar.—Cic. de Offic. ii. 8.

6 In which the confiscated estates were put up to sale.
One of the methods that Cesar took to reward his partisans, was by suffering them to purchase these estates at an under-value; it was the hope of being a sharer in these iniquitous spoils, that furnished one of the principal incentives to the civil war.—Cic. ubi sup.
arrive here, is it fair they should always press me for one when they return? It would be more convenient, however, if they would give me earlier notice, and not make their demands in the very instant they are setting out. You must excuse me, therefore, (if an excuse I can want, who am so much more prolix than you yourself) should this or prolix no longer than my last, as you may be afraid of finding an ample detail of everything in my next. But that my present epistle may not be wholly barren of news, I must inform you that Publius Sulla, the father, is dead. The occasion of this accident is variously reported: some say he was a martyr to his palace; and others, that he was murdered by highwaymen. The people, however, are perfectly indifferent as to the manner, since they are quite clear as to the fact: for certain it is, that the shame of his funeral pile have consumed him to ashes. And what though Liberty herself, alas! perished with this paragon of patriots, you will bear the loss of him, I guess, with much philosophy. But Caesar, 'tis thought, will be a real mourner, in the apprehension that his auctions will not now proceed so currently as usual. On the other hand, this event affords high satisfaction to Minidus Marcellus, and the esquemished Attius, who rejoice exceedingly in having thus gotten quit of a formidable antagonist.

We are in great expectation of the news from Spain, having, as yet, received no certain intelligence from that quarter. Some flying reports, indeed, have been spread, that things do not go well there; but they are reports without authority.

Our friend Paesa set out for his government on the 30th of December. The circumstances that attended his departure afforded a very strong proof that 'virtue is eligible upon its own account': a truth which you have lately, it seems, begun to doubt. The singular humanity with which he has relieved so many cases in times of public distress, drew after him, in a very distinguished manner, the general good wishes of every honest man.

I am extremely glad to find that you are still at Brundisium, and I much approve of your continuing there. You cannot be governed by a more judicious maxim than to sit loose to the vain ambition of the world; and it will be a great satisfaction to all your friends to hear that you persevere in this prudent inactivity. In the mean time, I hope you will not forget me when you send any letters to your family; as, on my own part, whenever I hear of any person that is going to you, I shall not fail to take the opportunity of writing.

Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

To the same.

Will you not blush when I remind you that this is the third letter I have written without having received a single line in return? A. 700. However, I do not press you to be more expeditious, as I hope, and indeed insist, that you will make me amends for this delay, by the length of your next epistle. As for myself, if I had the opportunity of conveying my letters as frequently as I wish, I should write to you, I believe, every hour; for as often as I employ my pen in this manner, you seem, as it were, actually present to my view. This effect is by no means produced, let me tell you, by those subtle images which your new friends talk so much of, who suppose that even the idea of a Cassius had been driven by what the late Catius, with wondrous elegance, has styled spectres. For by this curious word you must know he has expressed what Epicurus, who borrowed the notion from Democritus, has called images. But granting that these same spectres are capable of affecting the organ of vision, yet I cannot guess which way they can contrive to make their entrance into the mind. But you will solve this difficulty when we meet, and tell me by what means, whenever I shall be disposed to think of you, I may be able to call up your spectre, and not only yours, whose image, indeed, is already so deeply stamped upon my heart, but even that of the whole British island, for instance, if I should be inclined to make it the subject of my meditations.—But more of this another time. In the mean while I send this as an experiment to try with what temper you can bear my raillerys.

Should they seem to touch you, I shall renew my attack with so much the more vigour, and will apply for a writ of restitution to reinstate you in your old tenets, "of which you, the said Cassius, have by force and arms been dispossessed." Length of possession, in this case, will be no plea in bar; for, whether the time be more or less since you have been driven by the allurements of pleasure from the mansion of virtue, my action will be still maintainable. But let me not forget whom it is that I am thus bantering; it is not that illustrious friend whose every step, from his first entrance into the world, has been conducted by the highest honour and virtue? If it be true, then,

The Epicureans: to whose system of philosophy Cassius had lately become a convert. Accordingly Cicero rallys him in this and the following passages, on their absurd doctrines concerning ideas; which they maintained were excited by certain thin forms, or images, perpetually floating in the air. These images were supposed to be emitted from all objects, and to be so delicate and subtle a texture, as easily to penetrate through the pores of the body, and by that means render themselves visible to the mind.—Lucret. iv. 726, sq.,

It is probable that Cadius either coined this word himself, or employed it in a new and improper manner. For it is observable, that both Lucretius and Cicero, whenever they have occasion to express, in their own language, what the Greek Epicureans called εἰδέας, always render it by the word simulacra or imagines.

9 He was a native of Abdara, a city in Thrace, and flourished about 400 years before the Christian era. Epicurus, who was born about forty years afterwards, borrowed much of his doctrine from the writings of this philosopher.—Cic. de Fin. i. 6.

These were the formal words of the proctor's edict, commanding the restoration of a person to an estate, of which he had been forcibly dispossessed. Cicero, perhaps, besides the humour of their general application, meant likewise to intimate that Cassius had been driven out of his more rigid principles by his military companions: as, in a letter written to Tarchatius, when he was making a campaign with Caesar in Gaul, where our author is ralitying him upon a similar occasion, he intimates that he had been guilty of crimes in the camp. "Indicavit mihi Pansa (says he) Epicureum esse factum, O castra praecula!"—Ep. Fam. vii. 19.
that you have embraced the Epicurean principles, I doubt they have more strength and solidity in them than I once imagined.

And now, will you not be inclined to ask, how I could possibly think of amusing you in this idle manner? The truth of it is, I am not furnished with a more important subject, as I have nothing to write to you concerning public affairs; nor, indeed, do I choose to trust my sentiments of them in a letter. Farewell.

LETTER XXII.

Casius to Cicero.

Nothing affords me a greater pleasure, in my travels, than to converse with my friend. It brings you, indeed, so strongly to my mind, that I fancy myself indulging a vein of pleasantry with you in person. This lively impression, however, is by no means philosophized by those Caedici spectres you mention: and for which piece of rillery, I intend to draw up in my next such a list of inelegant stoics as will force you to acknowledge that Catius, in comparison with these, may well pass for a native of the refined Athens.

It gives me much satisfaction, not only upon our friend Pansa's account, but for the sake of every one of us, that he received such marks of public esteem when he set out for his government: I hope this circumstance will be thought a convincing proof how amiable a spirit of probity and benevolence, and how odious the contrary disposition, renders its possessor: and that the world will learn from hence, that these popular honours, which are so passionately courted by bad citizens, are the sure attendants on those whose characters are the reverse. To persuade mankind that virtue is its own reward, is a task, I fear, of too much difficulty: but that real and undisputed pleasures necessarily flow from probity, justice, and whatever else is fair and beautiful in moral actions, is a truth, surely, of most easy admission. Epicurus himself, from whom the Cati, and the Amaunix, together with the rest of those injurious interpreters of his meaning, pretend to derive their tenets, expressly declares, that "a pleasant life can alone be procured by the practice of virtue." Accordingly Pansa, who pursues pleasure agreeably to this just notion of it, still perseveres, you see, in a virtuous conduct. The truth is, those whom your sect has stigmatized by the name of voluptuaries, are warm admirers of moral beauty; and consequently cultivate and practise the whole train of social duties. But commend me to the judicious Sulla: whom, either that he were the philosopher by those Caedici, or that his death was divided in their opinions concerning the supreme good, left them to settle the question among themselves, whilst he turned his views to a less controverted acquisition, by purchasing every good thing that was put up to sale*. I received the news of his death with much fortitude: and, indeed, Caesar will take care that we shall not long have occasion to regret his loss; as there are numbers of equal merit whom he can restore to us in his place. Nor will Caesar himself, I suppose, much lament

LETTER XXIII.

To Dolabella.

Caius Superinus, a native of Calenum, is one with whom I am particularly united; and he is extremely so, likewise, with our very intimate friend Lepta. This person, in order to avoid being engaged in our intestine commotions, attended Marcus Varro into Spain, before the civil war broke out: imagining, as, indeed, everybody else did, that after the defeat of Afranius, there would be no farther disturbances in that province. However, he was, by that very measure, involved in those misfortunes he had taken so much pains to escape. For the sudden insurrection which was formed by Scamul, and afterwards raised to so formidable a height by young Pompey, forced him unwillingly to take a part in that unhappy enterprise. The case of Marcus Planius likewise, who is also in the number of Lepta's particular friends, is much the same with that of Saberinus. In compliance with my friendship, therefore, for these two persons, and in compassion to their misfortunes, I recommend them with all possible warmth and earnestness to your favour. But I have still another motive which engages me in their cause: Lepta interests himself no less ardently in their welfare, than if his own were at stake; and I cannot but feel the next, I might have said an equal, degree of solicitude, where my friend is so anxiously concerned. Accordingly, though I have often had occasion to experience your affection; yet, believe me, I shall principally judge of its strength by your compliance with my present request. I desire, therefore, as soon as he got the power into his hands, had permitted to return from the banishment to which they had for various crimes been condemned.

* In the preceding letter. See rem. 6 and 7 thereon.

V This alludes to the great number of those whom Caesar, this excellent customer of his, when he shall see what a worthy son he has left, shall succeed him.

But to turn to public affairs; let me know what is doing in Spain. It is a point, indeed, upon which I am extremely solicitous: as I had much rather submit to an old master, whose clemency I have experienced, than run the hazard of being exposed to the cruelty of a new one. You know the weakness of young Pompey's intellects; that he looks upon cruelty as heroism; and that he is sensible how much he has ever been the object of our ridicule. Therefore, and therefore, I pray treat me somewhat roughly, and return our jokes with the point of his sword. If you have any value for me, then, you will not fail to let me know whatever shall happen. Ah, my friend, how do I wish I were apprised whether you read this with an easy or an anxious mind! for, by that single circumstance, I should be determined what measures are proper for me to pursue. But not to detain you any longer, I will only entreat you, to continue your friendship to me, and then bid you farewell.

P.S. If Caesar should prove victorious, you may expect to see me very soon.

Y He was one of Pompey's lieutenants in Spain, in the year 704, in conjunction with Varro and Petreius. Caesar's victory over these generals has already been occasionally mentioned in the preceding remarks. or, if you will suffer me to employ so humble a phrase, I even beseech you, to afford your protection to these unhappy men, whose distress arises rather from unavoidable fortune, than from anything blameworthy in their own conduct. I hope, that by your good offices in this affair, you will give me an opportunity of obliging, not only these my friends, but the corporation of Calenum likewise, with which I have great connexions; but above all, that you will, by these means, put it in my power to render a grateful service also to Lepta. What I am going to add, is not extremely material, I believe, to the cause I am pleading: however, it certainly can do it no prejudice. Let me assure you then, that one of these unfortunate persons is in very low circumstances, and the other has scarcely sufficient to enable him to be admitted into the equestrian order. As Caesar, therefore, has generously spared their lives, and they have little else to lose, I entreat you, by all your affection towards me, to procure them the liberty of returning into Italy. The journey, indeed, is long: however, they are willing to undergo it, for the sake of living and dying among their friends and countrymen. I most earnestly request, therefore, your zealous endeavours for this purpose: or rather, indeed, (since I am persuaded it is entirely in your power,) I warmly entreat you to obtain for them this desirable privilege. Farewell.

LETTER XXIV.

To Caesar.

I very particularly recommend to your favour the son of our worthy and common friend Praecilius, a youth whose modest and polite behaviour, together with his singular attachment to myself, have exceedingly endeared him to me. His father, likewise, as experience has now fully convinced me, was always my most sincere well-wisher. For, to confess the truth, he was the first and most zealous of those who used both to rally and reproach me for not joining in your cause, especially after you had invited me by so many honourable overtures. But, All unavailing proved his every art, To shake the purpose of my steadfast heart. For whilst the gallant chiefs of our party were on the other side perpetually exclaiming to me, "Rise then, distinguish'd amidst the sons of fame, And fair transmit to times unborn thy name?" Too easy dupe of Flattery's specious voice, Dulling I stray'd from Wisdom's better choice And fain would they still raise my spirits, while they endeavour, insensible as I now am to the charms of glory, to rekindle that passion in my heart. With this view they are ever repeating, O let me not inglorious sink in death, And yield like vulgar souls my parting breath: In some brave effort give me to expire, That distant ages may the deed admire!

The estate necessary to qualify a man for being received into the equestrian order was four hundred thousand sesterces, equivalent to about 3000L sterling. Cicero artfully mentions the slender fortunes of his friends, as an intimation to Dolabella not to expect any dowage for his good offices towards them.

But I am immovable, as you see, by all their persuasions. Renouncing, therefore, the pompous heroics of Homer, I turn to the just maxims of Euripides, and say with that poet, Curse on the age, who, impotently wise, O'erlooks the paths where humbler Prudence lies.

My old friend Praecilius is a great admirer of the sentiment in these lines: insisting that a patriot may preserve a prudential regard to his own safety, and yet, Above hee peers the first in honour shone.

But to return from this digression: you will greatly oblige me by extending to this young man that uncommon generosity which so peculiarly marks your character, and by suffering my recommendation to increase the number of those favours which I am persuaded you are disposed to confer upon him for the sake of his family.

I have not addressed you in the usual style of recommendatory letters, that you might see I did not intend this as an application of common form. Farewell.

LETTER XXV.

To the same.

Amongst all our young nobility, Publius Crassus was one for whom I entertained the highest regard; and, indeed, he amply justified, in his more mature years, the favourable opinion I had conceived of him from his infancy. It was during the life of that his freedman Apollonius first recommended himself to my esteem; for he was zealously attached to the interest of his patron, and perfectly well qualified to assist him in those noble studies to which he was devoted. Accordingly, Crassus was extremely fond of him: but Apollonius, after the death of his patron, proved himself still more worthy of my protection and friendship, as he distinguished with peculiar marks of respect all that loved Crassus, or had been beloved by him. It was this that induced Apollonius to follow me into Cilicia,—where, upon many occasions, I received singular advantage from his faithful and judicious services. If I mistake not, his most sincere and zealous offices were not wanting to you likewise in the Alexandrine war, and it is in the hope of your thinking so that he has resolved, in concurrence with my sentiments, but chiefly indeed from his own, to wait upon you in Spain. I would not promise, however, to recommend him to your favour. Not that I suspected my applications would be void of weight, but I thought they would be unnecessary in behalf of a man who had served in the army under you, and whom, from your regard to the memory of Crassus, you would undoubtedly consider as a friend of your own. Besides, I knew he could easily procure letters of this kind from many other hands. But, as he greatly values my good opinion, and as I am sensible it has some influence upon yours, I very willingly give him my testimonial. Let me assure you, then, that I know him to be a man of literature, and one who has applied himself to the polite arts from his earliest youth: for when he was a boy, he frequently visited at my house with Dio- dotus, the stoic,—a philosopher, in my judgment, of consummate erudition. Apollonius, inflamed with zeal for the glory of your actions, is greatly desirous of recording them in Greek, and I think him very capable of the undertaking. He has an excellent genius, and has been particularly conversant in studies of the historical kind, as he is wonderfully ambitious, likewise, of doing justice to your immortal fame. These are my sincere sentiments of the man; but how far he deserves them your own superior judgment will best determine. But though I told Apollonius that I should not particularly recommend him to your favour, yet I cannot forbear assuring you, that every instance of your generosity towards him will extremely oblige me. Farewell.

LETTER XXVI.
Quintus Cicero to Marcus Cicero. I protest to you, my dear brother, you have performed an act extremely agreeable to me, in giving Tiro his freedom; as a state of servitude was a situation far unworthy of his merit. Believe me I felt the highest complacency when I found, by his letter and yours, that you rather chose we should look upon him in the number of our friends than in that of our slaves; and I both congratulate and thank you for this instance of your generosity towards him. If I receive so much satisfaction from the services of my freedman Statins, how much more valuable must the same good qualities appear in Tiro, as they have the additional advantage of his learning, his wit, and his politeness, to recommend them! I have many powerful motives for the affection I bear you; and this mark of your benevolence to Tiro, together with your giving me part (as, indeed, you had reason) in the family joy upon this occasion, still increases the number. In a word, I saw and admired all the amiable qualities of your heart in the letter you wrote to me on this subject.

I have promised my best services to the slaves of Sabinius; and it is a promise I will most assuredly make good. Farewell.

LETTER XXVII.
To Res. Licinius Aristoteles, a native of Melita, is not only my old host, but my very particular friend. These are circumstances, I doubt not, that will sufficiently recommend him to your favour; as, in truth, I have experienced, by many instances, that my applications of this sort always have much weight with you. Caesar, in compliance with my solicitations, has granted him a pardon; for I should have told you that he was deeply engaged in the same cause with myself. He persevered in it, indeed, much longer; which, if I am persuaded, will recommend him so much the more to your esteem. Let me entreat you, then, to show him, by your good offices, that this letter proved greatly to his advantage. Farewell.

LETTER I.
To Tiro.
Your letter encourages me to hope that you find yourself better. I am so, at least I most sincerely wish that you may. I entreat you, therefore, to consecrate all your cares to that end, and by no means indulge so mistaken a suspicion as that I am displeased you are not with me. With me you are, in the best sense of that expression, if you are taking care of your health,—which I had much rather you should attend than on myself. For though I always both see and hear you with pleasure, that pleasure will be greatly increased when I shall have the satisfaction, at the same time, to be assured that you are perfectly well.

My work is at present suspended, as I cannot make use of my own hand; however, I employ myself a good deal in reading. If your transcribers should be puzzled with my manuscript, I beg you would give them your assistance; as, indeed, there is an interlusion relating to a circumstance in Cato’s behaviour, when he was only four years of age, that I could scarce decipher myself. You will continue your care, likewise, that the dining-room he in proper order for the

1 Pindarch mentions several instances in the life of Cato, wherein that consummate patriot had given very early indications of his resolute and inflexible spirit. But the most remarkable, and probably the same which Cicero had celebrated in the passage he is here speaking of, was one that happened when Cato was in the house of his uncle, Livius Drusus, who had taken upon himself the care of his education. At that time the several states of Italy, in alliance with the republic, were strenuously soliciting the privileges of Roman citizens; and Pompeius Silo, a person of great note, who came to Rome in order to prosecute this affair, was the guest of Drusus. As Pompeius was one day amusing himself with the children of the family, “Well, young gentleman,” said he, addressing himself particularly to the little Cato and his brother, “I hope you will use your interest with your uncle, to give his vote in our favour.” The latter very readily answered in the affirmative, while Cato signified his refusal, by fixing his eyes sternly upon Pompeius, without saying a single word in reply. Pompeius, snatching him up in his arms, ran with him to the window, and, in a pretended rage, threatened to throw him out, if he did not immediately yield to his request. But in vain: nature had not formed the atroce animum Catosi of a texture to be menaced out of its purposes. Accordingly Pompeius was so struck with that early symptom of an undaunted spirit, that he could not forbear saying to some of his friends who were reception of our guests,—in which number I dare say I may reckon Tertius, provided Publius be not invited.

That strange fellow Demetrius was always, I know, the very reverse of his namesake, of Phaleris! but I find he is now grown more insufferable than ever, and is degenerated into an arrant Bilious. I resign the management of him, therefore, entirely into your hands, and you will pay your court to him accordingly. But, however,— d'ye see,—and as to that,—(to present you with a few of his own elegant expletives) if you should have any conversation with him, let me know, that it may furnish me with the subject of a letter, and at the same time afford me the pleasure of reading so much longer a one from yourself. In the meanwhile take care of your health, my dear Tiro, I conjure you, and be well persuaded that you cannot render me a more pleasing service. Farewell.

LETTER II.
To Dolabella.

Oh! that the silence you so kindly regret had been occasioned by my own death rather than by the severe loss I have suffered; a loss I should be better able to support, if I had you with me—for your judicious counsels and singular affection towards me would greatly con- tribute to alleviate its weight. This good office, indeed, I may yet perhaps receive; for, as I imagine we shall soon see you here, you will find me still so deeply affected as to have an opportunity of affording me great assistance; not that this affliction has so broken my spirit as to render me unmindful of present. “How happy will it be for Italy if this boy should live! For my part,” continued he, “I am well persuaded, if he were a new man, we should not be able to procure a single suffrage throughout all Rome.”—Pest in Vit. Caton. Illus.

Demetrius, surnamed Phalerus, from Phaleris, a seaport town in Greece, was a celebrated orator, who flourished about three centuries before the birth of Christ.

Who this person and Demetrius were is utterly unknown; but it is probable that the ridiculous part of their characters, to which Cicero here alludes, was that of being very dull and inelegant orators.

He was at this time with Caesar in Spain.

The death of his daughter Tullia. It appears by a former letter that she had lately lain-in at Rome, from whence she was probably removed, for the benefit of the air, to her father's Tusculan villa, where she seems to have died. This letter furnishes a presumptive argument against the opinion of those who imagine that Dolabella and Tullia were never actually divorced. For, in the first place, not-withstanding it appears that there was some distance of time between the accident of her death and the present epistle, yet it seems to have been the first letter which Cicero had written to Dolabella upon the occasion. Now it is altogether improbable, if the marriage had subsisted, that Cicero should not have given him immediate notice of an event in which, if not from affection, at least from interest, he would have been greatly concerned. In the next place it is equally improbable, supposing there had been no divorce, that Cicero could speak of this misfor- tune only in general and distant terms, as he does through-out this whole letter, without so much as mentioning the name of Tullia, or intimating even the remotest hint of any connexion between her and Dolabella. But the following letter will supply a farther and more positive argu- ment against the opinion above-mentioned. See rem. 4 on the next letter.—Ad Att. xii. 45, 46.

that I am a man, or apprehensive that I must totally sink under its pressure. But all that cheer-fulness and vivacity of temper which you once so particularly admired has now, alas! entirely forsaken me. My fortitude and resolution, never-\ntheless, (if these virtues were ever mine) I still retain, and retain them too in the same vigour as when you last saw me.

As to those battles which, you tell me, you have sustained upon my account, I am far less solicitous that you should confute my detractors?, than that the world should know (as it unquestionably does) that I enjoy a place in your affection; and may you still continue to render that truth conspicuous. To this request I will add another, and entreat you to excuse me for not sending you a longer letter. I shorten it, not only as imagining we shall soon meet, but because my mind is at present by no means sufficiently composed for writing. Farewell.

LETTER III.
Servius Sulpicius to Cicero.

I receive the news of your daughter's death with all the concern it so justly deserves; and, indeed, I cannot but consider it as a misfortune in which I bear an equal share with yourself. If I had been near you when this fatal accident happened, I should not only have mingled my tears with yours, but assisted you with all the consolation in my power. I am sensible, at the same time, that offices of this kind afford at best but a wretched relief; for as none are qualified to perform them but those who stand near to us by the ties either of blood or affection, such persons are generally too much afflicted themselves to be capable of administering comfort to others. Never-\ntheless, I thought proper to suggest a few reflections which occurred to me upon this occasion; not as imagining they would be new to you, but believing that, in your present discomposure of mind, they might possibly have escaped your attention. Tell me then, my friend, wherefore do you indulge this excess of sorrow? Reflect, I entreat you, in what manner fortune has dealt with every one of us; that she has deprived us of what ought to be no less dear than our children, and overwhelmed in one general ruin our honours, our liberties, and our country; and, after these losses, is it possible that any other should increase our tears? Is it possible that a mind long exercised in calamities so truly severe should not become totally callous and indifferent to every event? But you will tell me, perhaps, that your grief arises not so much on your own account as on that of Tullia. Yet surely you must often, as well as myself, have had occasion in these wretched times to reflect that their condition by no means deserves to be regretted.

p The person to whom Cicero alludes was, in all proba-\nbility, his own nephew, who was at this time in the army with Caesar. This young man had taken great liberties with his uncle's character, aspersing it upon all occasions, and in all companies: in particular (and what gave Cicero the greatest meanness), he attempted to inflame a suspicion among the principal officers of the army, that Cicero was a man of dangerous designs, and one against whom Caesar ought to be particularly upon his guard.—Ad Att. xii. 38; xiii. 37.
whom death has gently removed from this unhappy scene. What is there, let me ask, in the present circumstances of our country, that could have rendered life greatly desirable to your daughter? What pleasing hopes, what agreeable views, what rational satisfaction, could she possibly have proposed to herself from a more extended period? Was it in the prospect of conjugal happiness, in the society of some distinguished youths? As if, indeed, you could have found a son-in-law amongst our present set of young men worthy of being entrusted with the care of your daughter! Or was it in the expectation of being the joyful mother of a flourishing race, who might possess their patriotism with independence, who might gradually rise through the several dignities of the state, and exert the liberty to which they were born in the service and defence of their friends and country? But is there amongst all these desirable privileges, of which we were not deprived, before she was in a capacity of transmitting them to her descendants? Yet, after all, you may still allege, perhaps, that the loss of our children is a severe affliction; and unquestionably it would be so, if it were not a much greater to see them live to endure those indignities which their parents suffer in the daily reflection which, as it afforded great relief to the disquietude of my own heart, it may possibly contribute, likewise, to assuage the anguish of yours. In my return out of Asia, as I was sailing from Ægina towards Megara, I amused myself with contemplating the circumjacent countries. Behind me lay Ægina, before me Megara; on my right I saw Piræus, and on my left Corinth. These cities, once so flourishing and magnificent, now presented nothing to my view but a sad spectacle of desolation. "Alas! (I said to myself,) shall such a short-lived creature as man complain when one of his species falls either by the hand of violence or by the common course of nature, whilst in this narrow compass so many great and glorious cities, formed for a much longer duration, thus lie extended in ruins? Remember, then, oh my heart! the general lot to which man is born, and let that thought suppress thy un

4 This passage seems strongly to intimate, that the marriage between Dolabella and Tullia was actually dissolved before her death. It must be acknowledged, however, that a very learned and accurate critic is of opinion that the affirmative side of this question can no more be proved from these words of Sulpicius, than it can be inferred from those which he immediately adds, _ut et liberæ ex eee parente_, that Tullia died without issue, which it is well known she did not. But there seems to be this difference between the two instances, that with respect to the latter, Sulpicius might very properly put the question he there does, notwithstanding Tullia's having left a son; for where she had an heir, she might reasonably indulge the expectation of having more; whereas, with regard to the former, would it not have been highly injurious to her character if Sulpicius had argued from a support which implied that Tullia entertained thoughts of another husband, whilst her marriage with Dolabella was still subsisting?—Vide epist. * One of the finest and most elegant of all writers, either ancient or modern, has given us some reflections which arose in his mind, walking amongst the tombs of the dead in Westminster Abbey, which, as they are not altogether foreign to the subject of this letter, the reader, perhaps, will indulge me in the pleasure of producing, as a sort of corollaries to the sentiments of Sulpicius:—"When I look upon the tombs of the great, "says the incomparable Addison, "every emotion of envy dies within me; when I read the epitaphs of the beautiful, every inordinate desire goes out; when I meet with the grief of parents upon a tombstone, my heart melts with compassion; when I see the tomb of the parents themselves, I consider the vanity of grieving for those whom we must quickly follow; when I see kings lying by those who deplored them; when I consider rival wits, placed side by side, or the holy men that divided the world with their contests and disputes, I reflect with sorrow and astonishment on the little competitions, factions, and debates of mankind. When I read the several dates of the tombs, of some that died yesterday, and some six hundred years ago, I consider that great day when we shall all of us be contemporaries and make our appearances together."—Spectator, vol. i. No. 26.

means desire you should abandon yourself to this excess of grief. Restrain it then, I conjure you, for her sake, and for the sake of the rest of your family and friends, who lament to see you thus afflicted. Restrain it too, I beseech you, for the sake of your country; that whenever the opportunity shall serve, it may reap the benefit of your counsels and assistance. In short, since such is our fortune, that we must necessarily submit to the present system of public affairs, suffer it not to be suspected that it is not so much the death of your daughter as the fate of the republic and the success of our victors that you deplore.

But it would be ill-manners to dwell any longer upon this subject, as I should seem to question the efficacy of your own good sense. I will only add, therefore, that as we have often seen you bear prosperity in the noblest manner, and with the highest applause, show us, likewise, that you are not too sensitive of adversity, but know how to support it with the same advantage to your character. In a word, let it not be said that fortitude is the single virtue to which my friend is a stranger. As for what concerns myself, I will send you an account of the state of this province, and of what is transacting in this part of the world, as soon as I shall hear that you are sufficiently composed to receive the information. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Servius Sulpicius.

I JOIN with you, my dear Sulpicius, in wishing that you had been in Rome when this most severe calamity befell me. I am sensible of the advantage I should have received from your presence, and I had almost said your equal participation of my grief, by finding myself somewhat more composed after I had read your letter. It furnished me, indeed, with arguments extremely proper to soothe the anguish of affliction, and evidently flowed from a heart that sympathized with the sorrows it endeavoured to assuage. But although I could not enjoy the benefit of your own good offices in person, I had the advantage, however, of your son's, who gave me a proof, by every tender assistance that could be contributed upon so melancholy an occasion, how much he imagined that he was acting agreeably to your sentiments when he thus discovered the affection of his own. More pleasing instances of his friendship I have frequently received, but never any that were more obliging. As to those for which I am indebted to yourself, it is not only the force of your reasonings, and the very considerable share you take in my afflictions, that have contributed to compose my mind; it is the deference, likewise, which I always pay to the authority of your sentiments. For, knowing as I perfectly do the superior wisdom with which you are enlightened, I should be ashamed not to support my distresses in the manner you think I ought: I will acknowledge, nevertheless, that they sometimes almost entirely overcome me; and I am scarce able to resist the force of my grief when I reflect, that I am destitute of those consolations which attended others, whose examples I propose to my imitation. Thus Quintus Maximus 7 lost a son of consular rank, and distinguished by many brave and illustrious actions; Lucius Paulus 8 was deprived of two sons in the space of a single week; and your relation Gallus, 9 together with Marcus Catoc, had both of them the unhappiness to survive their respective sons, who were endowed with the highest abilities and virtues. Yet these unfortunate parents lived in times when the honours they derived from the republic might, in some measure, alleviate the weight of their domestic misfortunes. But as for myself, after having been stripped of those dignities you mention, and which I had acquired by the most laborious exertion of my abilities, I had one only consolation remaining,—and of that I am now bereaved! I could no longer divert the disquietude of my thoughts, by employing myself in the causes of my friends or the business of the state; for I could no longer, with any satisfaction, appear either in the forum or the senate. In short, I justly considered myself as cut off from the benefit of all those alleviating operations which fortune and industry had qualified me to 7 Quintus Fabius Maximus, so well known for his brave and judicious conduct in opposing the progress of Hannibal's arms in Europe, and at the same time advanced to the consulship of the year 455. At the expiration of his fourth consulate, he was succeeded in that office by his son, Marcus Fabius, who likewise distinguished himself by his military achievements. It does not appear when or by what accident Marcus died; but his illustrious father was so much master of his grief upon that occasion, as to pronounce a funeral eulogy in honour of his son before a general assembly of the people.—Liv. xxiv. 43; Plut. in Vit. Fab. 4.

8 A very few days before Paulus Emilius made his public entry into Rome, in the year 655, on occasion of his victory over Perseus, he had the misfortune to lose one of his sons; and this calamity was succeeded by another of the same kind, which befell him about as many days after his triumph.—Liv. xxxiv. 41.

9 Hannibal conjectures, that the person here mentioned is Catus Sulpicius Gallus, who was consul in the year 586.

The Censor. His son was praetor in the year of Rome 638, and died whilst he was in the administration of that office. I cannot forbear transcribing upon this occasion a noble passage from Cicero's treatise concerning old age, as I find it extremely well translated to my hand, by a late ingenious writer (Mr. Hughes, if I mistake not) in the Spectator. Our author represents Cato as no more than a low and humble man, thrown into the following rapture at the thoughts of his approaching dissolution:— "O happy day," says this amiable moralist, "when I shall escape from this crowd, this heap of pollution, and be admitted to that divine assembly of exalted spirits! when I shall go to my Cato, my son; than whom a better man was never born, and whose funeral rites I myself performed; whereas, he ought rather to have attended mine. Yet has not his soul deserted me, but seeming to cast a look on me, is gone before to those habitations to which it was sensible I should follow him. And though I might appear to have borne my loss with courage, I was not unaffected with it; but I comforted myself in the assurance that it would not be long before we should meet again, and he divorced no more."—Plut. Annal. ii. 69; Plut. in Vit. Eaten.; Cic. de Senect. 52; Spectator, vol. vii. No. 537.

Sulpicius has drawn, together, in this admired letter, whatever human philosophy has of force to compose the perturbations of a mind under the disquietude of severe afflictions. But it is evident that all arguments of the sort here produced tend rather to silence the clamours of sorrow, than to soften and subdue its anguish. It is a much more exalted philosophy, indeed, that must supply the effectual remedies for this purpose; to which no other but the grace of Christianity alone will be found, on the trial, to be in any rational degree sufficient.
engage. But I considered, too, that this was a deprivation which I suffered in common with yourself and some others; and, whilst I was endeavouring to reconcile my mind to a patient endurance of those ills, there was no one but the public officer by whom I could have received the advice, and in the sweetness of whose conversation I could discharge all the cares and anxiety of my heart. But this last fatal stab to my peace has torn open those wounda which seemed in some measure to have been tolerably healed: for I can now no longer lose my private sorrows in the prosperity of the commonwealth, as I was wont to dispel the uneasiness I suffered upon the public account, in the happiness I received at home. Accordingly, I have equally banished myself from my house and from the public,—as finding no relief in either from the calamities I lamented in both. It is this, therefore, that heightens my desire of seeing you here; as nothing can afford me a more effectual consolation than the renewal of our friendly intercourse; a happiness which I hope, and am informed indeed, that I shall shortly enjoy. Among the many reasons I have for impatiently wishing your arrival, one is, that we may previously concert together our scheme of conduct in the present conjuncture,—which, however, must now be entirely accommodated to another’s will. This person, it is true, is a man of great abilities and generosity, and, one, if I mistake not, who is by no means my enemy,—as I am sure he is extremely your friend. Nevertheless, it requires much consideration, I do not say in what manner we shall act with respect to public affairs, but by what methods we may best obtain his permission to retire from them. Farewell.

LETTER V.

To Lucius Lucceius.*

All the letters I have received from you upon the subject of my late misfortune, were extremely acceptable to me, as instances of the highest affection and good sense. But the great advantage I have derived from them, principally results from that animating contempt with which you look down upon human affairs, and that exemplary fortitude which arms you against all the various assaults of fortune. I esteem it the most glorious privilege of philosophy, to be thus superior to external accidents, and to depend for happiness on ourselves alone: a sentiment which, although it was too deeply planted in my heart to be totally eradicated, has been somewhat weakened, I confess, by the violence of those repeated storms to which I have been lately exposed. But you have endeavoured, and with great success indeed, to restore it to all its usual strength and vigour. I cannot, therefore, either too often or too strongly assure you, that nothing could give me a higher satisfaction than your letter. But, powerful as the various arguments of consolation are which you have collected for my use, and elegantly as you have enforced them, I must acknowledge, that nothing proved more effectual than that firmness of mind which I remarked in your letters, and which I should esteem as the utmost reproach not to imitate. But, if I imitate, I must necessarily emulate and instruct in this lesson of fortitude; for I am altogether unsupported by the same hopes which I find you entertain, that public affairs will improve. Those illustrations, indeed, which you draw from the gladiatorial combats, together with the whole tendency of your reasoning in general, all concur in forbidding me to despair of the commonwealth. It would be nothing extraordinary, therefore, if you should be more composed than myself whilst you are in possession of these pleasing hopes; the only wonder is, how you can possibly entertain any. For, say, my friend, what is there of our constitution that is not utterly subverted? Look round the republic and tell me (you who so well understand the nature of our government), what part of it remains unbroken or unimpaired? Most unquestionably there is not one; as I would prove in detail, if I imagined my own discourse capable of any sureness. And, as I have absolutely none; and shall, therefore, in pursuance of your advice, preserve my spirits even in the midst of despair. The pleasing recollection of those actions you recite to my remembrance, and which, indeed, I performed chiefly by your encouragement and recommendation, will greatly contribute to this end. To say the truth, I have done everything for the service of my country that I ought, and more than could have been expected from the courage and counsels of any man. You will pardon me, I hope, for speaking in this advantageous manner of my own conduct, but, as you advise me to alleviate my present uneasiness by a retrospect of my past actions, I will confess, that, in thus commemorating them, I find great consolation.

I shall punctually observe your admonitions, by calling off my mind as much as possible from everything that may disturb its peace, and fixing it on those speculations which are at once an ornament to prosperity, and the support of adversity. For this purpose, I shall endeavour to spend as much of my time with you as our health and years will mutually permit; and, if we cannot meet so often as I am sure we both wish, we shall always at least seem present to each other by a sympathy of hearts, and a union in the same philosophical contemplations. Farewell.

* Manutius supposes, with great probability, that Lucceius, in the letter to which this is an answer, had endeavoured to persuade Cicero not to despair of better times, by reminding him of what sometimes happened at the gladiatorial shows, where it was not unusual to see a combatant that seemed almost entirely vanquished, unexpectedly recover his ground, and gain the day from his antagonist.
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

LETTER VI.

Lucius to Cicero.

I SHALL rejoice to hear that you are well. As to my own health, it is much as usual; or, rather, I think, somewhat worse.

I have frequently called at your door, and am much surprised to find that you have not been in Rome since Caesar left it. What is it that so strongly draws you from hence? If any of your usual engagements of the literary kind renders you thus enamoured of solitude, I am so far from condemning your retirement, that I think of it with pleasure. There is no sort of life, indeed, that can be more agreeable, not only in times so disturbed as the present, but even in those of the most desirable calm and serenity; especially to a mind like yours, which may have occasion for repose from its public labours, and which is always capable of producing something that will afford both pleasure to others and honour to yourself. But if you have withdrawn from the world, in order to give a free vent to those terrors which you so immoderately indulged when you were here, I shall lament indeed your grief; but (if you will allow me to speak the truth) I never can exorcise it. For tell me, my friend, is it possible that a man of your uncommon discernment should not perceive what is obvious to all mankind? Is it possible you can be ignorant that your perpetual complaints can profit nothing, and only serve to increase those disquietudes which your good sense requires you to subdue? But, if arguments cannot prevail, entreaties perhaps may. Let me conjure you, then, by all the regard you bear me, to dispel this gloom that hangs upon your heart; to return to that society and to those occupations which were either common to us both or peculiar to yourself. But though I would fain dissuade you from continuing your present way of life, yet I would by no means suffer my zeal to be troublesome. In the difficulty, therefore, of steering between these two inclinations, I will only add my request that you would either comply with my advice, or excuse me for offering it. Farewell.

LETTER VII.

To Lucius Luceius.

Every part of your last letter glazed with that warmth of friendship, which, though it was by no means new to me, I could not but observe with peculiar satisfaction; I would say pleasure, if that were not a word to which I have now for ever hidden adieu. Not merely, however, for the cause you suspect, and for which, under the gentleness and most affectionate terms, you, in fact, very severely reproach me; but because all that ought in reason to assuage the anguish of so deep a wound is absolutely no more. For whither shall I fly for consolation? Is it to the bosom of my friends? But tell me (for we have generally shared the same common amities together), how few of that number are remaining? how few that have not perished by the sword, or that are not become strangely insensible? You will say, perhaps, that I might seek my relief in your society; and there, indeed, I would willingly seek it. The same habits and studies, a long intercourse of friendship,—in short, is there any sort of bond, any single circumstance of connexion wanting to unite us together! Why then are we such strangers to one another? For my own part, I know not; but this I know, that we have hitherto seldom met, I do not say in Rome, where the forum usually brings everybody together, but when we were near neighbours at Tusculum and Puteoli.

I know not by what ill fate it has happened that, at an age when I might expect to flourish in the greatest credit and dignity, I should find myself in so wretched a situation as to be ashamed that I am still in being. Despoiled, indeed, of every honour and every comfort that adorned my public life, or solaced my private, what is it that can now afford me any refuge? My books, I imagine you will tell me; and to these indeed I very assiduously apply. For, to what else can I possibly have recourse? Yet even these seem to exclude me from that peaceful port which I fain would reach, and reproach me, as it were, for prolonging that life which only increases my sorrows with my years. Can you wonder then that I absent myself from Rome, where there is nothing under my own roof to afford me any satisfaction, and where I abhor both public men and public measures, both the forum and the senate? For this reason it is, that I wear away my days in a total application to literary pursuits; not, indeed, as entertaining so vain a hope, that I may find in them a complete cure for my misfortunes, but in order to obtain, at least, some little respite from their bitter remembrance.

If those dangers with which we were daily menaced, had not formerly prevented both you and myself from reflecting with that coolness we ought, we should never have been thus separated. Had that proved to have been the case, we should both of us have spared ourselves much un easiness: as I should not have indulged so many groundless fears for your health, nor you for the consequences of my grief. Let us repair then this unlucky mistake as well as we may: and as nothing can be more suitable to both of us than the company of each other, I purpose to be with you in a few days. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

To Marcus Marcellus.

NOTWITHSTANDING that I have nothing new to communicate to you, and am in expectation of a letter from you very shortly, or rather, indeed, of seeing you in person; yet I would not suffer Theophilus to go away without sending you a line or two by his hands. Let me entreat you then to return amongst us as soon as possible; and, be assured, you are impatiently expected, not only by myself and the rest of your friends, but by all Rome in general. I am some-

The forum was a place of general resort for the whole city. It was here that the lawyers pleaded their causes, that the poets recited their works, and that funeral orations were spoken in honour of the dead. It was here, in short, everything was going forward that could engage the active, or amuse the idle.—Hor. lib. i. sat. iv, 74, sat. vi. 42.

times, however, inclined to fear that you will not be extremely forward to hasten your journey: and, indeed, if you were possessed of no other sense but that of seeing, I could easily excuse you if there are some persons whom you would choose to avoid. But as the difference is very inconsiderable between hearing and being a spectator of what one disapproves; and as I am persuaded it is of great consequence, both in respect to your private affairs as well as upon every other consideration, that you should expedite your return, I thought it incumbent upon me to tell you so. And now, having acquainted you with my sentiments, the rest be left to your own determination; but I should be glad to know, however, when we may expect you. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

To Tiro.

BELIEVE me, my dear Tiro, I am greatly anxious for your health; however, if you persevere in the same cautious regimen which you have hitherto observed, you will soon, I trust, be well. As to my library, I beg you would put the books in order, and take a catalogue of them, when your physician shall give you his consent, for it is by his directions you must now be governed. With respect to the gardener, I leave you to adjust matters as you shall judge proper.

I think you might come to Rome on the first of next month, in order to see the gladiatorial combats, and return the following day, but let this be entirely as is most agreeable to your own inclinations. In the mean time, if you have any affection for me, take care of your health. Farewell.

LETTER X.

Servius Sulpicius to Cicero.

The news I am going to acquaint you with, will, I am sure, prove extremely un迎来; yet, as you cannot but in some measure be prepared for it, by being sensible that every man’s life is subject to casualties, as well as to the general laws of nature, I thought proper to send you a circumstantial account of the unhappy accident that has lately happened.

I arrived at Piraeus, from Epidaurus, on the 29d instant; where I continued all that day merely to enjoy the company of my colleague, Marcellus. The next day I took my leave of him, with an intention of going from Athens into Boeotia, in order to finish the remainder of my circuit, and I left him in the resolution, as he told me, of sailing to Italy by the way of Malia. The day following, as I was preparing to set out from Athens, his friend Posthumius came to me about four in the morning, and informed me Marcellus had been stabbed the night before by Magius Cilo, whilst they were sitting together. That he had received wounds from a dagger, one of which was in his breast, and the other under his ear, but that neither of them, he hoped, was mortal. He added, that Magius, after having committed this barbarous action, immediately killed himself, and that Marcellus had despatched him in order to give me this account, and likewise to desire that I would direct my physicians to attend him. This I instantly did, and followed them myself as soon as it was light. But when I had almost reached Piraeus I met a servant of Acidanus, with a note to acquaint me that our friend expired a little before day-break. Thus did the noble Marcellus unworthily fall by the hand of a villainous assassin; and he whose life his very enemies had spared in reverence to his illustrious virtues, met with an executioner at last in his own friend! However, I proceeded to his pavilion, where I found on two of his freedmen and a few slaves, the rest I was told having fled in apprehension of the consequences in which they might be involved by this murder of their master. I was obliged to place the body of Marcellus in the same sedan that brought me, and to make my chairmen carry it into Athens, where I paid him all the funeral honours that city could supply, which indeed were not inconsiderable. But I could not prevail with the Athenians to suffer him to be buried within their walls, a privilege they assured me which their religious ordinances would by no means admit. They granted me, however, what was the next honour, and which they had never permitted to any stranger before; they allowed me to deposit his ashes in any of the Gymnasia I should think proper. Accordingly, I fixed upon a spot belonging to the Academy, one of the noblest colleges in the whole world. In this place I caused a funeral pile to be erected, and afterwards persuaded the Athenians to raise a marble monument to his memory, at the public expense. Thus have I paid to my relation and colleague, both during his life and after his death, every friendly office he had a right to expect from me. Farewell.

a The reason which induced Cilo to murder his friend is not certainly known. It was suspected by some at Rome that it was at the secret instigation of Caesar; but the circumstance of Cilo immediately afterwards killing himself, renders that suspicion altogether improbable, and seems to determine the matter personal and perhaps sudden resentment.—Ad Att. xii. 10.

But, famous as it was, it was purchased in the 100th year, and dedicated to the public for the convenience of walks and exercises for the citizens of Athens, and was gradually improved by the rich, who had received benefit or pleasure from it, with plantations of groves, stately ports, and commodious apartments for the professors of the academic school."—Middleton’s Life of Cicero, p. 309, note 5.
LETTER XI.
To Tiro.

I impatiently expect a letter from you, upon affairs of many and various kinds; but it is with much greater impatience, however, that I expect yourself. In the mean time, endeavour to gain Demetrius over to my interest, and to obtain whatever other advantage you shall be able. I know your care is not wanting to recover the money which is owing to me from Anthus; but I beg you would be as expeditious in that matter as possible. If it is upon that account you delay your return, I admit it to be a good reason; if not, fly hither, I charge you, with the utmost speed. To repeat it once more, I expect a letter from you with great impatience. Farewell.

LETTER XII.
Vatinius to Cicero.

If you have not renounced your usual custom of defending the cause of your friends, an old client of yours desires to engage you as his advocate; and, as you formerly protected him in his humiliation, I dare say you will not now abandon him in his glory. Whose aid, indeed, can I so properly invoke upon the occasion of my victories, as that generous friend's who first taught me how to vanquish? Can I doubt, that he who had the courage to withstand a combination of the most powerful men in Rome, who had conspired my ruin, will not be able to beat down the envious and malignant efforts of a little contemptible party that may endeavour to oppose my honors? If I still, then, retain the share I once enjoyed of your friendship, take me, I entreat you, wholly under your protection, as one whose dignities it is incumbent upon you both to support and advance. You are sensible that I have many enemies, whose malevolence I have in no sort deserved; but what avails innocence against so unaccountable a fate? If these, therefore, should any of them attempt to obstruct the honors I am soliciting, I conjure you to exert your generous offices, as usual, in defence of your client. In the mean time, you will find, at the bottom of this letter, a copy of the despatches I send by this express to the senate, concerning the success of my arms.

Being informed that the slave whom you employ as your reader had eloped from you into the country of the Vardae, I have caused diligent search to be made after him, although I did not receive your commands for that purpose. I doubt not of recovering him, unless he should take refuge in Dalmatia; and even in that case, I do not entirely despair. Farewell, and continue to love me.

From the camp at Narona, July the 11th,

LETTER XIII.
To Tiro.

You are not mistaken in supposing me desirous of your company; but, indeed, I am extremely apprehensive of your venturing upon so long a journey. The abstinence you have been obliged to observe, the evacuations you have undergone, together with the violence of your distemper itself, have too much impaired your strength for so great a fatigue; and any negligence after disorders so severe as yours, is generally attended with consequences of the most dangerous kind. You cannot reach Cuma in less than two days, and it will cost you five more to complete your expedition. But I purpose to be with you at Formia towards the end of this month; and, I hope, my dear Tiro, it will not be your fault if I should not have the satisfaction of finding you perfectly recovered.

My studies languish for want of your assistance; however, the letter you sent by Acustus has somewhat enlivened them. Pompeius is now here, and presses me much to read to him some of my compositions: but I jocosely, though at the same time truly, assure him, that all my muses are silent in your absence. I hope, therefore, you will prepare to attend them with your usual good offices. You may depend upon mine in the article, and at the time I promised: for as I taught you the etymology of the word fides, be assured I shall act up to its full import. Take care, I charge you, to re-establish your health; mine is perfectly well. Adieu.

LETTER XIV.
To Varro.

To importune the execution of a promise, is a sort of ill-manners, of which the populace themselves, unless they are particularly instigated for that purpose, are seldom guilty. I cannot, however, forbear, I will not say to demand, but to remind you of a favour, which you long since gave me reason to expect. To this end, I have sent you four admonitors; but admonitors, perhaps, whom you will not lock up as extremly modest. They are certain philosophers, whom I have chosen from among the disciples of the later Academy; and confidence, you know, is the cha-characteristic of this sect*. I am apprehensive, therefore, that you may consider them as so many important daws, when my meaning only is, that they should present themselves before you as modest petitioners. But to drop my metaphor, I have long denied myself the satisfaction of addressing to you some of my works, in expectation of receiving a compliment of the same kind from yourself. I waited, therefore, in order to make you a return, as nearly as possible, of the same nature. But, as I am willing to impute your delaying this favour to the desire of rendering it so much the more perfect, I could no longer refrain from telling the world, in the best manner I was able, that we are united both in our affections and in our studies. With this view, I have drawn up a dialogue which I suppose to have passed between you and myself, in conjunction with Atticus, and have laid the scene in your Cuman villa. The part I have assigned to you, is to defend (what, if I mistake not, you approve) the sentiments of Anti-ocbus b; as I have chosen myself to maintain the principles of Philo c. You will wonder to find, perhaps, in the perusal of this piece, that I have represented a conversation, which, in truth, we never had; but you must remember the privilege which dialogue writers have always assumed.
And now, my dear Varro, let me hope that we shall hereafter enjoy together many of these philosophical conversations. If we have too long neglected them, the public occupations in which we were engaged must be our apology; but the time is now arrived when we have no such excuse to plead. May we, then, exercise these speculations together, under a fixed and peaceable government, at least, if not under one of the most eligible kind!
Though, indeed, if that were to prove the case, far other employments would engage our honourable labours. But, as affairs are at present situated, what is there else that can render life desirable?
For my own part, it is with difficulty I endure it, even with all the advantages of their powerful assistance; but, without them, it would be utterly insupportable. But we shall talk farther and frequently upon this subject when we meet; in the meantime, I give you joy of the new habitation you have purchased, and highly approve of your removal. Farewell.

principal dispute between them, seems to have related to propositions were certain; the latter, that none were more ciples of the New Academy. Antiochus, mentioned in the preceding note, had been bred up under him, though he afterwards became a vehement opponent of the sect. Cicero took the sceptical part in this dialogue, not as being agreeable to his own sentiments, but in order to pay Varro the greater compliment of maintaining the more rational opinion.— Academ. ubi nesp. ; Ad Att. xiii. 19.

LETTER XV.
To Tiro.

WHY should you not direct your letters to me with the familiar superscription which one friend generally uses to another? However, if 1. v. 708. you are unwilling to hazard the envy which this privilege may draw upon you, be it as you think proper; though, for my own part, it is a maxim which I have generally purused with respect to myself, to treat envy with the utmost disregard.
I refuse, therefore, to have carried so much benefit by your indulgence; and should the air of Tusculum be attended with the same happy effect, how infinitely will it increase my fondness for that favourite scene! If you love me, then, (and if you do not, you are undoubtedly the most successful of all dissemblers) consecrate your whole time to the care of your health; which, hitherto, indeed, your assiduous attendance upon myself has but too much prevented. You well know the rules which it is necessary you should observe for this purpose, and I need not tell you that your diet should be light, and your exercises moderate; that you should keep your body open, and your mind amused. Be it your care, in short, to return to me perfectly recovered, and I shall ever afterwards not only love you, but Tusculum so much the more ardently.

I wish you could prevail with your neighbour to take my garden, as it will be the most effectual means of vexing that rascal Helico. This fellow, even though he paid a thousand sesterces* for the rest of a piece of cold, barren ground, that had not so much as a wall or a shed upon it, or was supplied with a single drop of water, has yet the assurance to laugh at the price I require for mine, notwithstanding all the money I have laid out upon improvements. But let it be your business to spirit the man into our terms, as it shall be mine to make the same artful attack upon Otho.

Let me know what you have done with respect to the fountain; though, possibly, this wet season may now have over-supplied it with water. If the weather should prove fair, I will send the disl. together with the books you desire. But how happened it that you took none with you? Was it that you were employed in the critical disposition upon the model of your admired Sophocles? If so, I hope you will soon oblige the world with your performance.

Ligurius, Caesar's great favourite, is dead. He was a very worthy man, and much my friend. Let me know when I may expect you; in the mean time be careful of your health. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.
To Quintus Valerius Orca*

I HAVE the strongest attachment to the citizens of Volaterrae, as a body of men, who, having received great obligations from me, have abundantly returned them. Their good offices, indeed, have never been wanting in any

* About 86. of our money.

He was prior in the year of Rome 697, and at the expiration of his office obtained so much honour from Afrani, who came to possess the kingdom of Africa.
Upon the breaking out of the civil war, he took possession of Sardinia in the name of Caesar, by whom he was at this season of my life, whether of adversity or prosperity. But were I entirely void of all personal connexions with this community, I should, nevertheless, merely from my great affection towards yourself, and in return to that which I am sensible you equally bear for me, most earnestly recommend them to your protection; especially as they have, in some sort, a more than common claim to your justice. For, in the first place, the gods themselves seem to have interposed in their behalf, when they so wonderfully escaped from the persecutions of Sylla; and, in the next, the whole body of the Roman people expressed the warmest concern for their interest, when I stood forth as their advocate in my consulsip. For, when the tribunes were endeavouring to carry a most iniquitous law for the distribution of the lands belonging to this city, I found it extremely easy to persuade the republic to favour the rights of a community which fortune had so remarkably protected. And as Caesar, in the Agrarian law, which he procured during his first consulship, showed his approbation of the services I had thus performed for them, by expressly exempting their lands from all future impositions, I cannot suppose that he, who is perpetually displaying new instances of his generosity, should intend to resume those which his former bounty has bestowed. As you have followed, then, his party and his power with so much honour to yourself, it should seem agreeable to your usual prudence, to follow him likewise in this instance of his generosity, or certainly, at least, to leave this matter entirely to his own decision. One thing I am sure you can by no means doubt; and that is, whether you should wish to fix so worthy and so illustrious a corporation in your interest, who are distinguished for their inviolable adherence to their friends. Thus far I have endeavoured to persuade you to take these people under your protection, for your own sake; but, that you may not imagine I have no other plea to urge in their favour, I will now propose it also for mine. You cannot, in truth, confer upon me a more acceptable service, than by proving yourself the friend and guardian of their interests. I recommend, therefore, to your justice and humanity the possessions of a city which have been hitherto preserved by the peculiar providence of the gods, as well as by the particular favour of the most distinguished personages in the whole Roman commonwealth. If it were in my power as effectually to serve those who place themselves under my patronage as it once was, there is no good office I would not exert, there is no opposition I would not encounter, in order to assist the Volaterranians. But I flatter myself I have still the same interest with you, that I formerly enjoyed with the world in general. Let me entreat you, then, by all the powerful ties of our friendship, to give these citizens reason to look upon it as a time appointed one of the commissioners for dividing these estates with which he proposed, upon his return from Spain, to bestow the publick and fidelity of his soldiers—Fhil. Annal. ii. 384.

a It is in Tuscany.

b They held out a siege of two years against the troops of Sylla, who in vain endeavoured to compel them to submit to his edict for the confiscation of their lands—Quarter. Projected.

c The law alluded to seems to have been a branch of that proposed by Hailius, an account of which has been given in these remarks. See rem. 5, p. 307.
Cæsar has entrusted to your care. On the contrary, notwithstanding that the share I enjoy in your affection is so generally known as to occasion many applications to me, yet I would not be tempted, by any popular motives, to break in upon you in the execution of your office. However, I could not refuse the solicitations of Curtius, as he is one with whom I have been intimately connected from his earliest youth. I took a very considerable part in the misfortunes he suffered from the unjust persecution of Sylla; and when it seemed agreeable to the general sense of the people that my friend, together with the rest of those who in conjunction with himself had been deprived both of their fortunes and their country, should be restored at least to the latter, I assisted him for that purpose to the utmost of my power. Upon his return, he invested all that remained to him from this general wreck of his substance, in the purchase of an estate at Volaterræ; of which, if he should be dispossessed, I know not how he will support the senatorial rank to which Cæsar has lately advanced him. It would be an extreme hardship indeed if he should sink in wealth as he rises in honours; and it seems altogether inconsistent, that he should lose his estate in consequence of Cæsar’s general order for the distribution of these lands in question; at the same time, that, by his particular favour, he has gained a seat in the senate. But I will not allege all that I well might, for the equity of my friend’s cause, lest, by enlarging on the justice, I should seem to derogate from the favour of your compliance with my request. I only conjure you, to consider this affair of Curtius as my own; to protect his interest as you would mine in the same circumstances; and to be assured, that whatever services you shall thus confer upon my friend, I shall esteem as a personal obligation to myself. Farewell.

LETTER XIX.

To Fabius Gallus.

Instances of your friendship are perpetually meeting me wherever I turn; and I have lately, in particular, had occasion to experience them in regard to my affair with Tigellius. I perceive by your letter, that it has occasioned you much concern, and I am greatly obliged by this proof of your affection. But let me give you a short history how the case stands. It was Cipius, I think, that formerly said, “I am not asleep for every man’s;” neither am I, my dear Gallus, so meanly complaisant as to be the humble servant of every man. The truth of it is, to consider this affair of Curtius as my own; to protect his interest as you would mine in the same circumstances; and to be assured, that whatever services you shall thus confer upon my friend, I shall esteem as a personal obligation to myself. Farewell.

a This is the same person to whom the 11th letter of the first book is addressed.

Tigellius was an extravagant debauche, who, by his pleasantries, his skill in music, his agreeable voice, together with his other soft and fashionable qualifications, had extremely ingratiated himself with Cæsar.

Cipius was a complaisant husband, who, upon some occasions, would affect to nod, whilst his wife was awake and more agreeably employed. But a slave coming into the room when he was in one of these obliging slumbers, and attempting to carry off a flagon that stood upon the table, “Sirm,” says he, “non omnibus dormim.”

PLENIANCES in order to preserve my friendship with Cæsar’s favorites, that there is not one of them, except this Tigellius, who does not treat me with greater marks of respect than I ever received, even when I was thought to enjoy the highest popularity and power. But I think myself extremely fortunate in being upon ill terms with a man who is more corrupted than his own native air, and whose character is notorious, I suppose, to the whole world, by the poignant verses of the satiric Calvus. But to let you see upon what slight grounds he has taken offence, I had promised, you must know, to plead the cause of his grandfather Phæmeus, which I undertook, however, merely in friendship to the man himself. Accordingly, Phæmeas called upon me in order to tell me that the judge had fixed a day for his trial; which happened to be the very same on which I was obliged to attend as advocate for Sextius. I acquainted him, therefore, that I could not possibly give him my assistance at the time he mentioned; but that if any other had been appointed, I most assuredly would not have failed. Phæmeas, nevertheless, in the conscious pride no doubt of having a grandson that could pipe and sing to some purpose, left me with an air that seemed to speak indignation. And now, having thus stated my case, and shown you the injustice of this songster’s complaints, may I not properly say with the old proverb, “So many Sardinians, so many rival rogues.”

I beg you would send me your ™ Cato™, which I am extremely desirous of reading. It is, indeed, some reflection upon us both that I have not yet enjoyed that pleasure. Farewell.

LETTER XX.

To Cluvius.

In the visit which, agreeably to our friendship and that great respect with which you always treat me, I received from you upon your setting out for Gaul, we had some general dis

Tigellius was a native of Sardinia, an island noted for its noxious air. See rem. x. p. 480.

Fate seems to have decreed that Tigellius should not want a poet to deliver his character down to posterity: nor, although the verses of Calvus are lost, those of Horace remain, in which Tigellus is delineated with all those inimitable strokes of ridicule which distinguish the masterly hand of that poetical satirist.—Hor. Sat. i. 2 et 3.

The literal interpretation of this proverb is, “You have Sardinians to sell, each a greater rogue than the other;” but a shorter turn has been adopted in the translation, in order to bring it nearer to the conciseness of the proverbial style. This proverb took its rise (as Manutius observes) from the great number of Sardinian slaves with which the markets of Italy were overstocked, upon the reduction of that island by Titus Syracusius Gracchus, in the year of Rome 512.

The character of Cato was, at this time, the fashionable topic of declamation at Rome; and every man that pretended to genius cloaked his abode with the public with an invective or panegyric of the illustrious Roman, as party or patriotism directed his pen. In this respect, as well as in all others, Cato’s reputation seems to have been attended with every advantage that any man who is ambitious of a good name can desire; for the next honour to being applauded by the worthy, is to be abused by the worthless.

He was one of the commissioners nominated by Cæsar for settling the division of the lands for the purposes men-course relating to those estates in that province which are held of the city of Atella; and I then expressed how much I was concerned for the interest of that corporation. But in confidence of the singular affection you bear me, and in performance of a duty which it is incumbent upon me to discharge, I thought proper to write to you more fully upon this affair, as it is, indeed, of the last importance to a community with which I have the strongest connexions. I am very sensible, at the same time, both of the occasion and extent of your commission,—and that Caesar has not entrusted you, in the execution of it, with any discretionary power. I limit my request, therefore, by what I imagine is no less within the bounds of your authority, than I am persuaded it is not beyond what you would be willing to do for my sake. In the first place, then, I entreat you to believe, what is truly the fact, that the whole revenues of this corporation arise from these lands in question, and that the heavy impositions with which they are at present burdened, have laid them under the greatest difficulties. But although, in this respect, they may seem to be in no worse condition than many other cities in Italy; yet, believe me, their case is unhappily distinguished by several calamitous circumstances. In connection with these, however, to enumerate them, lest, in lamenting the miseries of my friends, I should be thought to glance at those persons whom it is by no means my design to offend. Indeed, if I had not conceived strong hopes that I shall be able to prevail with Caesar in favour of this city, there would be no occasion for my present very earnest application to you. But as I am well persuaded that Caesar will have regard to the dignity of this illustrious corporation, to the zeal which they bear for his interest, and above all to the equity of their cause, I venture to entreat you to leave the decision of this affair entirely to his own determination. If I could produce no precedent of your having already complied with a request of this nature, it is a request which I should nevertheless have made, but I have so much the stronger hopes that you will not refuse me in the present instance, as I am informed you have granted the same favour to the citizens of Regia. It is true, you have some sort of connexion with that city; but in justice to your affection towards me, I cannot but hope that what you have yielded to your own clients you will not deny to mine, especially as it is for those alone that I solicit you, notwithstanding so many others of my friends are in the same situation. I dare say I need not assure you, that it is neither upon any amiable motives that I apply to you in their behalf, nor without having just reason to be their advocate. The fact is, I have great obligations to them; and there has been no reason of my life in which they have not given me signal proofs of their affection. As you are sensible, therefore, that the interest of this corporation, with which I am so strongly connected, is greatly concerned in the success of my present request, I conjure you, by all the powerful ties of our mutual friendship, and by all the sentiments of your humanity, to comply with these my intercessions in their behalf. If, after having obtained this favour, I should succeed likewise (as I have reason to hope) in my application to Caesar, I shall consider all the advantages of that success as owing entirely to yourself. Nor shall I be less obliged to you than I should not succeed, as you have contributed all in your power, at least, that I might. In one word, you will by these means not only perform a most acceptable service to myself, but for ever attach to the interest both of you and your family a most illustrious and grateful city. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

To Fabius Gallus.

You need be in no pain about your letter. So far from having destroyed it, as you imagine, it is perfectly safe, and you may call for it whenever you please. Your admonitions are extremely obliging, and I hope you will always continue them with the same freedom. You are apprehensive, I perceive, that if I should render this Tigellius my enemy, he may probably make me merrier than I like, and teach me the Sardinian laugh. In return to your proofs, let me present you with another, and advise you to "throw aside the pencil." For our master will be here much sooner than was expected; and I am afraid he should send the man who ventures to paint Cato in such favourable colours, to join the hero of his panegyric in the shades below.

Nothing, my dear Gallus, can be expressed with greater strength and elegance than that part of your letter which begins, "The rest are fallen," &c. But I whisper this applause in your ear,—and desire it may be a secret, even to your freedman Apella. Nobody, indeed, writes in this manner except ourselves. How far it is to be defended or not I may consider, perhaps, another time; but this, at least, is indisputable, that it is a style entirely our own.' Persevere, then, in these

* It is said there was a sea-weed frequently found upon the coasts of Sardinia, the poisonous quality whereof occasioned a convulsive motion in the features which had the appearance of laughter; and that hence the Sardinian laugh became a proverb usually applied to those who concealed a heavy heart under a gay countenance. Gallus seems to have cited this proverb as a caution to Cicero not to be too free in his raillery upon Tigellius; and there is a peculiar propriety in his application of it, as Tigellius was a Sardinian. I must acknowledge, however, that I have departed from the sentiments of the commentators in supposing that Tigellius is the person here alluded to: they all imagine, on the contrary, that it is Caesar. But this letter seems evidently to be upon the same subject as the 19th of this book, and was, probably, an answer to one to which Gallus had written in return to that epistle.

This proverb, Victorius supposes, had its rise from the schools of the painters, where the young pupils, who in the absence of their master were amusing themselves perhaps in drawing their pencils over the fresco on which he was at work, called upon each other, when they saw him returning, to lay them aside. Cicero, in the application of this proverb, alludes to the panegyric which Gallus had written upon Cato. See p. 9 on the 19th letter of this book.

compositions, as the best and surest method of forming your eloquence. As for myself, I now employ some part even of my nights in exercises of the same kind. Farewell.

LETTER XXII.
To Marcus Rutilius.

In the consciousness of that affection I bear you, and from the proofs I have experienced of yours, I do not scruple to ask a favour, which a principle of gratitude obliges me to request. To what degree I value Publius Sextius, is a circumstance with which my own heart is best acquainted; but how greatly I ought to do so both you and all the world are perfectly well apprised. As he has been informed by some of his friends that you are upon all occasions extremely well disposed to oblige me, he has desired I would write to you in the strongest terms in behalf of Caius Albinius, a person of senatorial rank. Publius Sextius married his daughter,—and he has a son by her, who is a youth of great merit. I mention these circumstances, to let you see that Sextius has no less reason to be concerned for the interest of Albinus than I have for that of Sextius. But to come to the point.

Marcus Laberius purchased, under an edict of Caesar, the confiscated estate of Plotius, which he afterwards assigned over to Albinus, in satisfaction of a debt. If I were to say that it is not for the credit of the government to include this estate among those lands which are directed to be divided, I might seem to talk rather in the style of a man who is dictating than of one who is making a request. But as Caesar thought it necessary to ratify the sales and mortgages that had been made of those estates which were confiscated during Sylla's administration, in order to render his own purchasers of the same kind so much the more secure; if these forfeited lands, which were put up to auction by his particular order, should be included in the general division he is now making, will it not discourage all future bidders? I only, hint this, however, for your own judicious consideration. In the mean time I most earnestly entreat you not to dispossess Albinus of the farms which Laberius has thus conveyed to him; and be assured, as nothing can be more equitable than this request, so I make it in all the warmth and sincerity of my heart. It will afford me, indeed, not only much satisfaction, but in some sort likewise great honour, if Sextius, to whose friendship I am so deeply indebted, should have an opportunity, through my means, of serving a man to whom I am thus nearly related. Again and again, therefore, I entreat your compliance; and as there is no instance wherein you can more effectually oblige me, so you may depend upon finding me infinitely sensible of the obligation. Farewell.

LETTER XXIII.
To Vatinius.

I am by no means surprised to find that you are sensible of my services. On the contrary, I perfectly well knew, and have upon all occasions declared, that no man ever possessed so grateful a heart. You have, indeed, not only acknowledged, but abundantly returned, my good offices: be assured, therefore, you will always experience in me the same friendly zeal in every other article of your concerns. Accordingly, after having received your last letter, wherein you recommend that excellent woman your wife to my protection, I immediately desired our friend Sura to acquaint her, that if in any instance she had occasion for my services I hoped she would let me know,—and that she might depend upon my executing her requests with the utmost warmth and fidelity. This promise I shall very punctually fulfill; and if it should prove necessary I will wait upon her myself. In the mean time I beg you would inform any of your own friends, that I shall not look upon any office as difficult, or below my character, wherein my assistance can avail her: as, indeed, there is no employment in which I could be engaged upon your account that I should not think both easy and honourable.

I entreat you to settle the affair with Dionysius; and any assurance that you shall think proper to give him, in my name, I will religiously perform. But if he should continue obstinate, you must e'en sete him as a prisoner of war, to grace your triumphal entry.

May a thousand curses fall upon these Dalmatians for giving you so much trouble. However, I join with you in being well persuaded that you will soon reduce them to obedience: and as they have always been esteemed a warlike people, their submission will greatly contribute to the glory of your arms. Farewell.

The services here alluded to are, probably, those which Vatinius solicited in the 12th letter of this book. Cicero's answer to that letter is lost, as well as Vatinius's reply: but the present episode seems to have been written in return to the latter.

If Vatinius was not a more tender husband than he appears to have been a son, this lady might have had occasion for Cicero's protection, in some instances, which she would not, perhaps, have been very willing to own: for among other enormities that are laid to the charge of Vatinius, it is said, that he had the cruelty, as well as the impiety, to lay violent hands on his mother.—Orat. in Vatin. 7.

Who would imagine that this is the same person of whom Cicero has elsewhere said, that "No one could look upon him without a sigh, or speak of him without execration: that he was the dread of his neighbours, the disgrace of his kindred, and the utter abhorrence of the public in general." Indeed, when Cicero gave this character of Vatinius, he was acting as an advocate at the bar, and endeavouring to destroy his credit as a witness against his friend and client. But whatever advantages may be made, in general, for rhetorical exaggerations, yet history shows that, in the present instance, Cicero's eloquence did not transgress the limits of truth. For Paterculus has painted the character of Vatinius in the same disadvantageous colours, and represented him as the lowest and most worthless of men.—Orat. in Vatin. 10; Vell. Pat. ii. 69.

c He was employed in a commission of the same kind with that of Orca and Cluvius, to whom the 16th and 20th letters of this book are addressed.

LETTER XXIV.

To Cornificius*.

It was with great satisfaction I found, by your letter, that you allow me a place in your thoughts: and it is by no means as doubting the constancy of your friendship, but merely in compliance with a customary form, that I entreat you to preserve me still in your remembrance.

It is reported that some commotions have arisen in Syria: at which I am more alarmed upon your account than our own, as you are placed so much nearer to the consequences. As to affairs at Rome, we are enjoying that sort of repose which I am sure you would be better pleased to hear was interrupted by some vigorous measures for the public welfare. And I hope it shortly will: as I find it is Caesar’s intention to concert methods for that purpose.

Your absence has inspired me with the courage of engaging in some compositions, which otherwise I should scarce have ventured to undertake: though there are some among them which even my judicious friend, perhaps, would not approve. The last that I have finished is upon a subject, on which I have frequently had occasion to think that your notions were not altogether agreeable to mine: it is an inquiry into the best species of eloquence. Though I must add, that whenever you have differed from me, it was always with the complaisance of a master artist towards one who is not wholly unskilled in his art. I should be extremely glad that this piece might receive your suffrage: if not for its own sake, at least for its author’s. To this end, I shall let your family know, that, if they think proper, they may have it transcribed, in order to send it to you. I imagine, indeed, although you should not approve my sentiments, yet that anything which comes from my hand, will be acceptable in your present inactive situation.

When you recommend your character and honours to my protection, it is merely, I dare say, for the sake of form, and not as thinking it in the least necessary. Be assured, the affection which, I am persuaded, mutually subsists between us, would be sufficient to render me greatly zealous in your service. But abstractedly from all motives of friendship, were I to consider only the noble purposes to which you have applied your exalted talents, and the great probability of your attaining the highest dignity in the commonwealth, there is no man to whom I should give the preference in my good offices, and few that I should place in the same rank with yourself. Farewell.

1 Quintus Cornificius, in the year 705, obtained the proconsulship of Illyricum. In the following year he was removed from thence into some other province, the name of which is unknown, but it appears to have been contiguous to Syria. In this province he resided when the present and twenty-sixth letter of this book were written to him. He was afterwards appointed governor of Africa, as appears by several letters addressed to him in the next book, and which will afford a further occasion of speaking of him. He had greatly distinguished himself in the art of eloquence, and is supposed to have been the author of those rhetorical pieces which are mentioned by Quintilian as written by a person of this name.—Pigl. Annal. ii. 446, 454, 466; Quintil. iii. 1.

2 This is, probably, the same piece of which an account has been given in rem. 4 on letter 15, book 2.

LETTER XXV.

To Cicero.

I look upon myself as a sort of property, the possession of which belongs, 'tis true, to Atticus; but all the advantage that can be derived from it is wholly yours. If Atticus, therefore, were inclined to dispose of his right in me, I am afraid he could only pass me off in a lot with some more profitable commodity: whereas, if you should have the same inclination, how greatly would it enhance my value to be proclaimed as one entirely formed into what he is, by your care and kindness! I entreat you then to continue to protect the work of your own hands, and to recommend me in the strongest terms to the successor of Sulpicius in this province. This will be the surest means of putting it in my power to obey your commands of returning to you in the spring: as it will facilitate the settling of my affairs in such a manner, that I may be able, by that time, to transport my effects, with safety, into Italy. But I hope, my illustrious friend, you will not communicate this letter to Atticus: for as he imagines I am much too honest a fellow to pay the same compliment to you both; suffer him, I beseech you, to remain in this favourable estime of Adieu, my dear patron, and salute Tiro in my name.

LETTER XXVI.

To Cornificius.

I shall follow the same method in answering your letter which I have observed that you great orators sometimes practise in your replies, and begin with the last article first. You accuse me, then, of being a negligent correspondent; but, believe me, I have never once omitted writing whenever any of your family gave me notice that a courier was setting out to you.

I have so high an opinion of your prudence, that I expected you would act in the manner your very obliging letter assures me you intend, and that you would not determine your measure, till you should know where this paltry Bassus™ designed to make an irruption. I entreat you to continue to give me frequent intelligence of all your purposes and motions, as well as of whatever else is going forward in your part of the world.

It was with much regret that I parted with you when you left Italy; but I comforted myself in the persuasion, that you were not only going into a scene of profound tranquillity, but leaving one that was threatened with great commotions. The reverse, however, has proved to be the fact, and war has broken out in your quarters, at the same time that it is extinguished in ours. But the peace we enjoy is attended, nevertheless, with many disgusting circumstances, and disgusting, too, even to Caesar himself. It is the certain consequence, indeed, of all civil wars, that the vanquished must not only submit to the will of the victor, but to the will of those also who assisted him in his conquest. But I am now become so totally callous, that I saw Bursa, the other day, at the games which Caesar exhibited, without the least emotion; and was present with equal patience at the farewells of Publius and Labienus. In short, I am unable to imagine so much as of the want of a judicious friend with whom I may freely laugh at what is thus passing amongst us. And such a friend I shall find in you, if you will hasten your return hither; a circumstance which I look upon to be as much your own interest, as I am sure it is mine. Farewell.

LETTER XXVI.
To Dolabella.

I rejoice to find that Baiae has changed its nature, and is become, if possible, so wondrous a sultry
a. v. 708.

But, perhaps, it is only in compliance to my friend that it thus suspends its usual effects, and will resume its wonted qualities the moment you depart. I shall not be surprised should this prove to be the case; nor wonder, indeed, if heaven and earth should alter their general tendencies, for the sake of a man who has so much to recommend him to the favour of both.

I did not imagine, that I had preserved, among

Cicero's inveterate enemy, who had been banished some years before, but had lately been recalled by Caesar. See rem. * p. 387.

For an account of Laberius see rem. * p. 380. Publius Syrus had, likewise, distinguished himself upon the Roman stage in those buffoon pieces which they called their minnes. But although these rival poets and actors were both of them excellent in their way, yet it appears that their humour was too low and ingrate to suit the just and refined taste of Cicero.—Macroh. Saturn. ii. 7.

Dolabella had probably informed Cicero, in a letter from Baiae, of the salutary effects he experienced from the waters of that place; in answer to which Cicero plays upon the ambiguous meaning of the word salubres, and applies in a moral sense what Dolabella had used in a personal one.

If no other memoirs of these times remained than what might be collected from the letters of Cicero, it is certain they would greatly mislead us in our notions of the principal actors who now appeared upon the theatre of the Roman republic. Thus, for instance, who would imagine that the person here represented as interesting heaven and earth in his welfare, was, in fact, a monster of Jowedness and inhumanity? But how must the reader's astonishment be raised, when he is informed that it is Cicero himself who tells us so? "Dolabella—a pro pacre deliciis crudelitas fuit, (says our author in one of his Philippic orations,) defune se libidinum turpitudine ut in hoc sit semper ipse laetus, quod eu facetus que sibi obedit ne inimico quidem possent veneerunt." If this was a true picture of Dolabella, what shall be said in excuse of Cicero for having disposed of his daughter to him in marriage? Should any too partial advocate of Cicero's moral character endeavour to palliate this unfavourable circumstance, by telling us that he had never inquired into Dolabella's conduct, might it not justly be suspected that he meant to banter? Yet, this is the very reason which Cicero himself assigns in the oration from whence the above passage is cited. "Et hic, dic inamoratius! aliquando factus meus! occulta enim erat vita non inquirerem." Strange that a man who loved his daughter even to a degree of extravagance, should be so careless in an article wherein her happiness—But I need not finish the rest; where facts speak for themselves, let me be spared the pain of a comment.—Phil. xx. 14.

my papers, the trifling speech which I made in behalf of Deliotarus; however, I have found it, and send it to you, agreeably to your request. You will read it as a performance which was by no means, of course, enough to deserve much care in the composition; and, to say truth, I was willing to make my old friend and host a present of the same indeclic kind with his own.

May you ever preserve a virtuous and a generous mind! that the moderation and integrity of your conduct may prove a living reproach to the violence and injustice of some others amongst our contemporaries! Farewell.

LETTER XXVIII.
Vatinius to Cicero.

I have not been able to do anything to the purpose with regard to your librarian, Dionysius; and, indeed, my endeavours have hitherto proved so much the less effectual, as the severity of the weather, which obliged me to retreat out of Dalmatia, still detains me here. However, I will not desist till I have gotten him into my custody. But I must, in the meantime, assist you in executing your commands, why else did you write to me, I know not what, in favour of Catillus? But avance, thou insidious tempter, with thy dangerous intercessions! And our friend Servilius, too, (for mine my heart prompts me to call him, as well as yours,) is, it seems, a joint petitioner with you in this request. Is it usual then, I should be glad to know, with you orators to be the advocates of such clients, and in such causes? Is it usual to plead in behalf of the most cruel of the human race? In defence of a man who has murdered our fellow-citizens, plundered their houses, ravished their wives, and laid whole regions in desolation? This worthless wretch had the insolence, likewise, to take up arms against myself; and he is now, 'tis true, my prisoner. But tell me, my dear Cicero, in what manner can I act in this affair? I would not willingly refuse anything to your request; and, as far as my soul and body are concerned, I will, in compliance with your desire, remit the punishment I intended. But what shall I answer to those unhappy sufferers who require satisfaction for the loss of their effects, and the destruction of their ships? who call for vengeance on the murderer of their brothers, their children, and their parents? Believe me, if I had succeeded to the impudence as well as to the office of Appius', I could not have the assurance to withstand their cries for justice. Nevertheless, I

Mammerius observes, that this is not the same Appius to whom the letters in the 3d book are addressed; and refers to a passage in Valerius Maximus, to prove that he perished early in the civil wars. But so he undoubtedly might, and without being the same person here alluded to; for it by no means appears when or in what post he was, that Val- nius succeeded to this Appius in question. will do everything that lies in my power to gratify your inclinations. He is to be defended at this trial by Volusius; and, if his prosecutors can be vanquished by eloquence, there is great reason to expect that the force of your disciple's rhetoric will put them to flight.

I depend upon your being my advocate at Rome, if there should be any occasion. Caesar, indeed, has not yet done me the justice to move for a public thanksgiving, for the success of my arms in Dalmatia: as if, in truth, I were not entitled to more, and might not justly claim the honour of a triumph! But as there are above threescore cities that have entered into an alliance with the Dalmatians, besides the twenty of which that country so long ago consisted: if I am not to be honoured with a public thanksgiving till I shall have taken every one of these considerable towns, I am by no means upon equal terms with the rest of our generals.

Immediately after the senate had appointed the former thanksgivings for my victories", I marched

* There is some difficulty in reconciling what Vatinus here says of a supposition having been formed by the senate, with the complaint he makes above against Caesar for having delayed to move the house for that purpose. Some of the commentators, therefore, have suspected that this is the beginning of a distinct letter; and others, that it is a postscript, written a considerable distance from time

INTO DALMATIA, where I attacked and made myself master of six of their towns. One of these, which was of very considerable strength, I might fairly say that I took four several times; for it was surrounded by a fortification consisting of four different walls, which were defended by as many forts, through all which I forced my way to the citadel, which I likewise compelled to surrender. But the excessive severity of the cold, together with the deep snows that fell at the same time, obliged me to retreat; so that I had the mortification, my dear Cicero, to find myself under the necessity of abandoning my conquests just as I was upon the point of finishing the war. I entreat you, then, if occasion should require, to be my advocate with Caesar, and in every other respect to take my interest under your protection,—in the assurance, that no man possesses a higher degree of affection for you than myself.

BOOK XII.

LETTER L

To Curious.

'Tis true, I once both advised and exhorted you to return into Italy; but I am so far from being in the same sentiments at present, that, on the contrary, I wish to escape myself, to some blest clime remote from POLePE'S race7.

My heart, indeed, most severely reproaches me for submitting to be the witness of their unworthy deeds. Undoubtedly, my friend, you long since foresaw our evil days approaching, when you wisely took your flight from these unhappy regions; for though it must needs be painful to hear a relation of what is going forward amongst us, yet far more intolerable is surely to be the sad spectator of so wretched a scene. One advantage, at least, you have certainly gained by your absence; it has spared you the mortification of being present at the late general assembly for the election of questors. At seven in the morning, the tribunal of Quintus Maximus, the consul, as they called him8, was placed in the field of MAras; when, news being brought of his sudden death, it was immediately removed. But Caesar, notwithstanding he had taken the auspices9 as for an assembly of the tribes, converted it into that of the centuries; and, at one in the afternoon, declared Caninius only elected consul. Be it recorded, then, that during the consulate of Caninius no man had time to dine, and yet that there was not a single disturbance of any kind committed: for he was a magistrate, you must know, of such wonderful vigilance, that he never once slept throughout his whole administration. The truth of it is, his administration continued only to the end of the year, and both expired the very next morning. But, ridiculous as these transactions may appear to you who are placed at 8 The citizens of Rome were cast into three general divisions—into centuries, into curiae, and into tribes. Some account of the two latter has been already given in rem. 5, p. 375, and rem. 7, p. 428. The former was an institution of Servius Tullius, who distributed the people into 183 centuries, according to the value of their respective possessions. These companies had a vote in all questions that came before the people assembled in this manner, and the majority of voices in each determined the suffrage of that particular century. But, as the patricians and the wealthiest citizens of the republic filled up 28 of these 180 classes, theinferior citizens were consequently deprived of all weight in the public deliberations. The praetors, consuls, and censors, were elected by the people assembled in centuries; but the questors, aediles, and tribunes, were chosen in an assembly of the tribes.—Dion. Hal. iv. 30.

so great a distance from them, believe me you could not refrain from tears if you were to see them in all their true and odious colours. How would you be affected, then, were I to mention the numberless instances of the same kind which daily occur! For my own part, they would be utterly insupportable to me, had I not taken refuge in philosophy, and enjoyed, likewise, that friend of ours for the companion of my studies whose property, you tell me, you are. However, since you assure me at the same time that all the benefit which can arise from you belongs solely to myself, I am perfectly well contented,—for what can property give more?

Acilius, who is sent into Greece at the head of some legions, as successor to Sulpicius, has great obligations to me; for I successfully defended him in two capital prosecutions, before the commencement of our public troubles. He is a man of a very grateful disposition, and one who, upon all occasions, treats me with much regard; whereas, in ordinary, I herewith send you a letter in which I have written to him in your favour, in the strongest terms; and I desire you will let me know what promises he shall give you in consequence of my recommendation. Farewell.

LETTER II.

To Auctus, proconsul.

In confidence of that share you allow me in your esteem, and of which you gave me so many convincing proofs, during the times we conversed together at Brundisium, I claim a sort of right of applying to you upon any occasion wherein I am particularly interested. I take the liberty, therefore, of writing to you in behalf of Marcus Curius, a merchant at Patrae, with whom I am most intimately united. Many are the good offices which have mutually passed between us,—and, what indeed is of the greatest weight, they reciprocally flowed from the most perfect affection.

Atticus.

See the beginning of Curius's letter to Cicero, p. 587.

The commentators imagine that this person is the same whom Cicero mentions in the foregoing letter to have succeeded to Sulpicius in the government of Greece; and that, therefore, either instead of Auctus, the true reading is Aculus, or that he was called Aculus Auctus. But, though it is altogether impossible to determine who the person was to whom this letter is addressed, or in what year it was written, yet it seems highly probable that Aculus and Auctus were different men; for Cicero, in the preceding epistle, mentions Aculus as one on whom he had conferred some very important services: whereas, in the present letter, Cicero appears to have been the person obliged. Now it is by no means credible that our author, if he had ever done any good offices to Auctus, should have been totally silent upon a circumstance which would have given him a much higher claim to the favour he was requesting, than any which he produces. And the incredibility grows still stronger, when it is remembered that Cicero never fails to display his services upon all occasions in which he can with any propriety mention them. But on which side seuer of this question the truth may lie, it is a point of such very little consequence, that perhaps it will scarce justify even this short remark.

Probably during Cicero's residence in that city, upon his return into Italy, after the battle of Pharsalia, an account of which has been given in the foregoing observations.

If, then, you have reason to promise yourself any advantage from my friendship,—if you are inclined to render the obligations you have formerly conferred upon me, if possible, even still more valuable,—in a word, if you are persuaded that I hold a place in the esteem of every person in your family, let these considerations induce you to comply with my request in favour of Curins. Receive him, I conjure you, under your protection, and preserve both his person and his property from every injury and every inconvenience to which they may be exposed. I assure you myself, (what all your family will, I doubt not, confirm,) that you may depend upon deriving great satisfaction from my friendship, as well as much advantage from the faithful returns of my gratitude. Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Curius.

Your letter affords me a very evident proof that I possess the highest share of your esteem, and that you are sensible how much you are endeared to me in return,—both which I have ever been desirous should be placed beyond a doubt. Since, then, we are thus firmly assured of each other's affection, let us endeavour to live in our mutual good offices,—a contest in which I am perfectly indifferent on which side the superiority may appear.

I am well pleased that you had no occasion to deliver my letter to Aculus. I find, likewise, that you had not much for the services of Sulpicius; having made so great a progress, it seems, in your affairs as to have curtailed them (to use your own ludicrous expression) both of head and feet. I wish, however, you had spared the latter, that they might proceed a little faster, and give us an opportunity of one day seeing you again in Rome. We want you, indeed, in order to preserve that good old vein of pleasantry which is now, you may perceive, well-nigh worn out amongst us; insomuch that Aculus may properly enough say, as he often knew used, "if it were not for two or three of us, my friends, what would become of the ancient glory of Athens?" In the mean time, I will venture to assure you myself, (what all your family will, I doubt not, confirm,) that you may depend upon deriving great satisfaction from my friendship, as well as much advantage from the faithful returns of my gratitude. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

To Cornelius.

I have the satisfaction to find, by your very obliging letter, that my last was safely delivered. As to my doubt of its affording you pleasure, and, therefore, was so much the more unjust lest it should lose its way. You inform me, at the same time, that a war is broken out in Syria, and that Caesar has given you the

To several of his friends.

I wish you much joy of your command, and hope success will attend it; as, in full confidence of your wisdom and vigilance, I am well persuaded it will. Nevertheless, I am truly alarmed at what you mention concerning the invasion which, it is suspected, the Parthians are meditating. I find by your letter, that the number of your forces is agreeable to what I should have conjectured: I hope, therefore, that these people will not put themselves in motion till the legions of the Rhine are ordered into your assistance, shall arrive. But if you should not, even with these supplies, find yourself in a condition to face the enemy, I need not remind you to follow the maxim of your predecessor Marcus Bibulus, who, you know, during the whole time that the Parthians continued in your province, most gallantly shut himself up in a strong garrison. Yet, after all, circumstances will best determine in what manner it will be proper for you to act: in the mean time, I shall be extremely anxious till I receive an account of your operations.

As I have never omitted any opportunity of writing to you, I hope you will observe the same punctuality with regard to me. But above all, let me desire you to represent me in your letters to your friends and family as one who is entirely yours. Farewell.

Letter V.

Decimus Brutus to Marcus Brutus and Caius Cassius.

You will judge by this letter in what posture our affairs stand. I received a visit yesterday in the evening from Hirtius, who convinced me of Antony's extreme perfidy and ill intentions towards us. He assured Hirtius, it seems, that he could not by his own consent I should take possession of the province sooner, he seems to have been nominated; and that both the army and the populace were so highly incensed against us, that he imagined we could none of us continue with any safety in Rome. You are sensible, I dare say, that both these assertions are as absolutely false, as that it is undoubtedly true what Hirtius added, that Antony is apprehensive, if we should gather the least increase of power, it will be impossible for him and his party to maintain them in their ground. I thought, under these difficulties, there was nothing that I could take, for our common interest, would be to request that an honorary legation might be decreed to each of us, in order to give some decent colour to our leaving Rome. Accordingly, Hirtius has promised to obtain this grant in our favour; though I must add, at the same time, such a spirit is raised against us in the senate, that I am by no means clear he will be able to perform his engagement. And say jealous too of his power; I am persuaded, it will not be long ere they declare us public enemies, or at least sentence us to banishment. It appears to me, therefore, our wisest method in the present conjuncture is to submit to Fortune, and withdraw to Rhodes or to some other secure part of the world.

We may there adjust our measures to public circumstances, and either return to Rome or remain in exile, as affairs shall hereafter appear with a more or less inviting aspect; or if the worst should happen, at least we may have recourse to the last desperate expedient. Should it be asked, why not attempt something at present, rather than wait a more distant period? My answer is, because I know not where we can hope to make a stand, unless we should go either to Sextus Pompeius', or to Rome. Brutus and Cassius retired to Lanuvium, a villa belonging to the former, about fifteen miles from the city, at which place they probably were when Decimus Brutus, who had not yet left Rome, wrote the following letter.

1 Decimus Brutus, of the same family with Marcus Brutus, served under Caesar in the wars in Gaul; at the end of which, in the year 705, he returned to Rome, and was chosen one of the city questors. It does not appear that he distinguished himself by anything remarkable, till he engaged with Marcus Brutus and Cassius in the conspiracy against his friend and benefactor. This was executed, as all the world knows, by stabbing Caesar in the senate, on the 15th or the 16th of March, a few weeks before the present letter was written. When one considers the characters of those who were the principal actors in this memorable tragedy, it is astonishing that they should have looked no farther than merely to the taking away of Caesar's life; as if they imagined that the government must necessarily return into its proper channel as soon as the person who had obstructed its course was removed. They were, however, very surprised at those very unreasonable and insensible contumacies which they ought to have had in view, and which accordingly ensued. Whatever thus may be determined as to the patriotism of the fact itself, it was, unaccountably, conducted, as Cicero frequently and justly complains, by the weakest and most impolitic counsels. Antony, (who was at this time consul,) although he thought proper, at first, to carry a fair appearance towards the conspirators, yet secretly raised such a spirit against them, that they found it expedient to withdraw from

1 This seems to be intended as a sneer upon the conduct of Bibulus. Cicero was governor of Cilicia when Bibulus commanded in Syria, and they both solicited at the same time the honour of a public thanksgiving for the success of their respective armies. Cat. gave his suffrage, upon this occasion, in favour of Bibulus, but refused it to Cicero, a preference which extremely exasperated the latter, and which was, probably, the principal cause of that contempt with which he speaks of Bibulus in the present passage. See letter 10, book vi. rem. 9.

2 Hirtius was warmly attached to Caesar, and extremely regretted his death; but as he was disgusted with Antony, and perhaps jealous too of his power, he seems to have been altogether of the cause he approved, merely from a spirit of personal pique and envy.—Ad Att. xiv. 20; xxv. 6.

3 Caesar, a short time before his death, had nominated Decimus Brutus to the government of Cisalpine Gaul, and Antony to that of Macedonia. But as Gaul lay more conveniently for Antony's present purposes, his design was to procure the administration of it for himself.

4 The senators could not be long absent from Rome without leave of the senate. When their private affairs, therefore, required their attendance abroad, it was usual to apply for what they called a legatio libera, which gave a sanction to their absence, and invested them with a sort of travelling title, that procured them the greater respect and honours in the countries through which they passed, and in the place where they proposed to reside.

5 That is, (as the commentators explain it,) by arming the slaves, throwing open the prisons, and raising foreign nations in their defence.

6 Sextus Pompeius, the younger son of Pompey, was in Caudine, where his very celebrated escape battle to Caesar. Cæsus attempting to make his escape, after the total defeat of his army, was killed by some of the conqueror's soldiers; but Sextus, upon the enemy's approach, in order to lay siege to Caudine, secretly abandoned that city, and concealed himself till Caesar's return into Italy. The latter had no sooner left Spain, than Sextus collected his broken forces; and a short time after this letter was written, he appeared at the head of no less than six legions.—Hist. De Bell. Hisp.; Dio, p. 574.
THE LETTERS OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO

Cæcilius Bassus. It is probable, indeed, that when the news of Caesar's death shall be spread through their respective provinces, it may much contribute to strengthen their party; however, it will be soon enough to join them when we shall know the state of their forces.

If you and Cassius are desirous I should enter into my engagement on your behalf, I shall very readily be your sponsor: and, indeed, it is a condition which Hirtius requires. I desire, therefore, you would acquaint me with your resolution as soon as possible; for I expect, before ten o'clock, to receive an appointment from Hirtius to meet him upon these affairs. Let me know, at the same time, where I shall find you.

Hirtius shall have given me his final answer, I purpose to apply to the senate that a guard may be appointed to attend us in Rome. I do not suppose they will comply with this request, as our appearing to stand in need of such a protection will render them extremely odious. But how successful soever my demands may prove, I shall not be discouraged from making such as I think reasonable. Farewell.

LETTER VI.
To Tiro.

NOTWITHSTANDING I wrote this morning by Harpatus, and nothing new has since occurred; yet I cannot forbear making use of this opportunity of conveying a second letter to you upon the same subject; not, however, as entertaining the least distrust of your care, but because the business in which I have employed you is of the last importance to me. My whole design, indeed, in parting with you was, that you might thoroughly settle my affairs. I desire, therefore, in the first place, that the demands of Othilius and Aurelius may be satisfied. Your next endeavour must be to obtain part, at least, if you cannot procure the whole, of what is due to me from Flamma; and particularly insist on his making this payment by the first of January. With regard to that debt which was assigned over to me, I beg you would exert your utmost diligence to recover it; but, as to the advance-payment of the other not yet due, I leave you to act as you shall judge proper. And this much for my private concerns. As to those of the public, I desire you would send me all the certain intelligence you can collect. Let me know what Octavius and Antony are doing: what is the general opinion of Rome; and what turn you imagine affairs are likely to take. I can scarcely forbear running into the midst of the scene; but I restrain myself in the expectation of your letter.

Your news concerning Balbus proves true; he was at Aquinum at the time you were told, and Hirtius followed him thither on the next day. I imagine they are both going to the waters of Baiae, but let me know what you can discover of their motions.

Do not forget to remind the agents of Dolabella, nor to insist upon the payment of what is due from Papia. Farewell.

LETTER VII.
To Bithynicus.

I HAVE many reasons to wish that the republic may be restored; but, believe me, the promise you give me in your letter, renders it still more ardently my desire. You assure me, if that happy event should take place, you will consecrate your whole time to me; an assurance which I received with the greatest pleasure, as it is perfectly agreeable to the friendship in which we are united, and to the opinion which that excellent man your father entertained of me. You have received so many considerable services, I confess, from the men who are, or lately were, in power, than any that I have been capable of conferring upon you: but, in all other respects, there is no person whose connexions with you are of a stronger kind than my own. It is with great satisfaction, therefore, that I find you not only preserve our friendship in your remembrance, but are desirous, likewise, of increasing its strength. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.
To Tiro.

If you should have an opportunity, you may register the money you mention; though, indeed, it is an acquisition which it is not absolutely requisite to enroll. It may, perhaps, be as well, seminary of great note in Macedonia. In this place he was to prosecute his studies and exercises till Caesar, who proposed he should accompany him in his intended expedition against the Parthians, should call upon him in his march to that country. But as soon as Octavius was informed of the death of Caesar, and that he had appointed him his heir, he immediately hastened to Rome; and the eyes of everybody, but particularly of Cicero, were now attentively turned towards him, in order to discover in what manner he would act in this very critical situation, both of his own affairs and those of the republic.—Dio, p. 271; Appian. De Bell. Civ. ii.

It appears by the letters written to Atticus at this time, that Cicero had some considerable demands upon Dolabella; which arose, it is probable, from the latter not having yet returned the whole of Tullius's portion, agreeably to the Roman laws in cases of divorce.

This person is supposed by Mamutius to be the son of Quintus Pompeius, who obtained the name of Bithynicus, in honour of his conquest of Bithynia.

Cicero mentions him in his treatise of Celebrated Ottors, as one with whom he had enjoyed a particular friendship. He attended Pompey in his flight after the battle of Pharsalia, and perished with him in Egypt.—Cic. de Clar. Orat. 240.

The censors every five years numbered the people, at which time each citizen was obliged to give an exact...
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

I have received a letter from Balbus, wherein he excuses himself for not giving me an account of Antony's intentions concerning the law I inquired after; because he has gotten, it seems, a violent defluxion upon his eyes. Excellent excuse, it must be owned! For if a man is not able to write, most certainly, you know, he cannot dictate! But let the world go as it will, so I may sit down quietly here in the country.

I have written to Bithynicus.—As to what you mention concerning Servilus, you, who are a young man, may think length of days a desirable circumstance; but, for myself, I have no such wish. Atticus, nevertheless, imagines that I am still as anxious for the preservation of my life as he once knew me; not observing how firmly I have since fortified my heart with all the strength of philosophy. The truth of it is, he is now seized in his turn with a panic himself; and would endeavour to infect me with the same groundless apprehensions. But it is my intention to preserve that friendship unviolated which I have so long enjoyed with Antony; and, accordingly, I intend writing to him very soon. I shall defer my letter, however, till your return; but I do not mention this with any design of calling you off from the business you are transacting, and which, indeed, is much more nearly my concern.

I expect a visit from Leptis to-morrow, and shall have occasion for all the sweets of your conversation, to temper the bitterness with which his will be attended. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

To Dolabella, Consul. 5.

I desire no greater satisfaction, my dear Dolabella, than what arises to me from the disinterested part I take in the glory you have lately acquired; however, I cannot but acknowledg—account of his estate. But if, in the interval, a man had made any new acquisition, he was required to enter it before the pretor.

2 Servilus Iauriculus died about this time, in an extreme old age; Murciades conjectures, therefore, and with great probability, that Tiro, in the letter to which the present is an answer, had given Cicero an account of this event, and, at the same time, expressed his wishes of living to the same advanced period.

3 Both Antony and Cicero seem to have been equally unwilling, at this time, to come to an open rupture; but, as to a real friendship between them, it is highly probable there never had been any. On the part of Antony, at least, there were some very strong family reasons to alienate him from Cicero. For Antony's father married the widow of Lentulus, whom Cicero had put to death as an accomplice in Catiline's conspiracy; and he, himself, was married to Fulvia, the widow of Clodius, Cicero's most inveterate enemy. These alliances must unquestionably have made impressions upon Antony's mind little favourable to brother-in-lawhood, and probably, contributed, among other reasons, to the rage that resentment which terminated in Cicero's destruction: but whatever the true motive of their enmity towards each other might have been, the first coolness seems to have arisen on the side of Antony; and if Cicero had resented it with greater moderation, he would have acted, perhaps, with more prudence in regard to the public interest, as well as in respect to his own. — Ad Att. xiv. 19.

4 See rem. v. p. 549.

5 Caesar had appointed Dolabella to succeed him in the consulship as soon as he should set out upon his Parthian ledge I am infinitely pleased to find, that the world gives me a share in the merit of your late applauded conduct. I daily meet, in this place, great numbers of the first rank in Rome, who are assembled here for the benefit of their health, as well as a multitude of my friends from the principal cities in Italy; and they all agree in joining their particular thanks to me with those unbounded praises they bestow upon you. They are so partial to them, indeed, tell me, that they are persuaded it is owing to your compliance with my counsels and admonitions, that you approve yourself so excellent a patriot and so worthy a consul. I might with strict truth assure them, that you are much superior to the want of being advised by any man; and that your actions are the free and genuine result of your own uninvestigated judgment. But although I do not entirely acquiesce in their compliment, as it would lessen the credit of your conduct if it should be supposed to flow altogether from my suggestions, yet neither do I wholly reject it: for the love of praise is a passion, which I am apt, you know, somewhat too immoderately to indulge. Yet, after all, to take counsel of a Nestor, as it was an honour to the character even of that king of kings, Agamemnon himself, it cannot surely be unbecoming the dignity of yours. It is certainly, at least, much to the credit of mine, that while in this early period of your life, you are thus exercising the supreme magistracy with universal admiration and applause; you are considered as directed by my guidance and formed by my instructions.

I lately paid a visit to Lucius Caesar, at Naples; and though I found him extremely indisposed, and full of pain in every part of his body, yet the moment I entered his chamber he raised himself with an air of transport, and without allowing himself time to salute me, "O my dear Cicero," said he, "I give you joy of your influence over Dolabella, and had I the same credit with my nephew, our country might now be preserved. But I not only expedition; and, accordingly, Dolabella, upon the death of Caesar, immediately assumed the administration of that office. His conduct in this critical conjuncture had rendered it somewhat doubtful which side he was most disposed to favour: but an accident had lately happened which gave a great part of the republic great hopes that he would support the cause of the conspirators. Some of Caesar's freed-men had erected a sort of altar upon the spot where his body had been burned, at which the populace daily assembled in the most tumultuous and alarming manner. Dolabella, in the absence of his colleague Antony, interposed his consular authority in order to suppress this mob; and having caused the altar to be demolished, he exerted a very reasonable sense of severity, by commanding the principal ringleaders of the riot to be instantly put to death. It was this that produced the following letter from Cicero, written from some place of public resort, probably from the baths of Baiae.—Bst. p. 240, 287; Ad Att. xiv. 15.

6 Dolabella was, at this time, not more than twenty-five years of age, which was almost twenty years earlier than he could legally have offered himself as a candidate for the consular dignity, the Roman laws having very wisely provided that no man should be capable of exercising this important office till he had attained the age of forty-two.

7 He was not a distant relation to Julia Caesar, and uncle to Mark Antony. Upon the celebrated coalition of the triumvirate, he was sacrificed by Antony to the resentment of Octavians, as, in return, Cicero was delivered up to the vengeance of Antony. But Lucius escaped the consequence of this prescription by the means of Julia, Antony's mother.—Plut. in Vit. Ant.
CONGRATULATE YOUR FRIEND ON HIS WORTHY CONDUCT, BUT DESIRE YOU WOULD RETURN HIM MY PARTICULAR ACKNOWLEDGMENTS: AS, INDEED, HE IS THE SINGLE CONSUL WHO HAS ACTED WITH TRUE SPIRIT SINCE YOU FILLED THAT OFFICE." HE THEN PROCEEDED TO ENLARGE UPON YOUR LATE GLORIOUS ACTION, REPRESENTING IT AS EQUAL TO THE MOST ILLUSTRIOUS AND IMPORTANT SERVICE THAT EVER WAS RENDERED TO THE COMMONWEALTH. AND IN THIS HE ONLY ECHOED THE GENERAL VOICE OF THE WHOLE REPUBLIC. SCARCELY HAD HE CONCLUDED THE EXAGGERATION OF THOSE ENCOMIUMS TO WHICH I AM BY NO MEANS ENTITLED, AND IN SOME SORT TO PARTICIPATE WITH YOU IN THAT GENERAL APPLAUSE YOU HAVE ACQUIRED. TO BE SINCERE, HOWEVER, (FOR YOU WILL NOT IMAGINE THAT I MAKE THIS REQUEST IN GOOD EARNEST,) I WOULD MUCH RATHER RESIGN TO YOU THE WHOLE OF MY OWN GLORY, (IF THERE BE ANY, INDEED, I CAN JUSTLY CLAIM,) THAN ARROGATE TO MYSELF THE LEAST PORTION OF THAT WHICH IS SO UNQUESTIONABLY YOUR DUE. FOR AS YOU CANNOT BUT BE SENSIBLE THAT I HAVE EVER LOVED YOU, SO YOUR LATE BEHAVIOUR HAS RAISED THAT AFFECTION INTO THE HIGHEST POSSIBLE ARDOUR; AS, IN TRUTH, THERE CANNOT BE ANYTHING MORE ENGAGINGLY FAIR, MORE IRRESISTIBLY AMIABLE, THAN THE PATRIOT VIRTUES. I NEED NOT TELL YOU HOW GREATLY THE EXALTED TALENTS AND POLITE MANNERS, TOGETHER WITH THE SINGULAR SPIRIT AND PROBITY, OF MARCUS BRUTUS ARE EVER ENOUGH TO PRODUCE AFFECTION. Nevertheless, his late glorious achievement on the idea of March, has wonderfully heightened that esteem I bore him: and which I had always looked upon as too exalted to admit of any farther advance. In the same manner, who would have imagined that my friendship towards yourself was capable of increase? Yet it actually has increased so very considerably, that the former sentiments of my heart seem to have been nothing more than common affection, in comparison of that transcendent passion which I now feel for you.

Can it be necessary that I should either exhort you to preserve the glory you have acquired, or, agreeably to the usual style of admonition, set before your eyes some animating examples of illustrious merit? I could mention none for this purpose more forcibly than your own: and you have only to endeavour to act up to the character you have already attained. It is impossible, indeed, after having performed so signal a service to your country, that you should ever deviate from yourself. Instead, therefore, of sending you any unnecessary exhortations, let me rather congratulate you upon this noble display of your patriotism. It is your privilege (and a privilege, perhaps, which no one ever enjoyed before) to have exercised the severest acts of necessary justice, not only without incurring any odium, but with the greatest popularity: with the approbation of the lowest, as well as of the best and highest amongst us. If this were a circumstance in which chance had any share, I should congratulate your good fortune: but it was the effect of a noble and undaunted resolution, under the guidance of which you have preserved an enlightened judgment. I say this from having read the speech you made upon this occasion to the people; and never was any harangue more judiciously composed. You open and explain the fact with so much address, and gradually rise through the several circumstances in so artful a manner, as to convince all the world that the affair was mature for your animadversion. In a word, you have delivered the commonwealth in general, as well as the city of Rome in particular, from the dangers with which they were threatened: and not only performed a singular service to the present generation, but set forth a most useful example for times to come. You will consider yourself, then, as the great supporter of the republic: and remember, she expects that you will not only protect, but distinguish those illustrious persons who have laid the foundation for the recovery of our liberties. But I hope soon to have an opportunity of expressing my sentiments to you more fully upon this subject in person. In the mean while, since you are thus our glorious guardian and preserver, I conjure you, my dear Dolabella, to take care of yourself for the sake of the whole commonwealth. Farewell.

LETTER X.

To Trebonius.

I HAVE RECOMMENDED MY ORATOR FOR THE TITLE WHICH I HAVE GIVEN TO THE TREATISE I PROMISED TO SEND YOU TO THE CARE OF YOUR FREEDMAN Sabinus. I was induced to trust in his charge, from the good opinion I entertain of his countrymen: if, indeed, I may guess at his country by his name, and he has not, like an artful candidate at an election, usurped an appellation

f Brutus and Casius, together with the rest of the conspirators.

c Ci Paolo and a letter to Atticus, who approves of this poem and disapproves of those emoluments with which it is so extravagantly swelled. The hyperbole, indeed, seems to have been the prevailing figure in Cicero's rhetoric; and he generally dealt it out, both to his friends and to his enemies, with more warmth than discretion. In the present instance, at least, he was either very easily imposed upon by appearances, or he changed his opinion of Dohabeil's public actions and designs, according to the colour of his conduct towards himself. Perhaps both these causes might concur, in forming those great and sudden variations which we find in our author's sentiments at this period, with respect to the hero of the panegyric before us; for, in a letter to Atticus, written very shortly after the present, he speaks of Dohabell with high displeasure; and, in another to the same person a few months afterwards, he exclaims against him with such bitterness, as one who had not only been bribed by Anthony to desert the cause of liberty, but who had endeavoured, as far as in him lay, entirely to ruin it. The accusation seems to have been just; but it is observable, however, that in both the letters referred to, part of Cicero's objection arises from some personal ill-treatment which he complains of having received from Dohabeil.—Ad Att. xiv. 10: xvi. 15.

f Some account has already been given of Trebonius in rem. 9, p. 467. Caesar, upon his return from Spain, in the preceding year, appointed him consul with Quintus Fabius Maximus; but this, and other favours of the same kind, were not sufficient to restrain him from entering into the conspiracy which was soon afterwards formed against Caesar's life. At the same time, therefore, that Brutus and Casius found it expedient to leave Rome, Trebonius secretly withdrew into Asia Minor, which had before been allotted to him as his provincial province; and he was on his way to that government when the present letter was written.—Dio, p. 236, 247; Ad Att. xiv. 10.

ci Cicero supposes that Sabinus was so called as being a native of Sabina, a country in Italy, the inhabitants of which were celebrated for having long maintained an unex- pected simplicity of manners. Hanc alter ester vita coluisse Sabini is Virgil's conclusion of that charming description which he gives of the pleasing labours and innocent recreations of rural life, Georg. ii. 532.
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

to which he has no right. However, there is such a modesty in his countenance, and such an air of sincerity in his conversation, that I am much deceived if he does not possess, in some degree, at least, the true Sabine simplicity. But not to suffer him to take up any more of my paper, I will now turn, my dear Trebonius, to yourself. As there were some circumstances attending your departure that increased the affection I bear towards you, let me entreat you, in order to soothe the uneasiness I feel from your absence, to be as frequent a correspondent on your part as you shall certainly find me on mine. There are two reasons, indeed, why you ought to be more so: the first is, that, as the republic can now no longer be considered as in Rome, but removed with its glorious defenders, we, who remain here, must expect to receive from our provincial friends what we used to transmit to them; an account, I mean, of the common-wealth. The next reason is, because I have many other opportunities in your absence, besides that of writing, to give you proof of my friendship; whereas, you have none, I think, of testifying yours, but by the frequency of your letters. As to all other articles, I can wait; but my first and most impatient desire is, to know what sort of journey you have had, where you met Brutus, and how long you continued together. When you are advanced farther towards your province, you will acquaint me, I hope, with your military preparations, and with whatever else relates to our public affairs, that I may be able to form some judgment of our situation. I am sure, at least, I shall give no credit to any intelligence but what I receive from your hands. In the mean time, take care of your health, and continue to allow me the same singular share of your affection which I have always enjoyed. Farewell.

LETTER XI.

Trebonius to Cicero.

I arrived at Athens on the 22d of this month, where, agreeably to my wishes, I had the satisfaction of finding your son in the pursuit of the noblest improvements, and in the highest esteem for his modest and ingenious behaviour. As you perfectly well know the place you possess in my heart, you will judge, without my telling you, bow much pleasure this circumstance afforded me. In conformity, indeed, to the unfeigned friendship which has so long been cemented between us, I rejoice in every advantage that can attend you, be it ever so inconsiderable; much more, therefore, in one so important to your happiness. Believe me, my dear Cicero, I do not flatter you when I say, there is not a youth in all this seminary of learning more ardently devoted to those refined and elevated arts which are so peculiarly your passion, or who, in every view of his character, is more truly amiable, than our young man. I call him ours, for he assured, I cannot separate myself from anything with which you are connected. It is with great pleasure, therefore, as was with strict justice, I congratulate both you and myself, that a youth for whom we ought to have some affection, whatever his disposition might be, is of a character to deserve our highest. As he intimated a desire of seeing Asia, I not only invited, but pressed him to take the opportunity of visiting that province whilst I presided there: and you will not doubt of my supplying your place in every tender office of paternal care. But that you may not be apprehensive of this scheme will prove an interruption of those studies, to which, I know, he is continually animated by your exhortations. Cratippus shall be of our party. Nor shall your son want my earnest incitements to advance daily in those sciences, into which he has already made so successful an entrance.

I am wholly ignorant of what is going forward at Rome; only I hear some uncertain rumours of commotions amongst you. But I hope there is no foundation for this report; that we may one day sit down in the peaceful possession of our liberties, retired from the noise and bustle of the world: a privilege which hitherto it has not been my fortune to enjoy. However, having had a short relaxation from business during my voyage to this place, I amused myself by putting together a few thoughts, which I always designed as a present to you. In this performance I have inserted that lively observation which you formerly made, so much to my honour, and have pointed out, by a note at the bottom, to whom I am indebted for the compliment. If, in some passages of this piece, I should appear to have taken great liberties, I shall be justified, I persuade myself, by the character of the man at whom my invective is aimed; and you will, undoubtedly, excuse the just indignation I have expressed against a person of such infamous principles. Why, indeed, may I not be indulged in the same unbounded licence as was allowed to honest Lucullus? He could not be animated with greater abhorrence of the vices, which he has so freely attacked; and certainly, they were not more worthy of satire than those against which I have inveighed.

I hope you will remember your promise, and take the first opportunity of introducing me as a party in some of your future dialogues. I doubt not, if you should write anything upon the subject of Cicero's death, that you will give an instance of your friendship and your justice, by ascribing to me no inconsiderable share of that glorious transaction.

I recommend my mother and family to your good offices, and bid you farewell.

I know not whether it is with greater pain or pleasure that I reflect on the visit which I lately received from our very good friend, the well-natured Trebatius. He called upon me the next morning after my arrival at Tusculum; and as he was by no means sufficiently recovered from his late indisposition, I could not forbear reproving him for thus hazarding his health. He intercepted me with saying, that nothing was of more importance to him than the business which brought him to my house; and upon my inquiry if anything new had occurred, he immediately entered into an account of your complaints against me. But before I give them a particular answer, let me begin with a few previous reflections.

Amongst all my acquaintance I cannot recollect any man with whom I have longer enjoyed a friendship than with yourself; and, although there are several for whom my affection commenced as early, there are few for whom it has risen so high. The truth of it is, I conceived an esteem for you from the first moment I saw you; and I had reason to believe that you thought of me in the same favourable manner. But your long absence from Rome, which immediately succeeded our first acquaintance, together with that active course of life wherein I was engaged, and which was so entirely different from yours, did not at that time admit of our improving this mutual disposition by a more frequent intercourse: Nevertheless, even so long ago as when Caesar was in Gaul, and many years before the commencement of the civil war, I experienced your friendly inclinations towards me.

For as you imagined that my union with Caesar would be greatly advantageous on my side, and not altogether unuseful to himself, you generously recommended me to his favour, and was the cause of his cultivating my friendship. I forbear to mention several instances which occurred at that period, of the unreserved manner in which we both conversed and corresponded together, as they were followed by others of a more important nature. At the opening of the civil war, when you were going to meet Caesar at Brundisium, you paid me a visit in my Formian villa. This single favour, had it been attended with no other, was at such a critical juncture an ample testimony of your affection. But can I ever forget the generous advice you so kindly gave me at the same time,—and of which Trebatius, I remember, was himself a witness?

Letter XII.

To Marcus Tullius.

Can I ever forget the letter you afterwards wrote to me, when you went to join Caesar in the district, if I mistake not, of Trebula? It was soon after this, that, either by gratitude, by honour, or perhaps by fate, I was determined to follow Pompey into Greece; and there was any instance of an obliging letter, which you did not address both to me and for my family? Was there any one, in short, whom either they or I had more reason to esteem our friend? But I returned to Brundisium; and can I forget (let me ask once more) with what an obliging expedition you hastened, as soon as you heard of my arrival, to meet me at Tarentum? How friendly were your visits,—how kind your endeavours to reason me out of that dejection into which the dread of our general calamities had sunk me? At length, however, I returned to Rome; where every proof of the greatest intimacy, and upon occasions, too, of the most important kind, mutually passed between us. It was by your directions and advice that I learned to regulate my conduct with respect to Caesar; and as to other instances of your friendship, where was the man, except Caesar himself, at whose house you were more frequently visited, or upon whom you bestowed so many agreeable hours of your conversation? in some of which, you may remember, it was that you encouraged me to engage in my philosophical writings. When Caesar afterwards returned from completing his victories, it was your first and principal endeavour to establish me again in his friendship; and it was an endeavour in which you perfectly well succeeded. But if, what purpose, you will ask, perhaps, this long, and at one time, as far less important as kind, and at another I am at a loss to represent in the terms they deserve. Every part, indeed, of your character I admire; but when I consider you as the wise, the firm, and the faithful friend,—as the polite, the witty, and the learned companion,—these, I confess, are the striking points amidst your many other illustrious qualifications with which I am particularly charmed. But it is time to return to the complaints you have alleged against me. Be assured, then, I never once credited the report of your having voted for the law you mentioned to Trebatius; and, indeed, if I had, I should have been well persuaded that you were induced to concur in promoting it upon some very just and rational motive. But as the dignity of your character draws upon you the observation of all the world, the malevolence of mankind will sometimes give severer constructions to your actions than most certainly they merit. If no instances of this kind have ever reached your knowledge, I know not in what manner to proceed in my justification. Believe me, however, I have always defended you upon these occasions with the same warmth and spirit with which I am sensible you are wont to oppose, on your part, the calumnies that are thrown out upon myself. Thus, with regard to the law I just now mentioned, I... have always peremptorily denied the truth of the charge; and as to your having been one of the managers of the late games, I have constantly insisted that you acted agreeably to those pious offices that are due to the memory of a departed friend. In respect to the latter, however, you cannot be ignorant that if Caesar was really a tyrant (as I think he was), your zeal may be considered in two very different views. It may be said (and it is an argument which I never fail to urge in your favour), that you showed a very commendable fidelity in thus displaying your affection to a departed friend. On the other hand, it may be alleged (and, in fact, it is alleged) that the liberties of our country ought to be far preferable even to the life itself of those whom we hold most dear. I wish you had been informed of the part I have always taken whenever this question has been started. But there are two circumstances that reflect the brightest lustre upon your character, and which none of your friends more frequently or more warmly commemo rate than myself,—I mean your having always most strongly recommended pacific measures to Caesar, and constantly advised him to use his victory with moderation; in both which the whole world is agreed with me in acknowledging your merit.

I think myself much obliged to our friend Trebutius for having given me this occasion of justifying myself before you. And you will credit the professions I have here made, unless you imagine me void of every spark of gratitude and generosity: an opinion than which nothing can be more injurious to my sentiments or more unworthy of yours. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

Matius to Cicero.

I received great satisfaction from your letter, as it assured me of my holding that rank in your esteem which I have ever wished and hoped to enjoy. Indeed, I never doubted

7 At the time when Caesar was killed, he was preparing, agreeably to a vow which he had made at the battle of Pharsalia, to exhibit some games in honour of Venus; a divinity from whom he affected to be thought a descendant. Octavius, soon after his return to Rome, upon the death of Caesar, celebrated these games at his own expense, and Matius undertook to be one of the managers. As this was a public mark of respect paid to the memory of Caesar, and might tend to inflame the minds of the populace against the conspirators, it gave much disgust to the friends of the republic; and Cicero, it is probable, was in the number of those who had openly spoken of it with displeasure. He did so, at least, in a letter to Atticus.—Ad Att. xv. 3; Appian. De Bell. Civ. ii. 407.

8 It is with injustice," said the celebrated queen of Sweden, "that Caesar is accused of being a tyrant: if to govern Rome was the most important service he could have performed to his country." It is certain that the republic was disgraced to a state of total anarchy when Caesar usurped the command; but it is equally certain that he himself had been the principal author and instigator of those confusions, which rendered an absolute authority the only possible expedient for reducing the commonwealth into a state of tranquillity and good order. If this be true, it seems no very intricate question to determine what verdict ought to be passed upon Caesar. But surely it is difficult to know by what principles Cicero can be acquitted, who reviled that man when dead, whom he was the first to flatter when living.

of your good opinion; but the value I set upon it renders me solicitous of preserving it without the least flaw into my own and anxious, however, that I had never given just offence to any one however near, I was less disposed to believe that you, whose sentiments are exalted by the cultivation of so many generous arts, could hastily credit any reports to my disadvantage,—especially as you were one for whom I had at all times discovered much sincere good-will. But as I have the pleasure to find that you think of me agreeably to my wishes, I will drop this subject in order to vindicate myself from those calumnies which you have so often, and with such singular generosity, opposed. I am perfectly well apprised of the reflections that have been cast upon me since Caesar's death. It has been imputed to me, I know, that I lamented the loss of my friend, and think with indignation on the murderers of the man I loved. "The welfare of our country," say my accusers (as if they had already made it appear that the destruction of Caesar was for the benefit of the commonwealth), "the welfare of our country is to be preferred to all considerations of amity." It may be so; but I will honestly confess that I am by no means arrived at this elevated strain of patriotism. Nevertheless, I took no part with Caesar in our civil dissensions; but neither did I desert my friend because I disliked his measures. The truth is, I was so far from approving the civil war that I always thought it unjustifiable, and exerted my utmost endeavours to extinguish those sparks by which it was kindled. In conformity to these sentiments, I did not make use of my friend's victory to the gratification of any lucrative or ambitious purposes of my own, as some others most shamefully did whose interest with Caesar was much inferior to mine. Far, in truth, from being a gainer by his success, I suffered greatly in my fortunes by that very law which saved many of those who now exult in his death from the disgrace of being obliged to fly their country." Let me add, that I recommended the vanquished party to his clemency with the same warmth and zeal as if my own preservation had been concerned. Thus desirous that all my fellow-citizens might enjoy their lives in full security, can I repress the indignation of my heart against the assassins of that man from whose generosity this privilege was obtained,—especially as the same hands were lifted up to his destruction which had first drawn upon him all the odium and envy of his administration? Yet I am threatened, it seems, with their vengeance, for daring to condemn the deed. Unexampled insolence! that some should glory in the perpetration of those crimes which others should not be permitted even to deplore! The meanest slave has ever been allowed to indulge, without control, the fears, the sorrows, or the joys of his heart; but those, our assertors of liberty, as they call themselves, endeavour to extort from me, by their menaces, this common privilege of every creature. Vain and impotent endeavours! no dangers shall intimidate me from acting up to the generous duties of friendship and humanity; persuaded, as I have ever been, that death in an honest cause ought never to be shunned, and frequently to be courted. Yet why does it thus move their displeasure, if I only wish that they may repent of what they have perpetrated? For wish I will acknowledge I do, that both they and all the world may repent of Cesars in due time. But as a member (say they) of the commonwealth, you ought above all things to desire its preservation. Now that I sincerely do so, if the whole tenor of my past conduct, and all the hopes I can reasonably be supposed to entertain will not sufficiently evince, shall not attempt to prove it by my professions. I conjure you, then, to judge of me, not by what others may say, but by the plain tendency of my actions; and, if you believe I have any interest in the tranquillity of the republic, be assured that I will have no communication with those who would impiously disturb its peace. Shall I renounce, indeed, those patriot principles I steadily pursued in my youth, when warmth and inexperience might have pleased some excuse for errors? Shall I, in the sober season of declining age, wantonly unravel all the noble fair conclusions of my better days? Most assuredly not; nor shall I ever give any other offence than in bewailing the severe catastrophe of a most intimate and illustrious friend! Were I disposed to act otherwise, I should scorn to deny it; nor should it be ever said that I covered my crimes by hypocrisy, and feared to avow what I scrupled not to commit.

But to proceed to the other articles of the charge against me; it is farther alleged that I presided at those games which the young Octavius exhibited in honour of Caesars victories. The charge, I confess, is true; but what connexion has an act of mere private duty, with the concerns of the republic? It was an office, not only due from me to the memory of my departed friend, but which I could not refuse to that illustrious youth, his most worthy heir. I am reproached, also, with having been frequent in paying my visits of compliment to Antony; yet you will find that the very men who impute this as a mark of disaffection to my country, appeared much more frequently at his levee, either to solicit his favours, or to receive them. But, after all, can there be anything, let me ask, more insufferably arrogant than this accusation? Caesar never opposed my associating with whomsoever I thought proper, even though it was with men of war, with persons whom he himself disapproved; and shall the men who have cruelly robbed me of one friend, attempt, likewise, by their malicious insinuations, to alienate me from another? But the moderation of my conduct, will, I doubt not, discredit all reports that may hereafter be raised to my disadvantage; and I am persuaded, that even those who hate me for my attachment to Caesar, would rather choose a friend of my disposition, than of their own. In fine, if my affairs should permit me, it is my resolution to spend the remainder of my days at Rhodes. But, if any accident should render it necessary for me to continue at Rome, my actions shall evince, that I am sincerely desirous of my country's welfare. In the mean time, I am much obliged to Trebius for supplying you with an occasion of so freely laying open to me the amiable sentiments of your heart; as it affords me an additional reason for cultivating a friendship with one whom I have ever been disposed to esteem. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

Marcus Brutus and Caius Cassius, Praetors, to Mark Antony, Consul.

If we were not persuaded of your honour and friendship, we should not trouble you with the present application; which, in confidence of both, we doubt not of your receiving in the most favourable manner.

We are informed, that great numbers of the veteran troops are already arrived in Rome, and that many more are expected by the first of June. Our sentiments would be extremely changed, indeed, if we entertained any fears or suspicions with regard to yourself. However, as we resigned ourselves entirely to your direction, and, in compliance with your advice, not only published an edict, but wrote circular letters in order to dismiss our friends who came to our assistance from the municipal towns, we may justly look upon ourselves as worthy of being admitted into a share of your counsels; especially in an article wherein we are particularly concerned. It is our joint request, therefore, that you would explicitly acquaint us with your intentions, and whether you imagine we can possibly be safe amidst such a multitude of veteran troops, who have even some design, we are told, of replacing the altar which was erected to Caesar; a design, surely, which no one can wish may meet with your approbation, who has any regard to our credit or security. It has sufficiently appeared, that from the beginning of this affair, we have had a view to the public tranquility, and have aimed at nothing more than the recovery of our common liberties. No man, except yourself, has it in his power to deceive us, because we never have trusted, nor ever will trust, any other; and most certainly you have too much integrity to betray the confidence we have reposed in you. Our friends, however, notwithstanding that they have the same reliance upon your good faith, are greatly alarmed for our safety; as they think so large a body of veterans may much more easily be instigated to violent measures by ill-designing men, than they can be restrained by your influence and authority. We entreat you, therefore, to return us a full and satisfactory answer. To tell us that you ordered these troops to march to Rome, as intending to move the senate in June next, concerning their affairs, is amusing us with a very idle and trifling reason; for as you are assured that we shall not attempt to obstruct this design, from... what other quarter can you possibly suspect that it will be opposed? In a word, it cannot be thought that we are too anxious for our own preservation, whether it be considered, that no accident can happen to our persons without involving the whole republic in the most dangerous commotions. Farewell

LETTER XV.

To Caius Cassius.

BELIEVE me, my Cassius, the republic is the perpetual subject of my meditations; or, to express the same thing in other words, you and Marcus Brutus are never out of my thoughts. It is upon you two, indeed, together with Decimus Brutus, that all our hopes depend.—Mine are somewhat raised by the glorious conduct of Dolabella, in suppressing the late insurrection; which had spread so wide, and gathered every day such additional strength, that it seemed to threaten destruction to the whole city. But this mob is now so totally quelled that I think we have nothing further to fear from any future attempt of the same kind. Many other fears, however, and very considerable ones too, still remain with us; and it entirely rests upon you, in conjunction with your illustrious associates, to remove them. Yet where to advise you to begin for that purpose, I must acknowledge myself at a loss. To say truth, it is the tyrant alone, and not the tyranny, from which we seem to be delivered; for although the man, indeed, is destroyed, we still suffer many sensible pains from his despotic ordinances. We do more; and, under the pretence of carrying his designs into execution, we approve of measures which even he himself would never have pursued: and the misfortune is, that I know not where this extravagance will end. When I reflect on the laws that are enacted, on the immunities that are granted, on the immense largesses that are distributed, on the exiles that are recalled, and on the fictitious decrees that are published, the only effect that seems to have been produced by Caesar's death is, that it has extinguished the sense of our servitude, and the abhorrence of that detestable usurper; as all the disorders into which he threw the republic still continue. These are the evils; therefore, which it is incumbent upon you and your patriot coadjuvers to redress: for let not my friends imagine that they have yet completed their work. The obligations, it is true, which the republic has already received from you, are far greater than I could venture to hope: still however her demands are not entirely satisfied; and she promises herself yet higher services from such brave and generous benefactors, who have engaged her injuries, by the death of her oppressor; but you have done nothing more. For, tell me, what has she yet recovered of her former dignity and lustre? Does she not obey the will of that tyrant, now he is dead, whom she could not endure when living? And do we not, instead of repealing his public laws, authenticate even his private memorandums? You will tell me perhaps (and you may tell me with truth) that I concurred in passing a decree for that purpose. It was in compliance however with public circumstances; a regard to which is of much consequence in political deliberations of every kind. But there are some however who have most immoderately and ungratefully abused the concessions we found it thus necessary to make.

I hope very speedily to discuss this and many other points with you in person. In the mean time be persuaded that the affection I have ever borne to my country, as well as my particular friendship to yourself, renders the advancement of your credit and esteem with the public extremely my concern. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.

To Oppius.

The sentiments and advice which your letter has so freely given me, in relation to my leaving Italy; together with what you said to Atticus, in a late conversation upon this subject, have greatly contributed, he can bear me witness, to dispel those doubts that occurred on whichever side I viewed this question. I have ever thought indeed that no man was more capable of forming a right judgment, nor more faithful in communicating it, than yourself; as I am sure I very particularly experienced in the beginning of the late civil wars. For you had told me in regard to my following Pompey, or remaining in Italy, your advice I remember was, that "I should act as my honour directed." This sufficiently discovered your opinion; and I could not but look with admiration on so remarkable an instance of your sincerity. For notwithstanding your strong attachment to Cesar, who, you had reason to think, would have been better pleased if I had pursued a different conduct; yet you rather chose I should act agreeably to your honour, than in conformity to his inclination. My friendship for you, however, did not take its rise from this period; for I was sensible that I enjoyed a share in your esteem long before the time of which I am speaking. I shall ever remember indeed the generous services you conferred both upon myself and my family, during the great misfortunes which I suffered in my exile: and the strict intimacy in which we conversed with each other, after your return, as well as the sentiments which upon all occasions, I professed to entertain of you, are circumstances which none who were inclined to observe them could possibly overlook. But you gave me a most distinguishing proof of the good opinion you had conceived of my constancy and fidelity, by the unreserved resignation of your heart to me, after the death of Caesar. I should think myself therefore a disgrace to human nature, if I did not justify these your favourable sentiments, by every kind of good office in my power, as well as by the return of my warmest affection. Continue yours to me, my dear Qopius, I esteem you, a request however which I prefer more in compliance with the customary form, than as thinking it in the least necessary. I recommend all my affairs in general to your protection, and leave it to Atticus to inform you in what particular points I desire your services. When I shall be more at leisure, you may expect a longer letter. In the mean time take care of your health, as the most agreeable instance you can give me of your friendship. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

To Trebatius.

I AM the more enamoured with this city,4 because I find you are much the favourite of everybody in it. But I know not, in truth, where you are otherwise; and I should rather have told you, that even the absence of your freedman, Rufus, is no less regretted among them than if he were a person of as much consequence as you and I. However, I by no means disapprove of your having called him from hence, in order to superintend the buildings you are carrying on in the Lupercale5: for, notwithstanding your house at Velia is altogether as agreeable as that which you have in Rome, yet I should prefer the latter to all the possessions you enjoy here. Nevertheless, if you should take the opinion of a man whose advice you seldom reject, you will not part with your patrimony on the banks of the noble Hales, nor forsake a villa which has had the honour of belonging to Papirius, an intention which the citizens of Velia are in some fear lest you should entertain. But although it be incommoded, indeed, by the great concourse of strangers who visit the adjoining grove; yet that objection may easily be removed, you know, by cutting down6 this imperient plantation, which will prove a very considerable advantage likewise both to your pocket and your prospect. To speak seriously, it is a great convenience, especially in such distracted times as the present, to be possessed of an estate which affords you a refuge from Rome, in a pleasant and healthy situation, and in a place where you are so universally beloved. To these considerations, I will add, my dear Trebatius, that, perhaps, it may be for my advantage also, that you should not part with this villa. But, whatever you may determine, take care both of yourself and my affairs; and expect to see me, if the gods permit, before the end of the year.

I have purloined from Sextius Fadius, one of Nico’s disciples, a treatise which the latter has written concerning the pleasures of the palate. Agreeable physician! how easily will he make me a convert to his doctrine! Our friend Bassus was so jealous of this treasure, that he endeavoured to conceal it from me; but I imagine, by the freedom of your table indulgencies, that he has been less reserved in communicating the secrets of it to you.

—The wind has just now turned to a favourable point, so that I must bid you farewell.

Velia, July the 2oth.

LETTER XVIII.

To the same.

You see the influence you have over me; though, indeed, it is not greater than what you are justly entitled to, from that equal return of friendship you make to mine. I could not, therefore, be easy in the reflection, I will not say of having absolutely refused, but of not having complied, however, with the request you made me, when we were lately together. Accordingly, as soon as I set sail from Velia, I employed myself in drawing up the treatise you desired, upon the plan of Aristotle's Topics7: as, indeed, I could not look upon a city in which you are so generally beloved, without being reminded of my friend. If now you send me the produce of these meditations; which I have endeavoured to express with all the perspicacity that a subject of this nature will admit. Nevertheless, if some passages should appear dark, you must do me the justice to remember, that no science can be rendered perfectly intelligible without the assistance of a master to explain and apply its rules. To send you no farther, for an instance, than to your own profession, could a knowledge of the law he acquired merely from books? Undoubtedly it could not; for although the treatises which have been written upon that subject are extremely numerous, yet they are by no means of themselves sufficient instructors, without the help of some learned guide to enlighten their obscurities. However, with respect to the observations in the present performance, if you give them a frequent and attentive perusal, you will certainly be able to enter into their meaning; but the ready application of them can only be

4 Cicero, after much debate with himself concerning the voyage which he is to make in the preceding letter, at length fixed his resolution and embarked. He sailed along the western coast of Italy, towards Rhegium, but came ashore every night, in order to lodge at the villa of some friend. He was in this manner pursuing his voyage into Greece when he wrote the present letter from Velia, a sea-port town on the coast of Lucania.

5 A range of buildings in Rome, so called from an ancient temple of the same name, which had been formerly erected upon that spot to the god Pan. —Dion. Hal. i. 19.

6 Groves were generally consecrated to some divinity, as this seems to have been, by the number of strangers who probably frequented it on a religious account. Instead of lucem, therefore, which is the reading adopted by Manutius, and followed in the translation, some of the commentators have thought it should be latum: because, if it were a consecrated grove, it could not be cut down without committing an act of impiety. But this objection is founded upon the mistake that Cicero spoke in a serious sense what he seems plainly to have intended in a indirec tone.

7 The treatise here mentioned is still extant among Cicero's works, and appears to be a sort of epitome of what Aristotle had long before published upon the same subject. The principal design of it is, to point out the several sources from whence arguments upon every question may be derived.
attained by repeated exercise. And in this exercise I shall not fail to engage you, if I should return safe into Italy, and find the republic in a state of repose. Farewell.
Rhegium, July the 38th.

LETTER XIX.

Brutus and Cassius, Praetors, to Antony, Consul.

The letter we have received from you is altogether agreeable to your late contumelious and menacing edict, and by no means becoming you to have written to us. We have in no sort, Antony, given you any just provocation; nor could we have imagined, that you would look upon it as anything extraordinary, if, invested as we are with the high authority of praetors, we thought proper, in a public manifesto, to signify our requests to the consul. But if it raises your indignation that we presumed to take this liberty as praetors, allow us to lament that you should not indulge us in it at least as friends.

We receive it as an instance of your justice, that you deny ever having complained of our levying troops and contributions, and making applications to the armies, both at home and abroad, to rise in our defence; a charge which we likewise disavow in every particular. We cannot but wonder, however, since you were silent upon this head, that you should be so little able to command yourself upon another, as to reproach us with the death of Caesar.

We leave it to your own reflections to determine what sentiments it ought to create in us, that the praetors of Rome, in order to preserve the tranquility and liberties of the commonwealth, cannot publish a manifesto declaring their desire of retiring from the execution of their office, without being insulted by the consul. "Tis in vain, however, that you would intimidate us by your arms; for it would ill become the spirit we have shown to be discouraged by dangers of any kind. As little should Antony attempt to usurp an authority over those to whom he is himself indebted for the liberty he enjoys. To the free and independent, the measures of any man are perfectly impotent. Had we a design, therefore, of having recourse to arms, your letter would be altogether ineffectual to deter us from our purpose. But, you are well convinced, that no consideration can prevail with us to rekindle the flames of a civil war; and, perhaps, you artfully threw out these menaces in order to persuade the world that our pacific measures are the effect, not of choice, but timidity.

To speak plainly our sentiments, we wish to see ourselves to the highest honours; but to honours that are conferred by a free republic. It is our desire, likewise, not to engage with you in any contests; but we must add, that the possession of our liberties is of far higher value in our esteem than the enjoyment of your friendship. Well consider what you undertake, and how far you may be able to carry it into execution; reflecting, not how many years Caesar was permitted to live, but how short a period he was suffered to reign. In the mean while, let us endeavor to protect the republic with such counsels as may tend to the advantage both of yourself and of the commonwealth. But should they prove otherwise, we wish that the consequence may be as little detrimental to your own interest, as shall be consistent with the dignity and safety of the republic.

August the 4th.

LETTER XX.

To Plancus.

I had left Rome, and was actually on my voyage to Greece, when I was recalled by the general voice of the republic; but the conduct of Marc Antony, ever since my return, has

1 Caesar did not continue longer than five months in the peacable enjoyment of his usurpation; for he returned to Rome, from the conquest of Pompey's sons in Spain, in the month of October 708, and was assassinated in the March following.—Vell. Pat. ii. 56.

2 Some general account of Plancus has already been given in rem. iv. p. 475. In the beginning of the present year he was appointed by Caesar governor of the farther Gaul, where he now was, at the head of three legions. He is said, during his residence in that province, to have founded the city of Lyons. Upon the death of Caesar, to whom he had been warmly attached, Cicero employed all his art to engage him on the side of the senate; and Plancus, after much hesitation, at length declared himself accordingly. But this declaration seems to have been entirely the effect of a belief that the rupture between Antony and the senate was upon the point of being accommodated: it is certain, at least, that it was not sincere. For Plancus soon afterwards betrayed the cause he had thus professed to support, and went over with his troops to Antony.—Fizh. Annal. ii. 468; Sene., Ep. 91; Vell. Pat. ii. 63. See rem. iv. on letter 18 of book xv.

3 The principal motive of Cicero's intended voyage into Greece was in order to avoid the danger of suspension. However, he at length embarked; but the sooner sailed than he repented, as usual, of the step he had taken. Nevertheless, he pursued his voyage and arrived in Sicily, from whence he proposed to stretch over into Greece; but, in attempting this passage, he was blown back by contrary winds on the coast of Italy. Upon his going ashore, in order to refresh himself, he was informed by some of the principal inhabitants of that part of the country, who were just arrived from Rome, that there were great hopes Antony would accommodate affaires to the general satisfaction of all parties. This news was followed by a letter from Atticus, pressing him to renounce his intended voyage, as also by an interview with Brutus, who likewise expressed his disapprobation of that scheme. Upon these considerations, therefore, he gave up all further thoughts of Greece, and not permitted me to enjoy a moment of repose. The erocity (for to call it pride would be imputing a to him which is nothing uncommon) the erocity of his temper is so excessive, that he cannot hear a word, or even a look, which is animated with the least spirit of liberty. It is this that fills my heart with a thousand disquietudes: but dis-quietudes, in which my own preservation is by no means concerned. No, my friend, I have nothing farther to wish with respect to myself, whether I consider the years to which I am arrived, the actions that I have performed, or the glory (if that may be mentioned as of any value in the account) with which they have been crowned. All my anxiety is for our country alone; and the more so, my dear Plancus, as the time appointed for your succession to the consular office is so remote, that it is rather to be wished than expected, that we should be able to preserve our liberties so long alive. What rational hopes, indeed, can possibly be entertained, where a commonwealth is totally oppressed by the arms of the most violent and outrageous of men, where neither the senate nor the people have any authority; where neither laws nor justice prevail; and, in one word, where there is not the least trace or shadow of civil government remaining? But as you receive, I imagine, the public accounts of what is transacted amongst us,
I need not descend into a detail of particulars.
Let me rather, in consequence of that affection I bear you, and which has been still increasing from our earliest youth, let me rather remind and exhort you, to turn all your thoughts and cares towards the republic. If it should not be utterly destroyed core you enter upon the consular office, it may, without difficulty, be steered right. Though I will add, that much vigilance as well as great good fortune must concur, in order to preserve it to that desirable period. But I hope we may see you here, somewhat before that time shall arrive.
Meanwhile, besides the inducements that arise to me from my regard to the well-being of the republic, you may be assured that, from my particular attachment likewise to yourself, I shall exert my utmost efforts for the advancement of your credit and honours. By these means, I shall have the satisfaction to discharge, at once, the duties I owe both to my country and to my friend; to that country which is the object of my warmest affections, and to that friend whose amity I would most religious cultivate.

I am extremely rejoiced, though by no means surprised, to find that you treat Furnius agreeably to his rank and merit. Be assured that whatever favours you shall think proper to confer upon him, I shall consider them as so many immediate instances of your regard to myself. Farewell.

immediately returned to Rome.—Ad Att. xiv. 13, 22; xv.
19, 20, 21, 33; xlvi. 6, 7.

n Cicero was, at this time, in his 63d year.
Cicero was in the number of those whom Caesar had named to the consulate, in that general designation of magistrates which he made a short time before his death.
But as Plancus stood last in the list, his turn was not to commence till the year 711.

o He was lieutenant to Plancus in Gaul.

LETTER XXI.
Decimus Brutus, Consul elect, to Cicero.

If I entertained the least doubt of your inclinations to serve me, I should be extremely copious in my solicitations for that purpose; but I have strongly persuaded myself that my interest is already a part of your care.
I led my army against the inhabitants of the Alps, so not much from an ambition of being saluted with the title of Imperator, as in order to comply with the martial spirit of my troops, and to strengthen their attachment to our cause.
In both these views I have, I think, succeeded:
as the soldiers have had an opportunity, by this measure, of experiencing the courage and the generosity of their general. I was engaged with the most warlike of these people; and have taken and destroyed great numbers of their forts. In short, I thought the action sufficiently considerable to send an account of it to the senate. I hope, therefore, you will support my pretensions with your suffrage, as it will, at the same time, be greatly contributing to the credit of the common cause. Farewell.

LETTER XXII.
To Decimus Brutus, Consul elect.

It is of much consequence to the success of this epistle, whether it reaches you in an anxious or an easy hour. Accordingly, I have directed the bearer to watch the favourable mo-moment of delivering it into your hands: as there is a time, my friend, when a letter, no less than a visit, may prove extremely unseasonable. But if he should observe the caution I have enjoined him, and this should find you, as I hope it will, in a state of mind perfectly serene and undisturbed,
I doubt not of your ready compliance with the request
I am going to make.

Lucius Lamia offers himself as a candidate at the ensuing election of praetors. There is no man with whom I live in an equal degree of familiarity, as we are intimately, indeed, united, by a long acquaintance. But what greatly, likewise, recom-mands him to me is, that nothing affords me more entertainment than his company. To this I must add, the infinite obligations I received from him in my affair with Clodius. He was at that time at the head of the equestrian order; and, he entered with so much spirit into my cause, that the consul Gabinius commanded him to withdraw from Rome;
a indignity never offered before to any citizen of p Decimus Brutus was nominated by Caesar to be colleague with Plancus, of whose appointment to the consular office mention has been made in rem. n on the preceding episode. Soon after the rest of the conspirators found it necessary to leave Rome, Decimus withdrew into Cisalpine Gaul, in order to take possession of that province which had been allotted to him by Caesar, and to put himself in a posture of defence against the attempts which Antony was meditating. Shortly after his arrival in that province, he employed his troops in an expedition against certain inhabitants of the neighbouring mountains; and having happily executed this scheme, he wrote the following letter to request Cicero's suffrage in procuring him those distinctions which the senate usually descent to their successful generals.

the republic. As the world has not forgotten what he thus suffered upon my account, I am sure it would be the highest reproach upon my character if I did not remember it myself; and, therefore, my dear friend, be well assured that the good or ill success of Lamia, in his present pursuit, will no less sensibly affect me, than if I were personally concerned. Notwithstanding, therefore, the illustrious character which Lamia bears, together with the great popularity he has acquired by the magnificence of the games he exhibited when he was alive, yet I am labouring with as much misiduity to promote his interest, as if he had none of these advantages to recommend him. If, then, I possess that share in your affection which I am well persuaded I enjoy; let me entreat you to write to Lupus to secure the votes of those equestrian centuries over which you bear an unlimited sway. But not to detain you with a multiplicity of words, I will conclude all with most sincerely assuring you, that although there is nothing, my dear Brutus, which I have not reason to expect from your friendship, yet you can, in no instance, more effectually oblige me, than by complying with my present request. Farewell.

LETTER XXIII.

To the same.

There is none of my friends with whom I live in so strict an intimacy as with Lamia. To say A. v. 709. that I am much indebted to his good offices, would not be speaking of them in the terms they deserve; for the truth is (and it is a truth of which the whole republic is sensible), he has conferred upon me the highest and most generous obligations. Lamia, after having passed through the office of edile with the greatest splendour and magnificence, now offers himself as a candidate for the pretorship; and, it is universally acknowledged, that he wants neither interest nor dignity to support his pretensions. However, the opposition he is likely to meet with from his competitors is so strong, that I have many fears for the event; and, therefore, think myself obliged to be his general solicitor upon this occasion. I well know how much it is in your power to serve me in this affair, and I have no doubt of your inclination. Be assured, then, my dear Brutus, that you cannot more sensibly oblige me than by assisting Lamia in his present pursuit; and it is with all the warmth of my heart that I entreat you to exert your utmost interest for that purpose. Farewell.

LETTER XCV.

To Caius Cassius.

It gives me great pleasure to find that my late speech has received your approbation. If I could more frequently enforce the same sentiments, the liberties of the republic might easily be recovered. But that far more desperate and detestable accendr

1 than he at whose death you said "the worst of all villains is expired," is watching for a pretence to begin his murderous purposes; and his single view, in charging me with having advised the killing of Caesar, is merely to excite the veteran soldiers against my life. But this is a danger which I am not afraid to hazard, since he gives me a share with you in the honour of that glorious deed. Hence it is, however, that neither Piso, who first ventured to inveigh against the measures of Antony, nor myself, who made a speech to the same purpose about a month afterwards, nor Publius Servilius, who followed my example, can any of us appear with safety in the senate. For this inhuman gladiator has evidently a design upon our lives: and he hoped to have rendered me the first victim of his cruel vengeance. With this sanguinary view he entered the senate on the 19th of September, having several days before retired to the villa of Metellus, in order to prepare an inflammatory speech against me. But who shall reconcile the silent meditations of eloquence with the noisy revels of lewdness and debauchery? Accordingly, it was the opinion of all his audience (as I have already, I believe, mentioned to you in a former letter) that he could not so properly be said to have delivered a speech, as to have discharged, with his usual indecency, the horrid fumes of his scandalous intemperance.

You are persuaded, you tell me, that my credit and eloquence will be able to produce some good effect. And some, indeed, they have produced, considering the sad situation of our affairs. They have rendered the people sensible that there are three persons of consular rank, who, because they are in the interest of the republic, and have spoken their sentiments in the senate with freedom, cannot attend that assembly without the danger of being assassinated. And this is all the good you are to expect from my oratory. A certain relation of yours is so captivated with his new alliance, that he no longer concerns himself in the success of your games; but, on the contrary, is mortified to the last degree at those useless and disgraceful shows with which your brother has distinguished himself. Another of your family has been softened by some grants which it is pretended that Caesar had designed to confer upon him. This, however, to the memory of Caesar, our author excused himself from being present. The following day, however, Antony being absent, Cicero ventured to appear in the senate, when he delivered the speech to which he here alludes, and which is the first of those that are called his "Philippics." See Life of Cicero, p. 345.

1 Antony. 2 Caesar. 3 The speech mentioned in rem. 4 of this letter. 5 It was in answer to this speech that Cicero composed his second Philippic, which, however, he did not deliver. For, by the advice of his friends, he abstained from this measure, as they did not think it safe for him to be present.—Manutius.

6 Leopoldus is supposed to be the person here meant, as he was related to Cassius by his own marriage, and had lately married the daughter of Antony's daughter.

7 Brutus and Cassius were obliged, as praece, to exhibit certain games in honour of Apollo, with which the public were annually entertained on the third of July; but as they had withdrawn themselves from Rome, these games were conducted by the brother of Cassius.

8 It is not known to whom Cicero alludes in this place, nor in the period immediately following.
LETTER XXVI.

To Cæcurn Cæsaris.

The malignant spirit of your friend b突破s out every day with greater and more open violence. To the instance, in the first place, the statue which he has lately erected near the rostrum, to Caesar, under which he has inscribed, To the excellent father of his country; intimating that you and your heroic associates are to be considered, not only as assassins, but parri-cides. In which number I am, likewise, included; for this outrageous man represents me as the principal adviser and promoter of your most glorious enterprise. Would to heaven the charge were true! for had I been a party in your councils, I should have put it out of his power thus to perplex and embarrass our affairs c. But this was a point which depended upon yourselves to determine; and, since the opportunity is now over, I can only wish that I were capable of giving you any effectual advice. But the truth is, I am utterly at a loss in what manner to act myself: for to what purpose is resistance, where one cannot oppose force by force?

It is evidently the intent of Caesar to prey upon his former friends. And, accordingly, Antony being on the 2d of October last presented to the people by Canutius d, mentioned the generous deerivers of our country in terms that traitors alone deserve. He scrupled not to assert, likewise, that you had acted entirely by my advice, and that Canutius, also, was under the same influence. He had the mortification, however, to leave the rostrum with great disgrace. In a word, you may judge what are the designs of this faction by their having seized the appointments of your lieutenant e; for does not their conduct, in this instance, sufficiently declare, that they considered this money as going to be remitted to a public enemy? Wretched condition, indeed! that we, who scorned to submit to a master, should more ignobly crouch to one of our fellow slaves! Nevertheless, I am still inclined to flatter myself, that we are not quite deprived of all hopes of being delivered by your heroic efforts. But where then, let me ask, are your troops? And with this question I will conclude my letter; as I had rather leave the rest to be suggested by your own reflections, than by mine. Farewell.

a The occasion on which Plancus had applied to Cicero for his services in the senate does not appear.

b Antony.

c Cicero frequently reproaches the conspirators with having committed a capital mistake in sparing Antony when they destroyed Caesar, an error which our author would have prevented, it seems, had they admitted him into their councils. But it may be affirmed, (and upon the authority of Cicero himself,) that nothing could have been more unjustifiable than to have rendered Antony a joint victim with Caesar. 'Tis true, there was an ancient law subsisting, by which every one was authorised to lift up his sword against the man who should discover any designs of invading the public liberties. But Antony was so far from having given indications of this kind at Caesar's death, that Cicero, in a letter written to Atticus, soon afterwards, tells him he looked upon Antony as a man too much devoted to public service to be inclined to form any schemes destructive of the public reepose: "quem quidem ego (says he) epularem magis arbitor rationem habere, quam quisquam malum cogitare."—Quint. in Vit. Publ.; Ad Att. vi. 3.

d He was one of the trimen of the present year.

e As proconsul of Syria, to which province Cæsars was probably, on his way when this letter was written.
LETTER XXVII.

To Cornificius.

Stratorius has given me an ample account of the sad situation of affairs in your province. Oh, my friend, what insufferable outrages are committed in every part of the Roman dominions! But those which have been offer'd to yourself are so much the less to be borne, as they are aggravated by the superior veneration which is due to your character. No wonder, therefore, that your great and generous spirit may incline you to look upon these insults with calmness, and, perhaps, with indifference, yet you ought by no means to suffer them to pass unchastised.

The news of Rome, I well know, is regularly transmitted to you; otherwise I would take upon myself to be your informer, and particularly of the late attempt of Octavius. The fact laid to his charge is considered by the populace as a mere fiction of Antony, in order to gain a pretence to seize upon the young man's estate. But the more penetrating and better sort, not only credit the report, but highly approve the design. Indeed, the hopes of the republic are greatly turned towards Octavius; as there is nothing which his generous thirst of glory, 'tis believed, will not animate him to perform. My friend Antony, at the same time, is so sensible of his being generally detested, that although he discovered the assassins in his house, yet he would not venture to make the affair public. He set out for Brundisium on the 9th of October, in order to meet the four legions that are returning from Macedonia; he hopes, by bring them over to his interest, to conduct them to Rome, and with their assistance to fix the yoke upon our necks. Thus you see the situation of the republic! If a republic, indeed, it may with any propriety be called, where all is in a state of intestine war. I frequently lament your fortune, in having been born so late, as never to have tasted the happiness of living in a sound and well-regulated commonwealth. You remember the time, however, when there was a prospect, at least, of better days, but now that prospect is no more! How in truth should it any longer subsist, after Antony dared to declare, in a general assembly of the people, that "Cassius affected to rank himself with those who could never appear in Rome, so long as he preserved his life and authority?" But thanks to philosophy for having taught me to endure this and every other mortification which human nature can possibly suffer; and, indeed, it has not only cured me of all my disquietudes, but armed my breast against every future assault of fortune. And let me advise you to fortify yourself with the same resolution, in the full persuasion that nothing but guilt deserves to be considered as a real evil. But these are reflections which you know much better how to make, than I can instruct you.

Stratorius has always been highly in my esteem; but he has rendered himself more particularly so by the great diligence, fidelity, and judgment he discovers in the management of your affairs. Take care of your health, as the most pleasing instance you can give me of your friendship. Farewell.

LETTER XXVIII.

To the same.

My very intimate and most accomplished friend, Caius Anicius, has obtained a titular legation into Africa, in order to transact some business relating to his private concerns in that province. Let me, therefore, entreat your best offices to him upon all occasions, and that you would give him your assistance for the more easy and expeditious despatch of his affairs. But above all (as it is superior to all in my friend's estimation) I recommend the dignity of his rank and character to your peculiar regard; and accordingly I make it my mission, that you would appoint licitors to attend him. This is a compliment which I always spontaneously paid, during my own consulship, to those of senatorial rank, who came into my province, and which I have ever, likewise, myself received upon the same occasions; as, indeed, it is what I have both heard and observed to have been generally practised by procouns of the greatest distinction. You will act, then, in the same manner, my dear Cornificius, in the present instance, if I have any share in your affection, and in all other respects will consult the honour and interest of my friend, assuring yourself that you cannot confer upon me a more acceptable service. Farewell.

LETTER XXIX.

To Tiro.

I see into your scheme; you have a design that your letters, as well as mine, should make their appearance in public. But, tell me, how happened it, that you, who are wont to be the supreme judge and critic of my writings, should be guilty of so inaccurate an expression as... to desire me "faithfully! to preserve my health?" That adverb surely can have no business there, as its proper employment is to attend upon some word that imports a moral obligation. The figurative language, its use, indeed, is various, as it may be applied even to inanimate and intellectual objects, provided (as Theophrastus observes) the metaphor be not too bold and unnatural. But we will reserve this for a conversation when we meet.

Demetrius has been here; but I had the address to avoid both him and his retinue. Doubtless, you will regret that you lost the opportunity of seeing him. It is an opportunity, however, which you may still recover; for he returns, it seems, tomorrow. Accordingly, I purpose to leave this place the next morning.

I am extremely uneasy about your health, and entreat you not to omit any means that may contribute to its re-establishment. It is thus that you will render me insensible of your absence, and abundantly discharge all the services I require at your hands.

I am directed to your good offices towards Cuspius, for I greatly interest myself in the success of his affairs. Adieu.

LETTER XXX.
To Cornificius.

QUINTUS TURIUS, who was an African merchant of great probity, as well as of an honourable family, is lately dead. He has appointed Cneius Saturninus, Sextus Aufidius, and Caius Annius, together with Quintus Considius Galinus, Lucius Servilius Posthumus, and Caius Rabelius, all of them men of the same worthy character as himself, his joint heirs. I find you have already treated them in so generous a manner, that they have more occasion for my acknowledgments to you than my recommendation; and, indeed, the favours they gratefully profess to have received from your hands, are more considerable than I should have ventured, perhaps, to request. Nevertheless, as I perfectly well know the regard you pay to my recommendation, I will take courage, and entreat you to add to those services, which you have already, without my solicitation, so liberally conferred upon them. But what I am particularly to desire is, that you would not suffer Eros Turius, the testator's freedman, to continue to embezze his late patron's effects. In every other instance, also, I recommend their interest to your protection, assuring you that you will receive much satisfaction from the regard and attachment of these my illustrious friends. Again and again, therefore, I very earnestly recommend them to your good offices.

Farewell.

1 It is impossible, perhaps, to determine, precisely, wherein the impropriety of this expression consisted, as it does not appear from the original whether Tiro spoke of his own health or of Cicero's. In the translation, however, it is applied to the latter, as it seems to render the expression less critically just. For as Tiro was Cicero's slave, the care of his health was a duty which the former owed to the latter, as a necessary means of enabling him to perform those services to which Cicero had a right. Accordingly, therefore, to our author's own remark concerning the literal use of the word fideltia, Tiro might very properly have applied it in the sense here mentioned. But there was no such duty owing from the master to the slave; and, consequently, Tiro could not, ia strict propriety, have applied it to Cicero.

2 Soon after Cicero's late return to Rome, [see p. 541.] he came to an open rupture with Antony. It found it necessary, therefore, for his security, to remove from the city to some of his villas near Naples.—Life of Cicero, p. 224.

3 The same, probably, which stands the 21st in the present book, p. 552.

4 December. Antony had just before left Rome, in order to march his army into Cisalpine Gaul. Upon the news of this retreat, Cicero immediately returned to the city.—Life of Cicero, p. 247.

LETTER XXXII.

To Cornificius.

There is no man that cultivates my friendship with greater marks of esteem than Sextus Anti-dius; nor is there any of equestrian rank who bears a more distinguished character. The strictness of his morals is so happily tempered with the sweetness of his disposition, that he unites the severest virtue with the easiest and most engaging address. I recommend his affairs in Africa to you, with the utmost warmth and sincerity of my heart. You will extremely oblige me, therefore, by showing him that you pay the highest regard to my recommendation; and I very earnestly entreat you, my dear Cornificius, to comply with this request. Farewell.

LETTER XXXIII.

To Decimus Brutus, Consul-elect.

Marcus Seius has, I suppose, informed you what my sentiments were at the conference which Lupus held at my house with Libo, your relation Servilus, and myself; as he was present during the consultation. And, though Greecius immediately followed him, he can give you an account of all that passed after Seius set out.

The grand and capital point, which I could wish you to be well convinced of, and ever to bear in your mind, is, that in acting for the security of our common liberties, you ought, by no means, to wait the sanction of the senate; as that assembly is not yet sufficiently free and uncontrolled in its deliberations. To conduct yourself by a contrary principle, would be to condemn the first glorious steps you took for the deliverance of the commonwealth, and which were so much the more illustrious, as they were unsupported by the formal suffrage of public authority. It would be to declare, that the measures of young Caesar are rash and ill-considered; who, in the same unauthorised manner, has undertaken the important cause of the commonwealth.

In a word, it would be to show the world that you thought those brave and worthy veterans your fellow-soldiers, together with the fourth and martial legions, had judged and acted irrationally, in deemimg their consul an enemy to his country, and consecrating their arms to the service of the republic. To pursue measures which are agreeable to the general sense of the senate, may be well considered as acting under their express authority; when it is fear alone that restrains them from signifying their approbation in a formal manner. In fine, you can no longer hesitate, whether you should be guided by the principle I am recommending, as you have in two strong instances been governed by it already; first, on the ides of March, and lately when you raised your troops. Upon the whole, then, you ought to be both disposed and prepared to act, not merely as you shall be commanded, but in such a manner as to render your achievements the subject of universal admiration and applause. Farewell.

LETTER XXXIV.

To the same.

Our friend Lupus very punctually delivered your commands and your letter to me, the next morning after his arrival in Rome; which
A. v. 709.

A. v. 709. he was in six days after his leaving Mutina. I cannot but consider you as recommending my own honours to my protection, when you request me to be the guardian of yours; for, be assured, they are equally my concern. It will give me great pleasure, therefore, to find, that you doubt not of my promoting them, upon every occasion, to the best of my zeal and judgment. Accordingly, although I had purposed not to appear in the senate before the first of January next, yet the tribunces of the people, having on that very day on which your manifesto was published, issued out a proclamation for a meeting of the senate on the 20th of this month, in order to move that a guard might be appointed for the security of the consuls elect: my affection towards you, induced me to change my resolution, and I determined to attend.
I thought, indeed, it would be a most unpardon-able omission, if the senate should be holden without taking notice of your inestimable services to the republic, as it unquestionably would have been if I had not attended; or that I should not be present to support any decree that might happen to be proposed for the advancement of your honours.

For this reason, I came early into the senate, and my presence brought together a great number of the members. I will leave it to your other friends, to inform you what I there said to your advantage; as well as of the speech which I afterwards made to the country in which they served, as the legio Partica, or from the name of the general who levied them, as the legio Augusta, or from the name of some divinity, as in the present instance, the legio Martia.—Il. viii. xvi. 6; Ad Att.
xvi. 8.

The Roman legions were originally named according to the order in which they were raised, as the first, the second, &c. But as those legions which were occasionally raised in the provinces, were distinguished, likewise in the same manner, it was usual to add to this numerical designation some other for the sake of avoiding confusion.
This latter denomination was generally taken either from

1 The principal intent of this consultation seems to have been to determine, whether Decimus Brutus should venture, without the express sanction of the senate, to act offensively against Antony, who was, at this time, on his march to dispossess Brutus of Cisalpine Gaul.

2 When Antony set out for Brundisium, in order to meet the legions which were returning from Macedonia, as has been related in the 27th letter of this book, Octavius went amongst those veteran soldiers to whom Caesar had granted settlements in Campania. From these he drew together, at his own expense, and by his private authority, a very considerable body of troops to oppose Antony, if he had thought proper to have made any attempts upon Rome with the Macedonian legions.—Phil. ii. 2, 12; Ad Att.
xvi. 8.

allegiance to the republic.—Phil. iii. 4.

the same purpose, in a very numerous assembly of the people. In the mean time, let me entreat you to believe, that I shall most zealously embrace every opportunity of contributing to the exaltation of those dignities you already possess; and although I am sensible I shall meet with many rivals in my good offices for this purpose, yet I will venture to claim the first rank in that honourable list. Farewell.

LETTER XXXV.

To Cornificius.

I am waging war here against that most iniquitous of all sanguinary ruffians, my colleague; Antonius; but by no means, however, upon equal terms; as I have nothing but my tongue to oppose to his arms. He ventured, in a speech which he lately made to the people, to throw out some bitter invectives against you. But his insolence did not pass unchastised; and he shall have still further reason to remember, against whom it is that he has thus pointed his injurious attacks. But, as your other friends, I imagine, supply you with accounts of our transactions, I should rather inform you what turn affairs are likely to take; and, indeed, it is a point of no very difficult conjecture. The republic labours under a total oppression; her friends are without a leader, and our glorious tyrannicides are dispersed into different and distant quarters. Pansa means well to the commonwealth, and delivers his sentiments with great spirit and freedom. Hirtius recovers but slowly; and, in truth, I know not what to think of him. Our only hope is, that the people at last will be awakened from their lethargy, and act with a spirit becoming the descendants of their heroic ancestors. For myself, at least, I will never be wanting to my country; and whatever misfortune may attend the commonwealth after I have exerted my best efforts to prevent it, I shall hear it with perfect equanimity. You may depend, likewise, upon my supporting you in your rank and dignities, to the utmost of my power. Accordingly, in an assembly of the senate, which was holden on the 20th of this month, I proposed (among other necessary and important articles, which I carried by a great majority) that the present consuls should be continued in their respective governments; and that they should be ordered not to resign them into other hands, than those which the senate should appoint. I made this motion not only as thinking it highly expedient for the interest of the republic, but with a particular view also of preserving you in your provincial command. Let me exhort you, then, for the sake of our country, and let me conjure you by your regard to myself, not to suffer another man to usurp the least part of your authority, but, in every instance, to maintain the dignity of your rank and character, as a possession which nothing can counteract.

To deal with you agreeably to that sincerity which our friendship requires, I must tell you, that all the world would have highly applauded your conduct, if you had complied with my advice in regard to Sempronius. But the affair is now over; and, in itself, indeed, it was a matter of no great importance. It is of the utmost, however, that you should employ, as I hope you will, every possible means to retain your province in its allegiance. I would add more, but your courier presses me to despatch; I must entreat you, therefore, to make my excuses to Cherippus, for not writing to him by this opportunity. Farewell.

LETTER XXXVI.

Quintus Cicero to Tiro.

Your letter brought with it a very strong, though silent reproof, for my having thus long omitted writing to you. I could not, indeed, but be sensible how much I had lost by my negligence, when I observed that those points which my brother (from tenderness, perhaps, or haste) had but slightly touched in his letter, were faithfully represented in yours, in all their genuine colours. This was particularly the case, in respect to what you mentioned concerning the consuls elect. I know, indeed, that they are totally sunk in sloth and debauchery: and if they should not recede from the helm, we are in the utmost danger of being irrecoverably lost. I was myself a witness, during a summer's campaign with them in Gaul, that they were guilty of such actions, and within sight, too, of the enemy's camp, as are almost beyond all belief: and I am well persuaded, unless we should be better supported than we are at present, that the scoundrel Antony will gain them over to his party, by admitting them as associates in his licentious pleasures. The truth of it is, the republic must necessarily either throw herself under the protection of the tribunes, or employ some private hand to defend her cause; for as to these noble consuls of ours, one of them is scarce worthy to preside over Cassena; and I would not trust the other with superintending the paltry hovels of Cossutius.

I hope to be with you towards the latter end of this month. In the mean while, let me repeat what I have often said, that I tenderly love you. My impatience to see you is, indeed, so immediate, that if our first meeting were to happen in the midst of the forum, I should not forbear to transgress the rules of good breeding, and most warmly embrace you in the presence of the whole assembly. Farewell.

LETTER XXXVII.

 Cicero, the Son of, to his dearest Tiro.

After having been in daily and earnest expectation of your couriers, they are at length, to my great satisfaction, arrived, having performed their voyage in forty-six days from the time they left you. The joy I received from my dear father's most affectionate letter was crown'd by the very agreeable one which attended it from yourself. I can no longer repeat, therefore, of having neglected writing to you; as it has proved a mean of furnishing me with an ample proof of your good-nature; and it is with much pleasure I find that you admit the apology I made for my silence.

That the advantageous reports you have heard of my conduct, were perfectly agreeable, my dearest Tiro, to your wishes, I can by no means doubt: and it shall be my constant endeavour to confirm and increase the general good opinion which is thus arising in my favour. You may venture, therefore, with great confidence, to be, what you obligingly promise, the herald of my fame. Indeed, I reflect with so much pain and contrition of mind on the errors into which my youth and inexperience have betrayed me, that I not only look upon them with abhorrence, but cannot hear even to hear them mentioned: and I am well convinced that you take a part in the unseasonliness which I suffer from this circumstance. It is no wonder you should be solicitous for the welfare of a person whom both interest and inclination recommend to your good wishes, as I have been ever desirous you should partake of all the advantages that attend me. But if my conduct has hitherto given you pain, it shall henceforward, be assured, afford you reason to think of me with double satisfaction.

I live with Cratippus rather as his son than his pupil; and not only attend his lectures with pleasure, but am extremely delighted with the peculiar sweetness of his conversation. Accordingly I spend whole days in his company, and frequently, indeed, the most part of the night, as I entreat him to sup with me as often as his engagements will permit. Since the introduction of this custom, he comes every night and then unexpectedly steals in upon us while we are at table; and, laying aside the severity of the philosopher, enters with great good humour into all the mirth and pleasantness of our conversation. Let me request you, then, to hasten hither as soon as possible, in order to enjoy with us the society of this most agreeable and excellent man. As to Brutius, I never suffer him to be absent from me a single moment. His company is as entertaining as his conduct is exemplary; and he perfectly well knows how to reconcile mirth and good-humour with the serious disquisitions of philosophy. I have taken a house for him near mine, and assist his narrow fortunes as far as my slender finances will admit.

I have begun to declaim in Greek, under Cassius, as I choose to employ myself in Latin exercises of that kind when I have leisure. I live in great familiarity also with those learned and approved friends of Cratippus, whom he brought with him from Mitylene, and pass much of my time likewise with Euphrates, one of the most considerable persons in Athens, together with Leonides, and several others of the same rank and merit. Thus I have given you a general sketch of my life.

As to what you mention concerning Gorgias, notwithstanding that he was of service to me in my oratorical exercises, yet my father's commands were superior to all other considerations: and as he peremptorily wrote to me that I should immediately dismiss him, I have obeyed his injunctions. I would not suffer myself, indeed, to hesitate a moment, lest my reluctance should raise any suspicions in my father to my disadvantage. Besides, I thought it would ill become me to take upon myself to be a judge of the propriety of his orders. I am extremely obliged to you, however, for the friendly advice you give me in this affair.

I very readily admit the excuse you make on account of your want of leisure, perfectly well knowing how much your time is generally engaged. I am extremely glad to hear that you have bought a farm, and wish you much joy of the purchase. But you must not wonder that I deferred my congratulations to this part of my letter; for you will remember it was about the same place in yours that you with.pted to me the occasion of them.

You have now a retreat from all the fatiguing ceremonies of the city, and are become a Roman of the true old rural kind. I take pleasure in figuring you to myself, in the midst of your country employments, buying your tools of husbandry, dealing out your orders to your bailiff, and carefully treasuring up the fruit-seeds from your harvest. To be serious, I sincerely join with you in regretting that I could not he of service to you upon this occasion. But, be assured, my dear Tiro, I shall not fail to assist you, if ever fortune should put it in my power; especially as I am sensible you made this purchase with a view to my use as well as your own.

I am obliged to your care in executing my commission. I desire you would see that I have a

1 He was at this time pursuing his studies at Athens, under the direction of Cratippus, one of the most celebrated philosophers of the Peripatetic sect. If young Cicero had not the talents of his father, his genius, however, seems by no means to have been contemptible; and the present letter, written when he was but nineteen years of age, is a full confirmation of those who have charged him with a want of sense, even to a degree of stupidity. See letter 26 of book xiv. ad fin.

2 The allowance which Cicero made to his son, during his residence at Athens, was about 200l. a-year.—Ad Att. xvi. 1.

3 This unworthy tutor had encouraged his pupil in a passion for drinking, a vice in which the young Cicero, how sincere soever he might have been in his present resolves, most shamefully signalised himself in his more mature years.—Plint. in Vit. Cicero; Plin. Hist. Nat. xiv. 22.

4 Alluding, perhaps, to those celebrated Romans in the earlier ages of the republic, who, after having been called forth from their farms to the service of their country, discharged with glory the functions of the state, and then returned to their ploughs.
LETTER XXX VIII.
From the same to Tiro.

The reasons you assign for the intermission of your letters are perfectly just; but I hope that these excuses will not very frequently recur. 'Tis true I receive intelligence of public affairs from particular expressions, as well as from general report; and am continually assured, likewise, of my father's affection, by his own hand; yet I always take great pleasure in reading a letter from yourself, be it upon ever so trifling a subject. I hope, therefore, since I am thus earnestly desirous of hearing from you, that you will not, for the future, send me apologies instead of epistles. Farewell.

LETTER XXXIX.
Bithynicus to Cicero.

If we were not mutually attached to each other, by many singular good offices, I should remind you of that friendship which formerly subsisted between our parents: but I leave arguments of this kind to those who have neglected to improve their hereditary connexions. For myself, I am well satisfied with going no farther for my claim to your services than to our own personal amity. In confidence of which let me entreat you, if you believe that none of your favours will be thrown away upon me, that you would, upon all occasions during my absence, take my interests under your protection. Farewell.

LETTER I.
To Cornificius.

I NEGLECT no opportunity (and, indeed, if I did, I should fail in what you have a full right to expect from me) not only of celebrating your merit, but of promoting those honours it so justly deserves. But I choose you should be informed of my zealous endeavours for this purpose, by the letters of your family, rather than by my hand. Let me employ it in exhorting you to turn all your care and your attention upon the republic. This is an object worthy of your spirit and your talents; as it is agreeable, likewise, to those hopes which you ought to entertain, of still rising in the dignities of your country. But this is a topic I will enlarge upon another time. In the mean while, I will inform you, that the public affairs are totally in suspense; as the commissioners are not yet returned, whom the senate deputed to Antony; not to sue for peace, indeed, but to denounce war, unless he shall immediately pay obedience to the orders with which they are charged.1

I seized the first occasion that offered of resuming

1 See Rem., p. 537.

The injunctions were, that Antony should instantly quit the siege of Modena, and desist from all hostilities in Gaul. Cicero strongly opposed the sending this deportation, as it was below the dignity of the senate to enter into any sort of treaty with a man whom they had already, in effect, declared a public enemy, as it would have the appearance of fear; and, as the only method of bringing Antony to his duty, would be by an immediate and vigorous prosecution of the war. But these reasons, and others of the same tendency, which Cicero urged with great warmth and eloquence, were over-ruled by the friends of Antony; and it was ordered that Servius Sulpicius, Lucius Piso, and Lucius Philippus, all of them persons of consular rank, should carry this message from the senate to Antony.

LETTER II.
To Decimus Brutus, Consul-elect.

Polla sends me word that an opportunity offers of conveying a letter to you; but at present I have nothing material to write. All public business, indeed, is entirely suspended till we shall hear what success the deputies have met with, from whom we have not yet received any intelligence. I will take this occasion, however, of telling you, that the senate and the people are greatly anxious concerning you, not only as their own preservation depends upon yours, but as they are extremely solicitous that you should acquit yourself with glory. The truth is, you have, in a very remarkable degree, the general affection of the whole republic, which confidently hopes that as you lately delivered us from one tyrant, so you will now free us from the danger of another. We are raising troops in Rome and throughout all Italy, if that term may with any propriety be employed, where every man eagerly presses to enter into the service,—so warmly are the people animated with a passion of recovering their liberties, and such is their abhorrence of the slavery they have thus long sustained!

We now expect soon to receive an account from you not only of your own operations, but of those likewise of our common friend Hirtius and of Caesar, whom I must particularly call mine. I hope, shortly, to see you all three united in the general honour of one common victory. For the rest, I have only to add (what I had rather you should learn, however, from the letters of your family, and what I hope they are so just as to assure you), that I neither do, nor ever shall, neglect any opportunity of contributing to the advancement of your public honours. Farewell.

LETTER III.

To Plancus*. The visit I lately received from Furnius afforded me great satisfaction, not only upon his own account, but more particularly on yours, as he painted you so strongly to my mind that I could not but fancy, during the whole conversation, that you were actually present. He represented to me the heroism you display in the military affairs of your province, the equity of your civil administration,—the prudence which distinguishes every part of your conduct in general,—together with what I was by no means indeed a stranger to before, the charms of your social and friendly qualities. To this he did not forget to add, likewise, the singular generosity which you have shown in your behaviour towards himself. Every one of these articles I heard with pleasure; and, for the last, I am much obliged to you.

The friendship I enjoy with your family, my dear Plancus, commenced somewhat before you were born; and, as the affection which I conceived for you begun from your childhood, so, in your more mature years, it was mutually improved into the strictest intimacy. These are considerations by which strongly engage me to favour your interests; which I look upon, indeed, as my own. Merit, in conjunction with fortune, have crowned you, even thus early in your life, with the highest distinctions; as the diligent exertion of your superior talents has frustrated the opposition of those many envious antagonists who vainly endeavoured to obstruct your way. And now, if you will be influenced by the advice of a man who greatly loves you, and who, from a long connexion with you, has an equal claim to your regard with the oldest of your friends, you will receive all the future honours of your life from the republic in its best and most constitutional form. There was a season, you know (for nothing surely could have escaped your discernment), there was a season when the world thought you too compliant with the prevailing faction of the times; and I should have thought so too if I had imagined that your approbation was to be measured by your submission. But as I knew the sentiments of your heart, I was persuaded you had prudently considered the extent of your power. Public affairs, however, are at present in a far different situation; and you may now freely act in every point as your judgment shall direct. The time is shortly approaching when, in consequence of your present designation, you will enter upon the consular office,—and you will enter upon it, my friend, in the prime of your years, with the advantage of possessing the noblest and most commanding eloquence, and at a period, too, when there is the utmost scarcity of such illustrious citizens as yourself. Let me conjure you then, by the immortal gods, most earnestly to pursue those measures that will ensure the highest glory to your character. Now there is but one possible method of acting towards the republic with this advantage to your reputation; at least, there is but one in the present conjuncture, as the commonwealth has for so many years been disturbed by our intestine commotions.

When I write to you in this strain, it is rather in compliance with the dictates of my affection than as supposing that you stand in need either of precepts or admonitions. I am sensible that you are sufficiently supplied with reflections of this nature from the same source whence I derive them myself: it is time, therefore, to put an end to what I designed, not as an ostentation of my wisdom, but merely as an instance of my friendship. I will only add, that you may depend upon the most zealous and most generous services upon every occasion wherein I shall imagine your credit and character is concerned. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

Plancus to Cicero. I am exceedingly obliged to you for your letter; a favour for which I am indebted, I perceive, to the account that Furnius gave of me in the conversation you mention. If I have not written to you sooner, you must impute it to my being informed that you were set out upon your expedition into Greece; and I was not apprised of your return till a very short time before I learned it from your letter. I mention this because I should think, myself deserving of the highest reproach if I were intentionally guilty of an omission even in the slightest office of friendship.

* Caesar.
* Antony.
* The senate did not suspend their preparations for war notwithstanding the deputation they had sent to Antony. On the contrary, Hirtius and Octavius marched into Gaul at the head of a considerable army while Plancus remained in Italy, in order to complete the additional troops with which he was purposed to join them.—Life of Cicero, p. 292.
* See rev. k, p. 551.

towards you. The intimacy, indeed, which was contracted between you and my father, the early esteem I conceived of your merit, together with those instances of affection I have received from you, supply me with many powerful reasons for not falloing in the regards I owe you. Be assured, therefore, my dear Cicero, there is no man whom I am so much disposed to revere as yourself; as, indeed, the great disparity of our ages may well justify me in looking up to you with all the sacred respect of filial veneration. I received your admonitions, therefore, as so many dictates of the most consummate wisdom; at the same time that I considered them as instances, likewise, of your unfeigned sincerity,—for in this respect, I judge of your heart by what I feel in my own. If I had any doubt, then, what measures to pursue, or were inclined to adopt others than those you recommend, I should most certainly be determined by your judgment, or restrained by your advice: but in my present situation can there possibly be an inducement to draw me from those paths you point out? The truth is, that whatever honourable distinctions are required, either by my own industry or by the favours of fortune, though far inferior to what your affection represents them, yet they want no other lustre, perhaps, but that of having been attained with the general approbation of the commonwealth; and this even the most inveterate of my enemies acknowledge. Be assured, then, that the whole of my power, my prudence, and my authority, shall ever be exerted in the service of the republic. As I am no stranger to your sentiments, I am well persuaded that mind would never disagree with yours if I had the happiness of having you so near me as to be able to consult them. But though I cannot enjoy this very desirable advantage, yet I trust you will never have occasion to condemn my conduct.

I am extremely impatient to learn what is transacting in the nearer Gaul, as well as what effect the present month may produce in regard to affairs at Rome. In the mean time, I am earnestly labouring to prevent the people of this province from pursuing the example of their neighbours, by taking advantage of the public disturbances to throw off their allegiance. And should my endeavours be attended with the success they deserve, I doubt not of being approved, not only by every friend of liberty in general, but what I am most ambitious of, by yourself in particular. Farewell, my dear Cicero, and love me with an equal return of that affection I bear you.

LETTER V.

To Plancus.

The duplicate you sent me of your letter was an instance of your obliging care lest I should be disappointed of what I so impatiently wished to receive. The contents afforded me a double satisfaction; and I am at a loss to determine whether the friendship you profess for myself, or the zeal you discover for the republic rendered it most truly acceptable. To speak my own opinion, indeed, the public affections are altogether noble and sublime; but surely there is something more amiable sweet in those of the private kind. Accordingly, that part of your letter where you remind me of the intimacy in which I lived with your father, of the early disposition you found in yourself to love me, together with other passages to the same friendly purpose, filled my heart with the most exquisite pleasure, as the sentiments you profess with regard to the commonwealth raised in me the highest satisfaction: and, to say truth, I was so much the more pleased with the latter, as they were accompanied, at the same time, with the former.

To repeat what I said in the letter to which you have returned so obliging an answer, let me not only exhort, but entreat you, my dear Plancus, to exert your utmost powers in the service of the commonwealth. There is nothing that can more contribute to the advancement of your glory; for amongst all human honours, none most certainly is superior to that of deserving well of one's country. Your great good sense and good-nature will suffer me, I know, to speak my sentiments to you with the same freedom that I have hitherto used. Let me again observe then, that the honours you have already acquired, though you could not indeed have attained to them without merit, yet they have principally been owing to fortune, in conjunction with the particular circumstances of the times. But whatever services you shall perform for the republic in this very critical conjuncture, will reflect a lustre upon your character, that will derive all its splendour from yourself alone. It is incredible how odious Antony is become to all sorts of people, except those only of the same dishonest views with himself; but the great hopes and expectations of the republic are fixed upon you and the army you can compose, and myself conjure you then, in the most solemn manner, not to lose so important an opportunity of establishing yourself in the esteem and favour of your fellow-citizens, or, in other words, of gathering immortal praise. Believe me, it is with all the tenderness of a father that I thus admonish you; that I enter into your interests with as much warmth as if they were my own, and that my exhortations proceed from the zeal I bear for the glory of my friend and the welfare of my country. Adieu.
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

LETTER VII.

To Trebonius.

Wou'd you heaven you had invited me to that noble feast which you made on the ides of March; 1 no remaints, most assuredly, should have been left behind. 2 Whereas the part you unluckily spared gives us so much perplexity, that we find something to regret, even in the godlike service which you and your illustrious associates have thereby rendered your republic. To say the truth, when I reflect that it is owing to the favour of so worthy a man as yourself, that Antony now lives to be our general bane, I am sometimes inclined to be a little angry with you for taking him aside when Caesar fell, 3 as by this mean you have occasioned more trouble to myself in particular than to all the rest of the whole community. From the very first moment, indeed, that Antony's ignominious death occurred, I believe the senate uncontrolled in its deliberations, I resolved the spirit which you and that inflexible patriot, your father, were wont to esteem and applaud. Accordingly, the tribunes of the people having summoned the senate to meet on the 20th of December, upon other matters, I seized that opportunity of taking the whole state of the republic into consideration; 4 and more by the zeal than the eloquence of my speech, I revived the drooping spirits of that oppressed assembly, and awakened in them all their former vigour. It was owing to the arduous with which I thus contended in the debates of this day, that the people of Rome first conceived a hope of recovering their liberties; and to this great point all my thoughts and all my actions have ever since been perpetually directed. Thus important, however, as my occupations are, I would enter into a full detail of our proceedings, if I did not imagine that public transactions of every kind are transmitted to you by other hands. From them, therefore, you will receive a more particular information, whilst I content myself with giving you a short and general sketch of our present circumstances and situation. I must inform you, then, we have a senate that acts with spirit; but that as to those of consular dignity, part of them

1 See rem. 9 on letter i of this book.
2 "The purport of them was, that the senate should assign lands and rewards to all his troops, and confirm all the other grants which he and Dolabella had made in their consulship; that all his decrees from Caesar's books and papers should be confirmed; that no account should be demanded of the money taken from the temple of Opis, &c. On these terms he offered to give up Cisalpine Gaul, provided, that he might have the greater Gaul in exchange for five years, with an army of six legions, to be completed out of the troops of Decimus Brutus."—Life of Cicero, p. 553.
3 Marcus Brutus, when he found it necessary to leave Italy, withdrew into Macedonia, where he was, at this time, employed in raising forces in support of the republican cause.
4 The province of Syria had been intended by Caesar for Cassius; but Mark Antony, after the death of Caesar, had artfully procured it to be allotted to Dolabella. Accordingly, the latter left Rome a short time before the expiration of his consulsip the last year, in order to be beforehand with Cassius in getting possession of this government; and it is in allusion to this circumstance that the humour of the present passage, such as it is, consists.

k k See rem. 4 on the preceding letter.
5 As it had been resolved in a council of the conspirators, that Antony's life should be spared, they did not choose he should be present when they executed their design upon Caesar, probably lest he should attempt to assist his friend, and by that means occasion them to spill more blood than theretofore. For this reason Trebonius held Antony in disguise, at the entrance into the senate, till the rest of the conspirators had finished their work—Dio, p. 240; Plint in Vit. Brut.
6 Upon the news that two of the four legions from Brundisium [see rem. 3, p. 552] had actually declared for Octavius, and posted themselves in the neighbourhood of Rome, Antony left the city with great precipitation, and putting himself at the head of his army, marched directly in order to wrest Cisalpine Gaul out of the hands of Decimus Brutus. Cicero, who was at this time in the country, took the opportunity of Antony's absence to return to Rome; where he arrived on the 9th of December, in the preceding year, about a month or two, 'tis probable, before he wrote the present letter.—Life of Cicero, p. 247.
7 It was upon this occasion that Cicero spoke his third Philippic.
want the courage to exert themselves in the manner they ought, and the rest are ill-affect ed to the republic. The death of Servius is a great loss to us. Lucius Caesar, though he is altogether in the interest of liberty, yet in tenderness to his nephew, does not concur in any very vigorous measures. The consuls, in the mean time, deserve the highest commendations; I must mention Decimus Brutus, likewise, with much applause. The conduct of young Caesar is, that equally laudable, and I persuade myself that we have reason to hope he will complete the work he has begun. This, at least, is certain, that if he had not been so extremely despondent in raising the veteran forces, and if two legions had not deserted to him from Antony’s army, there is nothing so cruel or so flagitious which the latter would not have committed. But as these are articles which I suppose you are already apprised of, I only just mention them in order to confirm them.

You shall hear farther from me whenever I can find a more leisure moment. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.
To Caius Cassius.
It is owing, I imagine, to the difficulty of forwarding any despatches during the winter season, A. D. 710, that we have yet received no certain intelligence of what you are doing, nor even know in what part of the world you are placed. It is universally reported, however, (though more, I believe, from what people wish, than from what they have sufficient grounds to assert,) that you have raised an army, and are actually in Syria; a report which the more easily gains credit, as it appears to be extremely probable.

Our friend Brutus has acquired great honour by his late glorious and unexpected achievements; not only as being in themselves extremely desirable to the friends of liberty, but from the wonderful expedition, likewise, with which he performed them. If it be true, therefore, that you are in possession of those provinces we imagine, the republic is very powerfully supported; as that whole tract of country which extends from the nearest coast of Greece as far as Egypt is, upon this supposition, in the hands of two of the most faithful friends of the commonwealth. Nevertheless, if my judgment does not deceive me, the event of this war depends entirely upon Decimus Brutus: for if he should force his way out of Mutina, (as we have reason to hope,) it will, in all probability, be totally at an end. There are now, indeed, but few troops employed in carrying on that siege, as Antony has sent a large detachment to keep possession of Bononia. In the mean while, our friend Hirtius is posted at Clatera, and Caesar at Forum Cornelii, each of them at the head of a very considerable army; at the same time that Pansa is raising at Rome a large body of Italian troops. But the season of the year has hitherto prevented their entering upon action; and, indeed, Hirtius appears, by the several letters I have received from him, as if he were determined to take all his measures with the utmost precaution.

Both the Gauls, excepting only the cities of Bononia, Rhegium, and Parma, are zealously affected to the republic, as are also your clients on the other side the Po. The senate, likewise, is firm in the cause of liberty; but when I say the senate, I must exclude all of consular rank, except Lucius Caesar, who, indeed, is faithfully attached to the interest of the commonwealth. The death of Servius Sulpicius has deprived us of a very powerful associate. As for the rest of the consulars, part of them are ill affected to the republic, others want spirit to support its cause, and some there are who look with envy on those patriot citizens whose conduct they see distinguished by the public applause. The populace, however, both in Rome and the whole of Italy, are, I think, perfectly unanimous in the common cause. I have nothing further, I think, to add, but my wishes that your heroic virtues may shine out upon us from yon eastern regions, in all their enlivening warmth and lustre. Farewell.

LETTER IX.
To Lucius Papirius Patus.
I have received a second letter from you concerning your friend Rufus: and since you interest yourself thus warmly in his behalf, you might depend upon my utmost assistance, even if he had done me an injury. But I am perfectly sensible, from those letters of his, which you communicated to me, as well as from your own, how much my welfare has been his concern. I cannot, therefore, refuse him my friendly offices, not only in regard to your recommendation, which has all the weight with me it ought, but in compliance also with my own inclinations. I must acknowledge that it was his and your letters, my dear Petrus, which first put me upon my guard against the designs that were formed to destroy me. Afterwards, indeed, received intelligence from several other hands to the same effect, and particularly of the consultations that were held concerning me both at Aquinum and Fabrateria, of which meetings, I find, you were likewise apprised. One would imagine that this party had foreseen how much I should embarrass their schemes, by the induty they employed in order to compass my destruction: and, as I had not the least suspicion of their purposes, I might incautiously have fallen into their snare, if it had not been for the admonitions you sent me, in consequence of the information you had received from Rufus. Your friend, therefore, wants no advocate with me for my good offices; and I wish the republic may be in so happy a situation, as to afford me an opportunity of giving him the most substantial proofs of my gratitude.

But, to dismiss this subject, I am sorry you no longer frequent the festive tables of your friends; as you cannot renounce these parties of good cheer without depriving yourself of a very exquisite gratification. And, to tell you the truth, I am sorry, likewise, upon another account, as I am afraid you will lose the little knowledge you had acquired in the art of cookery, and be absolutely at a loss how to set forth a tolerable supper. For as you made no very considerable improvements in this fashionable science, even when you had many curious models for your imitation, what strange awkward things must your entertainments prove now that you enjoy no longer the same advantages! When I informed Sperinaea of this wonderful revolution in the system of your affairs, her shock was so violent, her head, and declared that it portended some terrible disaster to the commonwealth; unless, said he, this extraordinary phenomenon be occasioned by the present cold weather, and your friend should return with the zephyrs to his accustomed train of life. But, without a joke, my dear Pactus, I would advise you to spend your time in the cheerful society of a set of worthy and agreeable friends; as there is nothing, in my estimation, that more effectually contributes to the happiness of human life. When I say this, I do not mean with respect to the sensual gratifications of the palate, but with regard to that pleasing relaxation of the mind which is best produced by the freedom of social converse, and which is always most agreeable at the hour of meals. For this reason, the Latin language is much happier, I think, than the Greek, in the term it employs to express assemblies of this sort.

In the latter they are called by a word which signifies assemblages; whereas, in ours, they are more emphatically styled convivial meetings: intimating that it is in a communication of this nature that life is most truly enjoyed. You see I am endeavouring to bring philosophy to my assistance, in recalling you to the tables of your friends; and, indeed, I prescribe them as the best recipe for the re-establishment of your health.

Do not imagine, my friend, from my writing in this strain of pleasantry, that I have renounced my cares for the republic. Be assured, on the contrary, that it is the sole and uninterrupted business of my life to secure to my fellow-citizens the full possession of their liberties, to which end my admonitions, my labours, and the utmost powers of my mind, are, upon all occasions, unrewarded employed. In a word, it is my firm persuasion, that, if I should dic a martyr to these patriotic endeavours, I shall finish my days in the most glorious manner. Again and again I bid you farewell.

* A celebrated divine, who is said to have forewarned Cesar of the days of March.—Suet. in Vit. Jul. Cæs. 81.

LETTER X.

Caicus Cassius, Proconsul, to Cicero.

I am to inform you of my arrival in Syria, where I have joined the generals Lucius Munatius and Quintus Crispus. These brave and worthy citizens, having been made acquainted with what has lately passed in Rome, immediately resigned their armies to my command, and with great zeal and spirit co-operate with me in the service of the republic. Aulus Allienus has delivered to me the four legions which he brought from Egypt: the legion which was commanded by Cecilius Bassus has likewise joined me. And now it is unnecessary, I am persuaded, that I should exhort you to defend the interest both of myself and of the commonwealth, to the utmost of your abilities: but it may animate your zeal and your hopes, to be assured that a powerful army is not waiting to support the senate and its friends in the cause of liberty. For the rest, I refer you to Lucius Carcius, whom I have directed to confer with you upon my affairs. Farewell.

From my camp at Tarichea, March the 7th.

LETTER XI.

Asinius Pollio to Cicero.

You must not wonder that you have heard nothing from me, in relation to public affairs, since the breaking out of the war. Our couriers have always found it difficult to pass un molested through the forest of Castulo, but it is now more than ever infested with robbers. These banditti, however, are by no means the principal obstruction to our intercourse with Rome, as the mails are perpetually searched and detained by the...
in the present conjuncture. I have received, indeed, only one letter from Pansa since the ides of March; by which he advised me to assure the senate, that I was ready to employ the forces under my command in any service they should require. But this would have been a very imprudent declaration at a time when Lepidus had professed, in his public speeches, as well as in the letters he wrote to all his friends, that he concurred in Antony's measures. For could I possibly, without the consent of the former, find means to subsist my army in their march through his provinces? But, granting that I could have surmounted this difficulty, I must have conquered another and a still greater,—as nothing less than a pair of wings could have rendered it practicable for me to have crossed the Alps, whilst every pass was guarded by the troops of Lepidus. Add to this that I could by no means convey any despatches to Rome, as the couriers were not only exposed in a thousand different places to the danger of being plundered, but were detained, likewise, by the express orders of Lepidus. It is well known, however, that I publicly declared at Corduba, that it was my resolution not to resign this province into any other hands than those which the senate should appoint: not to mention how strenuously I withheld all the applications that were made to me for parting with the thirtieth legion. I could not, indeed, have given it up, without depriving myself of a very considerable strength for the defence of the republic, as there are no troops in the whole world that are animated with a braver or more martial spirit than those of which this legion is composed. Upon the whole, I hope you will do me the justice to believe, in the first place, that I am extremely desirous of preserving the public tranquillity, as there is nothing I more sincerely wish than the safety of all my fellow-citizens; and, in the next place, that I am determined to vindicate my own and my country's rights.

It gives me greater satisfaction than you can well imagine, that you admit my friend into a share of your intimacy. Shall I own, nevertheless, that I cannot think of him as the companion of your walks, and as bearing a part in the pleasure of your conversation, without feeling some emotions of envy! This is a privilege, believe me, which I infinitely value, as you shall most assuredly experience, by my devoting the whole of my time to your company, if ever we should live to see peace restored to the republic.

I am much surprised that you did not mention in your letter whether it would be most satisfactory to the senate that I should remain in this province, or march into Italy. If I were to consider only my own ease and safety, I should certainly continue here; but as, in the present conjuncture, the republic has more occasion for legions than for provinces, (especially as the loss of the latter may with great ease be recovered,) I have determined to move towards Italy with my troops. For the rest, I refer you to the letter I have written to Pansa, a copy of which I herewith transmit to you. Farewell.

TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

LETTER XII.
To Caius Cassius.

You will receive a full account of the present situation of affairs from Tidius Strabo, a person of great merit, and extremely well-affecting to the republic. Need I add how strong his attachment is to yourself, when it thus evidently appears by his leaving his family and his fortunes in order to follow you? For the same reason I forbear to solicit your good offices in his behalf, as I am persuaded you will think his coming to you a sufficient recommendation to your favour.

If any misfortune should attend our arms, be assured that the friends of the republic have no other resource left than in you and Marcus Brutus. We are at this juncture indeed in the most imminent danger: as it is with great difficulty that Decimus Brutus still holds out at Mutina. However, if he should be speedily relieved, we may look upon victory as our own; if not, let me repeat it again, every friend of liberty will fly for refuge to Brutus and to you. May you stand ready, then, with all that spirit which is necessary for the full and complete deliverance of our distressed country! Farewell.

LETTER XIII.
To Planus.

The account that Furnius gave us of your disposition towards the republic, afforded the highest satisfaction both to the senate and the people. But your letter, which was afterwards read in the senate, seemed by no means to comport with those sentiments our friend had thus represented you as entertaining. At the very time indeed when your illustrious colleague is sustaining a siege from the lawless crew of the most worthless villains, you do not scruple to advise us to peace. But if peace is their sincere desire, let them immediately lay down their arms, and sue for it in a proper manner, otherwise they must expect to obtain it, not by treaty, but by the sword alone. But I leave it to Furnius and your worthy brother, to acquaint you with the reception which your letter upon this subject, as well as that of Lepidus, met with from the senate. Meanwhile, notwithstanding you are well qualified to be your own adviser, and that it will soon be in your power likewise to have recourse to the faithful and friendly counsel of Furnius and your brother; yet, in compliance with that affection to which you have so many powerful claims, I cannot forbear sending you a few admonitions. Believe me, then, my dear Planus, whatever honours you have hitherto acquired, (and you have acquired in truth the highest,) they will be considered as so many vain and empty titles, unless you dignify them by joining in the defence both of the liberties of the people and the authority of the senate. Let me conjure you therefore to separate yourself from those associates with whom you have hitherto been united, not by choice indeed, but by the general attraction of a prevailing party. It has been the fortune of many, as it will probably be yours, to exercise the supreme magistracy during times of public commotions; but not one of this number ever derived to himself that esteem and veneration which naturally flow from the consular dignity, who had not distinguished his administration by an active and zealous regard for the interests of the commonwealth. To this end it is necessary that you renounce the society of those impious citizens, whose principles are far different from your own; that you show yourself the friend, the guide, and the protector of all those who are faithfully attached to our constitution; and in fine that you be well persuaded that the re-establishment of the public tranquillity consists, not merely in laying down our arms, but in being secure from all reasonable apprehensions of their power being resumed to enslave us again. Thus to think and thus to act, will render your character, both as a consul and a consular, most truly illustrious: but if you should steer yourself by other maxims and by other measures, you will possess those exalted distinctions, not only without honour, but with the utmost disgrace.

And now, if I have expressed my sentiments with somewhat more than ordinary seriousness, impute it to the zeal of my affection towards you; assuring yourself, at the same time, that I shall, without any prejudice, be guided on truth, if you make the experiment in a manner worthy of your character. Farewell.

March the 20th.

LETTER XIV.
To Lepidus.

The singular regard I bear you, renders it greatly my concern that you should be distinguished with the highest dignities of the republic. I cannot, therefore, but regret,

* Marcus Emilius Lepidus was descended from one of the noblest and most ancient families in Rome, and he was himself distinguished with some of the most honourable posts in the republic. He stood high in the confidence and friendship of Julius Caesar, who, when he was dictator, named him for the master of the horse; when he was consul, in the year 707, declared him his colleague; and who, a short time before his death, appointed him governor of the nearer Spain. One of the most elegant of the Roman historians has represented Lepidus as void of all humility, and desirous of every view of his character as altogether unworthy of that high station to which fortune had exalted him. Accordingly he is described by Shakspere, in the tragedy of Julius Caesar, as a slight unmentionable man, most to be sent on errands.

But though the poet has been strictly true to history, it may be questioned, perhaps, whether the historian has been equally faithful to truth. For when one considers the great trust which Caesar reposed in Lepidus, his address in prevailing with young Pompey, who had made himself master of all Spain, to renounce his conquest; together with the share he had in forming that celebrated league between Antony, Octavius, and himself, which gave him a third part in the division of the whole Roman dominions; is it credible that his talents were devoted to laudable purposes? History, perhaps, may be more reasonably relied upon in what it has delivered concerning his moral character; and it is probable that Lepidus was strongly infected with avarice, ambition, and vanity. This at least is certain, that he acted towards the senate in the present conjunction with great dissimulation and treachery. At the time when this letter was written, he was at the head of a very considerable army in the Narbonesian Gaul, which Caesar had annexed to the province of Spain, in favour of Lepidus—Fihg. Annul. II. 45; Vott. Pat. II. 64, 80; Dil. XIV. 275.
that you omitted to pay your acknowledgments to the senate for those extraordinary honours they lately conferred upon you.

I am glad you are desirous of composing those unhappy dissensions that destroy the tranquillity of our country; and if you can ensure this good work, consistently with the enjoyment of our liberties, it will be greatly to your own credit, as well as to the advantage of the commonwealth. But if the peace you propose is to re-establish a most oppressive tyranny, be well assured there is not a man in his senses who will not rather renounce his life than thus suffer himself to be made a slave. I should think, therefore, that your wisest way would be to avoid engaging as the mediator of a peace which is neither approved by the senate or the people, nor indeed by any lover of his country in the whole republic. But as this is a truth which you will undoubtedly learn from others, I will only add, that I hope you will consider, with your usual prudence, in what manner it will be best and most advisable for you to act. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

To Caius Cassius.

I will not tell you with how much zeal I lately stood forth, both in the senate and before the people, an advocate for the advancement of your honours; as it is a circumstance which I had rather you should learn from the letters of your family, than from my own hand. I should easily at second thought, not have omitted the point in the former, if I had not met with a strenuous opposition from Pansa. Nevertheless, after having enforced my sentiments in the senate, I made a speech, to the same purpose, in an assembly of the people; which I was introduced by Marcus Servilius, the tribune. I urged upon this occasion (and with a warmth and vehemence suitable to a popular audience) all the reasons that may easily be adduced in your favour: and my speech was received with a louder and more universal applause than ever was known before. I hope you will pardon me that I took these steps contrary to the persuasions of your mother-in-law; who was apprehensive they might give offence to Pansa. He did not, indeed, forget to avail himself of these fears: and he assured the people, that even your own family were averse to my making this motion. I was by no means, I confess, governed by their sentiments in the case: as I acted entirely with a view to an interest which I have always endeavoured to promote: the interest I mean of the republic in general, as well

LETTER XVI.

Planeus to Cicero.

I should employ this letter in giving you a full explanation of my measures, if I had no other method of convincing you, that I have in every respect conducted myself towards the republic agreeably to my own promises, and to your persuasions. I have ever been ambitious, indeed, of obtaining your esteem, as well as your friendship: and if I have wished to secure you for my advocate where I have acted wrong, I have been no less desirous of giving you occasion to applaud me for acting right. But I was going to say, that I shorten this letter for two reasons: the first is, because I have entered into an ample detail of everything in my public manifesto; and the next, because you will receive a circumstantial account of all that relates to me from Marcus Varisidius, a Roman knight, and my particular friend, whom I have directed to wait upon you. In the mean time, let me protest, that it was not without much trouble that I obtained the confidence which enabled me to express my sentiments in the good opinion of the republic; but I forbore to declare myself, till I should be in a condition to effect something worthy of those expectations the senate has conceived of me, and of that high office I shall shortly bear. And should fortune second my endeavours, I hope to render such considerable services to the republic, that not only the present age shall feel the advantage of my assistance, but that it shall be remembered likewise in times to come. Meanwhile, that I may pursue these endeavours with the greater alacrity, let me entreat your suffrage in procuring me those honours which your letter sets before my view as incitements of my patriotism; and your interest for this purpose is equal, I well know, to your inclination. Take care of your health, and give me your friendship in the same degree that I sincerely give you mine.

7 The senate had lately decreed, that the statue of Lepidus should be erected in the forum, with an inscription, in honour of the services he had performed to his country by prevailing with young Pompey to lay down his arms.—Philipp. xvi. 4.

8 Dolabella having entered into Asia Minor, and committed great outrages and hostilities in that province, was declared, by a general vote of the senate, a public enemy; in consequence of which a debate arose concerning the person to whom the way should be opened on against Dolabella should be intrusted. Cicero moved that a commission should be granted to Cassius for that purpose, with the most honourable and extensive powers. But his motion was overruled by the superior interest of Pansa, who seems to have been very desirous of obtaining this command for himself.—Philipp. xi.

LETTER XVII.

Plancus, Consul elect, to the Consuls, the Prelates, the Tribunes, the Senate, and the Commons of Rome.

BEFORE I make any professions with respect to my future conduct, I deem it necessary to justify myself to those who may think that I have held the republic too long in suspense concerning my designs. For I would by no means have it imagined that I am atoning for my past behaviour, when, in fact, I am only seizing the first favourable opportunity of publicly declaring a resolution which I have long formed. I was in no sort ignorant, however, that, at a time of such general and alarming confusions, a less deliberate discovery of my intentions would have proved most to my own private advantage: as I was sensible that several of my fellow-citizens had been distinguished with great honours, by a more hasty explication of their purposes. But as fortune had placed me in such a situation, that I could not be earlier in testing mine without prejudicing that cause which I could better serve by concealing them, I was willing to suffer for a season in the good opinion of the world; as I preferred the interest of the public to that of my own reputation. That this was the genuine motive of my proceedings, cannot reasonably, I trust, be questioned. For, can it be supposed that a man in my prosperous circumstances, and of my well-known course of life, whose utmost hopes too were upon the very point of being crowned, could be capable either of manly submitting to the destructive ambition of another, or impiously cherishing any dangerous schemes of his own? But it required some time, as well as much pains and expense, to render myself able to perform those assurances I purposed to give to the republic, and to every friend of her cause; that I might not approach with mere empty professions to the assistance of my country, but with the power of performing an effectual service. To this end, as the army under my command had been strongly and frequently solicited to revolt, it was necessary to persuade them that a moderate reward, conferred by the general voice of the commonwealth, was far preferable to an infinitely greater from any single hand. My next labour was to convince those many cities which had been gained the last year by largesses and other donations, that these were obligations of no validity, and that they should endeavour to obtain the same benefactions from a better and more honorable quarter. I had still the farther task to prevail with those who commanded in the neighbouring provinces, to join with the more numerous party in a general association for the defence of our common liberties, rather than unite with the smaller number, in hopes of dividing the spoils of a victory that must prove fatal to the whole world. Add to this, that I was obliged to augment my own troops, and those of my auxiliaries, that I might have nothing to fear, whenever I should think proper, contrary to the inclination of some about me, openly to avow the cause which it was my resolution to defend. Now, I shall never be ashamed to acknowledge, that, in order to bring these several schemes to bear, I submitted, though very unwillingly, indeed, to the mortification of dissembling the intentions I really had, and of counterfeiting those which I certainly I had not: as the fate of my colleague had taught me how dangerous it is for a man who means well to his country, to divulge his resolutions ere he is sufficiently prepared to carry them into execution. For this reason it was that I directed my brave and worthy lieutenant, Catus Furnius, to represent to you, more fully than I thought prudent to explain in my despatches, those measures which seemed necessary for the preservation both of this province and of the republic in general, as being the more concealed method of conveying my sentiments to you upon that subject, as well as the safer with respect to myself.

It appears, then, that I have long been secretly attentive to the defence of the commonwealth. But now that, by the bounty of the gods, I am in every respect better prepared for that purpose, I desire to give the world, not only reason to hope well of my intentions, but clear and undoubted proofs of their sincerity.

I have five legions in readiness to march; all of them zealously attached to the republic, and disposed, by my liberalties, to pay an entire obedience to my orders. The same disposition appears in every city throughout this province; and they earnestly vie with each other in giving me the strongest marks of their duty. Accordingly, they have furnished me with as considerable a body of auxiliary forces, both horse and foot, as they could possibly have raised for the support of their own national liberties. As for myself, I am ready either to remain here, in order to protect this province, or to march wheresoever else the republic shall demand my services. I will offer yet another alternative; and either resign my troops and government into any hands that shall be appointed, or draw upon myself the whole weight of the war; if by these means I may be able to establish the tranquility of my country, or even retard those calamities with which it is threatened.

If, at the time that I am making these declarations, our public disturbances should happily be composed, I shall rejoice in an event so advantageous to the commonwealth, notwithstanding the honour I shall lose by being too late in the tender of my services. But, on the contrary, if I am early enough in my offers to bear a full part in all the dangers of the war, let me recommend it to every man of justice and candour to vindicate me against the malevolence of those whom envy may prompt to asperse my character.

In my own particular, I desire no greater reward for my services than the satisfaction of having contributed to the security of the republic. But I think myself bound to recommend those brave and worthy men to your especial favour, who, partly in compliance with my persuasion, but much more in confidence of your good faith, would not suffer themselves to be prevailed upon by all the applications that have been made, both to their hopes and their fears, to depart from their duty to the commonwealth.

LETTER XVIII.

To Plancius.

ALTHOUGH I had received a very full account from our friend Furnius of your disposition with a regard to the republic, and of the measures you were meditating in its defence, yet the perusal of your letter[1] afforded me a still clearer view into the whole plan of your patriot purposes. Notwithstanding, then, that you should not have an opportunity of executing your projected services, as the fate of the commonwealth, which depends upon a single battle, will probably be decided ere this reaches your hands; yet you have acquired, nevertheless, great and universal applause from what the world has been informed of your general good intentions. Accordingly, had either of the consuls been in Rome[2] when your despatches arrived, the senate would have declared, and in terms I am persuaded extremely to your advantage, the sense it entailed of your zealous and acceptable preparations in their cause. The proper season, however, for your being rewarded with honours of this kind, is, in my opinion at least, so far from being elapsed, that, on the contrary, it seems to be scarce fully arrived: as those distinctions alone appear to me to deserve the name of honours that are conferred by our country, not in expectation of services to come, but in just retribution to those that have effectually been performed. Believe me, if any form of government shall subsist amongst us where merit can hope to be distinguished, you will shine out with all the most illustrious dignities it can bestow. But nothing of this kind (let me repeat it again) can justly be called an honour, but what is given, not as the incentive of an occasional service, but as the recompense of a constant and uniform course of patriotism. Be it then your earnest endeavour, my dear Plancius, to acquire them well-merited rewards, by advancing to the relief of your colleague[3]; by improving that wonderful unanimity which appears in every province for the support of the common cause, and by giving all possible succour to your country in general. Be persuaded that I shall always be ready to assist your schemes with my best advice, and to promote your honours with my utmost interest: in a word, that I shall set, upon every occasion wherein you are concerned as one who is most sincerely and most warmly your friend. I am so, indeed, not only from that intercourse of affectionate good offices by which we have been long mutually united, but from the love I bear likewise to my country; in tenderness to which I am more anxious for your life than for my own. Farewell.

March the 30th.

LETTER XIX.

To Cornificius.

I AGREE with you in thinking that those who were concerned in the design upon Lilybaem[4] deserved to have been executed upon the spot. But you spared them, it seems, in the apprehension that the world would condemn you as too freely indulging a vindictive spirit; yet, as well might you have been apprehensive, my friend, that the world would condemn you for acting too agreeably to your patriotism.

I very gladly embrace your overtures of renewing that association with you, for the defence of the republic, in which I was formerly engaged with your father; and I am persuaded it is an association, my dear Cornificius, in which we shall ever be united. It is with much pleasure, likewise, that I find you esteem it unnecessary to send me any ceremonious acknowledgments of my services: formalities, indeed, would ill agree with that intimacy which subsists between us.

If the senate were ever holden in the absence of the consuls, unless upon some very sudden and extraordinary occasion, it would have been more frequent than it is in order to concert proper measures for the support of your authority. But as neither Hirtius nor Pansa is in Rome, no decree can at present be procured, in relation to the several sums of two millions[5], and of seventy millions[6] of sesterces which you mention. I think, however, that you are sufficiently authorised to raise this money by way of loan, in virtue of that general decree of the senate by which you were confirmed in your government.

I imagine you are informed of the state of our affairs, by those to whom it properly belongs to send you the intelligence. As for myself, I conceive great hopes that things will take a favourable turn. I am not wanting, at least, in my utmost vigilance and efforts for that purpose: and I am resolutely waging war against every foe to the republic. The recovery of our liberties does not seem, indeed, even now, to be a matter of great difficulty: I am sure it would have been perfectly easy, if some persons had acted in the manner they ought. Farewell.

LETTER XX.

To Plancius.

It is principally for the sake of my country that I ought to rejoice in the very powerful succours with which you have strengthened the republic, at a juncture when it is well-nigh reduced to the last extremity. I protest, however, by all my hopes of congratulating you on the victorious deliverance of the commonwealth, that a considerable part of the joy which I feel upon this occasion, arises from the share I take in your glory. Great, indeed, is the reputation you have already acquired, and great I am persuaded will be the honours that will hereafter be conferred upon you: for assure yourself, nothing could make a stronger impression upon the senate than your late letter* to that assembly. It did so, both with respect to those very important services which it brought us an account that you had performed, and with regard to that strength of sentiment and expression with which it was drawn up. It contained nothing, however, that was in the least unexpected to myself; as I was not only perfectly well acquainted with your heart, and had not forgotten the promises you had given me in your letters, but as I had received from Furnius a full information of all your designs. These, indeed, appeared to the senate much beyond what they had allowed themselves to hope: not that they ever entertained the least doubt of your disposition, but because they were by no means sufficiently apprised of either of what you were in a condition to effect, or whether you purposed to March. It was with infinite pleasure, therefore, that I read the letter which Marcus Varisidius delivered to me on your part. I received it on the 7th of this month, in the morning, amidst a large circle of very worthy citizens, who were attending in order to conduct me from my house: and I immediately gave them a share in my joy. Whilst we were mutually congratulating each other upon this happy occurrence, Munatius came to pay me his usual morning visit: to whom I likewise communicated your letter. It was the first notice he had received of an express being arrived from you: as Varisidius, in pursuance of your directions, did not deliver any of his dispatches till he had first waited upon me. A short time, however, after Munatius had left me, he returned with your letter to himself, together also with a note from the consuls to their colleague. We thought proper to carry the letter immediately to Corvutus: who, as prector of the city, supplies the office of the consuls in their absence, agreeably, you know, to an ancient and established custom. The senate was instantly summoned; and the expectation that was raised by the general report of an express being arrived from you, brought together a very full assembly. As soon as your letter was read, it was objected that Corvutus had not taken the precaution of manufacturing the paper which was ordered to be carried. This objection was confirmed by the general sentiments of our college. In consequence of this, the senate was adjourned to the following day; when I had a very warm contest with Servilius, who strenuously opposed the passing of any decree to your honour. For this purpose he had the interest to procure his own motion to be first proposed to the senate; which being rejected, however, by a great majority, mine was next taken into consideration. But when the senate had unanimously agreed to it, Publius Titius*, at the instigation of Servilius, interposed his negative. The farther deliberation upon this affair was postponed, therefore, to the next day: when Servilius came prepared to support an opposition, which, in some sort, might be considered as injurious to the honour even of Jupiter himself; as it was in the Capitol 1 that the senate, upon this occasion, was assembled. I leave it to your other friends to inform you in what manner I modified Servilius, and with how much warmth I exposed the contemptible interposition of Titius. But this I will myself assure you, that the senate could not possibly act with greater dignity and spirit, or show a stronger disposition to advance your honours, than it discovered upon this occasion. Nor are you less in favour with the whole city in general: as, indeed, all orders and degrees of men amongst us remarkably concur in the same common zeal for the deliverance of the republic. Perservere then, my friend, in the glorious course upon which you have entered: and let nothing less than immortal fame be the object of your well-directed ambition. Despite the false splendour of all those empty honours that are short-lived, transitory, and perishable. True glory is founded upon virtue alone; which is never so illustriously distinguished as when it displays itself by important services to our country. You have at this time a most favourable opportunity for that purpose: which, as you have a right to expect, let it not slip away. It is but your due that you shall have employed it to full advantage; lest it be said, that you are more obliged to the republic than the republic is obliged to you. As, for my own part, you will always find me ready to contribute to the advancement as well as to the support of your dignities: indeed, it is what I owe not only to our friendship, but to the commonwealth, which is far dearer to me than life itself.

While I was employing my best services for the promotion of your honours, I received great pleasure in observing the prudence and fidelity which Titus Munatius exerted for the same purpose. I had experienced those qualities in him upon other occasions: but the incredible diligence and affection with which he acted for your interest in this affair, showed them to me in a still stronger and more conspicuous point of view. Farewell.

April the 11th.

1 The Capitol was a temple dedicated to Jupiter, and the most considerable structure of the sacred kind in all Rome. The ruins of this celebrated edifice are still to be seen. None of the commentators have taken notice of the indirect compliment which Cicero here pays to Plancus, which seems, however, to deserve a particular explanation. The Capitol was held in singular veneration, as being built upon the spot which Jupiter was supposed to have chosen for the visible manifestation of his person. In consequence of this popular superstition, both Horace and Virgil often speak of the prosperity and duration of the Capitol as a circumstance upon which the fortune of the whole empire depended.

Cicero, therefore, by a very artful piece of flattery, intimated, that the opposition Servilius made to the honours which the senate intended to have paid to Plancus, was, in effect, an affront to that supreme and guardian divinity in whose temple the transaction passed, us being contrary to the interest of a republic which was distinguished by Jupiter himself with his immediate presence.—Vide Eul. viii. 349.
LETTER XXI.

To Cornificius.

My friendship with Lucius Lamia is well known, I am persuaded, not only to yourself, who are
a. u. 710. acquainted with all the circumstances of my life, but to every Roman in general. It most conspicuously appeared, indeed, to the whole world, when he was banished by the consul Gabinius1, for having, with so remarkable a spirit of freedom and fortitude, risen up in my defence3. Our friendship, however, did not commence from that period: it was from an affection of a much earlier date, that he was induced thus generously to expose himself to every danger in my cause. To these his meritorious services, I must add, that there is no man whose company affords me a more true and exquisite entertainment. After what I have thus said, you will think it needless, surely, that I should use much rhetoric in recommending him to your favour. You see the just reason I have for giving him so large a share of my affection:
whatever terms, therefore, the strongest friendship can require upon an occasion of this nature, let your imagination supply for me in the present. I will only assure you, that your good offices to the agents, the servants, and the family of Lamia, in every article wherein his affairs in your province shall require them, will be a more acceptable instance of your generosity than any you could confer in my own personal concerns. I am persuaded, indeed, from your great penetration into the characters of men, that without my recommendation you would be perfectly well disposed to give him your best assistance. I must confess, at the same time, I have heard that you suspect him of having signed some decree of the senate injurious to your honour. But I must assure you, in the first place, that he never signed any during the administration of those consuls1; and, in the next, that almost all the decrees which were pretended to be passed at that time, were absolutely forged. The truth is, you might just as reasonably suppose I was concerned in that decree to which my name was subscribed, relating to Sempronius; though, in fact,
I was then absent from Rome, and complained, I remember, of the injury that had been done me, in a letter which I wrote to you upon the occasion.
But not to enter further into this subject; I most certainly entreat you, my dear Cornificius, to consider the interest of Lamia, in all respects, as mine, and to let him see that my recommendation has proved of singular advantage to his affairs:
assuring yourself that you cannot, in any instance, more effectually oblige me. Farewell.

LETTER XXII.

To the same.

Cornificius delivered your letter to me on the 17th of March, about three weeks, as he told me, after he had received it from your hands.

a. u. 710. The senate did not assemble either on that day or the next; however, on the 9th they met, when I defended your cause in a very full house, and with no unpropiitious regards from Minerva2. I may with peculiar propriety say so, as the statue of the most ancient goddess of Rome, which formerly stood in the Capitol3, and which had lately been thrown down by a high wind, was at the same time decreed to be replaced. Your letter, which Pansa read to the senate, was much approved, and afforded great satisfaction to the whole assembly. It fired them, at the same time, with general indignation against the impudent attempts of the horrid Minotaur, for so I may well call those combined adversities of yours, Calvius and Taurus4. It was proposed, therefore, that the censure of the senate should pass upon them; but that motion was overruled by the more merciful Pansa. However, a decree was voted upon this occasion extremely to your honour.

As for my own good offices in your favour, be assured, my dear Cornificius, they have not been wanting from the first moment I conceived a hope of recovering our liberties. Accordingly, when I laid a foundation for that purpose, on the 20th of December last5, while the rest of those who ought to have been equally forward in that work, stood timidly hesitating in what manner to act, I had a particular view to the preserving you in your present post; and to this end I prevailed with the senate to agree to my motion concerning the continuance of the proconsuls in their respective provinces. But my zeal in your cause did not terminate here; and I still continued my attacks upon that person, who, in contempt of the senate, and well as most injuriously to you, had, even whilst he himself was absent from Rome, procured your government to be allotted to him. My frequent, or, to speak more properly, my incessant, reconstrances against his proceedings, forced him, much against his inclinations, to enter Rome, where he found himself obliged to relinquish the hopes of an honour which he thought himself no less sure of than if it had been in his actual possession. It gives me great pleasure that these my just and honest invectives against your adversary, in conjunction with your own exalted merit, have secured you in your government, as I rejoice extremely, likewise, in the distinguished honours you have there received.

I very readily admit of your excuse in regard to Sempronius, well knowing that your conduct upon that occasion may justly be imputed to those errors

1 It was a sort of proverbial expression among the Romans, when they spoke of any successful undertaking, to say that it was carried on "not without the approbation of Minerva."

2 Cicero, a little before his retreat into banishment, took a small statue of Minerva, which had long been reverenced in his family as a kind of tutelar deity, and carrying it to the Capitol, placed it in the temple of Jupiter, under the title of Minerva, the guardian of the city."—Life of Cicero, p. 92.

3 The Minotaur was a fabulous monster which the poets describe as half man half bull. Cicero, therefore, in allusion to the name of Taurus, who had joined with Calviius in some combination against Cornificius, joyously gives them the appellation of the Minotaur.

4 When he spoke his third and fourth Philippic orations, in which Cicero endeavoured, amongst other articles, to animate the senate and the people to vigorous measures against Antony.
TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

... to which we were all equally liable, whilst we trod the dark and dubious paths of bondage. I myself, indeed, the grave inspirer of your counsels, and the firm defender of your dignities, even I, my friend, was injudiciously hurried away by my indignation at the times, when, too hastily despairing of liberty, I attempted to retire into Greece. But the Etessian winds, like so many patriot citizens, refused to waft me from the commonwealth, whilst Auster, conspiring in their designs, collected his whole force, and drove me back again to Rhegium. From thence I returned to Rome, with all the expedition that sails and oars could speed me, and, the very next day after my arrival, I showed the world that I was the only man, amidst a race of the most abject slaves, that dared to assert his freedom and independency. I inveighed, indeed, against the measures of Antony with so much spirit and indignation, that he lost all manner of patience; and pointing the whole rage of his bacchanalian fury at my devoted head, he at first endeavoured to gain a pretence of assassinating me in the senate; but that project not succeeding, his next resource was to lay wait for my life in private. But I extricated myself from his insidious snares, and drove him, all reeking with the fumes of his nauseous intemperance, into the toils of Octavius. That excellent youth drew together a body of troops, in the first place, for his own and my particular defence; and in the next, for that of the republic in general; which, if he had not happily raised, Antony, in his return from Brundisium, would have spread desolation, like a wasting pestilence, around the land. What followed I need not add, as I imagine you are well apprised of all that has happened subsequent to that period. To return, then, to what gave occasion to this digression, let me again assure you, that I am perfectly well satisfied with your excuse concerning Sempronius. The truth is, it was impossible to act with any determined steadiness and uniformity in times of such total anarchy and confusion.

"But other days," to use an expression of Terence, "are now arrived, and other measures are now required." Come, then, my friend, let us sail forth together, and even take our place at the helm. All the advocates of liberty are embarked in one common bottom; and it is my utmost endeavour to steer them right. May prosperous gales then attend our voyage! But, whatever winds may arise, my best skill, must assuredly, shall not be wanting: and is it in the power of patriotism to be answerable for more? In the mean time, let it be your care to cherish in your breast every generous and exalted sentiment, remembering always that your true glory must ever be inseparably connected with the republic. Farewell.

9 An account of this intended voyage has already been given in a former note. See rem. 1, p. 551.

10 This seems to allude to his having refused to pay obedience to a summons from Antony, to attend a meeting of the senate which was held on that day. See rem. 1, p. 553.

11 Octavius, as soon as he returned into Italy, after the death of Caesar, endeavoured to secure Cicero in his interest, as Cicero appeared no less forward to embrace the friendship of Octavius. They both of them, indeed, had one of the strongest of all motives, perhaps, for a mutual coalition; as there is nothing in which men seem to unite more amicably, than in hunting down the same common foe. The league, however, into which Cicero entered with Octavius, extended no farther at first than to a matter of mere civil controversy; and he only engaged to support Octavius in his claim of part of Caesar's estate, which Antony, it was alleged, injuriously withheld from him. But even this was going a greater length than a true patriot could prudently have ventured: for though the contest between Antony and Octavius, with respect to the money in question, was altogether personal, yet "by natural consequence (as the accurate observer upon the epistles between Cicero and Brutus justly remarks) it became a matter of more extensive concern. In the first place, it was joined with the succession to the name of Caesar, which was looked upon by the chiefs of the Caesarin party as an earnest of the continuance of the public settlement made by Caesar in the person of Octavius; and, on the same account, it was always suspected by the more discerning republicans. In the next place, it gave Octavius the plausible occasion of being the distinguished asserter of Caesar's acts, and of the full execution of all his bequests, by which means he drew upon himself the eyes of all the veterans, the military force of the empire, and interested the whole populace of Rome in his cause, since it was the common cause of all who were expecting with impatience the effect of Caesar's liberality." However, had Cicero's engagements with Octavius ended here, his conduct might have been excused, at least, though it certainly could not have been justified. But when he afterwards armed Octavius with the power and the dignities of the state; when he trusted (as the excellent author of the observations on his life ingeniously expresses it) "the last stake of liberty in the hands of a man who had so great temptations to betray it," he seems clearly to have acted in contradiction to the sentiments of his heart, and to have sacrificed the cause of the republic to the hatred he bore to Antony. Plutarch expressly assigns this as Cicero's motive for declaring in favour of Octavius, which, indeed, is abundantly confirmed by his letters to Atticus. It appears "from these that there was so little difference, with respect to the republican interest, whether Antony or Octavius was at the head of affairs, that neither Attius nor Cicero could determine in that view which to prefer:—"Valde tibi assessor," says our author to his friend, "si multum posset Octavianus, multa firmissa acta tyrannum comprobatur int, quam in Tellusior: atque id contra Brutum fieri. Sin autem vincitur, vide intolerabilem Antonium, ut quem velis necesse."—Ad Att. xvi. 14; Plut. in Vit. Brut.; Tunic. obser. on Eph. between Brut. and Cle. p. 132; Obser. on the Life of Cle. p. 50.

LETTER I.
Galba² to Cicero.

On the 15th of this month, the day on which Pansa intended to join the army of Hirtius, Antony, and others, began to march with the legionary cohorts, and that of Silanus; both of which were composed of the Evocati. I happened, at this time, to be in Pansa’s army, having been sent a hundred miles express, in order to hasten his march. Antony advanced towards us with these troops, in the supposition that our forces consisted only of four new-raised legions; whereas Hirtius, the better to secure our junction, had taken advantage of the preceding night to reinforce us with the martial legion, which I generally commanded, as also with two praetorian cohorts. These regiments, upon the very first appearance of Antony’s cavalry, could by no means be restrained from engaging; so that we were under an absolute necessity of following them to the charge. Antony, in order to deceive us into a belief that none of his legions were with him, had posted them at Forum Gallorum, and only appeared with his horse and light-armèd troops in view. Pansa, when he saw that, contrary to his inclination, the martial legion had rushed on to the attack, gave directions that two of his new-raised legions, which were behind, should immediately come up. As soon as we had passed the woods and a morass, we formed in order of battle with twelve cohorts; the other two legions I just now mentioned not being yet arrived. Antony observing this, drew all his forces out of the village, and instantly began the engagement. Both sides maintained the first onset with the most obstinate bravery; though, indeed, our right wing, in which I commanded eight cohorts of the martial legion, at the very beginning of the action, repulsed Antony’s thirty-fifth legion, and pursued them above 4000 paces out of the field. But I no sooner observed the enemy’s cavalry attempting to surround the wing from which I had advanced, than I endeavoured to regain it; ordering, at the same time, my light-armèd troops to engage Antony’s Moorish horse, lest they should fall upon us in our rear. But whilst I was attempting to regain my post, I found myself in the midst of the enemy’s troops, and perceived Antony himself at a small distance behind me.

Upon this, throwing my shield across my shoulders, I galloped full speed towards one of our new-raised legions, which I saw advancing from the camp; the enemy, at the same time pursuing me on the one side, and our men aiming their pikes at me on the other; but, as the letter soon discovered who I was, I had the very extraordinary good fortune to escape. Caesar’s praetorian cohort, which was posted on the aEmilian road, made a very long and vigorous resistance. But our left wing, in which were two cohorts of the martial legion, together with the praetorian cohort, and which formed indeed the weakest division of our army, began to give ground, being hemmed in by Antony’s cavalry, in which he is extremely strong. As soon as all our troops had made good their retreat, I began to think of mine, and was the last that entered our camp. Antony, considering himself as master of the field, imagined he could, likewise, take possession of our camp; but, after an unsuccessful attempt, he retired with great loss.

As soon as Hirtius was informed of what had passed, he put himself at the head of twenty veteran cohorts, and meeting Antony in his return from the attack of our camp, engaged him upon the very spot where our action had just before happened, and entirely defeated his army. About ten o’clock that night, Antony, with his cavalry, regained his camp near Mutina; as Hirtius retired to that which Pansa had quitted in the morning, and in which he had left the two legions that repulsed Antony.

The enemy have lost the greatest part of their veteran troops. But this advantage was not to be obtained without a loss, likewise, on our side; the praetorian cohorts, together with the martial legion, having somewhat suffered in this action. We have taken two legionary standards, together with sixty others; and, upon the whole, have gained a very considerable victory. Farewell.

From the camp, April the 20th.

LETTER II.
Plancus to Cicero².

It affords me great pleasure to reflect that I have amply justified your favourable representations of me, by having strictly fulfilled the promises I made you. I give you a proof, likewise, of my particular affection, by acquainting you, before any other of my friends, with the measures I have taken. I hope you are well persuaded, that the republic will daily receive still stronger instances of my attachment; let me assure you, at least, that you shall be more and more convinced of it by the clearest and most unquestionable evidence. As to what concerns my own personal interest, I protest to you, my dear Cicero, by all my hopes of rescuing the republic from those imminent dangers to which it is exposed, that notwithstanding I esteem those illustrious recompeneses which are conferred by the senate as no less desirable than immortal fame, yet, believe me, I shall not in the least remit of my earnest endeavours to assuage the commonwealth, although I should never participate of its glorious rewards. If the ardour and efficacy of my zeal should not distinguish me, amidst those many excellent citizens who stand forth in the defence of our country, let not your suffrage contribute to the increase of my honours. I have no ambition inconsistent with that general equality for which I have taken up arms, and am perfectly well contented to leave it to your own determination, both when, and in what manner, my services shall be recompenosed. Nothing, indeed, can be deemed too late or too insensible, which is given to a man as a public testimony of his country's approbation.

Having reached the Rhone, by long marches, I passed that river, with my whole army, on the 27th of April, and immediately ordered a detachment of a thousand horse to advance before me from Vienna; by a shorter road. If I meet with no obstructions on the part of Lepidus, I doubt not of giving the republic reason to be satisfied with my diligence and expedition; but, if he should attempt to intercept my passage, I must take my measures as circumstances shall require. Of this, however, I will now assure you, that the army I am conducting is highly respectable, whether considered with regard to the nature, the number, or the fidelity of my troops. I will only add, that I desire your friendship upon no other terms, than as you are sure I shall always give you the warmest returns of mine. Farewell.

LETTER III.

Decimus Brutus to Cicero.

You are sensible how great a loss the republic has sustained by the death of Pansa. It behoves you, therefore, to exert all your credit and address to prevent our enemies from entertaining any reasonable hope of recovering their strength now that they have thus deprived us of both our consuls. I am preparing to pursue

Antony immediately; and I trust shall be able to render it impossible either for Antony to continue in Italy, or for Ventidius to escape out of it.

As I suppose you see very clearly the measures which Ppollio will pursue, I need say nothing to you upon that article. But I make it my first and principal request that you would send to Lepidus, in order, if possible, to prevent that light and inconstant man from renewing the war by joining with Antony; as both Lepidus and Pollio are at the head of very numerous and powerful armies. I do not mention this as imagining that you are not equally attentive to these important points,—but from the firm persuasion that Lepidus, however dubious it may perhaps appear to the senate, will never of himself act in the manner he ought. Let me entreat you, likewise, to confirm Plancius in his present resolutions; who, I should hope, when he sees Antony driven out of Italy, will not be wanting in his assistance to the republic. If the latter should have crossed the Alps, I purpose to post a proper number of forces to guard the passes of those mountains; and you may depend upon my giving you regular notice of all my motions. Farewell.

From my camp at Rhegium, April the 29th.

LETTER IV.

To Plancius.

How plessing was the letter I received from you two days before our victory at Mutina! wherein you gave me an account of the state of your troops, of your zeal to the republic, and of the expedition with which you were advancing to the relief of Brutus. But, notwithstanding that the enemy was defeated before you could join our army, the hopes, nevertheless, of Ventidius was a soldier of fortune, who, from the meanest original, became one of the most distinguished captains of the age. The father of Pompey having taken the city of Ascalum in the Italian or Social war, reserved part of the inhabitants to graces his triumphal entry into Rome, among which was the mother of Ventidius, who walked before the victor's ear with her infant son at her breast. When he grew up he gained his livelihood by serving as a groom, in which employment having gotten together a little money, he furnished himself with some mules and carriages, which he let out to the government for the use of the processions in their way to the provinces. In this capacity he became known to Caesar, who observing in him a genius much superior to his station, took him into Gaul, where he advanced him in his army; and, after the civil wars were ended, gave him a place in the senate, and created him praetor. After the death of Caesar, he attached himself to the interest of Antony, to whom assistance he was at this time marching at the head of a considerable body of troops, which he had raised out of Caesar's veteran legions that were dispersed in different parts of Italy. Towards the end of the present year, the triumvirates appointed him consul. Having shortly afterwards obtained a signal victory over the Parthians, his conduct and bravery were rewarded with a triumph; and to crown the series of his glory, he was honoured, at his death, with a public funeral. —Anul. Gell. xx. 4; Dio, xill. p. 328; Vell. Pat. ii. 65.

f The intent of this guard seems to have been what Mr. Rose conjectures, in order to intercept the march of Ventidius, and prevent him from following Antony over the Alps.

g A town upon the Emilian Way, between Modena and Parma. It is now called Reggio.
the commonwealth are still fixed entirely upon you; as the principal leaders of these infamous rebels have escaped, it is said, from the field of battle. You will remember, therefore, that to exterminate the remains of this party will be a service no less acceptable to the senate than if you had given them the first repulse.

I am waiting, as well as many others, with great impatience for the return of your couriers. I hope that our late success will now induce even Lepidus himself to act in concert with you for the defence of the common cause. I entreat you, my dear Plancus, to employ your utmost endeavours for this important purpose, that every spark of this horrid war may be utterly and for ever extinguished.

If you should be able to effect this, you will render a most godlike service to your country, and at the same time procure immortal honour to yourself.

Farewell.

May the 5th.

LETTER V.

To the same.

I seize the very first opportunity of contributing to the augmentation of your dignities; and a. u. 710. I omitted no distinction that could be considered either as the applause or reward of merit. This you will perceive by the decree which has been voted to your honour with the utmost zeal and unanimity in a very full house; and it is expressed in the very words I dictated from a paper which I had drawn up for that purpose. I was sensible, at the same time, from your letter, that it was more your ambition to approve your actions to every honest mind, than to be distinguished with these ensigns of glory; but I thought it incumbent upon the republic to consider, not what you desire, but what you deserve. Let me only entreat you to finish the work which others have so happily begun; remembering that whoever shall destroy Antony will have the whole honour of concluding this war. It is thus that Homer gives the glory, not to Ajax, nor Achilles, but to Ulysses alone, of having exterminated Troy.

Farewell.

LETTER VI.

Decimus Brutas to Cicero.

I look upon the obligations I have received from you, as nothing inferior even to those which a. u. 710. I have conferred upon the republic; but I am not capable, you are well assured, of making you so ill a return as I have experienced from some of my ungrateful countrymen. It might, perhaps, in the present conjuncture, be thought to have somewhat the air of flattery were I to say, that your single applause outweighs, in my esteem, their whole united approbation. It is certain, however, that you view my actions by the faithful light of dispassionate truth and reason; whereas they, on the contrary, look upon them through the clouds of envy and malevolence. But I am little concerned how much soever they may oppose my honours, provided they do not obstruct me in my services to the republic,—the very dangerous situation of which let me now point out to you in as few words as possible.

In the first place, then, you are sensible what great disturbances the death of the consuls1 may create in Rome; as it may give occasion to all the dangerous practices that ambition will suggest to those who are desirous of succeeding to their office.2 This is all that prudence will allow me to say in a letter; and all, indeed, that is necessary to be said to a man of your penetration. As to Antony, notwithstanding he made his escape from the field of battle with but a very few troops, and those too entirely disarmed; yet, by setting open the prisons, and by pressing all sorts of men that fell in his way, he has collected no contemptible number of forces. These have likewise been considerably augmented by the accession of the veteran and other troops of Ventidius; who, after a very difficult march over the Apennine mountains, has found means to join Antony in the farms of Sabata.3 The only possible scheme on which the latter can pursue is,—either to have recourse to Lepidus, if that general should be disposed to receive him; or to post himself on the Alps and Apennines, in order to make depredations with his cavalry (in which he is exceedingly strong) on the neighbouring country; or to march into Etruria4, where we have no army to oppose him.

Had Caesar, however, passed the Apennine mountains agreeably to my advice,5 I should have driven Antony into such difficulties that, perhaps without striking a single blow, I should have been able to have wasted his whole army by famine. But the misfortune is, that Caesar will neither be governed by me, nor will his army be governed by him,—both which are very unhappy circumstances for our cause. This then being the sad state of public affairs, can I be solicitous, as I said above, what opposition I may meet with in respect to my own personal honours? The particulars I have here mentioned were very delicate a nature, that I know not how you will be able to touch upon them in the senate; or if you should, I fear it will be to no purpose. In the mean time I am in no condition to subsist my troops any longer. When I first took up arms for the deliverance of the commonwealth, I had above four hundred thousand sesterces6 in ready money; but at present I have not only mortgaged every part of my estate, but have borrowed all I could possibly raise on the credit of my friends. I leave you to judge, therefore, with what difficulty I now maintain several legions at my own expense. The truth is, I should not be equal to so great a charge were I possessed of all Varro's* immense treasures.

5 "Octavius, from the beginning, had no thoughts of pursuing Antony. He had already gained what he aimed at; had reduced Antony's power so low, and raised his own so high, as to be in a condition of making his own terms with him in the partition of the empire: whereas, if Antony had been wholly destroyed, the republican party would have probably been too strong for him and Lepidus. When Octavius was pressed, therefore, to pursue Antony, he contrived still to delay it until it was too late, taking himself to be more usefully employed in securing to his interest the troops of the consuls."—Life of Cicero, p. 274.

As soon as I shall receive any certain information of Antony's motions, I will give you notice. In the mean time I will only add, that I desire the continuance of your friendship upon no other terms than as you shall find an equal return of mine. Farewell.

LETTER VII.

Plancus to Cicero.

I give you a thousand and a thousand thanks for your late favours, which, as long as I live, I shall always most gratefully acknowledge. A. u. 710. More than this I dare not venture to promise; for I fear it will never be in my power to acquit such uncommon obligations, unless you should think (what your letter endeavours, indeed, with much serious eloquence to persuade me) that to remember them is to return them. You could not have acted with a more affectionate zeal if the dignities of your own son had been in question; and I am perfectly sensible of the high honours that were decreed to me in consequence of your first motion for that purpose. I am sensible, too, that all your subsequent votes in my behalf were entirely conformable to the circumstances of the times and the opinion of my friends; as I am informed, likewise, of the advantageous colours in which you are perpetually representing me, as well as of the frequent contests you sustain with my injurious detractors. It is incumbent upon me, therefore, in the first place, to endeavour to convince the republic that I am worthy of the praises you bestow upon me,—and, in the next place, to render you sensible that I gratefully bear your friendship in remembrance. I will only add, under this article, that I desire you to protect me in the honours I have thus procured by your influence; but I desire it no otherwise than as my actions shall prove that I am the man you wish to find me.

As soon as I had passed the Rhone, I detached a body of three thousand* horse under the command of my brother, with orders to advance towards Mutina, to which place I intended to follow them with the rest of my army. But, on my march thither, I received advice that an action had happened and that the siege was raised. Antony, I find, has no other resource left but to retire into these parts with the remains of his broken forces. His only hopes, indeed, are, that he may be able to gain either Lepidus or his army, in which there are some troops no less disaffected to the republic than those which served under Antony himself. I thought proper, therefore, to recal my cavalry, and to hast in the country of the Allobroges', that I may be ready to act as circumstances shall require. If Antony should retire into this country destitute of men, I make no doubt, notwithstanding, that he should be received by the army of Lepidus, to be able to give a good account of him with my present forces. Should he even appear at the head of some troops, and should the tenth veteran legion revolt, which, together with the rest of those regiments, was by my means prevailed upon to engage in the service of the republic,—yet I shall endeavour, by acting on the offensive, to prevent him from gaining any advantage over us; which I hope to effect, till a reinforcement from Italy shall enable me to exterminate this desperate crew. I will venture at least to assure you, my dear Cicero, that neither zeal nor vigilance shall be wanting on my part for that purpose. It is my sincere wish, indeed, that the senate may have no farther fears; but if any should still remain, no man will enter into their cause with greater warmth and spirit, nor be willing to suffer more in the support of the public.

I am favourably disposed to engage Lepidus to join with me in the same views; and I have promised him, if he will act with a regard to the interest of the republic, that I shall, upon all occasions, yield him an entire deference. I have employed my brother, together with Furnius and Laterensis, to negotiate this association between us; and no private injury done to myself shall ever prevent me from concuring with my greatest enemy whenever it may be necessary for the defence of the commonwealth. But should these overtures prove unsuccessful, I shall still persevere with the same zeal (and, perhaps, with more glory) in my endeavours to give satisfaction to the senate. Take care of your health, and allow me an equal return of your friendship. Farewell.

LETTER VIII.

Decimus Brutus, Consul elect, to Cicero.

I have received a duplicate of the letter you sent me by my couriers, to which I can only say, in return, that my obligations to you rise much higher than I can easily discharge.

I gave you an account, in my last, of the posture of our affairs: since which I have received intelligence that Antony is on his march towards Lepidus. Among some papers of Antony which are fallen into my hands, I found a list of the several persons whom I intended to employ as mediators in his behalf with Pollio, Lepidus, and Plancus; so that he has not yet, it seems, given up all hopes of gaining the latter. Nevertheless, I did not hesitate to send an immediate express to Plancus, with advice on Antony's march. I expect, within a few days, to receive ambassadors from the Allobroges, and all the other districts of this province: and I doubt not of dismissing them strongly confirmed in their allegiance to the republic. You will be attentive on your part, I dare say, to promote all such necessary measures at Rome as shall be agreeable to your sentiments, and to the interest of the commonwealth. I am equally persuaded that you will prevent, if it be possible to prevent, the malevolent schemes of my enemies. But if you should not succeed in these generous endeavours, you will, at least, have the satisfaction to find that no indignities they can throw upon me, are capable of deterring me from my purposes. LETTER IX.

Plancus to Cicero.

Some occurrences have arisen since I closed my former letter, of which I think it may import the republic that you should be apprized; as both the commonwealth and myself, I hope, have reaped advantage from my embassy in the affair I am going to mention. I solicited Lepidus by repeated expressions to lay aside all animosities between us, and amiably unite with me in concerting measures for the succour of the republic, conjuring him to prefer the interest of his family and his country to that of a contemptible and desperate rebel; and assuring him, if he did so, that he might entirely command me upon all occasions. Accordingly, by the intervention of Later~

A. U. 710.

nus, I have succeeded in my negotiation; and Lepidus has given me his honour that he cannot prevent Antony from entering his province, he will most certainly lead his army against him. He requests, likewise, that I would join him with my forces; and the rather, as Antony is extremely strong in cavalry, whereas that of Lepidus is very inconsiderable: and out of these few, ten of his best men have lately deserted to my camp. As soon as I received this express, I lost no time to forward and assist the good intentions of Lepidus. I clearly saw, indeed, the advantage that would arise from my joining him; as my horse would be of service in pursuing and destroying Antony's cavalry, and, as the presence of my troops in general, would be a restraint upon the disaffected part of those under his command. To this end, having spent a day in throwing a bridge across the Isara, a very considerable river, that bounds the territories of the Allobroges, I passed it with my whole army on the 12th of May. But having received advice that Lucius Antoninus was advancing towards us with some regiments of horse and foot, and that he was actually arrived at Forum Julii; I ordered, on the 14th, a detachment of four thousand horse to meet him, under the command of my brother, whom I purpose to follow by long marches with four light-armed legions and the remainder of my cavalry. And should that Fortune which presides over the republic prove in any degree favourable to my arms, I shall soon put an end, at once, both to our own fears and to the hopes of these insolent rebels. But if the infamous Antony, apprized of our approach, should retire towards Italy, it will be the business of Brutus to intercept his march; and Brutus, I am persuaded, will not be wanting either in courage or conduct for that purpose. Nevertheless, I shall, in that case, send my brother with a detachment of horse to harass Antony in his retreat, and to protect Italy from his depredations. Farewell.

LETTER X.

Cassius, Proconsul, to Cicero.

Your letter affords me a new proof of your extraordinary friendship. I find by it that you are not only a well-wisher to my interest, (as A. U. 710, you have, at all times, been, indeed, for the sake of the republic as well as for my own,) but enter into it with the warmest and most anxious solicitude. I was persuaded, therefore, that as you could not suppose me capable of being inactive at a season when my country laboured under a general oppression, you would be impatient to hear both of my personal welfare and of the success of my military preparations. For this reason, as soon as Aulus Aelius had resigned those legions into my hands which he brought from Egypt, I wrote to you by different couriers, whom I despatched to Rome. I sent a letter, at the same time, to the senate; and if my people obeyed their instructions, it was not delivered till it was first read to you. But, if these expressions should not be arrived, I am persuaded they have been intercepted by Dolabella, who, after having most villanously murdered Trebonius, has made himself master of his province.

All the troops which I found in Syria have submitted to my authority. However, I have been a little retarded in my preparations, in order to distribute some donatives which I had promised to the soldiers, but I have now discharged my engagements.

If you are sensible that I have refused no labours nor dangers for the service of my country; if it was by your advice and persuasion that I took up arms against the people of Rome, and that my end was the freedom of their city from the enemies of the public, I need not tell you of this -

This seems to be an answer to the 15th letter of the preceding book, p. 568.

See rem. 5, p. 565.

b It has already been observed [see rem. 5, p. 563] that Dolabella left Rome before the expiration of his consulship, in order to possess himself of the government of Syria. In his way thither he arrived at Smyrna, where Trebonius, proconsul of Asia Minor, resided. Trebonius refused him admittance into the city, but treated him, however, with great civility, and many compliments mutually passed between them. With these Dolabella appeared satisfied, and pretending to pursue his march, proceeded towards Ephesus; but he returned to the night, and making himself master of the city by surprise, seized Trebonius in his bed. Cicero, in one of his Philippics, expatiates upon the cruelties which Dolabella exercised on this his unfortunate but illustrious prisoner. He kept him two days under torture, to extort a discovery of the public money in his custody, insulating him at the same time with the most opprobrious language; he then ordered his head to be cut off and exhibited to the populace on the point of a spear, his body to be dragged through the principal streets of Smyrna, and afterwards to be thrown into the sea. See rem. 5, p. 564; Appian. De Bell. Civ. III. p. 549; Philo. xii. 2, 3.

against those infamous invaders of our liberties; if I have not only raised an army for the defence of the commonwealth, but have even snatched it from most cruel and oppressive hands; let these considerations recommend my interests to your care and protection. Had Dolabella, indeed, possessed himself of these forces, the expectation of such an additional body of troops, even before they had actually joined Antony, would greatly have confirmed and strengthened his party. If, upon this account, therefore, you think these soldiers deserve highly of the republic, let them experience the benefit of your patronage, nor suffer them to have reason to regret, that they preferred their duty to the commonwealth, to all the powerful temptations of plunder and rapine. I must also recommend it to your care, that due honours be paid to the generals, Marcus and Crispus. As to Bassus, he obstinately refused to deliver up the legion under his command: and had they not, without his consent, deputed some of their officers to treat with me, he would have shut the gates of Apamæa, and forced me to have entered the town by assault. I make these requests, then, as well in the name of our friendship, which, I trust, will have much weight with you; as in that of the republic, which has ever, I know, been the object of your warmest affection. Believe me, the army under my command is zealously attached not only to the senate, and to every friend of our country, but particularly to yourself. The frequent accounts, indeed, they hear of your patriot disposition, have extremely endeared you to them, and should they find their interests to be a part of your concern, they will consider you, in all respects, as their first and greatest benefactor.

Since I wrote the above, I have received intelligence that Dolabella is marched into Cilicia, whither I purpose immediately to follow him. I will give you early notice of the event of this expedition, and may I so prove successful, as I shall endeavour to deserve well of the republic. Take care of your health, and continue your friendship to me. Farewell.

From my camp, May the 7th.

LETTER XI.

To Decimus Brutus, Consul elect.

The message you commissioned Galba and Volumnius to deliver to the senate, sufficiently intimates the nature of those fears and suspicions which I imagine we have reason to entertain. But I must confess, that the apprehensions you would thus infuse into us, seem by no means worthy of that glorious victory you have obtained over the enemies of the commonwealth. Believe me, my dear Brutus, both the senate, and the generals that support its cause, are animated with an undaunted resolution; we are sorry, therefore, that you, whom we esteem the bravest captain that ever the republic employed, should think us capable of any timidity. Is it possible, indeed, after having confidently repose our hopes on your courage and conduct, when you were invested by Antony in all the fullness of his strength and power, that any of us should harbour the least fear now that the siege is raised, and the enemy's army entirely overthrown? Nor have we any thing to apprehend from Lepidus; for who can imagine him so utterly void of all rational conduct, as to have professed himself an advocate for peace, when we were engaged in a most necessary and important war, and yet to take up arms against the republic the moment that most desirable peace is restored? You are far too sagacious, I doubt not, to entertain such a thought. Nevertheless, the fears you have renewed amongst us, at a time when every temple throughout Rome is resounding with our thanksgivings for your deliverance, have cast a very considerable damp upon our joy. May the fact prove, then, (what, indeed, I am inclined to believe as well as hope) that Antony is completely vanquished. But should he happen to recover some degree of strength, he will most assuredly find that neither the senate is destitute of wisdom nor the people of courage; I will add, too, nor the republic of a general, so long as you shall be alive to lead forth her armies. Farewell.

May the 10th.

LETTER XII.

Plancus to Cicero.

Antony arrived at Forum-Julii, with the van of his army, on the 15th of May, and Ventidius is only two days' march behind him. Lepidus writes me word, that he proposes to wait for me at Forum-Vocosium, where he is at present encamped, a place about four-and-twenty miles distant from Forum-Julii. If he and Fortune do not deceive my expectations, the senate may depend upon my speedily terminating this business to their full satisfaction.

I mentioned to you in a former letter, that the great fatigue which my brother had undergone, by his continual marches, had extremely impaired his constitution. However, as soon as he was sufficiently recovered to get abroad, he considered his health as an acquisition which he had gained as much for the service of the republic as for himself, and was the first therefore to engage in every hazardous expedition. But I have recommended it to him, and indeed insisted, that he should return to Rome, as he would be much more likely to wear himself away by continuing in the camp, than be able to give me any assistance. Besides, I imagined, now that the republic was most unhappily deprived of both the consuls, that the presence of so worthy a magistrate would be absolutely necessary at Rome. But if any of you should think otherwise, let me be censured for my imprudent advice; but let not my brother be condemned as falling in his duty.

Lepidus, agreeably to my request, has delivered Apella into my hands, as a hostage for the faithful exertion of his engagements to co-operate with me in the defence of the commonwealth. Lucius Galliæus has given me proofs of his zeal, as c Some account of these persons, as well as of Bassus, mentioned in the next sentence, has been given in the preceding remarks.

has also acted in the affair of the three brothers, to the satisfaction of Sextus Gaius. I have lately employed the latter in some negotiations between Lepidus and myself, and I have found him firmly attached to the interest of the republic. It is with great pleasure I give this testimony in his favour, a tribute which I shall always be ready to pay wherever it is deserved.

Take care of your health, and allow me the same share of your heart which you most assuredly possess of mine. I recommend my dignities, likewise, to your protection; and I hope, if I can plead any merit, you will continue your good offices to me with the same singular affection you have hitherto discovered. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.
To Cornificius.

You recommend a friend of my own, when you desire my good offices to Luceius: be assured I shall faithfully support his interest by every mean in my power.

We have lost our colleagues, Hirtius and Pansa: and the death of these excellent consuls, who discharged their office with great advantage to the republic, has happened at a very unseasonable juncture. For though we are at present delivered from the oppressions of Antony, we are not wholly free from all apprehensions of danger. But, if I may be permitted, I shall continue my usual endeavours to preserve the commonwealth from ruin; though, I must confess, I am full weary of the work. No lassitude, however, ought to obstruct the duties we owe to our country.—But I forbear to enter farther into this subject, as I had rather you should hear of my actions from others than from myself. The account I receive of yours is entirely agreeable to my wishes; but it is far otherwise with respect to the reports concerning Minucius. They are, indeed, very unfavourable to his character, notwithstanding all the fine things you said of him in a letter of your letters. I should be glad to know the truth of the case, and to be informed of everything else which is transacting in your province. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.
To Decimus Brutus, Consul elect.

It is with infinite satisfaction, my dear Brutus, that I find you approve of my conduct in the senate, with respect both to the decemvirs, and to the honours decreed to our young man. Yet, after all, what have my labours availed? Believe me, my friend, (and you know I am apt to boast,) the senate was the grand engine of my power: but all those springs which I used so successfully to manage, have utterly lost their force.

1 In the college of augurs.
2 Those decemvirs were probably the ten persons whom the senate, in the first transports of their supposed complete victory before the walls of Modena, had appointed to inquire into the conduct of Antony during his administration of the consulary office.—Apian. De Bell. Civ. liv. 578.

and I can no longer direct its motions. The truth of it is, the news of your glorious sally from the garrison of Mutina, of Antony's flight, and of his army being entirely cut to pieces, had inspired such confident hopes of a complete victory, that the disappointment has cast a general dam upon the spirit I had raised against our enemies; and all my ardent invectives seem at last to have proved just as insignificant as if I had been combating with my own shadow. But to the purpose of your letter.—Those who are acquainted with the dispositions of the fourth and the martial legions, assure me they will never be prevailed on to serve under you. As to the supply of money which you desire, some measures may, and most assuredly shall, be taken in order to raise it. I am wholly in your sentiments with regard to the calling Brutus out of Greece, and retaining Caesar here for the protection of Italy. I agree with you, likewise, my dear Brutus, that you have enemies; and though I find it no very difficult matter to sustain their attacks, yet still, however, they somewhat embarrass my schemes in your favour.

The legions from Africa are daily expected. In the mean time, the world is greatly astonished to find that the war is broke out again in your province. Nothing, in truth, ever happened so unexpectedly; as we had promised ourselves, from the account of the victory which was brought to us on your birthday, that the peace of the republic was established for many generations. But now all our fears are revived with as much strength as ever.

You mentioned in your letter, dated the 15th of May, that you were just informed, by an express from Plancus, that Lepidus had refused to receive Antony. Should this prove to be fact, our business will be so much the easier; if not, we shall have a very difficult struggle to maintain, and it depends upon you to ease me of my great apprehensions for the event. As for my own part, I have exhausted all my powers, and I am utterly incapable of doing more than I have already performed. It is you other men, my friend; and I not only wish but expect to see you the greatest and most distinguished of Romans. Farewell.

LETTER XV.
To Plancus.

Nothing, my dear Plancus, could be more glorious to yourself, nor more acceptable to the senate than the letter you lately addressed to that assembly: I will add too, nothing could be more opportune than the particular juncture in which it was delivered. Cornatus received it in the presence of a very full house, just as he had communicated to us a cold and insipid letter from Lepidus. Yours was read immediately afterwards, and it was heard with the loudest acclamations of applause. It was highly pleasing indeed to the senate, not only from the importance of its contents, and those zealous services to the republic of which it gave us an account, but from that strength and elegance of expression with which it was animated. The senate was extremely urgent that it might immediately be taken into consideration: but Cornutus thought proper to decline their request. However, the whole assembly expressing great indignation at his refusal, the question was put by five of the tribunes of the people. When Servilius was called upon for his opinion, he moved that the debate might be adjourned. What my sentiments were (and I was supported in them by the unanimous concurrence of the whole house) you will see by the decree that passed upon this occasion.

I am sensible that your own superior judgment is abundantly sufficient to direct you in all emergencies: yet I cannot forbear advising you not to wait for the sanction of the senate in so critical a conjuncture as the present, and which undoubtedly must often demand immediate action. Be a senate, my friend, to yourself; and, without any other authority, accrue not to pursue such measures as the interest of the republic shall require. In one word, let your actions anticipate our expectations, and give us the pleasure of hearing that you have executed some glorious exploit, ere we are so much as apprised that you even had it in your intention. I will venture to assure you, that the senate will most certainly approve both your zeal and your judgment in whatever you shall thus undertake. Farewell.

LETTER XVI.

To Decimus Brutus, Consul elect.

I AM indebted to you for your short letter by Placcus Volumnius, as well as for two others more.

A. u. 710. full, one of which was brought by the courier of Titus Vibiuss, the other was forwarded to me by Lupus; and all of them came to my hands on the same day. I find, by your own account, as well as by that which Gracceius has given me, that the war, far from being extinguished, seems to be breaking out again with greater violence.

You are sensible, if Antony should gain any strength, that all your illustrious services to the republic will be utterly frustrated. The first accounts we received here, and which, indeed, were universally credited, represented him as having run away in great consternation, attended only with a few frightened and disarmed soldiers. But if the truth, after all, should be (what Gracceius assures me) that Antony is, in fact, so strong as to render it unsafe to give him battle, he does not seem so much to have flied from Mutina, as to have changed the seat of war. This unexpected news has given all Rome another countenance, and a general air of disappointment appears in every face.

There are even some amongst us who complain of your not having immediately pursued Antony; for they imagine, if no time had been lost, that he must inevitably have been destroyed. But it is usual with the people in all governments, and especially in ours, to be particularly call’d to subserve their liberty, by licentious reflections on those to whom they are indebted for the enjoyment of it. However, one should be careful not to give them any just cause for their censures.

To say all in one word, whoever destroys Antony will have the glory of terminating the war: a hint which I had rather leave to your own reflections, than enter myself into a more open explanation. Farewell.

LETTER XVII.

Decimus Brutus to Cicero.

I WILL no longer attempt to make any formal acknowledgments of the repeated instances I receive of your friendship: mere words are a very inadequate return to those obligations which my best services can but ill repay. If you will look back upon my former letters, you cannot be at a loss to discover the reasons that prevented me from pursuing Antony immediately after the battle of Mutina. The truth, my dear Cicero, is, that I was not only unprovided both with cavalry and baggage-horses, but not having at that time had an interview with Cæsar, I could not depend on his assistance: and I was wholly ignorant, likewise, that Hirtius was killed. This will account for my not having pursued Antony on the day of the engagement. The day following I received an express from Pansa, to attend him at Bononia; but, in my way thither, being informed of his death, I immediately returned back to join my little corps. I may justly say, however, that my forces are extremely diminished, and in a very bad condition, from the great hardships they suffered during the siege. It was by these means that Antony got two days’ advance of me; and, as he marched in disorder, he could retire much faster than it was in my power to pursue. He increased his forces likewise by pressimg the inhabitants, and throwing open the prisons in every town through which he passed: and in this manner he continued his march till he arrived in the fens of Sabata. This is a place with which I must bring you acquainted. It is situated between the Alps and the Apennines, and the roads that lie about it are scarce practicable. When I had reached within thirty miles of Antony, I was informed that he had been joined by Ventidius, and had made a speech at the head of their combined troops, to persuade them to follow him over the Alps; assuring them that Lepidus had agreed to support him. Nevertheless, not only his own soldiers (which, indeed, are a very inconsiderable number,) but those likewise of Ventidius, repeatedly and unanimously declared that they were determined either to conquer, or perish in Italy; and at the same time desired that they might be conducted to Pollentia. Antony found it in vain to oppose them; however, he deferred his march till the ensuing day. As soon as I received this intelligence, I detached five cohorts to Pollentia; and am now following them with the remainder of my troops. This detachment threw themselves into that city an hour before Trebellius arrived with his cavalry; a circumstance which gives me great satisfaction, as it is a point, I think, upon which our whole success depends. When the enemy found that their designs were thus frustrated, they conceived hopes of crossing the Alps into Gaul; as they supposed the four legions commanded by Plancus would not be able to withstand them. I may justly call them so, indeed, as my forces from Italy could not overtake them soon enough to prevent their passage.—However, the Alle- broges, together with my detachment, have hitherto been sufficient to prevent their design; which, I

1 Some remains of this city still subsist, under the name of Polenta. It is situated at the confluence of the Stura and the Tanaro, in Piedmont.
trusting, they will find still more difficult to effect, when I shall come up with the rest of my forces. But should they happen, in the mean time, to pass the Isara, I shall exert my utmost endeavours that this circumstance may not be attended with any ill consequences to the community.

Let it raise the spirits and the hopes of the senate, to observe that Plancus and myself, together with our respective armies, act in perfect concert with each other, and are ready to hazard every danger in support of the common cause. However, whilst you thus confidently rely on our zeal and diligence, you will remit nothing; I hope, of your own, but employ your utmost care to send us a reinforcement, as well as every other necessary supply, that may render us in a condition to defend your liberties against those who have infamously conspired their ruin. One cannot, indeed, but look upon these our enemies with so much the greater indignation, as they have acted with the vilest hypocrisy, and suddenly turned those troops against their country, which they long pretended to have raised for its defence. Farewell.

LETTER XVIII.

Decimus Brutus to Cicero.

I wish you would peruse the letter I have addressed to the senate, and make what alterations you shall judge proper. You will find by it, that I am under an absolute necessity of thus applying to them. Whilst I imagined that I should be joined by the fourth and martial legions, I agreeably to the decree of the senate which passed for that purpose on the motion of Paulus and Drusus, I was less solicitous about the rest; but now that I have only some new-raised regiments, and those too extremely ill-accounted, I cannot but be apprehensive upon your accounts, as well as upon my own.

The citizens of Vicentia have always distinguished Marcus Brutus and myself by their particular regard. But you have informed me, that the senate has resolved to have that justice be done them by the senate, in the affair concerning the slaves. They, are, indeed, entitled to your favour, both by the equity of their cause, and the fidelity with which they have, upon all occasions, persevered in their allegiance to the republic: whereas their adversaries, on the contrary, are a most sedulous and faithless people. Farewell.

Verceil, May the 21st.

LETTER XIX.

Marcus Legidius to Cicero.

Having received advice that Antony was advancing with his troops towards my province, and had sent before him a detachment of his cavalry under the command of his brother

Lucius, I moved with my army from the confines of the Rhone and the Arar, in order to oppose their passage. I continued my march without halting, till I arrived at Forum Vosonii, and am now encamped somewhats beyond that town, on the river Argenteus, opposite to Antony. Vercellis joined him with his three legions, and has formed his camp a little above mine. Antony, before this conjunction, had the second legion entire, together with a considerable number of men, though indeed wholly unarmed, who escaped from the general slaughter of his other legions: he is extremely strong in cavalry; for, as none of those troops suffered in the late action, he has no less than 2,000 horses. Great numbers of his soldiers, both horse and foot, are continually deserting to my camp; so that his troops diminish every day. Both Silanus and Culea have left his array, and are returned to mine. But notwithstanding I was greatly offended by their going to Antony, contrary to my inclination, yet, in regard to the connections that subsist between us, and in compliance with my usual clemency, I have thought proper to pardon them. However, I do not, upon any occasion, employ their services, nor, indeed, suffer them to remain in the camp.

As to what concerns my conduct in this war, you may depend upon it, I shall not be wanting in my duty either to the senate or the republic; and whatever farther measures I shall take to this end, I shall not fail to communicate them to you.

The friendship between us has upon all occasions been inviolably preserved on both sides, and we have mutually vied in our best good offices to each other. But I doubt not that, since this great and sudden commotion has been raised in the commonwealth, some false and injurious reports have been spread of me by my enemies, which, in the zeal of your heart for the interest of the republic, have given you much uneasiness. I have the satisfaction, however, to be informed by my agents at Rome, that you are by no means disposed easily to credit these idle rumours; for which I think myself, as I justly ought, extremely obliged to you. I am so, likewise, for the former instances of your friendship, in promoting my public honours, the grateful remembrance of which, be assured, is indelibly impressed upon my heart.

Let me conjure you, my dear Cicero, if you are sensible that my public conduct has upon all occasions been worthy of the name I bear, to be persuaded that I shall continue to act with equal, or, if possible, even with superior zeal*. Let me hope, too, that the greater the favours are which you have conferred upon me, the more you will think yourself engaged to support my credit and character. Farewell.

From my camp, at Pons Argentibus, May the 29th.

LETTER XX.

Planetus to Cicero.

You have been apprised, no doubt, by Lævus and Nerva, as well as by the letter they delivered to you on my part, of the design I was meditating when they left me; as, indeed, they have constantly borne a share in all my councils and measures of every kind. It has happened, however, to me, what happens not unfrequently to me, to lose that tranquility which insured his reputation, and desires of approving his conduct to the friends of his country: I have given up a safer scheme, as being liable perhaps to some ill-natured exceptions, in exchange for a more dangerous one that may better evince my zeal. I am to inform you, then, that, after the departure of my lieutenants, I received two letters from Lepidus, entreating me to join him. These were seconded by the much stronger solicitations of Laterensis, who earnestly represented to me (what, indeed, I am also apprehensive of myself) that there is great reason to fear a mutiny among the disaffected troops under the conduct of Lepidus. I determined immediately, therefore, to march to his assistance, and take an equal share in the dangers with which he was threatened. I was sensible, at the same time, that to wait on the banks of the Isara till Brutus should pass that river with his army, and to meet the enemy in conjunction with my colleague, whose forces, as well as their general, would act in perfect harmony with me and my troops, would be the most the cautious measure with respect to my own personal security. But I reflected, that if any misfortune should attend Lepidus, it would be wholly imputed to me, and I should be condemned either as obstinately suffering my resentment to prevent me from giving encour to my enemy in the cause of the republic, or of timidly avoiding to take part in the danger of a most just and necessary war. As my presence, therefore, might be a mean of protecting Lepidus, and of bringing his army into a better disposition, I resolved to expose myself to all hazards, rather than appear to act with so much circumspection. But never was any man more anxious in an affair for which he was in no sort answerable, than I am in the present; for though I should have no manner of doubt if the army of Lepidus were not concerned, yet, under that circumstance, I am full of apprehensions for the event. Had it been my fortune to have met Antony before my junction with Lepidus, I am sure he would not have been able to have kept the field against me even a single hour; such is the confidence I have in my own troops, and so heartily do I despise his broken forces, as well as those of that paltry muleteer, the contemptible Ventidius. But, as the case is now circumstanced, I dread to think what may be the consequence, should any ill humours lie concealed in the army of Lepidus; as they may possibly break out in all their malignity, before they can be remedied, or even discovered. It is certain, however, that Lepidus, together with the well-affected part of his army, would be exposed to great danger, if we should not act in conjunction: besides that, our infamous enemies would gain a very considerable advantage, should they draw off any of his forces. If my presence, therefore, should prove a mean of preventing these evils, I shall think myself much indebted to my courage and good fortune for engaging me to make the experiment. With this design I moved with my army from the banks of the Isara on the 21st of May, having first erected a fort at each end of the bridge which I had thrown over that river, and placed a strong party to defend it, that when Brutus shall arrive, he may have nothing to retard his passage. I have only to add, that I hope to join Lepidus within eight days from the date of this letter. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

From the same to Cicero.

I should be ashamed that this letter is so little consistent with my former, if it arose from any instability of my mind. But it is much otherwise; and I have steadily pursued every measure in my power to engage Lepidus to act in concert with me, for the defence of the republic, imagining it would render you less apprehensive of my success against our wretched enemies. To this end, I not only complied with all the conditions he proposed, but even engaged for more than he demanded; and I had so much confidence in the sincerity of his intentions, that I ventured to assure you, no longer than two days ago, that he would zealously co-operate with me in carrying on the war upon one common plan. I depended, indeed, upon the promises he had given me under his own hand, together with the assurances I had likewise received from Laterensis, who was at that time in my camp, and who earnestly conjured me to forget all resentments against Lepidus, and to rely upon his good faith. But Lepidus has now put it out of my power to entertain these favourable hopes of him any longer; however, I have taken, and shall continue to take, all necessary precautions, that the republic may not be prejudiced by my too easy credulity. I am to inform you, then, that after I had used the utmost expedition (agreeably to his own earnest request) to transport my army over the Isara; and for that purpose had, in the space of a single day, thrown a bridge across that river, I received a counter-express from him, requiring me to advance no farther, as he should not have occasion, he said, for my assistance. Nevertheless, I will own to you I was so imprudent as to proceed in my march, believing that the true reason of his thus changing his mind arose from an unwillingness to have a partner with him in his glory. I imagined that, without depriving him of any share of that honour which he seemed so desirous to monopolise, I might post myself at some convenient distance, in order to be ready to support him with my troops, in case he should be pressed by the enemy: an event which, in the simplicity of my heart, I thought not improbable. In the mean time, I received a letter from the excellent Laterensis, which was conceived in terms full of despair. He complained that he had been greatly deceived, and assured me that Lepidus, within a very few days from the date of this letter, openly joined with Antony against the senate. See letter 85 of this book.

* Lævus and Nerva, the persons mentioned above.

* See rem., p. 375.
Neither Lepidus nor his army was to be trusted. He expressly cautioned me, at the same time, to be upon my guard against their artifices; adding, that he had faithfully discharged the engagements he had entered into, on his part, and hoped I would act with the same fidelity to the republic on mine. I have sent a copy of this letter to Titius, and purpose to transmit the originals of all the rest relating to this affair, by the hands of Lævenus Ciparius, who was privy to the whole transaction. I shall insert in this packet the letters of Lepidus, to which I did not give any credit, as well as those to which I did.

I must not forget to add, that when Lepidus harangued his soldiers, these mighty honest fellows were exceedingly clamorous for peace. They protested that, after the loss of both the consuls, after the destruction of so many brave men, who had perished in defence of their country, and after Antony and his adherents had been declared enemies of the commonwealth, and their estates confiscated, they were determined to draw their swords any more, either on the one side or the other. They were prompted to behave thus mutinously, not only by the insolent suggestions of their own hearts, but by the encouragement also of their officers, particularly Canidius, Rufrenus, and others, whose names the senate shall be acquainted with at a proper season. Lepidus was so far from punishing this sedition, that he did not take even a single step to restrain it. I thought, therefore, that it would be the highest temerity to expose my own faithful troops, together with my auxiliaries, which are commanded by some of the most considerable chiefs of Gaul, and in effect, too, my whole province to their combined armies. I considered, if I should thus lose my life, and involve the republic in my own destruction, I should fall, not only without honour, but without pity. In consequence of these reflections, I have determined to march my forces back again, that our wretched enemies may not have so great an advantage as my advancing any farther might possibly give them. I shall endeavour to post my army so advantageously as to cover the province under my command from being insulted, even supposing the troops of Lepidus should actually revolt. In short, it shall be my care to preserve everything in its present situation, until the senate shall send an army hither, and vindicate the liberties of the republic with the same success in this part of the world as attended their arms before the walls of Mutina. In the mean time, be assured that no man will act with more fervent zeal than myself in all the various occurrences of the war; and I shall most readily either encounter the enemy in the field, or sustain the hardships of a siege, or even lay down my life itself, as any of these circumstances shall prove necessary for the service of the senate. Let me exhort you, then, my dear Cicero, to exert your utmost efforts to send a speedy reinforcement to me, ere Antony shall have increased the number of his forces, or our own shall be entirely dispirited. For, if despatch be given to this affair, these infamous banditti will undoubtedly be extirpated, and the republic remain in full possession of her last victory. Take care of your health, and continue your friendship to me.

P. S.—I know not whether it may be necessary to make any excuse for the absence of my brother, who was prevented from attending me in this expedition by a slow fever, occasioned by the great fatigue he has lately undergone. Should no man has shown more zeal or courage in the cause of the republic, he will undoubtedly return to the duties of his post the very first moment his health shall permit.

I recommend my honours to your protection; though I must confess, at the same time, that all my desires ought to be satisfied, since I enjoy the privilege of your friendship, and the satisfaction of seeing you invested with the high privilege I have ever wished you. I will leave it, therefore, entirely to yourself, both then and in what manner I shall experience the effect of your good offices; and will only request you to suffer me to succeed Hirtius in your affections, as I certainly do in the respect and esteem he bore you. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

To Furnius.

In the interest of the republic requires the continuance of your services, and it be necessary (as a true friend, indeed, is of opinion it is) that you should bear a part in those important operations, which must extinguish the remaining flames of the war, you cannot, surely, be engaged in a more worthy, a more laudable, or a more illustrious pursuit. I think, therefore, you should by no means interrupt your applauded efforts in the cause of liberty, for the sake of obtaining the praetorship somewhat earlier than you are regularly entitled to enjoy it. I say your applauded efforts; for let not my friend be ignorant of the fame which his conduct has acquired. Believe me, it is inferior only to that of Plancus himself, both by his own confession, and in the judgment, too, of all the world. If there is any farther service, then, remaining for you to perform to your country, you ought to pursue it with an unbroken application, as an employment, of all others, the most truly honourable: and what, my friend, shall stand in competition with the true honour of having imagined that you have amply performed the duties you owe to the commonwealth, I do not dissuade you from hastening hither when the time of the elections shall approach, provided this ambitious impatience shall nothing diminish from the lustre of that reputation you have so justly obtained. I could name, however, many instances of persons of great distinction, who, during their engagements in the service of the republic, have renounced their legal pretensions of soliciting employments at home; a sacrifice which, in your own case, will be so much the less, as you are not at present strictly qualified to offer yourself as a candidate. Had you already, indeed, passed through the office of edile, and two years had intervened since your exercising that function, the

7 He had been tribune in the year of Rome 703, and was at this time in the army of Plancus, as one of his lieutenants.

8 By the laws of Rome a man could not be chosen praetor till two years after he had served the office of edile; and the same distance of time was likewise required between the praetorship and the consulates.
self-denial would have been greater; whereas now you will forego nothing of the usual and stated time of petitioning for the post in question. I am very sensible that your interest is much too strong to require the assistance of Cicero, who, should his arms be attended with the success we wish, your applications would certainly appear with greater advantage, were they deferred till the time of his consulate.

Thus much (as I was willing you should know my sentiments) I thought proper to say; but more, I am persuaded, your own good sense and judgment would render unnecessary. The sum of all, then, is shortly this: that I would have you regulate your conduct, upon all occasions, not by the common standard of popular ambition, but by that of true and solid glory, and look upon a lasting reputation as of more value than the transient honour of enjoying the prætorian office somewhat earlier than usual. I had a consultation the other day at my house upon this subject, with your very good friends Cæcina, Calvisius, and my brother, at which your freedman Dardanus was likewise present; and they every one of them joined with me in thinking that I have here given you. But after all, you yourself are the best and most competent judge. Farewell.

LETTER XXIII.

Decimus Brutus to Cicero.

Friendship and gratitude make me feel, upon your account, what I never felt upon my own; a. d. 710. and I will confess, that I am not without regard to a subject which has been propagated concerning you. I thought it by no means a matter to be despised when I had only heard of it, as I frequently did, from common report; but it has lately been mentioned to me, likewise, by Segullus. This man tells me (though what he says, indeed, is generally of a piece with the rest of his character) that paying a visit at Caesar's, where you were much the subject of the conversation, Caesar complained (and it was the only charge, if I understand him) of you as having given me an ambiguous expression * which you had made use of concerning him. I suspect the whole to be a mere fiction of Segullus, or, at least, that it was he himself who reported these words to Caesar. Segullus endeavoured, at the same time, to persuade me that you are in great danger of falling a victim to the resentment of the veteran legions, who speak of you, he gravely, with much indignation. The principle of it, he says, is, that both Caesar and myself are left out of the commission for dividing the lands b among the soldiers, and that everything is disposed of just as you and your friends at Rome think proper.

Notwithstanding that I was on my march c when I received this account, yet I thought it would not be advisable to pass the Alps till I had informed myself how affairs stand. I am well persuaded, nevertheless, that with respect to yourself, these reports and menaces of the veterans aim at nothing farther than by alarming your fears, and increasing the young Caesar against you, to obtain for themselves a more considerable proportion of the rewards decreed by the senate. But I do not intend, by saying this, to dissuade you from standing upon your guard, as nothing, be assured, is more valuable to me than your life. Let me only caution you not to suffer your fears to run you into greater dangers than about which you should avoid. However, I would advise you to observe the dispositions of these veterans, as far as you reasonably may; and to comply with their desires, both in regard to the decennvirs d and to the distribution of their rewards. As to those forfeited estates which belonged to the veterans who served under Antony, I should be glad, if you think proper, that Caesar and myself may be nominated to assign them to the troops. But in reference to the pecuniary donative which they have been also promised, it will be proper to act with more deliberation, and as the circumstances of the public finances shall require: to which end it may be signified to them, that the senate will take these their claims into consideration. As to those other four legions to whom the senate has also decreed an allotment of lands, I imagine that the estates in Campania, together with those which were formerly seized by Sylla, will be most advantageous to the purpose. I should think, too, that the best method of division would be, either to parcel out those lands in equal shares to the several legions, or to determine their respective proportions by lot. But when I thus give you my opinion, it is by no means as pretending to superior judgment, but merely from the affection of my heart towards you, and from my sincere desire that the public tranquillity may be preserved, which, I am very sensible, if any accidents should happen to you, cannot possibly be maintained.

I do not purpose to march out of Italy, unless I am to find it greatly expedient. Meanwhile I am employed in disciplining my troops, and furnishing them with arms: and I hope to appear with no contemptible body of forces, upon any emergency that shall again call me into the field. But Caesar, however, has not sent back the legion to me which served in Pæan's army.

I request your immediate answer to this letter; and if you should have anything of importance to a The expression itself is inserted in the original; but as it turns upon an ambiguity that will not hold in our language, it was impossible to preserve it in the translation. "Laudandum adolescentem," (Cicero is charged with having said,) ornandum, tollendum," the last of which words is capable of a double meaning, and may imply either that Octavius should be advanced to the dignities of the state, or that his life should be taken away. The polite and learned panegyrist of Cicero's conduct has endeavoured to vindicate his admired hero from a charge so little favourable both to his prudence and his honour, and it is to be wished that his arguments were as convincing as they are plausible. In a point, however, that does not admit of any positive proof, candour will incline on the favourable side; though I cannot but agree with an excellent author, that if the accusation was true, "it very much takes off from the ingratitude of the Roman people, in comparing to the death of his benefactor; since such double-dealing could hardly deserve the name of an obligation, let the effects of it be ever so advantageous."—Life of Cicero, p. 282; Observ. on the Life of Cic. LETTER XXIV.

From the same to Cicero.

All things here go on well: and it shall be my endeavour to render them still better. Lepidus seems to be favourably disposed towards me; and, indeed, we have reason to direct ourselves of all our fears, and to act with undaunted freedom in defence of the commonwealth. But had our affairs a far less promising aspect, yet it might justly animate and augment that courage which I know always resides in your breast, to reflect that we have three powerful armies devoted to the service of the republic, and that Fortune has already declared in our favour.

The report which I mentioned in my former letter is evidently calculated to intimidate you. But believe me, if you exert a proper spirit, the whole united party will be unable to withstand your eloquence.

I purpose, agreeably to what I told you in my last, to remain in Italy till I shall hear from you. Farewell.

Eporedia, May the 25th.

LETTER XXV.

To Plancus.

The news from your part of the world is so extremely variable and contradictory, that I am utterly at a loss what to write. Sometimes the accounts we receive of Lepidus are agreeable to our wishes, and at others entirely the reverse. All reports, however, concur in assuring us, that you are superior to every danger, either from fraud or force. If you are in so degree indebted for the latter to Fortune, it is certain that the former, at least, is owing to your prudence alone.

I am informed, by a letter from your colleague, dated the 6th of May, that you mentioned, in one of your expressions to him, that Lepidus had refused to receive Antony. We should have been more disposed to credit this intelligence, if you had taken notice of it in any of your despatches to Rome. But, perhaps, you would not venture to communicate to us this piece of good news, as having been a little premature in an account of the same kind in your last. Every man, indeed, is liable to be deceived by his wishes; but all the world knows that you can never be imposed upon by any other means. In the present instance, however, all possibility of farther error is removed: for to stumble twice against the same stone is a disgrace, you know, even to a proverb. Should the truth prove agreeable then to what you mentioned in your letter to your colleague, all our fears are at an end:

nevertheless, we shall not dismiss them till we receive a confirmation of this account from your own hand.

I have often assured you of my firm persuasion, that the whole credit of delivering the commonwealth from this civil war, will devolve entirely upon that general who shall extinguish these its last surviving flames: an honour which I hope, and believe, is reserved solely for yourself.

It is with great pleasure, though without the least surprise, that I find you entertain such grateful sentiments of my zeal in your service. Higher, indeed, it cannot possibly rise; but you may depend upon my exerting it to more important purposes, if affairs in your part of the world should succeed as we wish. Farewell.

LETTER XXVI.

Lentulus 1 to Cicero.

As I found, when I applied to Brutus in Macedonia, that he would not soon be prepared to march to the assistance of this province, I determined to return hither, in order to collect what remained of the public money, and to remit it with all possible expedition to Rome. In the interval I received intelligence that Dolabella's fleet appeared upon the coast of Lyca, and that he had procured above a hundred transport-vessels, intending, if he should not succeed in his designs upon Syria, 2 to sail directly with his forces to Italy, and join the Antonius and the rest of those infamous rebels. I was so much alarmed at this account, that I thought proper to postpone all other affairs, and immediately proceed in quest of this fleet. And notwithstanding my ships were unequal both in number and size to those of the enemy, I should probably have destroyed their whole fleet, if I had not been obstructed by the Rhodians: however, I have disabled the greatest part of it, and dispersed the rest. I have taken likewise every one of their transports, the soldiers and officers on board having quitted them upon the first notice of my approach. In a word, I have succeeded in the main of my design, having defeated a scheme which I greatly dreaded, and prevented Dolabella from strengthening our enemies by transporting his forces into Italy.

I refer you to the letter which I have written to the senate, 3 for an account of the ill-treatment I received from the Rhodians, though indeed I have by no means represented it in its strongest colours. These people, in consequence of their imagining that the affairs of the commonwealth were utterly desperate, behaved towards me with the most insufferable insolence. But their affronts to my own person are in no sort the foundation of my complaints: I have ever disregarded injuries of this kind, that centred entirely in myself. It is their disaffection to the republic, their attachment to the opposite party, their constant ill offices to all those who distinguish themselves in the support of our liberties, that I thought demanded my resentment. Let me not be understood, however, as passing an indiscriminate censure upon the whole island in general; for am I, indeed, from thinking them all equally infected with the same principles. But I know not by what fatality it happens, that those who should interpose authority to deliver the state from the danger to which I have exposed them to my father, to Lucius Lentulus, to Pompey, and to the rest of those illustrious chiefs who fled into this island after the battle of Pharsalia, are all of them, at this juncture, either actually in the administration themselves, or possess an unlimited influence over those who are. Accordingly, they have conducted themselves in this affair with their usual malevolence; and it is not only expedient, but, indeed, absolutely necessary, that the republic should interpose her authority, lest the insidiousness of this people should rise to still greater heights, by passing any longer unchastised.

Let me hope you will continue, as usual, to take my interests under your protection: and that you will, upon all occasions, both in the senate, and in every other instance, promote my honours with your suffrage. As the province of Asia is decreed to the consul, 1 with a power of appointing whomsoever they shall think proper to administer the government till their arrival; I entreat you to employ your interest with them to confer this dignity upon me. The situation of affairs in this province does by no means require their presence before the expiration of their consular office, or in any sort render it necessary that they should send hither an army; for Dolabella is now in Syria: and, agreeably to what you declared with your usual prophetic discernment, he will certainly be defeated by Cassius ere the consuls can possibly arrive. Accordingly, he has been obliged to abandon the siege of Antioch, and has retreated to Laodicea, a sea-port town in Syria, as the only city in which he could confide. I hope he will soon meet with the fate he so well deserves; or rather, indeed, I am persuaded it has already attended him, for he has no other place to which he can retreat, and it is impossible he should make any long or effectual resistance against so powerful an army as that which Cassius has led against him. I imagine, therefore, that Pansa and Hirtius will be in no haste to come into these provinces, but rather choose to finish their consular year at Rome. For this reason I am inclined to hope that you may prevail with them to appoint me their substitute.

I have received assurances from both of them, as well in person as by letter, that no successor should be elected to my office during their consulate: and Pansa has lately repeated the same promise to my friend Verrinus. Believe me, it is not from any ambitious views that I desire to be continued some time longer in this province. But as I have met with many difficulties and disadvantages in the discharge of my functions, I should extremely regret the being obliged to resign my post before I shall have fully reaped the fruit of my labours. If it were in my power to remit to Rome the whole of those assessments I had actually levied, I should be so far from wishing to remain here, that I should desire to be recalled. But I am very solicitous to receive the money I advanced to Cassius; to replace what I lost by the death of Trebonius, and the oppressions of Dolabella; as well as to recover the several sums which are due to me from those who have perfidiously broken the good faith they owed both to myself and to the republic. Now, these are points which I can by no means effect, unless the time of my continuance in this province be prolonged: a privilege which I hope to obtain by the interposition of your usual good offices.

I persuade myself that my services to the commonwealth give me just reason to expect, not the honour only of administering this province, but as high dignities as Cassius and the two Bruti: as I not only shared with them in forming the design and undergoing the hazard of that ever memorable enterprise against Caesar, 2 but have exerted myself with equal zeal and spirit in all our present combinations. I was the first, let me boast, that bid defiance to the oppressive laws of Antony. I was the first that brought over the cavalry of Dolabella to the interest of the republic, and delivered them into the hands of Cassius. I was the first who levied troops in defence of our common liberties against the infamous attempts of those who have conspired our destruction: and it is owing entirely to me that Syria, together with the army in that province, joined themselves under Cassius in the support of the republic. The truth is, if I had not very expeditiously contributed those large subsidies, both of men and money, with which I supplied Cassius, he would not have ventured to march into Syria: and the name of Dolabella would now have been no less formidable to the republic than that of Antony himself. Yet, at the same time that I acted thus warmly for the interest of the republic, I had every private bias that could draw me to the opposite party. Dolabella was my friend and companion, as the Antonys were my nearest relations: and it was by the united good offices of the latter that I obtained the quasiprincipate of this province. But the love of my country was superior to every other attachment; and I stood forth the first to declare war against the strongest and most endearing connexions both of blood and friendship. Inconsiderable, it must be acknowledged, is the fruit which I have hitherto reaped from these instances of my patriotism. However, I do not despair: and I shall unceasingly persevere, not only in displaying my zeal for our liberties, but in exposing myself to every difficulty and every danger for their support. Nevertheless, I cannot but add, if I were to be encouraged by some of those honours I have merited from the senate and from every friend to our country, they would...

1 Hirtius and Pansa, the news of whose death, together with that of the battles in which they fell, had not yet reached the knowledge of Lentulus.

2 This shortly afterwards proved to be the fact; for Cassius having forced the city of Laodicea to surrender, Dolabella, in order to avoid falling into the hands of his enemy, put an end to his own life by the assistance of one of his slaves, whom he commanded to be his executioner.—Vell. Pat. ii. 69.

P Plutarch (as Manutius in his remark upon this passage observes) taking notice that several affected to be thought associates in the conspiracy against Caesar, who, in truth, were in no way concerned in that affair, particularly mentions Lentulus as one of that number. But he paid dear for his boast, as it cost him his life when Octavius got into power.—Plut. in Vit. Jul. Cas.
LETTER XXVII.

Lentulus, Præpositor and Præparator, to the Consuls, the Praetor, the Tribunes of the People, the Senate, and the Commons of Rome.

As soon as Dolabella had possessed himself of Asia⁹ by the most infamous and cruel act of treachery, I applied immediately to the army in Macedonia under the command of the illustrious Marcus Brutus, as they were nearly in assisting to which I could have recourse, in order to recover this province as soon as possible to the dominion of the commonwealth. But Dolabella was apprehensive of my design, advanced with so much rapidity, that he had got out of these territories before it was possible that the forces I had solicited could arrive. In his march, however, he laid the whole country waste, seized upon the public money, and not only plundered the Roman citizens of their effects, but most inhumanly sold them as slaves. I did not think it necessary, therefore, to defer my departure out of Macedonia till the troops of Brutus should be ready. It appeared to be most for the advantage of the republic, that I should return with all expedition to the duties of my post, in order to levy the remainder of the public taxes, to collect the money I had deposed, to inquire what part of it had been seized, and by whose neglect: in a word, to transmit to you a full and faithful account of the state in which I should find the affairs of this province. With these views, I embarked; but as I was sailing among the Greek islands, I received intelligence that Dolabella’s fleet lay off the coast of Lycia, and that the Rhodians had a considerable number of ships of war ready to sail. I resolved, therefore, to put back to Rhodes with the ships that attended me, and which were now joined by those under the command of Paticus, the præpositor; a person whom I must mention as most intimately united with me, not only by the ties of friendship, but by the same common sentiments towards the republic. I assured myself that the Rhodians would give me assistance, in the first place, from their regard to the authority of your decree, by which Dolabella is declared an enemy to his country; and in the next, that they were engaged by a solemn treaty renewed with us in the consulate of Marcus Marcellus and Servius Sulpicius, to consider the enemies of the republic, in all respects, as their own. But I was greatly deceived in my expectation; they were so far from being inclined to strengthen my fleet with any of their own ships, that they would not suffer it to enter their harbour. They even refused to furnish our soldiers with provisions and water; and it was with difficulty I obtained permission myself to sail into their port with two small vessels. However, I did not think proper to resent this insult upon the rights and the majesty of the Roman people; deeming it of more importance, in the present conjuncture, to frustrate the designs of Dolabella. For I had discovered, by some intercepted letters, that it was his purpose, if he failed in his attempt upon Syria and Egypt, (as I was sure he must,) to proceed directly with his band of robbers and their plunder to Italy. Accordingly, in view to this his scheme, I had pressed out of the ports of Lycia, a considerable number of transports, none of them less than fifty-six tons burthen⁶, and these were strongly guarded by his fleet. Being greatly alarmed, therefore, conscript fathers, at this dangerous design, I resolved to bear with the injurious treatment of the Rhodians, and to submit to every milder expedient of gaining them over to our interest. For this purpose, I suffered myself to be introduced into their senate in the manner they thought proper; where I represented, in the strongest terms I was capable, the danger to which the republic would be exposed, if that infamous rebel should transport his forces into Italy. But I found them most perversely disposed to imagine that the friends of the republic were the weaker party; that the general association in favour of our liberties was by no means voluntary; that the senate would still patiently suffer the insolence of Dolabella; and that no man would venture to vote him a public enemy. To be short, they were more inclined to believe the false reports that had been propagated by the disaffected, than to credit my representations, though entirely agreeable to truth. In conformity with this disposition, they had sent, before my arrival in the island, two several embassies to Dolabella, notwithstanding his late assassination of Trebonius, and the many other flagitious acts which he committed in this province. And this they did by an unexampled violation of their laws, and contrary to the express prohibitions of the magistrates who were then in office. But whether this conduct was owing to their fears for the territories they possess on the continent, as they themselves allege, or whether it is to be imputed to the factious influence of a few of their principal magistrates, who formerly treated some of our illustrious countrymen with equal indignity, I know not. This, however, is certain, that I could not prevail with them to take any measures to obviate an evil which it was very easy for them to prevent: and all the arguments I could use, either with respect to my own personal danger, or in regard to that which threatened the republic, if this traitor with his banditti, after being driven from Syria, should transport themselves into Italy, proved utterly ineffectual. It was even suspected, that the magistrates themselves amused us with various pretences of delay, till they could send intelligence to Dolabella's fleet of our approach. And, indeed, there were some circumstances that greatly increased this suspicion, particularly that Sextius Marius, and Caius Titius, the lieutenants of Dolabella, suddenly quitted the fleet, and abandoned their transports, which had cost them so much time and pains to collect. Be that as it will, I pursued my voyage from Rhodes towards Lycia, and falling in with the enemy, I took all their transports, and have restored them to their owners. By these means I have obstructed what I so much feared, and have removed all apprehensions of Dolabella's passing into Italy with his rascal crew. I chased the enemy as far as Sida, which is the utmost limit of my province; where I learned that part of them were separated, and that the rest had steered in company together towards Syria and the island of Cyprus. Having thus dispersed this squadron, and knowing that brave commander and excellent patriot, the illustrious Caius Cassius, had a considerable fleet in those seas, I returned to the duties of my employment: and it shall be my endeavour, conscript fathers, to give both you and the republic full proofs of my indefatigable zeal. To this end I shall exert my utmost assiduity in collecting the public revenues, which I shall transmit to you, together with all my accounts, as expeditiously as possible. If I should have time, likewise, to make a progress through the province, in order to inquire into the conduct of those with whom I intrusted the care of the finances, I shall not fail to send a list of such who shall appear to have been faithful to their trust, as well as of those who, by voluntarily betraying it, have rendered themselves partners in the guilt of Dolabella. Let me add, that if you shall think proper to chastise these last according to their demerits, the execution of your justice will greatly strengthen my authority, and enable me, with more facility, to raise and preserve the remainder of the public taxes. In the meanwhile, the better to secure the public revenue, and to protect this province from future insults, I have formed (what, indeed, was extremely wanting) a body of troops composed entirely of volunteers.

⁹ Brutus, when he first left Italy, sailed directly for Athens, where he spent some time in concerting measures how to make himself master of Greece and Macedonia, which was the great design that he had in view. Here he gathered about him all the young nobility and gentry of Rome, who, for the opportunity of their education, had been sent to this celebrated seat of learning; but of them all, he took the most notice of young Cicero. He made him, therefore, one of his lieutenants, though he was but twenty years old; gave him the command of his horse; and employed him in several commissions of great trust and importance; in all which the young man distinguished both his courage and conduct.—Life of Cicero, p. 257.

Since I wrote the above, about thirty Asiatic soldiers, who deserted from Dolabella in Syria, are arrived in Pamphylia. They relate that Dolabella appeared before the walls of Antiochia, in Syria, and finding that the inhabitants had shut the city gates against him, he made several attempts to enter by force, but was always repulsed with great disadvantage. At length, having lost about a hundred men, he retired in the night, and fled towards Laodicea, leaving all his sick and wounded behind him. They add, that the same night almost the whole of his Asiatic troops deserted; eight hundred of which returned to Antiochia, and surrendered themselves to the officers of the garrison, which Cassius had left in that town; the rest (of which number these soldiers are) came down into Cilicia by Mount Amanus: in fine, that Cassius, with his whole army, was reported to have been but four days' march from Laodicea when Dolabella retired towards that city. I am persuaded, therefore, that this most infamous villain will meet with the punishment he deserves much sooner than we expected.

LETTER XXVIII.

Lepidus, Imperator and sovereign Pontiff, to the Senate and People of Rome.

HEAVEN and earth will bear me witness, conscript fathers, that there is nothing I have at all times more sincerely desired than the preservation of our common liberties: and I should soon have convinced you of this truth, if Fortune had not forced me to renounce those measures I was pursuing. My whole army, indeed, expressed their usual tenderness towards their fellow-countrymen, by a mutinous opposition to my designs; and, to own the truth, they absolutely compelled me not to refuse my protection to such a multitude of Roman citizens. I conjure you then, conscript fathers, to judge of this affair, not by the suggestions of private resentment, but by the interest of the commonwealth: nor let it be imputed as a crime to me and my army, that, amidst our civil dissensions, we yielded to the dictates of compassion and humanity. Be assured, that by acting with an equal regard to the safety and honour of all parties, you will best consult both your own and your country's advantage. Farewell.

From my camp, at Pons Argentaeus, May the 30th.

The function of the Roman pontiff was to give judgment in all causes relating to religion, and to regulate the festivals, sacrifices, and all other sacred institutions. The sovereign pontiff, or superintendant of these pontifical offices in the commonwealth.

This letter was written by Lepidus to the senate, in order to excuse the juncture of his forces with those of Antony, which was effected the day before its date. But though he represents himself as merely passive in that transaction, and to have been forced into it by a general revolt of his troops; yet it most evidently appears to have been in consequence of a secret treaty which had been in agitation during some months before, between him and Antony.

LETTER I.
To Plancus.

Though I am too well assured of the disposition of your heart, to require any formal declarations of your gratitude, yet I cannot but confess that I received your acknowledgments with great pleasure, as they afforded me the most evident proof of the affection you bear me. I was always, indeed, perfectly sensible of your friendship; but it never appeared to me in a stronger or more advantageous light.

Your letter to the senate was extremely well received, not only from the important account it brought us of your wise and heroic measures, but as it was greatly admired likewise for the strength and elegance of its composition. Let it be your earnest labour, my dear Plancus, to extingush the remains of this war, which if you should happily effect, you will acquire the most consummate credit and reputation. I wish all possible prosperity to the republic; yet, believe me, spent as I am with my utmost efforts to preserve it from destruction, I am scarce more solicitous for the liberties of my country, than for the glory of my friend. I hope that the immortal gods have placed within your power a most favourable opportunity of increasing your fame; and let me entreat you to embrace it, my dear Plancus, in the full persuasion that whoever shall destroy Antony, will have the honour of terminating this most execrable and alarming war. Farewell.

LETTER II.
To Asinius Pollio.

It is owing to Lepidus, who detained my couriers above a week, that I did not receive earlier advice of the several actions near Mutina; though, indeed, I should be glad to have been the last that was informed of this unhappy news, if it were utterly out of my power to be of any assistance in redressing its consequences. I wish the senate had ordered me into Italy, when they sent for Plancus and Lepidus; for if I had been present, the republic would not have received this cruel wound. And though some, perhaps, may rejoice in this event, from the great number of principal officers and veteran soldiers of the Caesarian party who have perished, yet they will undoubtedly find reason to lament it, when they shall be sensible of the terrible desolation it has brought upon their country. For if what is related, concerning the number of the slain, be in any degree true, the flower and strength of our armies are entirely cut off.

I was well aware of the great advantage it would have proved to the republic, if I could have joined Lepidus; and I should have been able, especially with the assistance of Plancus, to have dissipated those doubts which occasioned his delay in declaring for the senate. But the letters which I received from him being written (as you will perceive by the copies I herewith transmit) in the same spirit with those speeches which, it is said, he made to his army at Narbo, I found it necessary to act with some sort of artifice towards him, if I hoped to obtain leave to march my troops through his province. I was apprehensive, likewise, if an engagement should happen before I could execute my designs, that the known friendship I had with Antony (though not superior, indeed, to that which Plancus entertained for him) would give my enemies an occasion of misrepresenting my intentions. For these reasons I despatched two couriers from Gades, in the month of April, by two different ships, with letters, not only to you, and to Octavius, but to the consuls also, requesting to be informed in what manner my services might most avail the republic. But, if I am right in my calculation, these ships did not sail till the very day on which the battle was fought between Pansa and Antony; as that was the soonest, I think, since the winter, that these seas were navigable. To these reasons for not marching, I must add, that I had so little apprehension of this civil war, that I settled the winter-quarters of my troops in the very remotest parts of Lusitania. Both armies, it should seem, were as eager to come to an action, as if their greatest fears on each side were, lest some less destructive expedition might be found of composing our disturbances. However, if circumstances required so much precipitation, I must do Hirtius the justice to acknowledge, that he conducted himself with all the skill and courage of a consummate general.

I am informed, by my letters from that part of Gaul which is under the command of Lepidus, that Pansa's whole army is cut to pieces, and that he himself is since dead of his wounds. They add, that the martial legion is entirely destroyed, and that Lucius Fabatus, Caius Pudencus, and Decimus Carfulenus, are among the number of the slain. My intelligence farther assures me, that, in the subsequent attack by Hirtius, both he and Antony lost all their legions; that the fourth legion, after having taken Antony's camp, was engaged and defeated by the fifth, with terrible slaughter; that Hirtius, together with Pontius Aquila, and, as it is reported, Octavius likewise, were killed in the action. If this should prove true, (which the gods forbid,) I shall be very greatly concerned. My advice farther import, that Antony has, with great disgrace, abandoned the siege of Mutina; however, that he has complete regiments of horse still remaining, together with one which belongs to Publius Bagienus, as also a considerable number of disarmed soldiers; that Ventidius has joined him with the seventh, the eighth, and the ninth legions; and that Antony is determined, if there should be no hopes of gaining Lepidus, to have recourse to the last expedient, and arm not only the provincials, but even the slaves; in fine, that Lucius Antonius, after having plundered the city of Parma, has posted himself upon the Alps. If these several particulars are true, there is no time to be lost; and every man who wishes that the republic, or even the name of the Roman people, may subsist, should immediately, without waiting for the express orders of the senate, contribute his utmost assistance to extinguish these dreadful flames. I hear that Decimus Brutus is at the head of only seventeen cohorts, together with two incomplete legions of new-raised troops, which had been levied by Antony. I doubt not, however, that the remains of the forces commanded by Hirtius will join him. I hope so at least; as there is little, I think, to be expected from any new recruits that may be raised; especially since nothing can be more dangerous than to give Antony time to recover strength.

My next letters from Italy will determine the plan of my operations; and, as the corn is now cut down, and partly carried in, I shall be more at liberty to execute them without obstruction from the season of the year. In the mean time, let me assure you, that I will neither desert, nor survive the republic, however, that my distance from the scene of action is so great, and the roads so infested, that it is often six weeks, and sometimes more, ere I can be informed of any event that has happened. Farewell.

LETTER III.

Decimus Brutus to Cicero.

It affords me some consolation, in the midst of my great concern, that the world is at length convinced that my fears were not without just foundation. I have sent, by this express, a full account of the whole affair to the senate. And now let them deliberate, if they please, whether they shall call home their troops from Africa and Sardinia, whether they shall send for Marcus Brutus, and whether they shall order the payment of my forces. But of this you may be well assured, that unless they act, with regard to these several articles, in the manner I have pointed out in my letter, we shall all of us be exposed to the utmost danger.

I entreat you to be extremely cautious whom the senate shall employ to conduct the troops that are to reinforce me; as it is a trust which requires great fidelity and expedition. Farewell.

From my camp, June 3d.

\[4\] Notwithstanding Pollio's pious resolutions of expiring with the republic, he was contented to live on long after its total destruction, and died in a good old age in the court and favour of Augustus. It was not many months, indeed, from the date of this letter, that he united with the enemies of his country, by joining his troops with those of Antony and Lepidus.–Anct. Dial. de Caus. Corrupt. This letter appears to have been written a few days after the event, being dated the 3d of June; and the junction between the two armies of Lepidus and Antony having been effected on the 9th of May.

LETTER IV.

To Decimus Brutus.

May every god confound that most infamous of all human beings, the execrable Segellius! For a. u. 710. do you imagine, my friend, that he has told this idle tale to none but Caesar, or to you? Be assured he has related it to every mortal that would give him the hearing. I am much obliged to you, however, for informing me of this contemptible report; as it is a very strong instance, my dear Brutus, of the share you allow me in your friendship.

As to what he mentioned concerning the complaints of the veterans, that you and Caesar are left out of the commission for dividing the lands, I sincerely wish I had, likewise, been excluded from so troublesome an office. But it is by no means to be imputed to me, that you were not both nominated; on the contrary, I moved that all our generals should be included. But the clamours of those who always endeavoured to obstruct your honours, carried it against me; and you were both excepted, in opposition to my warmest efforts. Unheeded then by me, let Segellius propagate his impostant calumnies! For all that the man means is nothing more than to repair his broken fortunes. Not that he can be charged with having dissipated his patrimony; for patrimony he never had. He has only squandered in luxury what he acquired by infamy.

You may be perfectly at ease, my dear and excellent Brutus, with regard to those fears which you so generously entertain upon my account, at the same time that you feel none, you tell me, upon your own. Be assured I shall expose myself to no dangers which prudence can prevent; and, as to those against which no precaution can avail, I am little solicitous. High, indeed, would my presumption be, were I to desire to be privileged beyond the common lot of human nature.

The advice you give me not to suffer my fears to lead me into greater dangers than those they would avoid, supplies me at once with a proof both of your judgment and your friendship; but the caution is altogether unnecessary. The truth of it is, distinguished as you are by a fortitude of mind which renders you incapable of fear upon any occasion, yet there is no man who approaches nearer to you in that quality than myself. Nevertheless, I shall always be upon my guard, though I shall never be afraid. Indeed, if I should have any reason, will it not be wholly owing, my dear Brutus, to yourself? For were I of a disposition apt to take alarm, yet I should be perfectly composed, in the confidence of that protection I shall receive from your approaching consulate; especially as the world is no less sensible than I am of the singular share I enjoy of your affection.

I agree entirely with your opinion concerning the four legions, as also that both you and Caesar should have the distribution of those estates you mention. This is an office on which some of my colleagues had cast a very wistful eye; however, I have disappointed their longing, by reserving it wholly for you and Caesar. In the mean time, if any occurrence should arise that requires particular secrecy, I shall observe your directions, and communicate it to you by one of my own domestics. Farewell.

LETTER V.

Planus to Cicero.

I shall never regret to undergo the greatest dangers in the cause of my country, provided, my dear Cicero, that whatever happens to myself, I may not justly be accused of temerity. But I should not scruple to confess that I had been guilty of an imprudence, if I had ever acted in reliance upon the sincerity of Lepidus. Too easy a disposition to give credit to fair pretexts, cannot so properly be called an error; but an error into which the noblest minds are generally most liable to fall. It was not, however, from a mistake of this nature that I had lately well-nigh been deceived: for the character of Lepidus I perfectly well knew. It was entirely owing to a certain sensibility of what my detractors might say: a quality, I will freely acknowledge, particularly prejudicial in the affair of war. I was apprehensive, if I remained in my camp, that those who are inclined to misconstrue my actions, might represent me as the occasion of the war being protracted, by obstinately indulging my resentment against Lepidus: and, therefore, I advanced almost within sight of him and Antony. I encamped, indeed, at no greater distance from them than forty miles, that I might be able, as circumstances should require, either speedily to join the army of Lepidus, or safely to retreat with my own. In marking out my camp, I chose a spot of ground that gave me the advantage of having a large river in my front, which would take up some time in passing, and that lay contiguous, likewise, to the country of the Vocontii: who, I was sure, would favour my retreat. When Lepidus found himself disappointed of what he so much wished, and that there was no hopes of my approaching nearer, he immediately threw off the mask; and on the 29th of May he joined Antony. The combined armies moved the same day in order to invest my camp; and they had actually advanced within twenty miles before I received advice of their junction. However, I struck my tents with so much expedition, that, by the favour of the gods, I had the happiness to escape them. My retreat was conducted with such a good order, that no part of my baggage, nor even a single man, was either left behind or intercepted by these incensed villains. On the 4th of this month I repassed the Isara with my whole army: after which I broke down the bridge I had thrown across that river. I took this precaution, that my troops might have time to refresh themselves, as well as to give my colleague1 an opportunity of coming up to me, which I imagine he will be able to effect in three days from the date of this letter.

I must always acknowledge the zeal and fidelity which Leterensis has shown to the republic, in his negotiations between Lepidus and myself: but it is certain that his great partiality towards Lepidus prevented him from discerning the dangers into which I have been led. However, as soon as he discovered how grossly he had been imposed upon, he attempted to turn that sword against his own breast, which with much more justice had been plunged in the heart of Lepidus. But he was prevented from completing his purpose: and it is said (though I by no means mention it as a certainty) that the wound he has given himself is not mortal.

My escape from these traitors has proved an extreme mortification to them: as they marched to attack me with the same unrelenting fury which instigated them against their country. Some late circumstances particularly contributed to inflame their resentment. I had frequently and warmly urged Lepidus to extinguish this civil war: I had disapproved of the conferences that were held with the enemy: I had refused to see the lieutenants whom Antony deputed to me under the passports of Lepidus: and had intercepted Catus Vestinus, whom the former had sent express to the latter. But it is with pleasure I reflect, that the more earnestly they wished to get me into their hands, the more they suffer in the disappointment.

Continue, my dear Cicero, to employ the same vigorous efforts you have hitherto exerted, that we who are in arms, for the defence of the republic, may have suitable honours paid to our services. In the mean time, I wish that Caesar would join us with those brave troops he commands; or, if his affairs will not permit him, that, at least, they might be sent under the conduct of some other general: for most certainly his own personal interest is at stake2. The whole force of the disaffected party is united against our country: and shall we not put forth our utmost strength in its defence? As for what concerns myself, I will venture to assure you, that if you at Rome are not wanting on your parts, I will abundantly perform everything that can be expected on mine.

The obligations I am continually receiving from your hands, endear you to me every day more and more; at the same time that they animate me to act in such a manner as not to forfeit, in any degree, your esteem and affection.

I will only add my wishes, that I were able to person to give you such proofs of my gratitude as might afford you greater reason to rejoice in the good offices you have conferred upon me. Farewell.

LETTER VI.
To Decimus Brutus.

To tell you the truth*, I was once inclined to be somewhat angry at the shortness of your letters: A. D. 710. but I am now so well reconciled to your concise manner, that I condemn my own as downright lapse, and shall make your epistles the models of mine. How short, yet how expressive are you when you tell me, that "all things go well with you, and that you shall endeavour to render them still better; that Lepidus seems favourably disposed; and that we have everything to expect from our three armies." Were I ever so full of fears, these significant sentences would banish them all. But I exert the spirit you recommend; and, indeed, if, at the time when you were closely blockaded up, Mutina, my hopes, nevertheless, were fixed entirely upon you, how much higher, think you, must they be raised now?

I should be glad, my dear Brutus, to resign to you my post of observation, if I might do so without incurring the censure of deserting it. As to what you mentioned of continuing in Italy till you should hear from me, I do not disapprove of it, if the motions of the enemy should not call you elsewhere; as there are many points upon the carpet at Rome, which may render it prudent for you not to remove to a farther distance. But, at all events, if your presence here may prove a means of terminating the war, it is undoubtedly the first and principal scheme you should have in view.

The senate has decreed the first money that could be raised for the payment of your troops. Servius is extremely your friend; and you may always depend upon me. Farewell.

LETTER VII.
Asinus Pollio to Cicero.

Balbus*, my questor, has withdrawn from Gades with very considerable effects in his hands, A. D. 710. consisting of a large quantity of uncoined gold, a much larger of silver, together with a great sum of ready money; and what adds to his integrity, is, that he has not discharged even the pay of the troops. In his flight he was detained three days, by contrary winds, at Calpe,—from whence, however, he sailed on the 1st of this month, and has

* He was nephew to Lucius Cornelius Balbus, the great friend and favourite of Cæsar, and of whom frequent mention has been made in the preceding letters.

* The province of Spain abounded in valuable mines of every sort, particularly in these of silver and gold, the proprietors of which paid a certain proportion, to the government, of the pure ore which these mines produced.

mob having pelted Balbus with stones when he attempted to recover him out of their hands, he let loose upon them a party of his Gallic horse. Balbus having by these means got the unfortunate Radius into his possession, ordered him to be fixed in a pit which was dug for that purpose in the place where the games were exhibited, and caused him in this manner to be burned alive. This was performed soon after Balbus had dined, who was present during the whole execution, walking about bare-footed, with his hands behind him and his tunic loose, in the most unconcerned and indecent manner; and while the unhappy sufferer cried out that he was a Roman citizen, "Why do you not run now (said the insulting and relentless Balbus) to implore the protection of the people?" But this was not the single cruelty he exercised. He exposed, likewise, several Roman citizens to wild beasts; particularly a certain noted stonemason in the city of Hispalis,—and this for no other reason but because the poor man was excessively deformed. Such is the monster with whom I had the misfortune to be connected! But more of him when we meet. In the mean time (to turn to a point of much greater importance,) I was glad the senate would determine in what manner they should have me act. I am at the head of three brave legions, one of which Antony took great pains to draw over to his interest at the commencement of the war. For this purpose he caused it to be signified to them, that the very first day they should enter into his camp every soldier should receive five hundred denarii, besides which, he also assured them that if they obtained the victory they should receive an equal share of the spoils with his own troops; a reward which all the world knows would have been without end or measure. These promises made a deep impression upon them; and it was with great difficulty I kept them from deserting. I should not, indeed, have been able to have effect ed this if I had not cantoned them in distant quarters,—as son of the cohorts, notwithstanding they were thus separated, had the insolence to mutiny. Antony endeavoured, likewise, to gain in the rest of the legions by immense offers. Nor was Lepidus less importunate with me to send him the thirtieth legion, which he solicited both by his own letters and by those which he caused Antony to write. The senate will do me the justice, therefore, to believe, as no advantages could tempt me to sell my troops, nor any dangers which I had reason to apprehend if Antony and Lepidus should prove conquerors, could prevail with me to diminish their number, that I was thus tenacious of my army for no other purpose but to employ it in the service of the republic. And let the readiness with which I have obeyed all the orders I received from the senate be a proof that I would have complied in the same manner with every one they should have thought proper to have sent me. I have preserved the tranquillity of this province, I have maintained my authority over the army, and have never once moved beyond the limits of my own jurisdiction. I must add, likewise, that I have never employed any soldier, either of my own troops or those of my auxiliaries, in carrying any despatches whatsoever; and I have constantly punished such of my cavalry whom I have found at any time attempting to desert. I shall think these cares sufficiently rewarded in seeing the peace and security of the republic restored. But if the majority of the senate, and the commonwealth indeed in general, had known me for what I am, I should have been able to have rendered them much more important services.

I have sent you a copy of the letter which I wrote to Balbus just before he left this province; and if you have any curiosity to read his play, which I mentioned above, it is in the hands of my friend Gallus Cornelius, to whom you may apply for it. Farewell.

Corduba, June the 8th.

LETTER VIII.

To Plancus.

All our hopes are entirely fixed (and fixed, too, with the approbation of the gods themselves) upon you and your colleague. The perfect unanimity, therefore, that appears, by your several letters to the senate, to subsist between you, affords great satisfaction, not only to that assembly in particular, but to the whole city in general.

As to what you wrote to me concerning the commission for dividing the lands, if that affair had been brought before the senate I should have been the first to have proposed the most honourable decree in your favour. But the slowness of their deliberations in the business which was then under their consideration, together with other obstructions which attended their debates, having prevented them from coming to any resolution, both your brother and myself were of opinion that it was most advisable to proceed upon the former decree; and I take it for granted that he has acquainted you to whom it is owing that it was not drawn up in the manner we proposed. But if, in this instance or in any other, your inclinations should not be entirely gratified, be well persuaded, however, that you are in such high esteem with all the friends of the republic that there is no sort of honours they are not disposed to confer upon you. I wait with great impatience for an express from you, as I expect it will bring us the news I most wish. Farewell.

a There seems to have been some peculiar indecorum in this circumstance, though it is not very easy to determine wherein it consisted. It may be that public executions, at this time of the day, were thought indecent; it is certain, at least, that it was deemed improper to hold courts of judicature for the trial of criminal matters in an afternoon. For Plutarch takes notice that the younger Cato was accused of this practice during his prætorship, and thinks it necessary, for the credit of that illustrious Roman, to deny the truth of the charge; or, perhaps, Pollio might point out this circumstance as a mark of uncommon cruelty of disposition in Balbus, who could rise from table with a temper of mind as different from that which pleasures of this sort are naturally apt to inspire, and turn from a cheerful meal to a scene of the utmost horror and barbarity.—Plut. in Vit. Cato, Uticen.

TO SEVERAL OF HIS FRIENDS.

LETTER IX.
To Cornificius.

Is it really so, my friend; and have I never written to you but when I had occasion to recommend the cause of some litigious suitor? A. v. 710. I confess I have frequently troubled you with letters of this kind; but must you not thank your own obliging partiality towards me, if the world is persuaded that no recommendation has so much weight with you as mine? Tell me, however, when did I omit writing, if your family gave me notice of an opportunity? In fact, nothing affords me greater satisfaction, now that I cannot converse with you in person, than this intercourse of letters. I only lament that my public occupations prevent me from corresponding with you as frequently as I wish. If I had more leisure, indeed, I should not only provoke you to enter with me into a commerce of this epistolary kind, but I should challenge you with whole volumes of my works; a challenge which I ought to have received from you, as your engagements, I imagine, are not altogether so numerous as mine. But if I am mistaken in this supposition, how shall I acquit you of being a little unreasonable, in expecting frequent letters on my part, when you have so seldom leisure to send me any on yours? If I have hitherto been engaged in the most important occupations, as holding myself bound to exert all my cares in the defence of the republic, I may still more strongly urge that plea at present. For as a respite is always more dangerous than a first attack, so the rekindling of this war, after it was almost totally extinguished, demands a double portion of my labour and vigilance. But, not to enter farther into this subject, believe me, my dear Cornificius, I should think myself most inexcessibly indolent, not to say ill-mannered, were I capable of suffering you to gain the superiority over me in any instance of friendship. That I enjoy yours, is a point of which I never once had the least doubt; but the conversations we have lately had with Cheripus, has rendered it still more evident. As agreeable as he always was to my taste, I could not but look upon him, in his last visit, with more than ordinary pleasure, as he not only acquainted me with the sentiments of your heart, in the message he delivered to me, but, as he represented, at the same time, a livelier image of your very air and countenance. You had no reason then to be apprehensive that I should be displeased at your having sent me the same common letter which you addressed to all your friends in general. If I desired a more particular memorial, it was merely from the affection of my heart, and by no means as a point upon which I insisted.

The loss of both our consuls, together with the incredible scarcity of money in the treasury, puts it out of my power to ease you of your great and continual expense in your military preparations. We are trying all expedients in order to raise supplies for this purpose; but the respective duties we promised to the troops that behaved well; and I imagine that we shall at last be obliged to have recourse to a tax. *

I am persuaded there is no truth in the report concerning Attius Dionysius: as Stratorius has not mentioned a word to me upon that subject. With regard to Publius Lucceius: he well persuaded that his interest is no less my concern than it is yours: for, indeed, he is extremely my friend. I could not, however, prevail with the managers of the auction to adjourn the sale; their engagements and their oath oblige them, they assure me, to the contrary. I would by all means, therefore, advise him to hasten into Italy: and if the summons I sent him some time since had any weight, he will be at Rome when you read this letter. As to the affairs you mention, and particularly the money, I find you were not apprised of Pansa's death when you wrote your letter, by the hopes you express that, through my interest, he would comply with your request. And most undoubtedly he would, had he been living: for he held you in great esteem. But as he is dead, I do not see that anything can now be done in this matter.

I approve, in general, of your measures with respect to Venullius, Latinus, and Horatius: and particularly, that you have deprived them of their lictors. But I am not altogether so well pleased, that, in order to render this circumstance the less uneasy to them, you have taken away these attendants likewise from your own lieutenants. Those who deserve the highest honours ought not to have been thus levelled with a set of men, who certainly merit the utmost disgrace: and if they will not depart from your province, in obedience to the decree of the senate, I think you should use compulsory methods for that purpose.

I have nothing farther to add in answer to your last letter (of which I received a duplicate) but that I hope you will be persuaded, your credit and reputation are no less sacred to me than my own. Farewell.

LETTER X.
To Decimus Brutus.

Though I always receive your letters with the highest satisfaction, yet I am much better pleased when you employ your leisure time, than when you make an excuse to me, than if you had interrupted your very important occupations by writing yourself. He has executed your commission very fully: and nothing can render your character more truly amiable to me, than the account he gives of your zeal and diligence.

The junction of your forces with those of Punicus, and the harmony with which you act together, appears to your enemies less formidable, to the senate, was extremely agreeable, both to that assembly, and to the people in general. What remains then, each man's substance, but had wholly been disposed in Rome from the conquest of Macedon by Paulus Emilius, which furnished money and rents sufficient to ease the city over after of that burden, till the necessity of the present times obliged them to renew it."—Val. Max. iv. 3; Life of Cicero, p. 283.

This letter closes the correspondence between Cicero and Cornificius. The latter, not long afterwards, lost his life in bravely defending his province against the troops of Sextius, who claimed it in the name of Octavius, by virtue of the general division of the Roman dominions that had been agreed upon between the triumvirs.—Appian, De Bell. Civ. p. 690.
my dear Brutus, but to conjure you to persevere in the same unanimity, and to endeavour, I will not say to excel others, but (what is far worthier of your ambition) to rise above yourself? I need add no more: especially as I am writing to one whose epistolary conscientious I purpose to imitate.

I wait with patience for your next despatches, as I imagine they will bring us such accounts as are agreeable to our wishes. Farewell.

LETTER XI.

To Furnius.

When your letter assured me that it was absolutely necessary either to slight Narbonensian new Gaul, or to attack the enemy with great disadvantage, I was glad to find that the former had been chosen; as I much more dreaded the consequences of coming to an engagement upon unequal terms. What you mentioned likewise concerning the harmony between Plancus and Brutus, afforded me great pleasure; for it is a circumstance upon which I found my principal hopes of our success.

Notwithstanding you modestly refer it to time to inform me to whom we owe that general zeal which appears in your province; be assured it is a point of which I am already perfectly well apprised. I could not, therefore, but read the latter part of your letter, which, in all other respects, was extremely agreeable to me, with some concern. You there tell me, that if the election for ediles is fixed for the month of August, you will soon be at Rome; but if it is already over, you will be there much sooner. "For whereas," you ask, "should you weakly continue to hazard your life, without the prospect of any recompense?" O! my friend, is it possible that you, who judge so well concerning the interests of others, should be thus a stranger to your own? But, as I am sensible of the strong impulse of your heart towards true glory, I cannot believe that these are its genuine sentiments; at least, if they be, I must condemn my own judgment as well as yours, for being so greatly deceived in your character. Shall the ambition of anticipating a slight and common honour, (for so I must call the office you have in view, if obtained in the manner by which so many others have risen to it before you,) induce you to withdraw from a theatre where you are acting with such universal and well-merited applause? Shall it be a question with you, whether to offer yourself as a candidate now, or at the next election for praetors; and is it none, how you shall deserve every illustrious distinction which the commonwealth can bestow? Are you a stranger to the exalted reputation you have acquired? Or do you consider it as of no value, thus to rise in the esteem of your country? If you are ignorant, indeed, of the high credit in which you stand with the public, it is an ignorance for which we, who are your friends, are undoubtedly to be blamed. But if you already know it, tell me, my Furnius, can any pretorship afford you a satisfaction superior to what you feel in discharging the duty you owe to your country, and in reaping immortal glory? an acquisition which, though few indeed endeavour to deserve, yet every man most certainly wishes to enjoy. Calvisius, who is much your friend, and a man of great judgment also, frequently joins with me in complaining of you upon this article. However, since you are so desirous to attain this office, I shall endeavour that the election may be deferred till the month of January; as this adjournment will, upon many accounts I think, prove for the advantage likewise of the republic. Farewell: and may victory attend you!

LETTER XII.

To Caecus Cassius.

I imagine you are informed, by the public journals, which I know are duly transmitted to you, of the infamous conduct of that most light and inconstant man, your relation Lepidus. We are again, therefore, involved in a war, which we flattered ourselves was entirely over; and all our hopes are now placed upon Decimus and Plancus; or, to speak more truly indeed, upon Brutus and upon you. For it is from you two that we expect, not only a present assistance, in case any misfortune (which the gods avert!) should attend our arms, but a firm and lasting re-establishment of our liberties.

The reports in regard to Dolabella are, in all respects, agreeable to our wishes, excepting only that they want confirmation. In the mean time, be assured, that the opinion and expectations of the world concerning you, are such as evidently show that these look upon you as a truly great man. Let this animate you to the noblest achievements, in the full persuasion that there is nothing so considerable which your country does not hope to obtain by your courage and conduct. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

To the same.

I take example from the conciseness of your letters, to shorten mine: though, to say truth, nothing occurs at present that can tempt me to lengthen them. For, as to our transactions, I well know you are acquainted with them by the public journals; and we are perfectly ignorant of everything that concerns yours. One would imagine, indeed, that all communication were cut off between us and Asia: for we have received no intelligence from thence, excepting only some uncertain, though indeed repeated, rumours in relation to the defeat of Dolabella.

We imagined that the flames of this civil war were entirely extinguished; but, in the midst of this pleasing persuasion, we were suddenly and greatly alarmed by the conduct of your relation Lepidus. Be assured, therefore, that the hopes of the republic are wholly fixed upon you and your army. We have, it is true, a very powerful body of troops in this part of the world; nevertheless, your presence here is extremely necessary, to give our affairs all the success we wish. I will not say that we have no hopes of recovering our liberties; but I must say our hopes are small. Such as they are, however, they are entirely founded upon your future consulate*. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

Cassius*, Quesator, to Cicero.

The preservation of the republic, by the victory we have lately obtained, gives me inexpressible joy, as the honours that have been paid my friend* afford me likewise a very sensible pleasure. I cannot sufficiently indulge my admiration, when I consider you as thus rising above yourself in glory, and that the consul* should shine forth even with more lustre than the consul. Some uncommon privilege of fate most certainly attends your patriot virtues, as we have often I am sure experienced. How else should your single eloquence be of more avail than the arms of all our generals? You have a second time, indeed, rescued the well-nigh vanquished republic from the hands of our enemies, and once more restored her to us again. From this period, therefore, I date the return of our liberties, and I shall now be honoured with the public applause of the most distinguished of patriots. Yes, my friend, you will now declare, (what you promised to conceal till the recovery of our freedom should render it to my advantage to be known,) you will now declare to the whole world those instances you received of my tender attachment both to you and to the republic, during the dark and dangerous season of our servitude. I am much less solicitous, however, that you should publish my praises, than that you should be persuaded I deserve them; and I had rather stand approved by your silent judgment, than, without that internal verdict in my favour, to enjoy, by your recommendation, the good opinion of the whole world. It is my great ambition, indeed, that you should esteem my late conduct to have been, not the effect of a sudden and irregular impulse, but the natural result of the same uni-

a Cassius and Brutus were pretors the last year, and the laws entitled a man to use for the consulate two years after he had served the office of pretor.

b It is altogether uncertain whether the author of this letter was Lucius Cassius, the brother of Calus Cassius, or another Cassius, distinguished by the addition of Parmenius, from Parma, the place of his nativity. There is nothing indeed in the history of these two Cassii, or in the letter itself, that can render it more reasonable to suppose it to have been written by the one rather than the other; for they were both in the number of the conspirators against Caesar, and both afterwards acted with Brutus and Cassius in Asia. This epistle appears to have been written from the island of Cyprus soon after the news of Antony's defeat at the battle of Mutina had reached that part of the world.—Cassobun. ad Suet. Jul. 80; Appian De Bell. Civ. p. 671.

c This seems to allude to the honours that were paid to Cicero by the populace, upon the news that Antony had been forced to abandon the siege of Mutina. "The whole body of the people (to give the relation of this fact in the words of Dr. Middleton) assembled about Cicero's house, and carried him in a kind of triumph to the capitol; where, on their return, they placed him in the rostra, to give him the victory in the conduct of affairs, and then conduct him home with infinite acclamations."—Philipp. xiv. 5; Life of Cicero, p. 271.

d Those who had passed through the office of consul were styled consulars.

form principles of which you have been a witness: in a word, that you should think of me, as of one from whom the republic has so much to expect, as may well justify every honour to which I shall be advanced. I am sensible, my dear Cicero, that your own family, as they are well worthy of the relation they bear to you, deserve your first and most tender regard. But those surely have a right to the next place in your affection who endeavour to imitate your patriot virtues; and I shall be glad to find that their number is considerable. I imagine, however, that it is not so great as to exclude me from a share in your good offices, and prevent you from procuring any public distinctions in my favour which shall be agreeable to your inclination and your judgment. That I am not unworthy of them, with respect to the disposition of my heart, I have already, perhaps, sufficiently convinced you: and, as to my talents, whatever they may be, the general oppression under which our country so long laboured, would not suffer them to appear in their full advantage.

I drew together, out of the ports of this Asiatic province, and of the neighbouring islands, all the ships of war I could possibly collect: and, considering the great opposition I met with from several cities, I managed them with tolerable expedition. With this fleet I pursued that of Dolabella, commanded by Lucilius; who, after having frequently made a show of coming over to me, but still, however, continuing to retreat, sailed, at length, into the port of Corcyra; where he blocked himself up. I did not think proper to follow him thither; not only as judging it most advisable to join our land forces, but as Turullius the quaestor lay behind me with a squadron which Cullus Cicero fitted out the last year from Bithynia. I put in, therefore, at Cyprus; from whence I take this first opportunity of acquainting you with the intelligence I have here received. I am to inform you then, that the city of Laodicea (in pursuance of the example of our faithless allies the Tarsenses¹, though, indeed, with a greater degree of folly) have voluntarily called in Dolabella; from those two cities he has composed an army, not far as he can make an army of Greek soldiers, and is encamped before Laodicea; having thrown down part of the walls, in order to join his camp with the town. On the other hand, Cassius² is encamped, about twenty miles distant from him, at Paltos. His army consists of ten legions, and twenty auxiliary cohorts, together with four thousand horse. He imagines that he shall be able to oblige the enemy to surrender, without hazarding a battle; as wheal is so scarce in Dolabella's camp, that it is sold for twelve drachmas. The enemy must necessarily, indeed, be destroyed by famine, if they are not soon supplied by the ships that belong to Laodicea. This, however, we shall with great ease prevent; for, besides the three squadrons under Turullius, Patius, and myself, Cassius has a considerable fleet in these seas commanded by Sextilius Rufus. Let me encourage you then, to hope that we shall soon vindicate our liberties with the same success² in this part of the world, as has attended your army in Italy. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

To Decimus Brutus.

I was expecting every day to hear from you, when our friend Lepus gave me notice that he was just setting out to you, and desired to know if I had anything to write. But though I have nothing worth communicating more than what you are furnished with by the public journals, and that you are no friend I am told to letters of mere empty form, neither will I forbear following your example, and sending you two or three short words. Be assured, then, that all our hopes rest upon you and your colleague. As to Brutus, I am not able to give you any certain account of him: I can only say, that, in pursuance of your advice, I endeavour to persuade him, in all my letters, to come over into Italy, and to take a part in this general war. I much wish he were now here, as his presence would render me less apprehensive of the consequences of these intestine commotions which prevail in Rome; and which are by no means indeed inconsiderable. But I forget that I proposed to imitate your laconic brevity, and am running on in a second page. Farewell then, and may success attend your arms.

June 18th.

LETTER XVI.

To Caius Cassius.

Your relation and my friend, the worthy Lepidus, together with all his adherents, were, by a unanimous decree of the senate, which passed on the 30th of June last, declared public enemies to their country: but at the same time a full pardon was offered to such as shall return to their allegiance before the first of September. The senate acts with great spirit; but it is the expectation of being supported by your army, that chiefly animates them in their vigorous measures. I fear, indeed, that we shall have occasion for all your assistance, as the war is now become extremely formidable by the villany of Lepidus.

The accounts which daily arrive concerning Dolabella are altogether agreeable to our wishes: but, at present, they are nothing more than mere rumours. However, your last letter addressed to the senate, dated from the camp on the 9th of May, has raised a general persuasion in Rome, that he is actually defeated. Accordingly, it is imagined, that you are now upon your march into Italy, with a view, on the one hand, of succouring us with your troops, if any of those accidents so common in war should have rendered our arms unsuccessful; or, on the other hand, of assisting us with your counsels and authority, in case we should have proved victorious. You may be assured, in the mean while, that no endeavours of mine shall be wanting to procure the forces under your command all possible honours. However, I must wait a proper season for this purpose, when it shall be known how far they have availed, or are likely to avail, the republic. At present, we have only heard of their endeavours in the cause of liberty; and glorious, it must be acknowledged, their endeavours have been. But still some positive services are expected; and these expectations I dare be confident, either already are, or soon will be, perfectly answered. No man, indeed, possesses a more patriot or heroic spirit than yourself: and it is for this reason that we wish to see you in Italy as soon as possible. The fact is, if you and Brutus were here, we should look upon the republic as restored.

If Lepidus had not received Antony, weak and defenceless as he was, when he fled after the battle of Mutina, we should have obtained a complete victory. This infamous step, therefore, has rendered him far more odious in Rome even than Antony himself ever was: for Antony raised a war at a time when the republic was in the utmost ferment; whereas Lepidus has kindled the flames in the midst of peace and victory. We have the consuls elect to lead our armies against him; but though we greatly depend upon their courage and conduct, still however, the uncertain event of war leaves us much to fear. Be assured therefore that our principal reliance is upon you and Brutus, whom we hope soon to see in Italy; and Brutus, indeed, we expect every day. Should we have defeated our enemies, as I hope we shall, before your arrival, the authority, nevertheless, of two such illustrious citizens will be of infinite service in raising up the republic, and fixing it upon some tolerable basis. All our business, indeed, will by no means be over, notwithstanding we should be delivered from the infamous designs of our enemies,—as there are many other disorders of a different kind, which it will be still necessary to redress. Farewell.

w Marcus Brutus.

x The conduct of Marcus Brutus, as far as can be judged of it at this distant period, appears altogether unaccountable. Before the battle of Mutina he had drawn down all his forces to the coast, in order to embark for Italy, if any accident should make his assistance necessary. But upon the news of Antony's defeat, he retired to the remotest parts of Greece and Macedonia, to oppose the attempts of Dolabella; and from that time (as Dr. Middleton observes) seemed deaf to the call of the senate, and to all Cicero's letters, which urged him so strongly to come to their relief. But had Brutus and Cassius (as the same ingenious historian remarks) marched with their armies towards Italy, at the time when Cicero first pressed it, before the desertion of Plancus and the death of Decimus, it seems reasonable to believe that the immediate ruin of the republic might have been prevented.—Life of Cicero, p. 362.

y The disturbances to which Cicero alludes were, probably, those that were occasioned by the violent measures of Octavius, in order to obtain the consulate. —See rem. 1 on letter 18 of this book.

z Decimus Brutus, soon after the date of this letter, was most treacherously deserted by Plancus, who drew off his troops from those of his colleague, and went over with them to the camp of Antony and Lepidus. "Decimus Brutus being thus abandoned, and left to shift for himself, with a needy mutinous army, eager to desert, and ready to give him up to his enemies, had no other way to save himself than by flying to Marcus Brutus in Macedonia. But the distance was so great, and the country so guarded, that he was often forced to change his road for fear of being taken; till, having dismissed all his attendants, and wandered for some time alone in disguise and distress, he committed himself to the protection of an old acquaintance and host, whom he had formerly obliged, where, either through treachery or accident, he was surprised by Antony's soldiers, who immediately killed him, and returned
LETTER XVII.
To Ampius.
Yours family has informed you, I imagine, of my zealoua labours to procure your restoration, as A. u. 710. I have the pleasure to be assured that they are abundantly satisfied with my services. Uncommon, indeed, as the affection is which they every one of them bears towards you, yet I cannot allow that they are more sincerely desirous of your welfare than myself. I am sure, at least, their power of assisting you in the conjuncture is by no means equal to mine. I have employed it, and shall continue to employ it, for your benefit: and I have already gained a very considerable point, which will much contribute to facilitate your return. In the meanwhile, preserve a firm and manly spirit, and be well persuaded that my good offices shall not be wanting to you upon any occasion. Farewell.

LETTER XVIII.
Plancus, Consul elect, to Cicero.
I cannot forbear to express, upon every occasion, the sentiments I entertain of your respected favours; though, at the same time, it is with some reserve that I indulge myself in this satisfaction. The great intimacy, indeed, which you allow me to enjoy with you, renders all formal acknowledgments of this kind unnecessary; nor would I make so cheap a return to the many important obligations I owe to you, as that of mere empty professions. I had much rather reserve the proofs of my gratitude to some future opportunity of testifying it in person; and, if I live, I will convince you, by the assiduity of my good offices, and by every instance of respect and esteem, that you have not a friend, nor even a relation, who is so warmly attached to you as myself. In the mean time, I am at a loss to determine, whether the daily pleasure I receive, or the lasting honour I shall derive, from your affectionate regard, be greater.

And the interest of my troops has been a part of your care. It was not with any intention of advancing my own power, that I was desirous they should be distinguished by the senate, as I am conscious of having no views but what regard the welfare of the republic. My reasons were, in the first place, because I thought they deserved to be rewarded; and, in the next place, because I was desirous they might, upon all occasions, be still more attached to the commonwealth. I hoped, likewise, by these means, so strongly to fortify them against all solicitations, that I might be answerable for their continuing to act with the same unshaken fidelity which they have hitherto preserved.

I have kept entirely upon the defensive; and, though I am well apprised with how much just impiation the public wishes for a decisive action, yet I persuade myself that the senate will approve my conduct. If any misfortune, indeed, should attend our armies in this part of the world, the republic would not very soon be in a condition to oppose any sudden incursion of these rapacious traitors. As to the state of our forces, I imagine you already know that those under my command consist of three veteran legions, together with one new-raised regiment, which last, however, is composed of undisciplined troops or of such of this sort. Brutus\(^a\) is at the head of ten legions, one of which is veteran, another has been upon the establishment about two years, and all the rest are lately raised. Thus, you see, though our army is very numerous, it is not extremely strong. The republic, indeed, has but too often had occasion to be convinced how little is to be expected from raw and inexperienced forces. However, if we had been joined either by the African legions\(^b\), which are composed wholly of veteran troops, or by Caesar's\(^c\), we should, without hesitation, have hazarded a general engagement. As the troops of the latter were somewhat nearer than the former, I frequently pressed Caesar, by letters, to advance; and he accordingly promised to join us with all expedition. But other views, I perceive, have diverted him from these intentions. Nevertheless, I have despatched my lieutenant, Furnius, with another letter to him, if happily it may anything avail. You are sensible, my dear Cicero, that I take an equal part with you in the apprehension of this bear to Octavius. He has a right to my friendship, not only from that intimacy which I enjoyed with his uncle\(^d\); but, in regard also to his own disposition, which, as far I could ever discover, is regulated by principles of great moderation and humanity. It would ill indeed become that distinguished amity, which subsisted between Julius Caesar and myself, not to look upon Octavius with all the tenderness which is due to the son of my friend, after he has been adopted as such by Caesar's will, and that adoption approved by the senate. What I am going to say, therefore, is more the dictates of concern than resentment; but it must be acknowledged, that if Antony still lives, if he has been jointed with Lepidus, if their armies are by no means contemptible; in a word, all their hopes and all their attempts are singly owing to Caesar's. Not to look farther back than to his present joining me: had he fulfilled the assurances he gave me for that purpose, the war would, by this time, either have been totally at an end, or driven into Spain, where the enemy could not have carried it on without great disadvantage, as that province is utterly averse to them. I am at a loss to conceive, therefore, with what view, or by whose advice, Caesar was diverted from a measure so greatly to his interest and his honour, in order to turn his pursuits towards a consulsip of a few months' duration;\(^e\) much to the terror, at the same time, of the republic\(^f\); and with preten-sions, too, exceedingly ridiculous! The remonstrances of his friends might he extremely serviceable upon this occasion, both to himself and to the commonwealth. But none of them, I am persuaded, would have so much influence over him as yours; as there is no man who is so much obliged to you except myself; for I shall ever acknowledge that the favours I have received from you are great and innumerable. I have given instructions to Furnius to solicit Caesar upon this subject: and if I should have that authority with him which I am sure I ought, he will hereafter thank me for my advice. In the mean time, we have a very difficult part to sustain here: as, on city into the utmost consternation and disorder.—Dio, p. 390; Appian. p. 388-6.

Perhaps the absurdity to which Plutarch here alluded was, that Octavius, who was but a youth of twenty, and, consequently, who wanted above twenty years of the age prescribed by the laws for being qualified to sue for the consular office, should entertain so extravagant a thought as to aspire to the supreme magistracy.

2 Plutarch chose a very improper man to dissuade Octavius from pursuing his design upon the consulate, when he fixed upon Cicero as the most likely person to prevail with him for that purpose. It appears, indeed, that Octavius had artfully ensnared Cicero to enter into his views, by persuading him that he was desirous of having him for his colleague in the consular office, and promising to leave the sole administration of it to Cicero's superior wisdom and experience. Thus he was too well adapted to his vanity and ambition, to be thrown out in vain, and Cicero undertook the management of this affair upon the terms proposed. Plutarch, Appian, and Dion Cassius, all concur in giving testimony to the truth of this fact; but, as it is a fact which proves that Cicero was by no means at this juncture acting the part of a patriot, the polite apologists of his conduct has endeavoured to discredit the evidence of these historians. To this end Dr. Middleton produces the following passage from the letters to Brutus, as an incontestable proof, that no man was more shocked at Octavius's attempt, or took more pains to dissuade it, than Cicero.—"Cæsarem—improbissimos litteris quidam fallacibusque nuncius impulserunt in sempertimassimum consulatum. Quod simul atque sensa, neque ego illum absentem litterarum memoriam Hodus, nec punctum ejus materiae, qui ejus cupiditatis suffragiari viam sustulit: nee in senatu, seceratissimorum consiliorum fontes apertè dubitavi." [Epist. ad Brut. 10.] Now, there seems to be the strongest reason to question either the authenticity or the veracity of this letter; because it is most certain, from one of Cicero's Philippiques, that he actually did favour the earliest possible promotion of Octavius to the consulate.

"Quid est enim P. C. (says he) cum eum (Octavium) non quam primam amplectiisse honoris espe cupiatur? Legibus enim annalibus eum grandiore atque ad consulari constituted, adolescenti tenebrae latenter invaginatur. C. Caesar inuentu atate docuit ab excellenti extimati virtute, progressum etatis expectati non operete. In hoc opere libertatis posita est; ab hoc accepta jam salus, hasque sunt honores et exspectaturn et parati sunt."—[Philipp. v. 17, 18.] Could Cicero, after this, without being guilty of the wildest and the weakest inconsistency, the one hand, do we not think ourselves altogether strong enough to hazard an engagement: and, on the other, must take care not to expose the republic to greater dangers by declining one. However, if Caesar could comply with Octavius's interest and his honour, or if the African legions should speedily join us, you may depend upon having nothing to fear from this quarter. Let me entreat you to continue your friendship to me, and to be assured that I am entirely yours. Farewell.

From my camp, July the 8th.

1 "admonish Octavius by letter against his designs upon the consulship, approach those to their face who encouraged him in that ambitious view, and lay open the sources of these traitorous counsels in the senate," (all which the episode in question affirms that he did,) when he had himself, in the meantime, written to his brother, and said everything that his wit and eloquence could suggest in favour of Octavius's premature advancement to the consular office? Either the letters, then, to Brutus are not genuine, or Cicero, to serve a present purpose, pretended that he had acted a part which he did not. The former of these suppositions is maintained by some very learned and judicious critics, and the latter will by no means be thought improbable, if there is any weight in the several instances of the same kind which have been occasionally produced in the course of these remarks. But whichever of these alternatives be the fact, it equally concludes in support of that historical evidence for which I have been contending. In further confirmation of which it may be observed, that Plutarch cites the authority of Octavius himself for what he affirms concerning the private agreement between Octavius and Cicero in regard to the consulate. And it is probable he took this piece of secret history from those memoirs which Octavius wrote of his own life, as it is certain that both Plutarch and Appian made great use of them in compiling their histories.—Plut. in Vit. Cicer.; Appian. p. 578-3, 385; Dio, p. 519; Middleton, on the Epist. to Brut. p. 134, rem. 8: Tusiul's Observ. on the Epist. to Brut. p. 222, et Suet. in Vit. Aug. 66.

2 Plutarch, soon after the time of the letter above cited, said something to his brother, Declimus Brutus, and went over with his troops to Antony and Lepidus. [See rnm. 2 on letter 15 of this book.] About four months, likewise, from the time when this letter was written, the celebrated coalition was formed between Caesar, Antony, and Lepidus, in consequence of which Cicero, it is well known, was sacrificed to Antony's resentment. In the last moments of his life he beheld with great compunction; and it is the only circumstance in all his misfortunes that he bore with a becoming fortitude. He had, indeed, so much the less reason to complain of his fate, as it is certain that he suffered nothing more than he would have inflicted, had Fortune put Antony into his power. "Omnium adversorum (says Livy) nihil ut viro dignum erat, salut, praetor merum; quod quidem, vres sed imantem, minus indigni videri potest, quod a victore inimico nihil crudelius passurus erat, quam quod ejusdem fortune compose ipso fecisset." [Liv. Fragm. apud Senec. Supser. 67.] This is the judgment which the noblest mind of the imperial age has passed upon Cicero, and the truth of it is abundantly confirmed by the foregoing letters.

MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO

to

TITUS POMPONIUS ATTICUS,

IN SIXTEEN BOOKS.

TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH, WITH NOTES,

BY WILLIAM HEBERDEN, M.D. F.R.S.
TO THE

HONORABLE AND RIGHT REVEREND SHUTE BARRINGTON,

LORD BISHOP OF DURHAM, &c. &c.

My Lord,

In availing myself of your Lordship's permission to inscribe to you the following Letters, I shall not offend your modesty by any attempt to proclaim to the world what the world everywhere acknowledges—your Lordship's eminent virtues. I shall be content if I can hide some part of my own deficiency in the splendor of so great and good a name.

Your Lordship is well acquainted with the originals from which the following translation is drawn. But while all familiar letters must be liable to obscurity in proportion to our ignorance of the persons and circumstances, often of little notoriety, to which they allude; much more is it to be expected, that in a correspondence entertained at so remote a period, where there exist no remains of the letters on one side, and not unfrequently no record of the particulars which form their subject, many difficulties should present themselves, independent of those which are inseparable from customs and language long since gone into disuse. It is therefore no idle task to render documents, at once so curious and instructive, more extensively useful, by making them more generally understood. For whether we consider the matter or the manner of these letters, their author, or the time when they were written, they constitute in every point of view one of the most precious remains of antiquity. Cicero, as your Lordship knows, was not only the greatest orator of Rome; he was at the same time one of her wisest counsellors, and one of her best citizens. To good natural parts he had added incredible industry, and had made himself master of all the literature and philosophy of the Greeks, tho' considered as the only source, and, exclusively of revelation, still the brightest source, of good taste and right judgment. But while the learning of the Greek sophist was often suffered to waste itself in fruitless speculation or self-conceit, Cicero's, on the contrary, appears to have been constantly directed to the purposes of useful life, adding strength and grace to the maaly powers of his mind. It regulated his judgment, and animated his exertions in the forum and in the senate, in the various and important offices which he executed with singular diligence in the republic, and likewise in the discharge of these gentler duties of courtesy and friendship, to which he seems never to have been inattentive. For so occupied was his whole life, that it may well excite our wonder how he found time to write, or to read, even a portion of those works which he composed and studied. His conduct in the height of his power, during his consulship, is universally known, as well from contemporary histories as from his own orations, which yet remain an illustrious monument of his prudence, of his diligence, of his eloquence. His administration of a provincial government is not less distinguished, and is collected chiefly from the evidence of these letters. It appears to have been every way judicious and upright, and worthy of his high character. For in a situation where other governors, removed from the danger of immediate observation, and unrestrained by the sanctions of a pure religion, had too generally given a loose to rapine, extortion, and violence, and had sacrificed honour, conscience, duty, every ornament and every virtue, at the shrine of ambition and avarice, Cicero stands almost a single instance of unshaken justice, patriotism, and moral excellence.

But it would be tedious and impertinent to your Lordship to attempt to enumerate all the particulars that made up the life of this extraordinary man. Our business is with his Letters. And it is difficult to conceive any memorials more worthy of regard than the genuine letters of such a person, addressed to a most intimate friend, to whom he opened his bosom upon all occasions without reserve, who, as he says himself, was "his associate in public affairs, his confidant in all private ones, and admitted to all his conversation and thoughts." They present an undisguised account of his own sentiments and feelings under a great variety of circumstances, with his opinions upon almost all the great events and great men of his time. How highly they were valued by his countrymen, we learn from the testimony of Cornelius Nepos, who mentions "the sixteen books of his letters to Atticus, from the time of his consulship to his death;" and adds, that "whoever should read them would little need any other history of those times, everything being so clearly described respecting the zeal of parties, the vices of the leading men, and the changes of the republic, that nothing remains unrevealed. And his wisdom," says he, "may well be thought to have something of divine inspiration; for Cicero not only foretold what took place during his own life, but also what we now experience he announced like a prophet." To Englishmen they derive an additional interest, from breathing everywhere a rational love of liberty, and dread of tyranny, called forth by the peculiar crisis in which the republic was placed, when it was about to sink for ever under the yoke of despotism. To Christians they afford occasion to cherish with more fervent gratitude those consolations and hopes of revelation, that "anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast," from want of which we see the wisest of the heathen world become a prey to temporal calamities, and overwhelmed with despair.

* Qui et in publica, et in privatis omnibus conscius, et omnium sermonum et consiliorum particeps.

—Ad Att. i. 18.

Besides the contents of these letters, the style of their composition is itself deservedly an object of admiration; a style free from all pedantry and affectation, from all levity and impertinence, perfectly easy and familiar, yet everywhere consistent with dignity and good manners; or in the words of Cicero himself, when speaking of Atticus, "the language is chaste, interspersed with polite wit, and distinguished by marks of affection." But these very excellences, while they enhance the value of the original letters, add in no small degree to the difficulty of a just translation. It has been my endeavour, in the first place, to give the true sense of the author; then to give it as little altered from the original as the different genius of the languages would permit; to preserve as much as possible of the Roman air, without destroying that ease which gives to epistolary correspondence its best grace; not attempting to modernise terms of civility, or to disguise old customs under new habits, but wishing rather to familiarise the reader with ancient Rome. For I considered that these letters ought to appear, not as if Cicero had written in this age and country, but as if English had been the language of Italy in his time, so that the sentiments and manners might still be Roman, the medium only changed through which they are expressed. To the letters I have added notes, which I have studied to make as few, as short, and as clear as I could, consistently with the object of rendering more easily intelligible, not only to the English reader, but to the scholar, the frequent allusions, the hints, and broken sentences which occur. And though they have not been drawn up without considerable pains in perusing and weighing the opinions of different commentators, yet I have generally thought it best to give simply my own judgment, without embarrassing the reader with my reasons.

I know not if any apology be required for having given the names of people with their Latin terminations. For what can be more absurd than an attempt to translate a mere personal designation? I have not scrupled, therefore, to write Pompeius, Antonius, &c. And it may reasonably be expected that the public taste, which is daily improving, will before long adopt this alteration from the present practice. If I have not always followed the same rule in regard to the names of places, it is because countries belonging equally to all times seem improperly to partake of the same changes which obtain in the appellations of other common objects. While, therefore, I have preserved the names of persons unchanged, I trust I shall not be chargeable with inconsistency in adopting the English terms of Roue, Italy, and other places familiarly known in modern language.

But I have done. I have perhaps already trespassed upon your patience longer than I ought, were it not that under the cover of your Lordship's name I considered myself in some measure as addressing the public. It only remains that I thank your Lordship for affording me this public opportunity of acknowledging my deep sense of the great and undeviating kindness with which you have honoured me from a very early period of my life, and which derived originally, among many other blessings, from my dear and respected father, your Lordship has permitted to grow up with my growth into familiarity and friendship. I have the honour to be, with great gratitude, esteem, and affection,

My Lord, your Lordship's most obedient and faithful servant,

Datchet, October, 1825.

MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO
TO TITUS POMPONIUS ATTICUS.

BOOK I.

LETTER I.*

(Being the fifth in Gravius's edition.)

You, who know me so well, may easily conceive that distress I have felt, and what a severe loss I have sustained, both in my public and domestic concerns, by the death of my relation Lucius. For I possessed all the engaging qualities which can arise from kindness and gentleness of manner. And I doubt not that you partake in this affliction, both from your regard to me, and because you have yourself lost him a most accomplished connexion and friend, who was attached to you as well by his own inclination as by my frequent mention of you. As to what you say about your sister, she shall be my witness how much pains I have taken to reconcile my brother Quintus to her. For, as

* It is obvious that the best arrangement of any series of letters must be that of their dates. I have therefore not scrupled to adopt this order in regard to the first seven letters of this book, which are generally acknowledged to have been very early misplaced. At the same time, to avoid any inconveniences that might arise from it, I have, here and elsewhere, as often as the same liberty as been taken, subjoined the number of each letter as it stands in Gravius's edition. This first, in the order of me, was written in the 68th year of Rome, corresponding to the 5th year before Christ, when Cicero was thirty-five years old.

b Lucius Cicero was cousin-groom to Marcus; the term pater, like the Greek ἀδελφός, being subject to considerable latitude of signification. See book ii. letter 7, note 4.

Quintus Cicero, the younger brother of Marcus, had married Pomponia, Atticus' sister.

I thought him unreasonably offended, I wrote to him in such a manner as might soothe a brother, and admonish one who was my junior, and reprove one who was in the wrong. And by the letters which I have since frequently received from him, I trust that all is again as it ought to be, and as we wish. With regard to my writing, you accuse me without reason: for Pomponia has never acquainted me with any opportunity of sending a letter; neither has it happened to me to know of anybody that was going to Epirus, nor had I even heard that you were yet at Athens. As soon as I came to Rome after your departure, I despatched the business of Acutius, which you had intrusted to me, but it turned out that there was no need of exertion; and being persuaded of the sufficiency of your own judgment, I chose that Pedueus, rather than I, should give you an opinion by letter. For after having several days heard what Acutius had to say (with whose manner of prosing I presume you are acquainted), I should hardly have thought much of writing to you upon the subject of his complaint, when I had not scrupled (which was no pleasant task) to listen to them. But while you accuse me, remember that I have received but one letter from you; though you have had so much leisure for writing, and so many more opportunities of sending your letters. When you tell me that if anybody were offended with you, it was my business to appease him; mind what you say: I have not neglected that also. But he is strangely irritated. I have not, however, omitted anything that was to be said on your part. But how far it was to be urged, I thought it best to be determined by your wishes; which, if you will only let me know, you shall find that I have not chosen to be more forward than you would be yourself, nor shall I be more remiss than you may desire. Tadius has informed me respecting his affair, that you had written as if there was now no occasion to be uneasy, because the inheritance was secured by prescription. I was surprised you should not have known, that in a legal guardianship, under which the girl is said to be placed, no prescription can be established. I am glad you are pleased with your purchase in Epirus. I should wish, as you mention, that, as far as you can without inconvenience, you would attend to the commission I gave you; and in such a manner as you may judge suitable to my Tuscan villa. For, after all my troubles and fatigues, it is there I find repose, where I am now daily expecting my brother. Terentia is affected with severe pains in the joints; she has a great regard for you, and your sister, and mother, and wishes your best health, as does my darling Tullia. Take care of yourself, and continue to love me, and believe me to love you as a brother.

LETTER II.

(Græc. vi.)

I will hereafter give you no occasion of charging me with neglect of writing. Do you only take care that, in your abundant leisure, you are even with me. Rubrius's house at Naples, which you had already measured and completed in your mind, has been purchased by M. Fonteius for 130,000 sestertii (£1085). I wished you to be acquainted with this, in case it should any way affect your plans. My brother Quintus seems to be disposed towards Pomponia, as we could wish, and is now with her at his estate near Arpinum, where he has with him D. Turranius, a man of excellent acquisitions. My father died the 24th of November. This is the sum of what I had to say to you. If you should be able to meet with any ornaments of the gymnastic kind, which would suit that place which you know, I should be glad if you would secure them for me. I am so charmed with my Tuscan villa that I feel then only satisfied with myself when I get there. Let me know all that you do, and all that you intend to do.

LETTER III.

(Græc. vii.)

All is well with your mother, for whom I entertain a great regard. I have engaged to pay L. Cincius 20,400 sestertii (£170) on the 13th of February. I should be glad if you would take care to let me have the things you have purchased and provided for me as soon as possible. And I wish you a 100,000, each additional pair of marks increasing the number tenfold.

The same letters H.S. likewise are used to denote sestertia, to which the figures X, &c. being added, seem to signify not only "doents," &c., but more commonly "decies," &c. The denominator being 100 times the value of the corresponding adjective.

The following table exhibits at one view the denominations of the sestertia, and the corresponding value in English money.

In this and other parts of this translation I have retained the Latin terms of sestertii and sesterces, because different interpreters might estimate them differently; at the same time, for the convenience of the English reader, I have subjoined what I suppose to be the amount in pounds sterling. The expression H.S. (((())) XXX.) is generally agreed to mean 130,000, in which case the first characters (signifying 100,000) are to be understood of sesterces, while the tens imply 30 sestertii, each containing 1000 sestertii. And these different characters are usually so applied. Thus H.S. (((()) ())) CCCC, and H.S. X X X X, which we find in the 3d and 4th letters of this book, are equally expressive of 20,400, the former being sesterces; the decimal part of the number, sestertii. The value of Roman money is deduced from the actual value of the denarius, which is to be met with in all collections, and is worth about eightpence English. Hence it follows that the sesterces (two asses and a half, or a quarter of the denarius) is equivalent to two pence, and a thousand sesterces to 6s. 8d.

In order to reduce the sesterces to English pounds, it is only necessary to divide by 120. The characters expressive of their number are usually (1) 1000, ((1)) 10,000, (((1))) 100,000.
you would consider, as you promised, how you can complete my library. All hope of the pleasure to which I look forward when I shall have come into retirement, is placed in you.

LETTER IV.
(Graev. viii.)

EVERYTHING is as we could wish at your house. Your mother and sister are held in the greatest esteem by me and my brother Quintus. I have had some conversation with Aventiulus. He denies that anything had been written to him by his agent, and is surprised that any dispute should have arisen. The security which he demanded is no longer required from you. I have understood that Tadius is very thankful, and highly pleased with what you mention of having compromised the affair of his family. That friend of mine, who is indeed a good man, and very friendly to me, is seriously angry with you. When I know how much you regard this, I may be able to judge what pains I should take in it. I have provided for L. Cincius 20,400 sestertii (£170) for the Megaric statues. The Mercuries of your Pentelic marbles with bronze heads, about which you wrote to me, already delight me exceedingly; and I should be glad if you would send them, and the other statues, and whatever else you may judge suitable to the place, and to my studies, and to your taste, as many, and as soon as possible; especially what you think proper for my gymnasia and portico; for I am transported with such a fondness for these sorts of things, that while I request you to assist me, I must expect others to blame me. If Lentulus's ship is not ready, let the things be embarked in any other you please. My darling Tulliola is anxious for your present, and calls upon me as a surety; but it is safer for me to swear off than to pay.

LETTER V.
(Graev. ix.)

I hear from you too seldom, though you can much easier find people going to Rome than I can to Athens; and you may be more sure of my being at Rome than I can of your being at Athens. This letter is therefore the shorter, owing to my uncertainty; for, being doubtful where you might be, I was unwilling that this our familiar conversation should fall into strange hands.

I am anxiously expecting the Megaric statues and Mercuries about which you wrote to me. Whatever of the same kind you may have, which you think fit for my Academy, do not hesitate to send it, and trust to my purse. These sort of things are my delight. I particularly want such as are most suitable to my gymnasia. Lentulus promises the use of his ships. I request your diligent attention to these matters. Chilias asks you (and I too at his desire) for an account of the national customs of the Eumolpidiæ.

LETTER VI.
(Graev. x.)

While I was in my Tusculanum (this is in return for that of yours—"While I was in the Ceramicus"); however, while I was there, a servant sent by your sister from Rome gave me the letter which had been brought from you, and said that he was to set out the same afternoon on his return. Hence it is that I determined to write something to you in your letter, and am more pulled by the shortness of the time to write but a few lines. In the first place, I will engage to apose, or even fully to reconcile our friends; which although I did before in some measure, of my own accord, yet I will now set about it with more earnestness, and will urge him more strongly since I perceive by your letter how great a stress you lay upon it. But I would have you understand that he is very deeply offended. Still, as I see no serious cause for it, I have great confidence that he will be pleased by a sense of what is right, and by my authority.

I should be glad to have my statues and Hermæsæ embarked as soon as you have an opportunity, and anything else you may find proper for the place you know; especially what you think suitable to my palestra and gymnasia. For I am sitting there while I write, so that the place itself reminds me. I commission you besides to procure some more of the palaestra. I will also introduce into the ceiling of the ante-room; and two figured puteæ take care that you do not engage your library to anybody, however eager a lover of such things you may meet with, for I reserve all my gatherings for the service of the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens, to the which he is avouch'd to have added a pompsa. While I continued my residence at Tusculum, Pompeianum, & c., signifying his house near Tusculum and Pompeii.

* Luciæus, sec. 7 of this book.

* It is not obvious to conceive how the two figures of Mercury and Hercules, or Minerva, indicated by the terms Hermæsæ and Hermathena, could be combined in one statue. May it have been a stone casse mounted with a head of Mercury, and containing an image of Hercules or Minerva? Such are described by Plato in his lescope, 7. 1. Aulidæus compares Socrates to "those figures of Silenus in the sculptors' shops which open in the middle, and exhibit images of the gods," tos seîkriûs toûos ev toû ègracourèos kathèmònos—ü bîka èiôkriôs

1 Petasus sigillatus. These are usually supposed to have been the tops of wells, resembling some marbles still found among the ruins of ancient Italy. But it does not seem very probable that wells should be made a subject of ornament, and the real design of these marbles is not clearly made out. Perhaps they should be written petaluses, as it is in some editions, signifying "sculptured cases," to hold manuscripts or other library apparatus.
the purpose of providing that resource for my old age.

Respecting my brother, I trust that things are as I have always wished, and have studied to make them. There are many reasons to believe it, and not the least is, that your sister is pregnant.

As to what regards my comitia, I both remember that I excused you, and have long since declared this to our common friends who are expecting you. I shall not only not summon you, but shall forbid you. For I know that it is of much greater importance to you, that you should do what is to be done at that time, than it is to me that you should be present at the comitia. Therefore I would have you make your mind, as if it were on my business that you were sent into that country. And you will find me towards you, and hear of me, in case of any success, as if it were gained, not only in your presence, but by your means. Tulliola appoints you a day: she calls upon your surety.

LETTER VII.
(Grav. xi.)

I acted first of my own accord, and have since been much excited by your two letters written to the same purpose. In addition to which, Sallustius has been constantly exhorting me to do my utmost with Lucceius towards restoring your ancient friendship. But after all I could do, I have not only not been able to recover that good-will which he used to bear you, but not even to elicit the cause of his altered disposition. Although he speaks of that arbitration of his, and the things which before you left us I understood had given him offence, yet there is something that has sunk deeper in his mind, which neither your letters nor my assurance can so easily erase, as you can remove it in person, not only by conversation, but by your own familiar countenance; if only you think it worthwhile, which you certainly will if you take my advice, and act consistently with your natural kindness. You must not be surprised, if I before signified to you by letter that I hoped to find him tractable, and now appear to distrust. But it is incredible how determined his mind seems to be, and fixed in this angry mood. But this will either be set right when you arrive, or will make him very uneasy, whichever is in fault.

As to what you say in your letter, that you suppose I am already elected, you must know that nothing at Rome is so vexatious as the iniquitous proceedings against the candidates; nor is it known when the comitia will take place. But you will hear all about this from Philadelphia. I should be glad if you would send as soon as possible what you have got for my academy. Not only the actual enjoyment, but the very thought of that place delights me wonderfully. Remember not to give up your books to anybody; but keep them, as you say, for me. I entertain the strongest affection for them, as I do now disgust for everything else; for it is not to be believed in how short a time how much worse you will find things than you left them.

LETTER VIII.
(Grav. iii.)

Know that your grandmother is dead from want of you, and from fear lest the states of Latium should not be steady in their duty, and should fail to bring the victims to Mount Albanus. I imagine L. Saepeius will send to console you upon this event. We are expecting you here in January, either from common report, or from what you may have written to others; for to me you have written nothing about it. The statues which you have procured for me are landed at Cainta. I have not seen them; for it has not been in my power to leave Rome. I have sent a person to pay the freight. I am much obliged to you for having managed this so well, and so reasonably.

As to what you have repeatedly said about appeasing our friend, I have done and tried everything; but his mind is wonderfully estranged on account of certain suspicions, which, though I imagine you have heard, yet, when you arrive, you shall know from me. Sallustius, who is here, I have not been able to restore to the place he held in his affection. I mention this to you, because he used to accuse me on your account; but he has found by his own case that he is very inexorable, and that my attention to you has not been deficient. I have engaged my dear Tullia in marriage to C. Piso, son of Lucius Frugi.

LETTER IX.
(Grav. iv.)

You raise in us perpetual expectations of your arrival. Lately, when I supposed you to be coming, we were suddenly put off till July. Now, however, I imagine, as far as you can do it with convenience, you will really come at the time you mention. You will thus be at my brother Quintus’s comitia; we shall meet again after a long interval; and you will be able to conclude the business of Acutius. For this purpose Pædæces

By this expression Cicero gently reproaches his friend on account of his long absence.

It must be supposed that this relates to some scruples and apprehensions which this old lady had expressed, and which may probably have been a subject of jest between the two friends. The ceremonies alluded to are those of the Latin festival, which used to be celebrated every year in memory of the union of the different neighbouring states of Latium. By the word Latinæ I understand gentes, or civitates, not mulieres; for it does not appear that women had any part to perform there.

This L. Saepeius appears to have been a philosopher of the Epicurean sect, who placed their chief happiness in their case. It is upon thisdepands the smartness of Cicero’s observation, writing to one of the same persuasion.

Quintus Cicero was a candidate for the office of ediles at the ensuing comitia.

It is uncertain what this business was. It is spoken of in the first letter of this book.

has also requested me to write to you; for we are of opinion that it is desirable you should at length bring this affair to a conclusion. My intercession is, and has long been, prepared.

I have concluded the business of C. Macer with great and distinguished applause. And while I have done him every justice, have yet derived much greater advantage from the approbation of the people, upon his condemnation, than I could have done from any return on his part, had he been acquitted.

As to what you write to me about the Herma-thena, it is exceedingly grateful to me, and an ornament proper for my academy; Mercury being the common emblem of all schools, and Minerva the particular one of that school. I should be glad therefore, as you say, to have you contribute as many other things as possible to the embellishment of that place. The statues you before sent me
I have not yet seen; they are at Formium, which I am now intending to go. I shall transport all those things to Tusculum. Should I ever begin to over-flow, I will decorate Caleta. Keep your books, and do not despair of my being able to make them mine; which if I accomplish, I shall exceed Crassus in riches, and look down with contempt upon the houses and lands of all the world.

LETTER X.

(Grev. 1.)

Of my canvas, in which I know you take a lively interest, this is the state, as far as can yet be foreseen. P. Galba alone is beginning to solicit votes; he is refused without ceremony or disguise. People think that this premature canvassing is not unfavourable to my cause, for he very generally meets with denials under pretence of persons being under obligation to me. So I hope I may derive some advantage from it, as by this means the opinion spreads of my having many supporters. I had intended to begin canvassing in the Campus Martius, at the comitia for electing tribunes, the 17th of July, at the very time when I understood from Cicero that your servant was to set out with this letter. My competitors, which seem to be perhaps certain, are Galba, and Antonius, and Q. Cornolius. I imagine you will either smile or grieve at this. To enrage you quite, there are some who even think of Cæsnius. I do not apprehend Aquillius will offer; for he denies it, and has sworn that he is ill, and has objected his judicial supremacy. Catilina will be a certain competitor, if it be determined that the sum does not shine at midday. I imagine you do not expect me to take notice of Anidius and Palicanus.

Of those who are in nomination for this next year, Cæsar is thought secure. The contest is supposed to lie between Thermus and Silanus, who are so poor in friends and in reputation, that it seems to me not impossible to bring in Cærius; but this opinion is peculiar to myself. It appears most conducive to my cause that Thermus should be returned with Cæsar; for of those who are not the present candidates, there is nobody who seems likely to be a more powerful opponent, if he should withstand into my year; because he has the charge of the Flaminian road, which will easily be compiled by that time. I should therefore gladly see him now Caesar’s colleague.

Such is the opinion hitherto formed of the candidates. I shall take care to use the greatest dis-lance in executing every part of a candidate’s duty; and possibly, since the Cisalpine Gaul has considerable weight in voting, when the forum at Rome is a little cooled from its judicial causes, I may run down in September, as a lieutenant to Piso, so as to be back in January. When I shall clearly have discovered the disposition of the nobles, I will write to you. The rest I hope will go smoothly, with only the present city competitors. Take care to engage for me, since you are nearer to them, that the troop of our friends may not fall short.
I shall not be angry with him, if he does not come to my election. So much for this business.

But there is one subject on which I am very anxious to have your forgiveness. Your uncle Cæcilius, having been defrauded of a considerable sum of money by P. Varus, commenced an action against his brother Cælius Satrius for the property, which he said he had received from Varus by a fraudulently made transfer. Other creditors were parties in the same action; amongst whom was Lucullus, and P. Scipio, and L. Pontius, who they supposed would be appointed administrators, if the goods were sold. But it is absurd now to speak of an administrator, Cæcilius requested me to support him against Satrius. Now, there is scarcely a day that this Satrius does not come to my house.
His first attention is to L. Domitius; his next to me. He was of great service to me, and my brother Cælius had canvas with him. I am very truly embrassed, both as to the action against Satrius, and with Domitius, on whom, above all, my present success depends. I explained this to Cæcilius, and at the same time assured him, that if the dispute lay between them two alone, I would comply with his wishes; but that now, in the general cause of all the creditors (people especially of the first administration, who, without Cæcilius’s appointing anybody in his own name, could easily maintain their common cause) it was reasonable that he should consider the obligations and circumstances under which I lie. He seemed to receive this more happily than I could wish, or at least gentlemen use do; and afterwards he entirely brake off the intercourse between us, which had been a few days

1 This Cæsar was Lucilius Julius Cæsar, a distant relation of the "mighty Julia."
2 There is evidently some error in the text. I have no idea what appears to be the sense intended.
3 Cæsius is the ancient name for Lambardy; those who had passed through the first magistracies in the towns south of the Po, had a right of voting in the assembly of the Roman people.
4 These lieutenancies appear to have been fictitious offices, under the plea of which the senators of Rome had visited the provinces with a certain degree of authority.

established. I have to beg that you will not take this ill of me, but will consider that I was prevented by common humanity from coming forward in the time of his distress against the high reputation of a friend who had exerted all his efforts and kind offices to serve me. Or if you are disposed to pass a harsh sentence upon me, you will suppose it was my ambitious views that stood in the way. But I think, even if it were so, that I should still deserve to be forgiven, considering that this occasion is no trifling one. For you see in what progress we are, and how important it is not only to retain, but to acquire the good-will of all people. I hope I have proved my case; I certainly wish it.

Your Herthaenus delights me exceedingly; and it is so well placed, that the whole gymnasion derives a lustre from it, as from the sun. You have my best affections.

LETTER XI.

(Grav. ii.)

In the consulat of L. Julius Caesar and C. Marcus Figulus, know that I have a son born, and that Terentia is going on well. No letter from you after so long a time? I before sent you a particular account of the state of my interests. I am at present thinking to undertake the defence of my competitor Catilina. The judges are such as we could wish, and with the full consent of the accuser. I hope, if he should be acquitted, to have him the more friendly in the business of my canvass. Should it fail out otherwise, we must bear it with patience. I have great need of your speedy arrival; for it is the general opinion that some noble persons of your acquaintance will oppose my success. I foresee that you can be of the greatest use in conciliating their good will towards me; therefore do not fail to be at Rome in January, as you have appointed.

LETTER XII.

That Trojan woman is a slow business; nor did Cornelius afterwards return to Terentia. I think we must have recourse to Considius, Anius, Selicus; for the nearest relations cannot extract money from Caspar at less than twelve per cent. But, to return to my first subject: I have known nothing more shameless, more cunning, more sluggish, than her. I have given directions to Titus mere pre-texts and delays! But it may be that fortune orders things better than we ourselves; for Pompeius's forerunners tell me that he will openly propose that Antonius should be superseded; and at the same time the pretor will bring it before the people. It is an affair of that kind, that I cannot honourably defend; the man with the good esteem either of the respectable part of society, or of the populace, nor do I choose to do it, which is most of all; for a circumstance has occurred, which I send to you entire, that you may see the nature of it. I have a freed-man, a good-for-nothing fellow, Hilarus I mean, the acountant, and a client of yours. Of him Valerius the interpreter relates the following account, and Chilus writes me word that he has heard the same; that this fellow is with Antonius, and that Antonius, in making his exactions, gives out that a part is demanded for me, and that this freed-man is sent by me to look after the common plunder. I am not a little disturbed, though I can hardly believe it; but there has certainly been some conversation to this effect. Pray investigate the whole: inquire, learn, and, if you can by any means, remove the scoundrel from those parts. Valerius mentioned Cnæus Tullius. The person thus designated is universally agreed to be that C. Antonius who had been colleague with Cicero in the consulship, and whom Cicero had gained by voluntary resigned to him the valuable province of Macedonia, to which Cicero would otherwise have been appointed upon going out of office. Various conjectures have been formed about the term here applied to him, which shows it probably relates to some understanding between Cicero and Atticus, must ever remain obscure. It seems to be a contemptuous expression, used in imitation of the Greek feminicæ, which were sometimes applied to men, and which Pope has thus rendered in his Homer—

O, women of Achæa, men no more.

So afterwards (letter 14 of this book) we find Cicero using the term "Alisea Curiumia," meaning the effeminate son of Curio."
Plancius as his authority for this report. I earnestly beg you will see what all this is. It appears that Pompeius is very friendly to me; his divorce of Mucia\(^w\) is much approved. I imagine you have heard that P. Clodius, the son of Appius, was detected in women's clothes at the house of Caius Cæsar, while the religious ceremonies for the people\(^x\) were going on, and that he was saved, and conducted out by the hands of a servant-girl; that it is an affair of great scandal, which I know you will be sorry for. I have nothing more to tell you. And in truth I have been a good deal distressed, for Scipio, my reader, a pleasant youth, is lately dead, which has disturbed me more than the death of a slave ought to have done. I hope you will often write to me: if you have nothing to say, say what comes uppermost. The first of January, in the consulship of M. Messala and M. Piso\(^y\).

LETTER XIII.

I HAVE now received three letters from you, one through M. Cornelius, which I imagine you delivered to him at the Tres Tabernæ\(^z\); another, which your Canusian\(^a\) host brought me; the third, which as you mention you gave from the vessel after the anchor was weighed; which were all letters of a master: they speak in a chaste style, are interspersed with pleasant humors, and distinguished by marks of affection. These letters might well excite me to write in return; but I have been the more dilatory from want of a trustworthy messenger; for how few are there who can carry a letter of any weight, without lightening it by a perusal\(^b\)! Besides this I do not always know when any one goes to Epirus; and I conceive that, having slain your victims before Amalthaea\(^c\), you would immediately go to lay siege to Sicyon. Nor am I by any means certain when you go to Antonius, or how long you mean to stay in Epirus; so that I do not care to trust letters of a confidential kind either to Greeks\(^d\) or to Epirots. Since your departure some things have occurred deserving of notice, but not to be exposed to the risk of my letter's being either lost, or opened, or intercepted.

You must know then in the first place, that I was not the first called upon for my opinion\(^e\), and that the peace-maker of the Allobroges\(^f\) was put before me, which was done amidst the murmurs of the senate, but without any reluctance on my part; for I am thus freed from all obligation towards a perverse man\(^g\); and at liberty to maintain my own dignity in the state, in spite of his wishes. This second place of delivering my sentiments, carries with it nearly the same authority as the first, while it leaves the judgment unfettered by any obligation towards the consul. The third is Catullus; the fourth (if you wish to know that too) Hortensius. But the counsel himself is of a narrow and poor spirit, an ill-natured snarer of that sort which even without railiery is laughed at; ridiculous rather from his features, than his wit\(^h\): concuring in nothing with the state; separated from all the principal people; from whose one can expect no good to the state, because he wishes it no good; and from whom one need fear no harm, because he dares not commit it. His colleague\(^i\) is very attentive to me, and a follower and supporter of the better parties. There is besides some little disagreement between them: but I fear lest that which is diseased in the state may spread further; for I suppose you have heard that, while the sacred ceremonies for the people were performing at Cæsar's house, a man came there in female dress; and when the vestal virgins had received the sacrifice, mention was made of it in the senate by Q. Cornificius. He was the first, that you may not suspect any of us. Afterwards the affair was, by a decree of the senate, referred to the pontiffs, and it was determined by them to be sacrilegious. The consul then, by another decree of the senate, published an indictment, and Cæsar sent his wife a bill of divorce. In this cause Piso, induced by his friendship with P. Clodius, uses his divided into two provinces of Achæia and Macedonia, of which the latter included the whole of Greece proper. It appears from Cicero, [letters 4, 5, &c.] that Sert. Sulpicius, as governor of Achæia, had jurisdiction over the Peloponnesus, Attica, Boeotia, Thessaly, and Epirus: therefore Plinius calls it "Achæia, Iliam verum et meram Graeciam." And Paulus says, καλον εις την Αττικην ζητησεν την εις την Αχαιαν (Lib. vii.) And this extended sense is to be given to the word 'Achæia', when it occurs in the New Testament, as in Acts xvii. 12; and again, ch. xii. 21; also, I Cor. xvii. 16.

\(^{a}\) It seems to me to be the same word, used for the consul, upon first entering into office, to call upon the consular senators for their opinion in what order he thought proper; which order was observed during the remainder of the year.

\(^{b}\) By this expression is to be understood Calus Piso, who had presided over the province of Gallia Narbonensis, in which the Allobroges dwelt.

\(^{c}\) Marcus Piso, a relation of the former, and one of the new consuls.

\(^{d}\) In the original there is a play upon the words, facies and factidem, it is impossible to preserve in the translation, so neither would it be desirable, unless for the purpose of exhibiting a juster character of Cicero's manner towards his intimate friend.

\(^{y}\) Marcus.
endevours that this indictment, which he himself prefers, and prefers by order of the senate, and for the sake of religion, may be set aside. Messala is hitherto very strenuous for measures of severity. Good men are kept away by the treaties of Clodius; ruffians are provided; and I myself, who had been a very Lycurgus at the beginning, am daily softened down. Cato is instant and urgent. In short, I am afraid lest these matters, neglected by the good, and supported by the wicked, may be the occasion of serious evils to the republic. But that friend of yours (you know who I mean); about whom you wrote to me, that when he no longer dared to find fault, he began to commend) makes a show of great regard for me; salutes me, loves me, openly praises me; secretly, yet so that it is sufficiently manifest, he envies me: there is nothing kind in him, nothing candid, nothing disinterested in his politics, nothing illus- trious, nothing brave, nothing liberal. But these things I will detail to you more particularly some other time; for they are not yet sufficiently known to me; nor do I care to intrust to this fellow, of whom I know nothing, a letter about things of such importance. The praetors have not yet had their provinces allotted them; the business is in the same state in which you left it 14. The geographical position of Maceanum and Puteoli, which you require, shall have a place in my speech. I had observed that the date of the third of December was wrong. The parts of my speeches which you commend, I assure you pleased me very much; though I did not before venture to say so. But now that they have your approbation, they appear to me more truly Attic. I have added something to the speech against Metellus 15. The book shall be sent to you, since your kind regard for me has given you a taste for oratorical writings. What news shall I send you? what? The consul Messala has hought Anthonius’s house for 437 sesterces 16 (£33,600.) What is that to me? you will say; only that in comparison with this purchase, I must be judged to have laid out my money prudently; and people have begun to understand that, in buying, it is very allowable to use the assistance of one’s friends, in order to attain the requisites of the business. That Trojan woman is a slow business; but, how- ever, there is some hope. Do you bring these matters to a conclusion. You may expect to hear from me again with more freedom. January 27, in the consulship of M. Messala and M. Piso.

LETTER XIV.

1 I am afraid you will be tired of hearing how much I am engaged; but in truth I have been so busy, that I have scarcely had time for this short letter, and that has been snatched from important occupations. As I mentioned in a former letter Pompeius’s first harangue; that was acceptable to the poor, that it appeared spiritless to the wicked, unsatisfactory to the rich, undignified to the good; in short, it was a cold performance. Afterwards, at the instigation of the consul Flaccus, that inconsiderate tribune Pufius brought Pompeius forth to the assembly of the people. The business was conducted in the Flaminius Circus, and the same day, in that very place, was a fair held. He inquired of him whether he approved of the judges being chosen by the prator in the affair of Clodi- us’s sacrilege; which judges the same prator was to use as his council; as it had already been appointed by the senate. Upon which Pompeius spoke quite aristocratically; replying, that the authority of the senate on all occasions had now, and always, the greatest weight with him; and this he professed at great length. Afterwards the consul Messala inquired of Pompeius in the senate, what he thought of the proposal to pass this act; what of the indictment announced. He spoke in such a manner in the senate as to commend generally all the acts of that body; and said to me, as he sat by me, that he thought his answer contained a suffi- cient reply to the questions proposed to him. Crassus, perceiving that it gained him applause to have it supposed that he was pleased with my consu- late, rose up, and spoke of my consulate in the handsomest manner, saying, that he owed it to me that he was a senator, that he enjoyed his freedom and his life; that as often as he saw his wife, his home, his country, so often he saw blessings de- rived from me: in short, all those topics of fire and sword, which I used variously to represent in my speeches (you, who are my Aristarchus and critic, know those repositories of ornaments), he interwove with great effect. I was sitting next Pompeius, and observed him to be moved; whether it was that Crassus should have gained the applause which he had missed, or that my deeds should be so esteemed as to obtain the ready con- currence of the senate to the praises bestowed upon them, especially by one who owed it me the less, because, in all my letters in commendation of Pompeius, he had been lightly spoken of. This day much attached me to Crassus: and whatever was given covertly, I willingly acknowledged from him openly. But as for myself, ye gods! how I exulted before my new hearer, Pompeius! If periods and inflections, if deductions and arguments, ever availed me, it was then: in short, there were gen- eral cheers: for the subject was, of the dignity

1 On Pompeius is probably the person here intended.
2 Q. Cicero had been one of the prators, which made this circumstance of some interest both to Cicero and to Atticus, the one his brother, the other his brother-in-law.
3 The Attic manner in this speech, and in some other parts of Cicero’s letters, was always considered as the most perfect model.
4 The tribune Metellus had been active in opposing Cicero, charging him with having put citizens to death without a trial.
5 If the text be correct, the amount in English money would be about 36,402.
6 But there is great reason to suspect some error, as may easily be made in transcribing figures; for Cicero mentions this purchase as a justification of the conduct in borrowing money for a house in Rome, for which it appears by his Familiar Letters that he gave 3,600 sesterces, or near 30,000l. [Ep. Fam. v. 6.] It seems probable, therefore, that instead of CXXCCXXVII it ought to be written either (I) (I) (I) XXXVII, which would be equivalent to 33,644l., or XXXVII (triges septies, 370) equivalent to 30,632l.
7 This passage is illustrated by reference to the 39th chapter of the first book of the Offices, where Cicero speaks of the respect attended to a person’s residence,—adhibenda commodissima dignitasque diligentissima.
of the senate, the unanimity of the knights, the consent of all Italy, the expiring remains of the conspiracy, of plenty and peace. You know my powers on such materials; they were so exerted, that I am the more brief, because I imagine that they must have been heard even as far as you.

But this is the state of affairs at Rome. The sonorous, the Augustus: nothing must be more firm, nothing more upright, nothing more strenuous; for when the day was come for bringing forward the impeachment, according to the decree of the senate, there were collected youths scarcely bearded, the whole herd of Catiline, with the effeminate son of Curio at their head, demanding of the people to set aside the impeachment. Even Piso, the consul, who had proposed it, was now exerting himself against it. The Clodian mob had got possession of the passages; and voting papers were furnished so, that none might be given signifying assent. Here then Cato rushes to the rostra, and utters a most severe reproach on the consul Piso, if that can be called reproach, which is full of dignity, full of authority, full of wholesome counsel. Our friend Hortensius follows to the same purpose, and many other good men; but the assistance of Favonius was particularly distinguished. In this concourse of principal persons the assembly is dismissed; the senate is convoked; when it was decreed, in a full house, (while Piso was contending against it, and Clodius was entreaty at the feet of each individual,) that the consuls should use their authority with the people to admit the impeachment. Fifteen voted with Curio against passing the decree; on the other side were at least four hundred. The thing was concluded. Fufius, the tribune, then gave way, Clodius made some pitiful addresses, in which he treated Hortensius, C. Piso, and the consul Mesala, with great disrespect; he only charged with having found out every thing. The senate determined that nothing should be done respecting the provinces of the praetors, the embassies, and other business, till the impeachment should have been brought forward. Here you have the history of the Roman affairs. But yet I must tell you also what I had not hoped for: the consul Mesala is excellent, brave, firm, diligent, and extols, loves, and imitates me; the other is by one fault the less faulty; in that he is indolent, sleepy, inexpert, incapable of business; but in will so ill-disposed, that he began to hate Pompeius even after that meeting in which he praised the senate. He has therefore wonderfully alienated from him all the best people; nor is he induced to act thus more by friendship towards Clodius, than by a love of ruinous and factious measures. But he has nobody among the magistrates like him. With the exception of Fufius, we enjoy a good set of tribunes; and Cornutus is another Cato. But now, to return to private matters, the Trojan woman has made good her promises. Do you accomplish the commissions which you have undertaken. My brother Quintus, who has purchased the remaining three quarters of the Argiletan building for 735 sestertii (3000l.), is desirous of selling his Tuscanum, in order to buy, if he can, Paullus's house. I want you to be reconciled to Licinius. I seem very likely to do it, and will lend my assistance. Let me know exactly what you are doing, where you are, and how things are going on. The 13th of February.

LETTER XV.

You have heard that the province of Asia has fallen to my dear brother Quintus; for I doubt not but common report has brought you this intelligence swifter than any friend's letter. Now, as you know I have always been very greedy of praise; and am, and am esteemed, beyond all men attached to the Greeks; and have incurred much obloquy and enmity in the cause of the republic; do you therefore "call to mind all your prowess," and by your management contrive that I may be praised and loved by everybody. Upon this subject I will write more to you in the letter I shall send by Quintus himself. I should be glad if you would let me know what you have done about my commissions: and what, also, about your own business; for since your departure from Brundisium, no letters from you have been delivered to me. I want much to know how you do. March 15.

LETTER XVI.

You ask me what happened at the trial, that the issue should have been so contrary to all expectations; and at the same time you desire to know how it happened that I battled less than usual. I shall answer you the last first, like Homer. For, as long as the authority of the senate required my support, I fought with such eagerness and vehemence, as to excite shouts and acclamations greatly to my honour. And if ever you thought me strenuous in the public cause, you would certainly have admired me upon that occasion; for when he had recourse to his declamations, and in them used my name invidiously, ye immortal gods! what fighting, what execution did I exhibit! What attacks did I make upon Piso, upon Curio—upon the whole crew! How did I assail the levity of the

2 The provincial Asia was situated in the western part of Asia Minor. Generally speaking, Asia Minor was called Asia.

3 The original is taken from a verse of Homer. Cicero means to request that Atticus, who was invited to be lieutenant to Quintus, would exert himself to render the Greeks of Asia Minor favourable to him; and that he should do so, he offers three reasons: 1st, that he was fond of praise from all men; 2ndly, that he had himself always shown a partiality towards the Greeks; and 3rdly, because he was apprehensive lest the enemies he had made by his vigorous conduct in his consularship might endeavour to injure his reputation abroad. Atticus, however, refused to accept the appointment of lieutenant.

4 Homer begins his llas near the conclusion of the Trojan war, and afterwards introduces an account of the earlier part.

old, the wantonness of the young! Often did I want you, so help me gods! not only as an adviser of my plans, but as a witness of my extraordinary exertions. But after Hortensius had devised that the tribune Fufius should bring in the law respecting the sacrilege (in which there was no other difference from the consular indictment, excepting in the condition of the judges; though in that was everything), and was earnest that it might be so done; having persuaded himself, and others, that no judges could absolve him, I contracted my sails, knowing well the inefficiency of such judges, and I said nothing in my evidence but what was so well known and attested that I could not omit it. If, therefore, you ask me the reason of the acquittal (to revert now to your first question), it was the neediness and baseness of the judges; and that it should so happen was occasioned by Hortensius's proposal; who, fearing lest Fufius's intercession might put a stop to the progress of the law, as decreed by the senate, did not perceive that it was better to have him left in disgrace and ignominy, than to intrust an unsound court of judgment. But prompted by his hatred, he hastened to bring the matter to a trial, saying, that even before a leaden sword he must needs fall. But if you ask what were the circumstances of this judgment which had so incredible an issue, I answer, such that the counsel of Hortensius, which now from the event is censured by others, was by me censured from the very beginning. For as the rejection of a judge is made with the greatest applause, when the prosecutor, like an upright censor, rejects persons of bad character, and the defendant, like a kind master of gladiators, selects the most temperate; here, on the contrary, as soon as the judges sat down together, all honest men began to have sad misgivings; for a baser set never met together in a common gaming-house: senators of stained reputation, ruined knights, and tribunes, not debtors, so much as receivers. There were, however, a few honest men among them, whom he could not remove by rejection, who sat downcast and mournful among people most unlike to themselves, and seemed afraid of being infected by the contagion of their infamy. Here, as each charge was submitted to this council, in the first inquiries, there appeared a surprising sea without any difference of opinion: the defendent had obtained nothing; more was even granted to the prosecutor than he asked Hortensius, in short, was exulting that he should have managed so well. There was nobody who did not think him guilty, and a thousand times condemned. Upon my being brought forwards as a witness, I imagine you will have heard from the acclamation even of Clodius's advocates, what rage of the judges took place, how they surrounded me, how they exposed their throats to P. Clodius for my security: which I consider a much greater honour than that which was shown to Xenocrates, whom your countrymen prevented from swearing when he gave his testimony: or that of our judges, who refused to look at the accounts of Metellus Numidicus, when they were brought round as usual. What was done to me, I say, is much greater. So that by the voice of his judges, when I was so defended by them as the safeguard of all the country, the culprit was convicted, and all his supporters shrunk at once; and the next day the same concourse came about me as had conducted me home on resigning the consuls. The noble Areopagites cried out that they would not come forward unless a guard was appointed. It was submitted to the council: one voice alone was against having a guard. The affair was brought before the senate: it was decreed with great dignity and liberality; the judges were condemned; the business was intrusted to the magistrates: nobody thought the man would make any reply. Say now, ye Muses, how the fire was first kindled. You know Baldhead, him of the Nannest estates, that panegyrist of mine, whose speech I mentioned to you so full of my praise. In two days he accomplished the whole business by means of a single slave, and him taken from the school of the gladiators. He sent for the judges to come to him; he promised, he entreated, he bribed. Nay, more, O ye gods! such a profili

* The judges of ancient Rome corresponded to our jury rather than to our judges, and determined the fact, not the law. Their number varied at different times.

7 The foregoing sentence has been differently, but I think wrongly, understood by commentators.

8 I infer from what I have heard, they were bribed and bribed. The sense is rendered in some measure obscure for the sake of the poor antithesis of arsat et ararat.
this wound which has been inflicted on the state: for they fully thought, when religion and modesty, when the faith of judgments, and the authority of the senate had fallen, that such wickedness and licentiousness, being openly victorious, would exact of every honest man vengeance for the pain which every villain had suffered by the severity of my consulship. And I, that same person (for I need not fear the reproach of vain-gloriousness in speaking of myself to you, especially in a letter which I wish nobody else to read), myself, I say, have refuted the dowering spirits of good men, encouraging and rousing every one: and by persecuting and harassing these corrupt judges, I have snatched all insolence from all the supporters and favourers of that victory. I have never suffered the consul Piso to beat peace in anything: I have taken away from the man the province of Syria, already promised him; I have recalled the senate to its former severity, and have roused it from its despondence. Clodius I have crushed when he was present in the senate; both by a continued speech full of dignity and by a declaration, of which you may taste a few specimens; for the rest can neither baffle your force nor elegance, from want of that spirit of contention which you Greeks call ἐργασία. After when we met in the senate on the 15th of May, being called upon for my opinion, I entered at length upon the general state of the republic, and seemed to be inspired when I brought in that head of my discourse—"that the conscript fathers', on the receipt of a single wound, should not be dejected, should not faint; that it was a wound of such a kind as ought neither to be dissembled nor to be feared, lest we should be thought either cowards by being alarmed at it, or stupid by not being sensible of it: that Lentulus had been twice acquitted; twice Catiline; that he now was the third let loose upon the public by his judges. You are mistaken, Clodius; the judges have reserved you not for the city, but for a prison, and have wished not to retain you in the state, but to deprive you of banishment. Therefore, conscript fathers, raise up your spirits, maintain your dignity: that concord of all good men yet remains in the republic: they have felt pain, but their courage is unabated: no new evil has been created; but what was there before has been brought to light: in the trial of one abandoned man several have been found like him. But what am I doing? I have almost included my speech in my letter. I return to our altercation. The pretty boy gets up, and objects to me that I had been at Baiae. "It is not true; but what if it were? Is it the same," added I, "as if you were to say I had been in concealment?" "What," says he, "has a fellow of Arpinum 1 to do with hot haths?" "Say this," replied I, "to your patron, 2 who longed for the baths of Arpinum." (For you know the Marins 3 ) "How long," says he, "shall we bear this king?" "Do you venture to pronounce the word king," said I, "when he whose name was king did not so much as mention you to his will?" (For he had devoured the inheritance of Rex in his expectation.) "You have been buying a "fine house," says he. "One would think," said I, "you were accusing me of buying the judges." "They would not trust you," says he, "even on your oath." Nay, but," I answered, "it must not be feared that I trust you; the other one-and-thirty did not trust you, for they took care to receive their money beforehand." Overwhelmed by continued shouts; he sunk down, and held his tongue. My situation is this. Among the good, I am just as you left me; among the fifth and dregs of the city, much better now than you left me; for it is no prejudice to me that my evidence should seem to have had no effect. Their ill-disposition has been left blood without any pain to me; and the more so, because all those who supported them implicitly acknowledge that a very clear case was bought off from the judges. In addition to this, that wretched and hungry rabble, who hang about the popular assemblies like leech, eager for money, imagine that I am much esteemed by this Magnus. 4 And indeed we are united together by a frequent and pleasant intercourse to such a degree, that those our revellers in conspiracy, half-bearded youths, in their conversations call him Caesius 5 Cicero. Therefore, in the games and shows I carry off wonderful marks of favour, without any shepherd's pipe to intermingle its hissing. 6 The public attention is just now directed to the comitia for the election of consuls. Our Magnus, against the wish of everybody, thrusts forwards the son of Aules; 7 and in conducting this business, he endeavours to gain his cause, neither by authority nor by favour, but by those means with which king Philippus said he was able to take any castle into which an ass laden with gold could get up. 8 It is said that a certain consul has undertaken the affair, like Dotorio 9 the player; and that he has people in his house to distribute money, which I do not believe. 10 But there have lately been made two hateful decrees of the senate, which are supposed to be directed against the consul, on the requisition of Cato and Domitius: one, that it might be lawful to search the houses even of magistrates on informations of bribery; the other, that anybody who had distributors of money in his house, should be considered as an enemy to the state. Lucro, one of the stances and private histories of those remote times are not sufficiently preserved to enable any person to speak with confidence about it. 11 Moreover this meaning of the passage has been much disputed. I incline to believe it a parenthesis addressed to Atticus, signifying, perhaps, some salt spring near Arpinum, or some villa thence denominated.

1 Arpinum, a place about sixty miles E.S.E. from Rome, where Cicero was born, is celebrated for its warm baths, and frequented by the voluptuous. 2 This, no doubt, alludes to Clodius's concealement in disguise at the ceremonies of the Bonae Deae. 3 It has been generally supposed that Cicero, by this expression, meant the sister of Clodius, who wanted to have connected herself with Cicero. I think it more likely that he should have meant Caesius: but the particular circum

tribunes of the people, who entered upon his office at the time of the"Aelian law, has been set free from the operation both of the"Aelian and Fufian law, that he might introduce another on canvassing at elections; which, lame as he is, he has promulgated under prosperus omens. So the comitia are put off to the 27th of July. The novelty in the law is this: anybody who shall have promised money in his tribe, if he have not given it, shall be exempt from penalty; but if he have given it, he shall have to pay to each tribe three thousand sesterii (25L) annually, as long as he lives. I observed that P. Clodius had already kept this law,asmuch as he was accusation to promise, and not to pay. But mark you; do you perceive how my consulship, which Curio before called a delusional, will, if this man be elected, become a mere puppet-show? Therefore I believe we must content ourselves with our philosophy, as you do; and disregard these affairs of consulships as unworthy of notice.

As to what you tell me, that you have determined not to go into Asia, I should rather have wished that you did; and cannot but fear that some unpleasing consequence may arise from that circumstance. At the same time I cannot blame your determination, especially after having declined to accept - province myself. I shall be content with your epigrams, which you have placed in the Amathusian, especially since Chilus' has left me, and Archias has written nothing. But having already composed a Greek poem in honour of the Luculli, I am afraid he will now turn his attention to the story of the Cecilli. I returned thanks to Antonius in your name, and delivered the letter to Manlius. I have hitherto written to you the less freely, because I had no proper person to whom I could intrust my letters; nor did I sufficiently know what I should intrust to them. Farewell. I have now made you an agenda. If Clodius* refers to any business of yours, I will readily understand it, but he is just now more occupied in affairs of his own, in which I shall not be backward in assisting him. If you are likely to be stationary, you may expect often to hear from me; but do you also write frequently. I wish you would describe to me your Amathusian, how it is situated, how it is fitted up; and that you would send me any poems, and stories you possess on the subject of Amathusian.* I should like to make one at Arpinum. I will send you something of my writing; at present there is nothing finished.

 Letter XVII.

I PERCEIVE from your letter, copied from the copies of my brother Quintus's which you sent with it, a great alteration in his disposition and sentiments towards you; which affective me with all that concern which my extreme love for you both might be expected to produce; and I wonder what can have happened, that should occasion to my brother Quintus either such deep offence, or such changeableness of mind. I had already observed, what I saw that you also suspected at the time of your departure, that some unfavourable impression had arisen, and that he was hurt in mind, and harboured certain unfriendly suspicions; which, though I before often wished to heal, and especially after the allotment of his province; yet I was not aware that the offence he had conceived was so great as your letter declares; nor were my endeavours attended with the success that I hoped. But yet I consoles myself with the consideration, that I did not doubt but he would see you either at Dyraschiurn, or somewhere in those parts; and whenever that happened, I trusted, and persuaded myself, that everything would be amicably settled between you, not only by discourse and explanation, but by the very sight and meeting of each other. For what kindness there is in my brother Quintus, what cheerfulness, how tender a disposition both to conceive and to lay aside offence, it is needless for me to mention to you, who are well acquainted with it. But it has happened very unfortunately that you have not seen him anywhere. For what the malice of certain persons has suggested to him, has had more influence than either his duty or his relationship, or the former affection between you, which ought to have great weight: and it is easier to guess than to declare, where the blame of this misfortune lies; for in defending my own relations, I am afraid of appearing harsh towards yours. For this is my feeling upon the subject, that though no woud may have been inflicted by those of his own household yet they certainly might have healed that which was already received. But the fault of that affair, which extends even something further than appears, I can better explain to you when we meet. Respect the letter which he wrote to you from Thessalonica, and the language which you imagine he held with your friends at Rome, and upon his journey: what foundation there be for it I know not, but all my hope of removing this vexation rests in your kindness. For if you consider, that the minds of the best men are often irritable, and at the same time placeable; and that this sensibility, as I may call it, and tenderness of nature, is generally a sign of goodness; and, what is the chief of all, that we ought mutually to bear with the ill humours, or faults, or offences of each other; these differences, as I hope, will easily be composed; and that you may do so, I earnestly entreat you: for it is of the greatest concern to me, who sincerely love you, that there should be no one of my qualities which either does not love you, or is not loved by you. That which is by no means necessary, in which you explain what opportunities of advantage either in the provinces or in the city you have foregone, as well at other times, as during my consulate: for your ingenuousness and greatness of mind are well known to me. Nor have I ever thought there was any difference between us, except in the line of life we adopted; insomuch as a certain ambition has led me to the pursuit of honours; whilst a different, but most irreproachable, scheme of life, has conducted you to an honourable retirement. In that true praise of sincerity, of diligence, of scrupulous adherence to duty, I set neither myself nor anybody else before you; and in affection towards me, when I go beyond brotherly and domestic attachments, I attribute the first place to you. For I have seen, and thoroughly known, on various occasions, both your solicitude and your joy on my account. And often has your congratulation on my success been delightful to me, and your support in my fears most grateful. Nay, at this time, from your absence, I feel a want not only of counsel, in which you excel, but of that intercourse of conversation, which I enjoy with peculiar relish in your company.

What shall I say? In business of the state? in which it is not allowable for me to be negligent; or in the fatigue of the forum, which formerly I undertook for ambition’s sake; now, that I may be able by ’favour to maintain my dignity, or even in domestic concerns? in which both before, and particularly since the departure of my brother, I want you and our conversations. In short, neither my labour, nor my rest, neither my business, nor my idleness, nor forensic, nor domestic affairs, nor public, nor private, can any longer proceed without your sweet and friendly counsel and conversation. For the mention of these things modesty has often restrained us both.

But it has now been rendered necessary by that part of your letter in which you study to clear and justify yourself and your conduct. And amidst the embarrassments arising from his alienated and offended mind, this however has happened fortunately, that your resolution of declining all provincial employments has been known, and occasioned a profession by you to me and others of your friends; so that your not being together may appear to be the effect not of any disagreement and rupture between you, but of your inclination and judgment; whence I trust those sentiments which have been violated will easily admit of expiation; and these between us, which have been kept sacred, will continue to be religiously maintained.

We are here engaged in a sickly, wretched, and changeable republic. For I suppose you have heard of our knights being nearly dismissed from the senate. First they took it very ill that a decree of the senate should have been promulgated, to institute an inquiry into those who should have received money as judges. At the passing of this decree I was accidentally absent; but when I found that the equestrian order was much disturbed at it, though they did not openly say so, I reproved the senate, as I thought, with great authority; and spoke forcibly and copiously in the most honourable cause. Now for another favourite concern of the knights, scarcely to be borne, which, however, I have not only borne, but justified. The farmers of the revenue in Asia, who had made their agreement with the censors, complained in the senate that they had been deceived by the hope of gain, and had made an improper bargain, and petitioned that the letting might be set aside. I took the lead among their supporters; or rather I was the second; for it was Crassus who encouraged them to present this request. An odious business, a disgraceful petition, and a confession of imprudence. But there was the greatest reason to apprehend, that, if they gained no redress, they might be altogether alienated from the senate: This affair also was principally managed by me and it was brought about that they obtained a very full and very friendly senate; and I said a good deal respecting the dignity and unanimity of the two orders, on the first of December and day following. The business is not yet finally settled, but they have voted the dissolution of the senate, and have decreed Metellus, the consuls elect, to have spoken against it. That hero of ours, Cato, was going to speak, but owing to the shortness of the day it did not come to his turn. Thus maintaining my proposed line of conduct, I support, as well as I am able, that concord I had endeavour’d to cement. But yet, since these measures are liable to fail, a certain safe way, as I hope, is fortifying to enable me to retain my authority. I cannot sufficiently explain this to you by letters. I will give you a little hint. I am very familiar with Pompeius. I know what you will say: I will use caution, wherever caution can be used; and I will write more fully to you some other time about my intentions in conducting the business of the republic. Do you know that Luceipius purposes immediately to solicit the consulate? for there are said to be only two candidates. Caesar, with whom he thinks he may unite through Arrius, and Bibulus, with whom he supposes he may be joined through C. Piso. Do you laugh? Believe me, this is no laughing matter. What else shall I tell you? What? There are many things; but at another time. If you would have us expect you, take care to let me know. Now I modestly beg, what I earnestly wish, that you will come as soon as you can. The fifth of December.

LETTER XVIII.

There is nothing of which I now so much feel the want, as of him with whom I can communicate everything that concerns me; who loves me, who is prudent,—with whom I can converse without fluidity, without dissimulation, without reserve. For my brother, who is so candid and kind, is away; Metellus is no more to me than the seashore, or the air, a more desert: but you, who have so often relieved my cares and anxieties by your conversation and counsel, who used to be my companion in public matters, my familiar in private ones, the partner of all my words and thoughts, where are you? I am so deserted by

* It is to be supposed that Cicero, during his consulate, would not fail to offer his assistance in procuring for Atellus any appointment he might wish to hold.

* The sense I have given to this passage is not agreeable to the usual punctuation, but appears to me most consonant to Cicero’s ordinary manner of writing, and most suitable to the context.

* Asulni appear to have been persons from the order of knights, who rented of the consuls the collection of the tributes from Asia Minor, as was usual in other provinces, for five years at a time.
everybody that I have no other comfort but what is enjoyed with my wife and daughter, and my sweet little Cicero. For these ambitions and outward friendships make some show in public, but have no domestic fruit. So that whilst my house is full, whilst I go down to the Forum attended with troops of friends,—out of this crowd I can find nobody with whom I can either jest freely or open my bosom familiarly. Therefore I look for you, I want you, nay I call for you. For there are many things which trouble and distress me, which, could I pour them into your ears, I seem as if I could discharge in the conversation of a single walk. The stings and vexations of my domestic troubles I shall keep to myself, and not trust to this letter and to a strange messenger. And these (for I would not have you think too much of them) are not of great moment; but yet they hang upon me, and tease me, and have no friendly counsel or conversation to allay them. But in the republic, although thou art a ready courser, yet the stinging and distressing to exert itself does again and again elude every remedy. Should I but shortly collect together what has been done since your departure, you must needs exclaim, that the state of Rome can no longer subsist. For it was, I believe, after you left us, that the first entrance was made upon the cause of the Clodian story. Upon which occasion, conceiving that I had an opportunity of cutting down and restraining the licentiousness of the young, I exerted myself with vehemence, and poured forth all the powers of my mind and understanding,—influenced by no hostility towards anybody, but by the hope of correcting the republic and healing the state. Deeply is the republic injured by this corrupt and profligate judgment. See now what has since taken place: a consul has been imposed upon us whom nobody that is not as much a philosopher as ourselves can bear to look at without a sigh. How severe a wound is this! After a decree of the senate had passed respecting bribery at elections, respecting the conduct of judges, no law was carried through,—the senate was worried out,—the Roman knights alienated. So that year overyear two supports of the state which by me alone had been established; for the senator had thrown away its authority and dissolved the union of the two orders. Now then another fine year has been entered upon! Its beginning has been such that the annual rites in honour of the tutelary goddess of Youth were omitted. For Memmius was engaged in initiating the wife of M. Lucullus in rites of his own. Memmius, not brooking that, procured a divorce. But whereas that Idaean shepherd had only abused Memelius,—this Paris of our house, is treated both Memelius and Agamemnon with scorn. But there is one C. Herennius, a tribune, whom perhaps you have never heard of (though you may have heard of him, for he belongs to your tribe,) k Sextus, his father, used to distribute among you the money of the candidates. This man wants to translate P. Clodius to the condition of a plebeian 1; and the same fellow proposes that the populace at large should vote on this affair of Clodius in the Campus Martius. I have given him such a reception in the senate as I am accustomed to do to such scoundrels; but nothing can be more inglorious than he is. Metellus is an excellent consul, and attached to me; but it lessens his authority that he has, as a matter of form, promulgated this proposal respecting Clodius. But this son of Aulus, ye gods! how dull, how spiritless a soldier; how well he deserves to lend an ear every day, as he doth, to hear himself abused by Pallatinus. An Agrarian law has been promulgated by Flavius, a poor thing, almost the same as that of Pritius for, in the mean time there is not a sound statesman, not a phantom of one, to be found. He who might be one, my intimate (for so he is, and I wish you to know it) Pompeius defends that painted robe of his by keeping silence. Crassus utters not a word against the favour of the people. The others you are already acquainted with; who are so stupid that they hope to preserve their luxurious stews 3 when the republic is lost. The only person who administers any relief, rather by his firmness and integrity than by his counsel or prudence, is Cato, who now for the third month continues to harass the poor collectors, who have been very friendly to him. So we are compelled to pass no decree about other matters till an answer is given to these collectors. I expect therefore that even the business of the embassies will be put off. You see now by what waves we are tossed: and if from what I have said you perceive that there is as much more unsaid, yet visit us once more; and although these parts to which I call you deserve to be shunned, nevertheless let the value you set upon our friendship be such, that you may be glad to enjoy it even with these vexations. For, that you may not be registered as an absentee, I will take care to have your return given out and proclaimed everywhere. To be registered just at the illustration 4 is like a very merchant.

Agamemnon was brother to Memelius. Memmius, who had thus insulted M. Lucullus, had before injured his brother, in opposing his petition for a triumph.

Therefore take care that we may see you as soon as possible. The 1st of February, in the consulship of L. Metellus and L. Afranius.

LETTER XIX.

Nor only if I had so much leisure as you have, but also if I was content to send such short letters, I should surmise you, and write much more than you do. But, besides my great and incredible occupations, I never suffer any letter to go to you without some argument and opinion. First then, as it is proper in writing to such a lover of his country, I will send you an account of what is going forward in the republic; next, as I know your affection to me, I will tell you what I conceive you may not be unwilling to hear relating to myself. And with respect to the republic, the chief concern at present is the apprehension of a Gallic war. For the Edii, our brethren (as they have been called), are actually fighting; the Sequani have been fighting very ill; and the Helvetii are without doubt in arms, and making incursions into the Roman province. The senate has decreed that the consuls should have the two Gauls allotted to them; that a levy should be made; that exemptions should not be admitted; that ambassadors should be despatched with authority, who should go to the cities of Gaul and take care that they do not join the Helvetii. The ambassadors are Q. Metellus Creticus, and L. Placcus, and (by an ill assortment, like the Greek proverb of pouring precious ointment upon lentsil) Lentulus the son of Clodianus. And here I cannot forbear mentioning, that when, among the consuls, the first lot fell upon me, a full senate with one voice determined that I ought to be retained in the city. After me the same thing happened to Pompeius: so that we two seemed to be kept as pledges of the republic. Why then should I look for the applause of others when these spring up at home? Now this is the state of the city affairs. The Agrarian law was vehemently urged by the tribune Flavius, though the author of it was Pompeius, and it had nothing popular besides its author. From this law I took out, with the approbation of the assembly, whatever affected the interests of private persons: I exempted the land which had been sold in the consulship of P. Mucius and L. Calpurnius; I confirmed the possessions of Sulla's people; the Volterrani and Arrectini, whose lands Sulla had declared public, but had not allotted, I retained in the enjoyment of their property. One plan I did not object to, that land should be purchased with this adventitious money, which might be derived, for the space of five years, from the tributes of the countries newly conquered1. The senate was adverse to the whole of this Agrarian scheme, suspecting that it was designed only to give some new power to Pompeius; for Pompeius had used great exertions to accomplish his wish of carrying the law through. But, with the full approbation of those who were to occupy the lands, I confirmed the titles of the actual possessors (for our strength, as you know, lies in the rich proprietors), whilst I, in the fifth year, was concluded by a lustration, or sacrifice of purification, addressed to the assembled people.

1 These were the countries conquered by Pompeius in the Mithridatic war satisfied the people and Pompeius (for that also I wished to do) by the purchase; which being carefully conducted, I hoped the less of the city might be drawn off, and the waste lands of Italy peopled. But this whole affair has cooled again, having been interrupted by the war. Metellus is indeed a good consul, and is much attached to me: the other is such a mere cipher, that he does not even know what it is that he has bought*. These are the chief things of the republic; unless you may think it concerns the republic also, that one Herennius, a tribune of the people, of your tribe, a good-for-nothing and needy fellow, has several times instituted a motion for transferring P. Claudius to the rank of a plebeian: but many have interposed their prohibition. This, I think, is what has been doing in the republic. But for myself, after having once obtained the distinguished and immortal glory of that fifth of December*, not without much envy and ill will, I have never ceased to exert the same spirit in the republic, and to support that dignity which I had so far been able to attain. But when I had witnessed, first, in the acquittal of Claudius, the unconstancy and weakness of the judges; then saw how easily our knights conquerors, though they continued friendly to me, were dis-

united from the senate; then again, that certain happy spirits (those luxurious possessors of fishponds, I mean, your friends) are undisguisedly envious of me; I considered that it was time to look out for some greater support and stronger securities. Therefore, first I brought Pompeius, who had too long observed a silence upon my transactions, into that disposition, that in the senate, not once, but repeatedly, and in considerable length, he attributed to me the safety of the empire and of the world: which did not so much concern me (for what I did is not so obscure as to stand in need of testimony, or so doubtful as to require cameaundation) as the republic: because I was certain ill-disposed people who expected that some contention might arise between me and Pompeius from a disagreement upon those matters. With him I have united myself in such intimacy, that each of us may hence be more fortified in his own line of conduct, and firmer in the republic, from this connexion. And that hostility of the licentious and delicate youth, which had been raised against me, has been so softened by my civility, that they all now pay me particular attention. In short, I do nothing harsh towards anybody,—nor, however, any thing popular and unbecoming; but my whole conduct is so regulated, that I maintain a constancy towards the republic; and in my private concerns, in an account of the unsteadiness of the good, the unkindness of the malevolent, the hatred of the wicked, towards me, I adopt a certain caution and attention; and so hear my affections, whilst I am implicated in these new connexions, that the sly Sicilian Epicharmus often whispers in my ear that verse of his,—" Be sober and distrustful; these are the sinews of the understanding;" and of my management and scheme of life you see, I think, as it were a model. Respecting your business you often write to me; but it is impossible to remedy it,—for the decree of the senate was carried by a great concurrence of members, without the authority of any of us consulars. For, as to your seeing that I was present when it was drawn up, you may understand from the decree itself that a different object was at that time brought forward: and this about the free people was added without any occasion,—and was so done by P. Servilius the son, who gave his opinion among the last. But at this time it cannot be altered: so that the meetings which were at first held on this subject have long since ceased to be kept up. If, however, by your gentle manners you have squeezed out of the Sicilians any portion of money, I should be glad to be made acquainted with it. I have sent you the account of my consulate, written in Greek; in which, if there is anything that appears to an Attic gentleman not to be correct and good Greek, I will not say to you, what I think Lucullus said of his history, that he purposely introduced some barbarisms, that it might be known to be the work of a Roman. In which case, there be anything of that sort, it will be without my knowledge, and contrary to my inclination. If I complete that in Latin, I will send it to you. You may expect the third in verse, that I may omit no mode of celebrating my own praises. Here take care that you do not quote upon me the Greek proverb, "Who will praise his father?" For if there is anything better among men let it be praised, and let me be blamed for not rather bestowing my praises elsewhere; though what I write is, after all, not praise, but history. My brother Quintus studies to exculpate himself in his letters, and affirms that he never spoke anything against you to anybody: but this must be managed between us with great care and diligence when we meet. Do you only at length visit us again. This Cossinius, to whom I give my letter, seems to me an excellent man, free from levity, and affectionate towards you, and such as your letter represented him. The 15th of March.

LETTER XX.

Upon my return to Rome from my Pompeianum, on the 12th of May, our friend Cinclus gave me your letter dated the 18th of February, to which I now reply. And first, I am very glad that you are so perfectly acquainted with my opinion respecting you². In the next place, it gives me great satisfaction that you should have shown such moderation in those affairs in which I and my family were concerned, not without some appearance of harshness and unkindness²; which is a proof at once of no small affection, and of consummate judgment and prudence. On which ² This be afterwards executed. See book II, letter 3.

³ Some doubts have been entertained about the application of this proverb. In the beginning of Plutarch's life of Aratus it is quoted more at length; and from thence I should understand it here to signify, that as it was concluded that one who praised the deeds of his ancestors, had no merit of his own; so it might be inferred, that if Cicero was so vain of his consuls'hip he had little else to boast of.

subject as you have written so graciously, so carefully, so fairly, and candidly, that I not only have nothing further to ask of you, but had no right to expect so much readiness and mildness from you, or from any man; I think it best to say nothing more about the business. When we meet, then, if any occasion occurs, we will confer together by word of mouth.

In what you say about the republic, you argue affectionately and wisely; and your opinion is not at variance with the line of conduct I have adopted. I ought neither to recede from the state of my dignity, nor to go without my host into the fortifications of another man; and he of whom you speak, has nothing noble, nothing exalted, nothing that is not abject and popular. Yet the course I have taken is perhaps not without its advantage to myself in promoting the tranquility of my own times; but it is still much more advantageous to the republic than to me, that the violence of the wicked against me should be repressed by my having confirmed the wavering opinion of one in the highest fortune, authority, and favour; and by having converted him from the hopes of bad men to the commendation of my actions. Had any meanness been necessary on my part, I should have thought no object an equivalent; but everything has been done in such a manner, that my dignity has sustained no diminution from compliance with him, while his is increased by his approbation of me. The rest is, and will continue to be, so managed, as not to permit that what I have done, may appear to have been done by accident. My good men, those whom you mention, and that Sparta, which you say has fallen to my lot, I will not only never desert, but even if I am deserted by it, I will still continue in my former sentiments. I would wish you, however, to consider, that, since the death of Catulus, I maintain this course of honour without protectors, and without associates: for as Rhin- ton, I think, says, "some are as nothing, others care for nothing." With regard to the envy which our epurices bear me, I will either write to you at another time or will reserve it till we meet. But nothing can terrify me from the senate; whether because it is the right that we are united, or that it is most suitable to my affairs, or that I am not sorry to be held in such esteem by them.

With regard to the Sicilians, as I told you in a former letter, there is not much hope in the senate. For there is now nobody that offers any complaint. So that, if you wait for this, it is a long business. Try some other means if you can. For it has been concluded without animadversion from those whom I am concerned; and the senators hastily ran to support the motion. The season is not yet come for superseding the decree; because there are not only none to complain, but many are very well pleased; partly through malice⁴, partly from an opinion of its justice. Your friend Metellus is an excellent consul. I have only to blame in him, that he is not very well pleased with the news of peace from Gaul. I suppose he is ambitious of a triumph. In this I wish he were more moderate. Everything else is excellent. But this son of Aulus behaves in such a manner, that his consulate is no consulate, but the mortification of our Magnus*. Of my writings I have sent you my consulate in Greek. I delivered the book to L. Cossinius. But while you are pleased with my Latin compositions, I imagine that, as a Greek, you will bear towards this Greek one a little envy. If anybody else writes upon this subject I will send it you. But, believe me, as soon as they have read this of mine, they are somehow checked. Now, to return to my own business, L. Papirius Peetus, a good man, and fond of me, has made me a present of the books which Ser. Claudius left. As your friend Cincius declared that, by the Cincian law, it was allowable to take them, I said that I should most willingly accept them if he offered them. Now, if you love me, if you know that you are beloved by me, use your endeavours, through your friends, your clients, your guests, nay, your freed-men, and slaves, not that a scrap of them may be lost. For I want exceedingly both the Greek books, which I suspect, and the Latin, which I know he left. I have every day more satisfaction in these studies, whenever the business of the forum permits. You will render me a most, I say, a most grateful service, if you will attend to this with the same diligence you use in things which you suppose me to have much at heart. At the same time I recommend to you the affairs of Peetus himself, for undertaking which he gives you the greatest thanks. I not only ask, but entreat you, at length to visit us.

made, but to Cincius, on the supposition that it might be made. It is for this reason that he adds et attulisset. He said Cincius, that since he so interpreted his name sake's law, that he might legally accept the books, he should be very glad to do so if they were offered to him. This may allude particularly to some expressions which it is probable Atticus had used in his acknowledgment of letter 17, where Cicero declares his strong affection for him.

BOOK II.

LETTER I.

On the 1st of June, as I was going to Antium, and gladly leaving the gladiators of M. Metellus, I met your servant. He delivered to me your letter, and the Greek narrative of my consulship, upon which I was glad that I had previously given to L. Cossinius my book on the same subject, written likewise in Greek, which he was to take to you. For had I read yours first, you might say that I had stolen from you. Although yours, which I eagerly read, appeared to me rather rough and undressed, yet that very negligence had the effect of ornament; and, as they say of women, it was the sweeter from having no perfume. My book, on the other hand, had exhausted the whole repository of Isocrates, and all the scat-boxes of his disciples, and, in some measure, even the colours of Aristotle. This, as you mentioned in a former letter, you just tasted at Corecyra; but afterwards I imagine you received it from Cossinius. I should not have ventured to send it you, unless I had deliberately and critically examined it. Though Posidonius, to whom I had sent my memoir, that he might describe the same events in a more finished style, told me in his answer from Rhodes, that the perusal had not only not disposed him to write, but had completely discouraged him. What say you? I have confounded the Greek nation; so that they who pressed me to give them materials, which they might embellish, have now ceased to trouble me. If the book pleases you, you will take care to have it circulated in Athens, and other cities of Greece. For it may possibly throw some splendour on my affairs. I will send the speeches you ask for, and some others, since you seem to be pleased with what I have written at the desire of certain young men. For, as your fellow-citizen Demostenes, in those orations which are called Philippics, had shone forth, and emancipated himself from that abrupt and judicial manner of speaking, that he might appear more dignified and statesman-like; so it became me to see that there should be some orations of mine, which might be called consular; of which one was delivered in the senate on the 1st of January; the next to the people on the Agrarian law; the third on the subject of Otho; the fourth in defence of Rabirius; the fifth on the children of the persons proscribed; the sixth, when in the assembly I resigned my province; the seventh, by which I drove out Catiline; the eighth, which I delivered to the people the day after Catiline's flight; the ninth, in the assembly on the day when the Allobroges gave their public testimony; the tenth, in which I had opposed in the oration for the consulship...

the senate on the fifth of December. There are besides, two short ones, as it were fragments, on the subject of the Agrarian law. I will take care that you shall have this whole collection. And since not only my writings, but my transactions, afford you pleasure, in the same books you will see both what I have done, and what I have said. Otherwise, you should not have asked for them; for I did not present myself to you uninvited.

As to what you inquire about the cause of my sending for you; and signify, that though you are fettered with business, yet not only if it is necessary, but if I wish it, you will come to me; there is, in truth, no immediate necessity; but I thought you might arrange the season of travelling more conveniently. You are away too long, especially as you are at no great distance, and yet we do not enjoy the fruits of your company, and you are without us. At present all is quiet; yet if the madness of the pretors youth were allowed to proceed a little further, I should earnestly call you thence. But Metellus nobly prevents it, and will prevent it. What say you? He is a patriotic consul, as I always believed, and well disposed. But that follow no longer dissensions, but openly professes his wish to be made a tribune of the people. Upon the question being agitated in the senate, I beat him down, and reproached him with his inconstancy, who at Rome was soliciting the tribunate, though at Hera, in Sicily, he had declared that he wanted to be made aedile. But I said it was not a thing about which we need give ourselves much trouble; for it would no more be permitted to him as a plebeian to ruin the state, than it had been to some, like himself, who were patricians, when I was consul. Again, when he boasted in the assembly that he had come from the street in six days, and that nobody had time to come out to meet him, and that he had arrived in the night; I observed, that it was nothing strange that he should have come from Sicily to Rome in six days, who had gone from Rome to Interamna in three hours; that it was not the first time he had entered by night; and that nobody had met and stopped him on a former occasion, when it ought more especially to have been done. What say you? I make an impudens man modest not only by a constant dignity of speech, but even by this kind of repartee. Now, therefore, I dispute and jest familiarly with him. For, as we were conducting one of the candidates, he asks me if I used to give a place to the Sicilians in the exhibitions of gladiators? I said, no. "But I," says he, "their new patron, shall adopt this; though fby sister, who has such consular space allotted her, gives me but one foot." "Do not complain," said I, "of this one foot of your sister, for you are at liberty to uplift the one whenever you please." You will say this is not a very consular speech. I confess it; but I hate her, ill deserving to be called consular; for she is a seditious woman, at war with her husband, and not only with Metellus, but with Fabius also, because she is displeased with the part they take on this occasion.

In reply to your inquiry about the Agrarian law, it seems for the present to have cooled. As to the reproof you give me with a gentle hand respecting my familiarity with Pompeius, I would not have you imagine that I have united myself with him for the sake of my own security: but things were so circumstanced, that if by accident there should arise any disagreement between us, the greatest dissensions must have ensued in the republic: which I have guarded and provided against in such a manner, that I shall not depart from my just course; but he will become better, and lay aside something of his popular levity. For, you must know, he speaks much more magnificently of my actions, against which many had endeavoured to excite him, than of his own. For to himself he bears the same testimony of having well administered the state; to me of having saved it. How far his doing this may be of use to me I know not; it is certainly of use to the republic. What if I make even Caesar a better man, who is now in the enjoyment of such prosperous gales? Should I do any great injury to the state? But, if nobody envied me, if all favoured me as they ought, yet the remedy which could cure the unsound parts of the state, would not be less desirable than that which would cut them out. But now, when that body of knights, which I stationed on the Capitoline hill under your standard, has deserted the senate; and our chiefs think they have reached the skies, if they have but bearded mullets in their fish-ponds, which will come to their hands; and neglect everything else; do you not think that I render essential service, if I prevent them from doing mischief, who have it so much in their power? For you cannot esteem our friend Cato more than I do: but he, with the best intentions and the greatest integrity, sometimes does harm to the state, by delivering his opinion as if he were living in the republic of Plato, not in the drags of Romulus. What can be more just than that one, who had received money for his sentence, should be brought into judgment? Cato gave his opinion to this effect, and the senate assented. The knights declared war against the senate, not against me, for I dissented. What could be more impudent than the appeal of the collectors? Yet for the sake of retaining the good-will of the order, the laws should have been submitted to. Cato resisted, and carried his point. The consequence has been, that when the consul was shut up in prison; when auditions have at a Claudius was supposed to have had incestuous commerce with his sister.

b She was married to Metellus, but supposed to entertain Fabius also with the familiarities of a husband.

c The exact meaning of the original is not obvious; but I conceive it to relate to the opposition which Metellus and Fabius held to Cletus's design of making himself a tribune of the people.

d These were of the order of knights, who had made an improvident bargain for taking the rents of some of the subject provinces, and petitioned to have it cancelled. See book i. letter 37.

e The consul Metellus was imprisoned by Flavius, one different times been raised; not one of those men has come forward; by whose concurrence I, and also the consuls who came after me, used to defend the republic. What then! you will say, shall we have them hired with a price? What shall we do, if we can have them upon no other terms? Should we prefer submitting ourselves to freed-men, and even slaves? But, as you see, such is my deal. Lucceius has found my tribe more favourably disposed than his own; that of Lucceius he has lost. He accused Nasica ungenerously, and yet he spake but moderately, as if he had bestowed his pains, at Rhodes, upon the mills, rather than upon Molon. He gently found fault with me, because I had defended Nasica. Now, however, he is again a candidate on behalf of the republic. I will let you know what Lucceius does when I shall have seen Cæsar, who will be here in two days' time. That the Sicelians should injure you, you may attribute to Cato, and to his emulator, Servilius. What! do not that stroke affect many good men? But, if it must be so, let us commend it; only let us afterwards, in the dissensions of the state, be content to he left alone. My Amathus expects and wants you. My Tusculanum and Pompeianum delight me exceedingly, excepting that they have overwhelmed me, the asserter of debts, not with Corinthian brass, but debts of this ordinary brass money. You may expect soon to receive my Prognostica, with the little volume of orations. In the mean time let me know what are your intentions about coming to us, for Pompeonia desired I might be informed that you would be at Rome in July. This does not agree with the letters you had written to me about the time of your setting out.

Cæsis, as I before mentioned to you, has presented me with all the books which his brother left. This gift of his is dependent upon your diligence. If you have any regard for me, take care that they may be preserved, and sent to me. Nothing can be more acceptable to me than this; and I would have you carefully secure the Latin as well as the Greek books. I shall regard this as your gift. I have sent a letter to Octavius. I had not spoken to him; for I neither supposed your business to be of a provincial nature, nor did I consider your amusements to this purpose, but I have written as it became me, with all diligence.

of the tribunes, for opposing the Agrarian law; but after a few hours was liberated by Pompeius, attended by some of the other tribunes.

The similarity of the Latin words suggested this expression to Cicero, which it would be perhaps impossible, and certainly trifling, to preserve in a translation.

He is mentioned book I. letter 14.

The reason of this term being applied to a library is explained before, book I. letter 13. In letter 16, book I. he mentions his intention of having an Amathusium of his own at Arpinum.

This has been supposed to allude to the Castrilarian comitators, who were many of them overwhelmed with debts. It seems to me more probable, that it should refer to his general practice as an advocate.

Cicero had translated the Prognostics of Aratus, a Greek poet.

The father of Augustus Caesar, at that time governor of the province of Macedonia.

It is evident, from some former letters, that Atticus was in danger of sustaining a considerable loss at Sicyon, the tributes of which place he appears to have rented, but which had lately been withheld under pretence of a general.

LETTER II.

Take care, I beseech you, of our young Cicero; we are his uncles, and ought, according to the Greek expression, to be his guardian deities. I have been engaged in reading the Pellemeum, and have a large pile of Dicæarchus's works before me. What a great man he is! One may learn from him much more than from Poculius. At Rome I believe he has his Athenians and Corinthians. If you take my advice you will read him. This I answer for, that he is a wonderful man. Herodes, if he were wise, would read him, rather than write one syllable of his own. He has shot at me by letter; with you I see he has come to close quarters. I would sooner have been a conspirator myself, than have opposed the conspiracy, if I had thought it would be necessary to hear him. You are mistaken about Lollius; about Vinius I quite agree with you. The occasion and the time. Do you observe that the Kalends are coming, and Antochus is not come? That the judges are summoned? For so they inform me, that Nigidius threatens in the assembly to call to account any judge who absents himself. I should be glad however if you have heard anything about Antonius's arrival, that you would send me word. And since you do not come hither, at least sup with me the day before the Kalends. Mind that you do not fail. Fare you well.

LETTER III.

I imagine I ought to present my congratulations on Valerius's having been defended by Hortensius, and acquitted. This judgment was supposed to be granted to the favour of C. Atius. I was the general decree of the senate in favour of all free states. See book i. letter 19.

The son of Quintus and Pompeonia.

The last circumstances of this letter, the place from whence it is written, or to which it is directed, the persons and the books named in it, are so little known, that it is involved in considerable obscurity. Cicero seems to be speaking of his nephew, who was also nephew to Atticus; who has possibly been sent to Rome, while Cicero was at one of his villas. I have ventured to give this passage a sense very different from that of any commentary I have seen; and I have done so upon the authority of Plutarch, in the composition of his piece entitled περὶ φιλαδελφίας, where he observes that the word δεῖξις, signifying at once "uncle" and "divine," leads to brotherly kindness and affection: Βοοεκείμενος καλός ἐγγενής πρὸς εὐσεβείαν αἰσθήσεων καὶ ἀδικητίαν. Cicero therefore employs the Greek term, because the Latin did not bear this significance.

Περὶ Ἐλευθερίας. This was probably some work of Dicæarchus on the government of Pellenæ, a small territory of Achæa.

It is probable this Herodes might have written some poor account of Cicero's consilium, which it pleased him to read.

Who Lollius or Vinius may have been is not known.

C. Antonius was impeached for extortion in his government of Macedonia.

We may suppose that this letter was addressed to Atticus at Rome, whither he was going without accepting Cicero's invitation to the villa whence he writes. Therefore, having missed him before, Cicero now appoints him to sup with him at Rome the day when he intended to go thither himself.

Ἐναγγελία. This usually signifies the gratuity given.
sustain, too, that Epicrates 9, as you say, may have grown wanton; for I did not like his military shoes, any more than his white bandages. We shall see what the case is when you come.

When you find fault with the narrowness of my windows, you must know that you find fault with the Institution of Cyrus; for when I made the same observation, Cyrus said that the view of lawns through wide apertures was less pleasing. For, let the sight be A, the object B, the rays D and E— you understand the rest. If we saw by the incidence of images s, the images might be much embarrassed in these narrow openings; but now the emanation of rays is made merrily. If you find fault with other parts, you will not find me silent, unless it be on some point which can be altered without expense.

I come now to the month of January, and to my particular situation and policy; in which we must, like Socrates, consider both sides; and then at last, like his disciples, choose what pleases us. It is truly a matter of great concern: for either a strong resistance must be made to the Agrarian law, in which there will be some fighting, but full of honour; or we must be quiet, which is the same thing as going out of the way to Solomonium, or Antitheatrum Clodianum. But I must give it my support, which they say Caesar so much expects from me, that he makes no doubt of it. For Cornelius has been with me, Balbus I mean, Caesar's friend. He affirmed that Caesar would follow mine and Pompeius's advice in all things, and that he would endeavour to unite Cassius with Pompeius. Here is the state of this business. I am intimately connected with Pompeius; you if please with Caesar too. There is an opportunity of returning into favour with my enemies, of conciliating the populace, of securing tranquillity for my old age. But that former resolution of mine influences me, which is in the third book 10. In the mean time, that course which you pursued with virtue and spirit in early youth, and also as consul, you must still maintain, and grow in reputation and the praise of good men. Caesar himself 11 having dictated this to me in that book, which contains so many wholesome maxims, I think I ought not to doubt but that, in the words of Homer, "My best auspices should be to fight for my country." But let us reserve these considerations for our walks during the Compitalia. Do not forget the day to the messengers of good news. The letter is generally supposed to have been written from the country to Atticus at Rome, in answer to one received from him communicating this intelligence. It seems to me more natural to suppose that Cicero might have heard it elsewhere, and that it wanted confirmation.

This term is used to designate Pompeius, who appears to have affected some ambitious singularity of dress, and may have been suspected of interfering in the cause of Valerius.

This seems to relate to the Epicurean doctrine of images described by Lucretius, and here humorously applied to the circumstances of Cicero's house.

Of a poem written by Cicero on the subject of his consulate.

Calliope was invoked in this book to inspire him.

The Compitalia was a Roman festival, on which, it seems, Atticus had promised to pay Cicero a visit in the country.

before the Compitalia. I shall order the bath to be heated; and Terentia invites Pompeia: we will add your mother to our party. Bring me, from my brother Quintus's library, Theophrastus on the Love of Honour.

LETTER IV.

I AM very much obliged to you for sending me Serapion's work: of which, between ourselves, I scarcely understand a thousandth part. I have desired you may be paid for it in ready money; that you might not set it down among the expenses of your presents. But, having made mention of money, let me beg you to come to some arrangement with Titinius in any manner you are able. If he does not adhere to what he had professed, I should like best, if Pompeia agrees to it, that the things which are so dearly bought may be returned. If that cannot be done, let the money be paid, rather than have any altercation about it. I should be very glad to have you settle this before you go with your usual kindness and diligence.

Does Clodius then, as you say, go to Tigranes? Would it were on the same terms as Scopelus! I must give it to object to it. For it will be a more favourable time for my absence on a free lieutenancy, when my brother Quintus, as I hope, may be settled at his ease, and it may be known what that priest of the Bona Dea is about. In the mean time I shall entertain myself with the Muses with an even spirit, nay, with cheerfulness and satisfaction. Nor will it ever enter my mind to envy Crassus, or to repeat that I have been true to myself. I will endeavour to gratify you on the subject of geography; but I make no certain promise. It is a great undertaking; but yet, at your desire, I will try to let you have some fruit of my absence. Whatever you may have learned relating to the republic, especially whom you may think likely to be the consuls, let me know, though I am become less curious since I have determined not to trouble myself about public affairs.

I have been to see Terentia's wood. We want nothing but the Dodonean oak, to make us think we have possession of Epirus itself. About the Kalends I shall be either in my Formianum or Pompeianum. If I should not be in the Formianum, come, if you love me, to the Pompeianum; it will give me great delight, and will be very little out of your way. I have ordered Philutimus to let the ball be done as you wished. I think, however, 10 Many conjectures have been formed respecting the true reading and the right interpretation of this passage. Gronovius proposes to read "Scopelis conditiones," and observes that Metrodorus Scopelus was sent by Mithridates to Tigranes, and there lost his life. I have adopted his emendation, but have ventured to put upon it a new construction. After all, it is very doubtful.

11 What the nature of these free lieutenancies was, is explained, book i. letter 10, note 1. 12 Cicero thought to absent himself from Rome during the time of Clodius's tribunate. He was expecting that his brother Quintus might be relieved from his government before another year, and might then keep a watch upon Clodius's operations.

These oaks were of sacred memory, and situated in Epirus, the country of Atticus's villa, to which he here alludes.
you should consult Vettius. In these times, when the life of every good man is so precarious, I consider the enjoyment of the Palatine ground 2 for one summer to be of great value; yet so, that I should wish nothing less, than that Pomponia, or the boy, should be exposed to any danger from its falling.

LETTER V.

I wish indeed, and have long wished, to visit Alexandria, and the rest of Egypt; and likewise to get away from hence, where people are grown tired of me; and to return when they may again want me. But as to going at this time, and being sent by these persons, (I may say with Hector,) "I have too much respect for the Trojans, and long-robed Trojan ladies." For what will our nobles say if there are any remaining? that I have renounced my principles for a bribe? "The first to impute disgrace to me will be Polydamus," that Cato of ours, who alone is as good as a hundred thousand. But what will history say of us some six hundred years hence which I value much more than the idle rumours of those who are now living. But I think we must suspend our judgment and wait. For if it should be offered, I shall still be at liberty to do as I please; and then it will be time to determine. There is some credit even in declining. Therefore, if Theophanes* should happen to say anything to you about it, do not immediately repel him.

I am expecting to hear from you on the following subjects: what Arrius says; how he bears his disappointment; whether any consuls are yet provided; whether, as the people say, they are to be Pompeius and Crassus; or, as I am informed, Serius Sulpius with Gabinius; also, whether there are any new laws; and in short, if there is any news; and since Nepos is going away, who is to have the augurate†; with which alone I could be sought by them. See my liberty. But why do I speak of these things which I desire to have done with, and to give my whole mind and all my care to philosophy. This, I say, is my intention: would it had always been so! But now, when I have experienced the vanity of all that I once thought great, I think of dedicating myself to all the Muse. Let me, however, hear more certainly about Curtius, and whether anybody is fixed upon to succeed him; and what is doing about P. Cadius;* and tell me everything, as you promise, at your leisure. I wish you to inform me also what day you think of leaving Rome, that I may acquaint you where I shall be; and I beg you will very soon let me hear about what I have written to you. I anxiously expect your letters.

LETTER VI.

What I promised in a former letter, that some work should appear, the fruit of my retirement, I do not now very strongly confirm; for I am so attached myself to idleness, that I am not to be torn from it. Therefore I either amuse myself with books, of which I have an agreeable collection at Antium; or I count the waves, for the season is not favourable for catching lacertae. My mind quite revolts at writing. The geographical researches which I projected are a great undertaking: for Eratosthenes, whom I had intended to follow, is strenuously opposed by Serapion, and by Hipparchus. What think you, if Tyrannio should join me? Besides, the subject is difficult to explain, and of a uniform nature, and less susceptible of any ornaments of writing than I had supposed; and, which is the chief of all, any cause is, to say the truth, sufficient to make me give it up. I am doubtful whether I shall settle here, or at Antium, to pass all this time; where I would rather have been a duumvir, than have been consul at Rome. You have done wiser in providing a home at Bathroutum. But believe me this town is too. Could it be supposed there was any place so near Rome where there were so many people who never saw Vatinius? where there is nobody besides myself who cares if any one of the twenty commissioners¹ is alive and safe? where nobody interrupts me, and everybody loves me? Here then is the place to exercise my political talents: there I am not only prevented, but I am weary of it. Therefore some private observations, which I may read to you alone, shall be drawn in Theopompus's manner, or still more severely. I now trouble myself no further about the public, than to hate the wicked; and even that without anger, or rather with some pleasure in writing.

But to come to business: I have written to the city questors about my brother Quintius's affair. See what they say; whether there is any hope of

* The palestra was properly a piece of ground appropriated to public exercise. This might have adjoined to the wall of Cicero's and his brother's premises, which were contiguous buildings on the Palatine hill. The repairs of the partition wall may be supposed to have interfered with their access to this ground, at least for a season.

† Cesar and Pompeius thought at this time of sending an ambassador to Alexandria, to confirm Ptolemy Aulotus on his throne.

* Theophases was a creature of Pompeius.

² Arrius had received a promise of support from Crassus, but was not yet able to make room for the friends of Cesar and Pompeius.

³ Upon the death of Metellus Celer it was natural to suppose that his brother Nepos might have succeeded to his office of augur; but his going now to the government of a province made him ineligible, as it was necessary to solicit it personally at Rome.

⁴ It is not known who this Curtius is, or what place he held.

LETTER VII.

I will think again about the geography. You ask me for two omissions: one of which I did not care to write out, because I had left it imperfect; the other, that I might not praise a person I did not like; but I will see about this also. However, there shall be something, that you may not think I have been totally idle. What you tell me about Clodius is highly agreeable to me; and I hope, when you come, you will bring me a full account; and that you will let me hear from you in the mean time, if you know, or suspect, anything; especially what he is likely to do about the embassy. Before I read your letter I was wishing to get to the fellow1, not soothsaying that I might put off my engagement with him (for I am eager for the contest); but I thought he would lose whatever popularity he had acquired by being made a place of.

"For what purpose have you passed over to the people? that you might go to salute Tigranes? Tell me; do the Armenian kings refuse to salute patriots?" In short I was prepared to work him upon this embassy; which if he slighted, and if, as you say, that excites the indignation both of the framers and supporters of the law by which he was disenabled, it will be a fine scene. But, to say the truth, our Publius (Clodius) is treated rather disrespectfully; in the first place, that he who was once the only man in Caesar's house, now should not have been able to be one among twenty; then, that one's embassy should have been talked of, another should have been given; that rich one for the purpose of exacting money, is reserved, I suppose, for the Pisaurian Drusus, or the glutton Vatinius; this meagre and dainty banishment is given to him, whose tribunate is reserved to suit the occasions of these gentlemen. Infame him, I conjure you, as much as possible. The only hope of safety is in the disagreement of these people among themselves, of which I learned some symptoms from Curio. Already Arrius complains that the consulate has been snatched away from him: Megabocius2, and these sanguinary youths, are determined enemies. To this let there be added, yes, let there be added, that contest for the augurship. I hope often to send you fine letters upon these subjects. But I want to know what it is that you throw out obscurely; that already some of the 1 It seems Quintus Cicero wanted to have the expenses of his government defrayed in Roman money, instead of the Asaile cistophori, receiving from the plunder of Mithridates by Pompeius. The cistophoris was a small coin, so called from bearing the impression of the cistus, or chest, used in the mysteries of the Cistophori. It was a small coin, so called from bearing the impression of the cistus, or chest, used in the mysteries of the Cistophori. It was a small coin, so called from bearing the impression of the cistus, or chest, used in the mysteries of the Cistophori.

2 This sense appears to me sufficiently good, without altering the text in opposition to all MSS. Most commentators have thought it to omit the proposition in, and to understand Cicero to say that he had wished Clodius might go to Tigranes.

3 It is generally supposed that by this term is meant Pompeius, and that he was at variance with those young incendiaries, the remains of Catiline's accomplices.

Roman money; or whether we must be put off with the Pompeian cistophorus. Moreover, settle what is to be done about the wall. Is there anything else? yes; let me be informed when you mean to go from thence.

LETTER VIII.

While I was eagerly expecting a letter from you in the evening, as I usually do, I was informed that the servants had arrived from Rome. I called them in, and ask if they have any letters. They say no. What do you say, said I, is there nothing from Pomponius? Alarmed at my voice and countenance, they confessed that they had received a letter, but had lost it on their way. What think you? I was very much provoked; for your letters lately had brought some useful or agreeable information. Now, if there was anything deserving to be recorded in the letter you sent the 16th of April, write as soon as possible, that I may not remain in ignorance; or if there was nothing but good-humour, yet repeat even that. Know that young Curio has been here to visit me. What he said about Publius (Clodius) exactly agreed with your letters. He is wonderfully incensed against our haughty kings3. He said that the young men were equally angry, and could not bear this state of things. We are in a good way. If we can depend upon these people, let us, methinks, mind our own affairs4. I am engaged in history. At the same time, though you may think me another Saucelus5, nothing is more indolent than I am. But let me explain to you my motions, that you may determine where you will come to me. I design to go to Formium the middle of April6. Then (since you think I ought to omit that delicate

2 The expression implies that he did not abandon the states in anger, but withdrew his guidance till some more favourable season, when his services might be available.

3 The text is evidently corrupt. I have supposed that it ought to be written H.S. ([!] ([!] [!])). But it is impossible to ascertain the truth, and is of little moment.

4 In the original it is "brother." (See book i. letter 1.) They were really first-cousins.

8 A philosopher of great study.

9 The Parilia was a festival celebrated on the 21st of April.
TO TITUS POMPONIUS ATTICUS.

BASIN [at this time] on the first of May I shall leave Formia, that I may be at Antium on the third. For the games of Antium are to take place from the fourth to the sixth of May, and Tullia wishes to see them. Thence I think of going to Tusculum, then to Arpinum, and to be at Rome on the first of June. Let me see you either in Formia, or at Antium, or in Tusculum. Replace your former letter and add something new.

LETTER IX.

I hope you are well. Cecilius, the questor, having told me that he is going to send a servant, I have written this hastily, that I might elicit your marvellous dialogues with Publius, as well those which you mention, as that which you reserve, saying it is tedious to detail your reply; also that which has not yet taken place, which that Bopis at will relate to you upon her return from Solonium. I would have you believe nothing can be more agreeable to me. If the agreement relating to me is not kept I am in heaven. Austria, who brings matters before the people, shall know what a fine return he has made for my choicest speeches, of which you may expect a distinguished counterpart. For, as well as I can guess, if that profligate is in favour with these mighty men, he will not be able to exult, not only over the consular Cynic, but not over those Tribuns of the stews. He can never be an object of envy when I am robbed of my power, and of all my senatorial authority. But if he disagrees with them it will be absurd to attack me. However, let him if he will. Believe me, this revolution in the state has been made gaily, and with less noise than I had supposed; more speedily indeed than seemed possible; and that, partly through the fault of Cato; but, besides, through the shameless conduct of those who neglected the auspices, the Aelian, the Junian, and Licinius the Cæcilian, and the Didian; who threw away all the resources of the constitution; who gave away kingdoms and estates to tetrarchs; and to a few persons immense sums of money. I see now to what party envy will pass over, and where it will abide. Think that I have learned nothing either from experience, or from Theophrastus, if you do not shortly see people call out for those our times. For if the authority of the senate excited envy, what do you think will be the case, when it is transferred, not to the people, but to three ambitious men? Therefore let them make whom they will consults, and tribunes of the people; may, let them clothe the evil of Vatinius with the painted robe of the priesthood, you will shortly see not only those who have committed no offence, but even Cato himself, who is so guilty in their eyes, raised to great honour. As for myself, if your companion Publius permits it, I mean to act the philosopher; if he designs anything, then only to defend myself; and, as becomes that profession, “I announce that I will repel any one who first insults me.” Only let my country be favourable. It has received from me, though not more than is due, at least more than was demanded. I prefer being ill rowed under the steerage of another, to steering well with such ungrateful rowers. But these things may be discussed better when we meet. Now hear the answer to your inquiry. I intend to go from Formiuman to Antium the third of May; from Antium I wish to go to Tusculum on the seventh of May. But as soon as I leave Formiuman, where I mean to stay till the end of April, I will immediately let you know. Terentia sends her compliments. The young Cicero salutes the Athenian Titus.

LETTER X.

(Grav. xii.)

Let those men deny, if they can, that Publius has been made a plebeian. It is a mere exercise of sovereignty, and is not to be borne. Let but Publius send persons to attest it, and I will swear that our Cæorus, when he was colleague with Balbus, told me at Antium, that himself had conducted the auspices on the occasion. What two charming letters have been delivered to me from you, both at the same time! I do not know what remuneration I can make for them; but that some is due I freely acknowledge. Observe the concurrence of circumstances. I had just gone from the Antian into the Appian road at the Tres Tabernæ, on the festival of Ceres, when my friend Curio, coming from Rome, met me. At the same place presently came the servant from you with letters. Curio asked me if I had heard no news. I said, no. Publius (says he) is canvassing for the place of tribune of the people. What think you? He is very angry with Cæorus, and threatens to rescind all his acts. How does Cæorus receive it?

LETTER XII.

(Grec. XI.)

To tell you the truth, I seem as if I were banished since I have been in Formium. While I was at Antium there was no day on which I did not know better what was doing at Rome, than those who were living there. For your letters acquainted me not only with the state of Rome, but with that of the republic at large; and taught me not only what had happened, but also what was going to happen. Now, unless anything is picked up from a casual passenger, I can hear nothing. Therefore, though I hope very soon to see you, yet let me have, by the servant, whom I have directed immediately to come back, some long letter, full not only of all that has been done, but likewise of your own opinions. Take care to let me know the day when you mean to leave Rome. I intend to remain in Formiae as late as the sixth of May. If you do not arrive before that day, I shall perhaps see you at Rome. For why should I invite you to Arpitanum, 'a ragged place (as Ulysses says of Ithaca), but a good nurse of youths; than which nothing can in my eyes be more delicious.' So much for the present. Farewell.

LETTER XIII.

A provoking circumstance, that nobody should have delivered the letter. I wrote to you from Tres Tabernae the same hour that I received your most acceptable intelligence. But you must know that the parcel in which it was contained was taken to my house the same day on which I sent it, and from thence was brought back to me at Formium. I have ordered this letter again to be taken to you, that you might be assured of the pleasure yours had given me. When you inform me that nothing is said in Rome, this is what I expected. But, I can tell you, people are not reserved in the country, nor can the country bear your tyranny. But if you come into this Telepylus Lastrygonia (Formiae I mean), what a noise do people make! How irritated are their minds! In what detestation is our friend Magnus, whose appellation of Great begins to decay with that of the Rich Crassus. Believe me, I have yet met with nobody who could bear this state of things so quietly as I do. Therefore pray let us continue to enjoy our philosophical retirement; for I can aver upon my oath, that

1. The original is taken from Homer's Odyssey, and is the more appropriate in being applied by Cicero to Arpinum, with feelings of affection towards his native place, with which Ulysses is represented to have said it of his own country, Ithaca.

2. This is the tenth letter of this book.

3. This must have been his house at Roma.

4. That is, nothing was said of the authority usurped by the triumvirate.

5. By "your tyranny" is to be understood that which was exercised by the triumvirs at Rome, where Atticus was staying.

6. Τριφάρλος Λαστρυγώνια, is an expression taken from Homer's Odyssey, the meaning of which is not exactly known. The place so denominated by Homer was supposed to have been near Formiae.

seemed at least to be liked by the common people; and though a cause of trouble to the better sort, yet it did not threaten their ruin. Now it has suddenly become so hateful to every body, that I dread to think where it may burst forth, and what it may do. See now my tenderness of mind: I could not refrain from tears when I saw him, on the 22d of July, addressing the people upon the edicts of Bibulus; him, I say, who formerly used magnificently to extol himself in that very place, with the greatest affection of the people, and universal applause. How was he then bumbled! how dejected! how did he displease not only his audience, but himself also! O spectacle I agreeable to Caesar alone, not so to others. For having descended as it were, from the stars, it seemed a fall, rather than any advance. And as Apelles, if he saw his Venus, or Protegenes his Jalyus, smeared with mud, would, I conceive, feel great pain: so did I with great pain behold him, whom I had painted and polished with all the colours of art, suddenly disfigured. Though nobody thought I owed him any friendship for his conduct in the Clodian business; yet such was my regard; that it was not to be endured by any act of unkindness. Bibulus's Archilochian edicts against him are so acceptable to the populace, that one cannot pass by the place where they are exhibited, for the throng of people who are reading them: to him they are so bitter, that he pities with vexation: to me they are distasteful, because they give too much unseasonableness to one whom I have always loved; and I am afraid lest one so powerful, so active with his sword, and so unconquered by insult, should give way to grief and rage with all the force of his mind. What is likely to be the end of Bibulus, I cannot say; at present he is in surprising glory. Upon his putting off the comitia to the month of October, Caesar imagined that, this being a measure usually offensive to the people, he should be able, by addressing them, to persuade the assembly itself to go to Bibulus; but after uttering many very seditious expressions, he could not extract from them a single word. What say you? the triumvira feel that they have the good-will of no party: so much the more reason, have we to be afraid. Clodius is my declared enemy. Pompeius affirms that he will do nothing against me: it is dangerous to believe this; therefore I prepare myself to resist him. I trust I shall have the best wishes of all orders. When the time comes, only I shall want you, but the circumstances themselves will call for you: I shall gain a great deal of advice, of course, and of protection, if I have you with me at that time. Varro gives me satisfaction; Pompeius talks divinely. I hope I shall certainly be able to come off either with distinguished credit, or without mortification. Let me know what you are doing, how you amuse yourself, and how you have managed with the Sicelions.¹

LETTER XXII.

How I could wish that you had remained in Rome! you would certainly have been safe, if we could have foreseen what has happened: we could easily restrain our pretty youth², or at least we should be able to know what he was about. But now, this is the state of the business; he flies about, raves, follows no certain course, threatens many, and seems likely to act as chance may offer. When he sees the odium attached to the present state of affairs, he seems as if he would attack those who have occasioned it: but when again he recollects their influence, and the strength of their army, he directs himself against me; and to me he threatens both violence and prosecution. With him Pompeius has discovered; and, as he informed me himself, (for I have no other witness,) discoursed with vehemence, telling him that he should incur the utmost disgrace of perfidy and wickedness, if any danger should be brought upon me by bisaid, whom he had himself invested with arms, when he suffered to be made a plebèius; but that he, and Apelles, had received his promise on my behalf, and that if he did not observe it, he should resent it so, that the world might know nothing was dearer to him than my friendship. After saying this, and much more to the same purpose, he told me that Clodius first continued for some time to urge many things on the other side; but at last gave up, and declared that he would do nothing contrary to Pompeius's wishes. Since then, however, he has not ceased to speak very severely of me; and if he did not, still I should not trust him: but should prepare for everything, as I do. Now I conduct myself so, that every day my friends and my influence increase. I keep altogether clear from public concerns, and am busily engaged in causes, and the exertions of the forum. This I perceive is agreeable not only to those who use my assistance, but to the people generally. My house is frequented: I am saluted; the remembrance of my consulship is renewed. The favour of the people is manifest; and I am in such hope, as sometimes to think the struggle which hangs over me is not a thing to be declined. I have now need of your advice, your affection, and fidelity; therefore fly up; every thing will be easy to me, if I have but you. Much may be done through our friend Varro; but it will be strengthened by your support. Much may be got from Publius himself; much may be known, which cannot be kept secret from you; much also—but it is idle to enumerate each particular; I shall then want you for everything. Be assured of this, that everything will be plain when I see you; but all depends upon its being before he enters upon his office. While Crassus is urging Pompeius, I imagine if you are here (who by means of Bopis* may learn from Clodius himself with what sincerity they are acting) I shall either be free from trouble, or, at least, free from errors: you do not need my entreaty and exhortation. You see what my wishes, what the occasion, what the importance of the case requires. Of the republic I have nothing to write to you, but the great hatred of all people towards those who have possessed themselves of everything; yet no hope of any change. But, as you may easily perceive, Pompeius is tired, and heartily repents. I cannot sufficiently foresee what issue is to be expected; but these rancours must assuredly burst forth somewhere. I have sent back to you the books of Alexander; a careless writer, and no good poet, yet not without his use. I have willingly received Numerius Numestius into my friendship, and have found him a sensible and prudent man, and worthy of your recommendation.

² Publius Clodius.

LETTER XXIII.

I believe you never before received a letter from me that was not written in my own hand. From that you may judge how much I am occupied for having no spare time, and yet being obliged to walk about for the sake of recruiting my voice, I dictate this as I walk. In the first place then I would have you know, that our friend Sampsiceramus is heartily sick of his situation, and wishes he could again be restored to that place, from which he has fallen. He imparts to me his unassessibility, and sometimes openly seeks a remedy; which it is impossible for me to find. Then, all the authors and adherents of that faction are losing their vigour; while there never was a more general consent in the wishes and expressions of all people. As for myself (for I know you will be glad to be informed), I interfere in no public counsels, and give myself up altogether to the business and labour of the forum; by which, as may easily be supposed, I am brought to the frequent relation, and regret, of my former deeds. But that kinman of our Bopis casts not little errors; and threatens; and while he denies it to Sampsiceramus, to others he professes and boasts of it; therefore if you love me, as indeed you do, if you are asleep, wake up; if you are standing, walk; if you are walking, run; if running, fly. It is not to be believed how much (which is the most possible) I place in your counsels and prudence, how much in your affection and fidelity. The greatness of the occasion requires perhaps a long discourse; but to minds so united as ours, few words are sufficient. It is of great importance to me, if you cannot be at Rome on the comitia, at least that you may be there when he is declared the tribune. Farewell.

LETTER XXIV.

In the letter I sent by Numestius, I called upon you with an earnestness and vehemence, which nothing could exceed; to that call add even, if you can, something more. Do not make yourself uneasy (for I know you, and am aware of the solicitude and anxiety inseparable from real affection); but the case, as I hope, is less formidable in fact, than it seems in the relation. Vettius (Biopis who gave information at the time of my consulship) had prevailed Caesar, that he would contrive to bring the young Curio into some suspicion of criminality. He therefore insinuated himself into the familiarity of the young man; and having, as it appears, frequent meetings with him, he at length brought matters to such a state, that he declared his determination to assault Pompeius with the assistance of his slaves, and to kill him. Information of this was given by Curio to his father, and by him to Pompeius. The affair was brought before the senate. Vettius being introduced, at first denied that he had ever been concerned with Curio; but this did not last long; for he presently demanded a public pledge of security upon his giving evidence; this was not opposed. Then he gave out, that there had been a band of young men under the conduct of Curio; amongst whom had originally been Vitellius, and Q. Cepio Brutus, and Lentulus, the son of the flamen, not without the knowledge of his father; that afterwards C. Septimius, the secretary of Bulbus, had brought him a dagger from Bulbus: which was all absurd; as if Vettius would have been without a dagger, unless the consul had given him one! And this was the more scouted, because on the 15th of May Bulbus had warned Pompeius that he ought to be upon his guard, and Pompeius had thanked him for it. Young Curio being introduced, deposed in answer to what Vettius had said; and Vettius was then chiefly convicted by his own assertion, that it had been the advice of the young men to attack Pompeius in the forum with the gladiators of Gabinius; and that Paullus was at the head of it; though it was known that he was at that time in Macedonia. A decree of the senate was then passed, that Vettius should be put in prison for having confessed that he had no arms; and that whoever librated him would be an enemy to the republic. The general opinion of this affair was, that it had been designed Vettius and his slaves should have been apprehended in the forum with a dagger and with arms; and then he should have offered to confess. And this would have been done, if the Curios had not previously given information to Pompeius. The decree of the senate was then read in the assembly of the people; but the next day Caesar, who formerly, when he was praetor, had obliged Q. Catulus to speak from below*, now brought Vettius forwards on the rostra, and placed him in a situation, to which the consul Biblius was not permitted to aspire. Here he said whatever he pleased about the republic; and having come ready prepared, he first omitted any mention of Cepio, whom he had named with acrimony in the senate; so that it was manifest the night, and some nightly management, had intervened; in the next place, he named some, whom in the senate he had not touched with the slightest suspicion; as Lucullus, from whom he said C. Fannius used to be sent to him; the same who had set his name to the accusation of P. Clodius; also L. Domitius, whose house had been fixed upon as the place from whence their eruption might be made. He did not name me; but mentioned that a certain speaker, of consular rank, and neighbour to the consul, had suggested to him, that some Ahala Servilius, or Brutus, must be found. He added at last, upon being called back by Vatinus, after the assembly was dismissed, that he had understood from Curio, that my son-in-law Pluyo, and M. Laterensis, were privy to these machinations. Vettius was at this time charged before Crassus Dives for violence; and upon being found guilty, meant to claim the benefit of turning evidence; which if he had obtained, it was probable several trials would have followed. This did not much alarm me, who, however, am not used to disregard anything. Indeed, I had the strongest marks of favour shown me; but I am quite weary of my life, so full are all things of all sorts of miseries. A little while ago we had been apprehensive of a massacre, which the speech of that firm old man Q. Considius had dispelled; that which we might have apprehended every day, has suddenly sprung up. What think you? Nothing is more unfortunate than I; nothing more fortunate than Catilinus, both from the splendour of his life, and from the character of these times. Yet in the midst of these calamities, I preserve a firm and unruflled mind, and maintain my dignity honourably and carefully. Pompeius bids me lay aside all uneasiness on the subject of Clodius; and on every occasion professes the greatest kindness towards me; but I want you to direct my counsels, to share my anxieties, and to take part in all my thoughts. Therefore, as I desired Numestius to use his influence with you, so I beg you even more earnestly, if possible, to fly up to us. I shall get new life if I see you.

\[y\] Cicero's house in Rome was not far from Cæsar's.
\[z\] Ahala Servilius had killed Sp. Mætius on suspicion of aspiring to kingly power.
\[a\] Brutus, as is well known, had been the cause of Tarquin's being driven from the throne, and of the extinction of the regal power.
\[b\] Caesar had committed some acts of violence, and had filled the assembly with armed men, when the law was to be passed which gave him the government of Gaul for five years. Many senators abdited themselves; but Considius came forward, saying, that he was too old to fear death.
\[c\] Q. Catilinus had died the year before.

- \[d\] In the original it is Hortensius, which was one of the names of Hortensius; but being less commonly known, I have not thought fit to preserve it in the translation.

[In the interval between this and the following letters, Atticus went up to Rome at his friend's request. Clodius in the mean time having been appointed tribune of the people, spared no means to gain the populace, and at length promulgated a decree against such as had put to death a Roman citizen without the sentence of the people. This was evidently levelled at Cicero's conduct in the suppression of the Catilinarian conspiracy; upon which, seeing the disposition of men's minds, he withdrew from the city, and was presently followed by a decree of banishment.]

\begin{tt}
\[\text{(Graev. iii.)}\]
I wish I may ever see the day when I shall have reason to thank you for compelling me to preserve my life; hitherto I am very sorry. But I entreat you to come to me immediately at Vibo, to which place many causes have directed me. If you come thither, I shall be able to consult about my whole journey and flight. If you refuse to do this, I shall be surprised; but I trust you will do it.
\end{tt}

\begin{tt}
The reason of my coming hither was, that there was no place where I could any longer remain unmolested so well as on Sicà's estate; especially while the law for the banishment had not yet been finally amended. At the same time I knew that I could easily go back to Brundisium, if I had you with me; but without you I could not continue in those parts, on account of Autronius. Now, as I \end{tt}
mentioned to you before, if you come to me, we will consult upon this whole business. I know the journey is troublesome; but this great calamity is full of troubles. My spirits are too much broken, and depressed, to admit of my writing more. Farewell. Dated the 8th of April, from the shores of Lucania.

LETTER III.
(Grav. iv.)

I would have you attribute it to my misfortunes, rather than to fickleness, that I have suddenly left Vibo, whither I had invited you; for I have received a draft of the law for my ruin; by which I find that the amendment I had heard of, permits me to remain at any place exceeding the distance of four hundred miles. But not being permitted to go where I had intended, I immediately turned my course towards Brundisium, previously to the passing of the law, lest I might involve Sica, with whom I was staying, in my ruin; and also because I was not suffered to be at Malta. Now make haste to join me, if only I can meet with any one to take me in. Hitherto I have met with a kind reception; but I am apprehensive of what is to come. I repent, my Pomponius, of being yet alive; in which matter you have principally influenced me. But of this when we meet: only manage to come.

LETTER IV.
(Grav. i.)

As I before thought it of importance to have you with me,—so especially, upon reading the form of the law, I understood that nothing could happen more desirably for the journey I determined upon, than that you should join me as soon as possible: that after leaving Italy, in case my road should lie through Epirus, I might have your protection and that of your friends; or if anything else were to be done, might regulate my measures by your advice. I beg, therefore, that you will take pains to join me without delay. You may do it the easier, since the law respecting the province of Macedonia has been passed. I would use further arguments with you, if the state of affairs did not itself speak to you on my behalf.

LETTER V.

TARENTIA often acknowledges her obligations to you in the strongest terms; which is highly gratifying to me. I live in great wretchedness, added, so as to render it unsafe for him to proceed to Brundisium, (where we may suppose that Atticus had offered him an asylum,) unless he had the protection of Atticus's presence. Brundisium was the port from whence people passed into Greece. Vibo was opposite to Sicily. Cicero had designed to pass his exile in Sicily or Malta, but being prevented from executing this plan, he determined to go, by the way of Macedonia, into some of the nearest parts of Asia Minor.

The appointment of the government of Macedonia was probably of some importance to Atticus, on account of his private affairs. It was allotted to the consul Piso, who appears to have been a base, hypocritical man, in the interest of Otho.

and am worn out with excessive grief. I know not what to say to you: for if you are still in Rome you cannot now come up with me; and if you are on your road, as soon as you have come up with me we shall arrange together what is to be arranged. I only beg that you will continue in the same affection you have always borne me,—for I am still the same. My enemies have taken away from me my goods, but not myself. Farewell. Dated the 10th of April, at Thurium.

LETTER VI.

I had not doubted but I should see you at Tarentum or Brundisium. Many reasons made me wish it; among the rest, that I might stop in Epirus and take your advice on the rest of my affairs. Since this has not happened, I shall place this also in the long catalogue of my misfortunes. I shall proceed into Asia, particularly to Cyzicum. I commend my family to you. I hardly and wretchedly support myself. Dated the 18th of April, from the neighbourhood of Tarentum.

LETTER VII.

I arrived at Brundisium the 18th of April. The same day your servant delivered to me your letter; and, the third day after, another servant brought me another letter. Your kindness in inviting me to join me to your house in Epirus, is very gratifying to me, and nothing new, and what I should wish to do if I might spend my whole time there; for I dislike places that are frequented: I avoid mankind, and can hardly bear to see the light. That retirement would not be unpleasant to me, especially in so familiar a place; but to turn aside for the sake of making an excursion thither, is, in the first place, out of my way; then it would expose me to Antonius, and the rest of that set, for four days' journey,—and would, besides, be without you. For a fortified castle, if I were living there, might be desirable; to a mere passenger would be useless. If I dared I would go to Athens: I certainly should like it: but at this time many of my enemies are there,—and I have not you with me; and I fear they may interpret even that city to be not sufficiently distant from Italy; nor do you say on what day I may expect you. By calling upon me to preserve my life, you produce only this effect,—of preventing me from laying hands on myself; you cannot prevent my repenting of my determination, and of my life: for what is there that should attach me to it? especially if there is no longer that hope which accompanied me in my flight. I will not attempt to enumerate all the miseries into which I have fallen through the extreme malice and wickedness not so much of my enemies as of my

1 Cyzicum was situated on the Asiatic side of the Propontis.
2 Atticus's place in Epirus lay within the proscribed district; and his reason was, that Cicero did not feel himself at liberty to reside there in security. He was even apprehensive that some of his enemies might deem Athens to be too near to Italy.
enviers, lest I should exasperate my own grief and bring you into the same distress. This I affirm, that nobody was ever affected with so heavy a calamity, nobody had ever more reason to wish for death,—the most honourable time for which has already passed by; the time that remains may bring an end to my trouble, but not a remedy. On the subject of the republic I see you collect every thing which you think can afford me any hope of a change of circumstances. Little as this is, yet, since you will have it so, let us wait for it. In the mean time, if you make haste you will yet be able to join me; for I shall either go into Epirus or shall pass slowly through Candavira.

My doubt about Epirus is not owing to my irresolution, but to my uncertainty where I may meet with my brother, whom indeed I know not how I shall be able either to see or to take leave of. This is the greatest and saddest of all my miseries. I would write to you oftener, and more at length, if my grief did not take away all the powers of my mind, and above all the power of writing. I long to see you. Farewell. Dated the 30th of April, at Brundisium.

LETTER VIII.

On leaving Brundisium, I informed you why I did not go into Epirus; because of its vicinity to Greece, which was full of daring enemies, and because the passage out was difficult when I might wish to leave it. Besides this, I received two messages while I was at Dyrrachium, one to say that my brother would go by sea from Ephesus to Athens; the other that he would go by land through Macedonia. I sent therefore to Athens, to desire that he would come from there to Thessalonica; and went myself to Thessalonica, where I arrived the 23rd of May. I have heard nothing certain about his journey, except that he had a little before left Ephesus. I have now full of alarm about the proceedings at Rome2; for though you tell me, in a letter dated the 15th of May, that you had heard he was likely to be brought to a severe account, and in another letter that things were now more favourable,—yet this last is dated a day earlier than the other, which adds to my uneasiness: so that while my daily trouble distresses and wastes me, this additional vexation leaves me scarcely any life remaining. But the voyage is a very difficult one; and from his uncertainty where I might be, he may perhaps have taken a different course. For Phaëto, his freedman, has not seen him; but being driven back by the wind into Macedonia, he met me at Pella. I see how much reason I have to fear what is to come. nor do I know what to say. I am afraid of everything; for there is nothing so miserable that may not happen in my present circumstances. Wretched enough before in my great afflictions and sorrows, with the addition of this apprehension, I remain at Thessalonica in suspense.

1 Candavira was a mountainous district on the borders of Macedonia.
2 A port of Albania, opposite to Brundisium.

and have no courage for anything. Now, in answer to your inquiries, I have not seen Trypho Cæcilius. Your conversation with Pompeius I have understood from your letter. I do not see so great a commotion to hang over the republic, as you either see or represent with a view of comforting me; for the business of Tigranes having passed over, all difficulties seem to be removed. You desire me to return thanks to Varro, which I will do, and likewise to Hypsaeus. I think of following your advice in not going further off till the decrees of May are brought to me, but where I shall remain I am not yet determined; for I am so uneasy about Quintus that I can resolve upon nothing: but I will immediately let you know. From the irresolution apparent in my letters, I imagine you perceive the disturbance of my mind; which, though I am afflicted with an inconceivable and heavy calamity, is not however so much owing to the greatness of my misfortune as to the recollection of my own fault,—for you now see by whose iniquity I have been led on and betrayed. I wish you had perceived it sooner, and had not, with me, given up your whole mind to grief. When, therefore, you hear of my being oppressed and worn out with sadness, remember that I am more affected with the penalty of my folly than with the event itself; that I should have trusted him with such suspicion of his wickedness. The sense of my misfortunes, and apprehension for my brother, stop my writing. See after and regulate all these matters. Terenæa returns you the greatest thanks. I have sent you a copy of the letter which I wrote to Pompeius. Dated the 29th of May, at Thessalonica.

LETTER IX.

My brother Quintus having left Asia before the first of May and reached Athens on the fifteenth, was obliged to make great haste, that his absence might not expose him to difficulty, in case there should be anybody not yet satisfied with the sum of my misfortunes. I wished him, therefore, rather to hasten to Rome than to come to me. At the same time (for I will confess the truth, from which you may perceive the greatness of my sufferings) I could not bring my mind either to look upon him, who was so tenderly attached to me, under the effect of such affliction, or present before him, and suffer him to behold, my own wretchedness sunk in grief, and my ruined condition. I dreaded also, what would certainly have happened, that he might be unable to quit me, I continued the time when he would either be obliged to dismiss his lieutors,1 or would be forcibly torn from my embrace. The effect of this bitterness I have avoided by other bitterness, of not seeing my brother. You, who made me preserve my life, have driven me into this situation. I now pay the 1 Clodius had, in consideration of a large sum of money, contrived to get the son of Tigranes out of Pompeius's custody, though not without a struggle, in which some lives were lost. This was likely to have caused a division among the triumvirs, Clodius being supported by Caesar. But it seems to have passed over.

2 This is meant of Pompeius.
3 The provincial governors were allowed to retain their lieutors and fæces, the assign of their rank, till they returned to Rome; but might be obliged to dismiss them previously, if they used unnecessary delay.
penalty of my error; though your letters encourage me,—from which I easily perceive the amount of your own hopes. These indeed afforded me consolation, till you came to that part,—" after Pompeius, now gain over Hortensius, and people of that description. I beseech you, my Pompeius, do you not yet see by whose means, by whose treachery, by whose baseness, I am ruined? But of this we will talk when we meet. I only say, what I imagine you know, that it is not my enemies, but my enviers, who have undone me. Now, if indeed things are as you hope, I will support myself, and use my best endeavours, with that hope which you bid me entertain. But if, as it appears to me, things are fixed and settled, what I was not permitted to do in the best manner must be done in one less becoming'. Terentia often acknowledges her obligations to you. One of my troubles in apprehension is the business of my poor brother. When I know how this will be determined, I shall know what I ought to do. The expectation of letters, and of those advantages which you hold out, keeps me, as you advise, at Thessalonica. If any news arrives, I shall know what is hereafter to be done. If, as you mention, you left Rome on the first of June, we shall very soon meet. I send you the letter which I wrote to Pompeius. Dated the 13th of June, at Thessalonica.

LETTER X.

What has taken place, up to the 25th of May, I have learned from your letters; the rest I waited to hear at Thessalonica, as you advised. When this account arrives, I shall more easily be able to determine where I shall be; for if there is occasion, if anything is done, if I see any hope, I will either remain where I am, or will go to your house in Epirus. But if, as you say, these prospects should have vanished, I must make some other arrangement. Hitherto you show me nothing besides the disgrace of those people,—which, however, relates to everything rather than to me. I do not see, therefore, how this can help me: still as long as you encourage me to hope, I will obey you: for when you charge me so often and so severely, and upbraid me with want of courage, I beseech you, what evil is there which does not enter into my calamity? who ever fell at once from such a lofty state? in so good a cause? with such force of talents, and wisdom, and favour? such support from all honest men? Can I forget what I am? Can I help feeling what I am? what honour I have lost? what glory? what children? what fortunes? what a brother? whom (to teach you a new species of calamity) though I loved him, and have always loved him, more than myself, yet I avoided seeing, that I might neither be witness to his grief and mourning, nor present myself to him in ruin and affliction, whom he had left in the height of prosperity. I omit other grievous considerations,—for I am prevented by tears. And ought I then to be reproached for my weakness? or rather for having committed so great a fault as not to retain these advantages (which might easily have been done, if plots for my destruction had not been laid within my own walls), or at least not to lose them but with my life? I have mentioned this, that you might rather relieve me, as you do, than that you should think me deserving of reproach and blame. And I write the less to you, because I am interrupted by my sorrows; and in truth I have more to expect from thence than to say myself. If any intelligence is brought me, I will acquaint you with my determination. I wish you to write to me, as you have hitherto done, about everything, that I may not remain in ignorance on any point. Dated the 18th of June, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XI.

Your letters and some favourable reports, though not on the best authority, and the hope of hearing further from you, and your advice, have all kept me at Thessalonica. When I shall have received the letters I expect, if there is indeed that hope which has been encouraged by rumours, I will go to your house; if it is otherwise, I will take care to inform you what I do. Continue to assist me as you do with your exertions, your advice, and influence. Have done with consolation, and cease to upbraid me. When you do so, I seem to have lost your affection, and to have lost your sympathy; whom I conceive to be so affected with my misfortunes, that you are yourself insensible. Support my excellent and kind brother Quintus. I beg you to write to me fully everything that may be depended upon. Dated the 28th of June.

LETTER XII.

You argue seriously about what may be hoped, especially through the senate; and at the same time you add, that the clause of the law (for my banishment) is stuck up, by which nothing is allowed to be said, and accordingly nothing is said. In this state of things do you blame me for being afflicted? while I am, as you yourself know, in such affliction as nobody ever felt. You hold out hopes from the new elections; but what hope is there with the same tribune of the people, and a hostile consul elect? I am much hurt about the speech which has been brought forward. Try if possible to heal this wound. I wrote it long since in anger, because he had first attacked me; but I had so suppressed it, that I never imagined it would get abroad. How it should have got out I do not know; but as it never happened that I had

1 Alluding to his death. Suicide was not then held to be either a crime or a disgrace. Cato and Attilius adopted it in perfect conformity with the principles of their respective sects. Cicero here, as elsewhere, plainly exposes one leading principle of the Academicians, to whose sect he belonged, that they were unable to do what they considered to be best, they ought to do that which was next best.
2 The triumvirs, Caesar, Crassus, and Pompeius.
any dispute with him in person; and as it seems to me to be written more carelessly than my other speeches, it may possibly be concluded not to be mine. I should wish, if you think I can by any means be re-established, that you would do what you can in this business; but if I must needs be undone, I am less solicitous about it. I continue still in the same place, without any power of conversing, or thinking. Though, as you mention, I had expressed a wish that you might come to me at Dodon; yet I understand that where you are, you are of real use to me, and that here you could not relieve me by one word of comfort. I am unable to write more; nor indeed have I anything to say. I expect rather to hear from you. Dated the 17th of July, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XIII.

(Græv. xiv.)

From your letters I am full of expectation about Pompeius, what he may intend, or declare concerning me; for I imagine the comitia are over: after which you mention that he wished to have my case considered. If my hopes make me appear foolish to you, I entertain them by your desire, though I am aware that your letters have rather been calculated to check me and my expectations. I should be glad now to hear distinctly what you think. I know that I have fallen into this trouble by the many faults I have committed. If any chance should in any degree rectify them, I shall the less regret that I have lived, and continue to live. On account of the constant communication of this road, and my daily expectation of news, I have not yet moved from Thessalonica; but I am now driven away, not by Planicus, (for he would rather keep me,) but by the nature of the place itself, which is ill calculated to bear the pain of such calamities. I did not go into Epirus, as I had mentioned, because lately all accounts and letters had agreed that there was no occasion for my being so near Italy. Therefore, as soon as I hear the event of the elections, I shall go into Asia, though I am not yet certain to what place; but you shall hear. Dated the 21st of July, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XIV.

(Græv. xiii.)

After seeing my hopes diminish, and at length vanish, I changed my intention, which I had mentioned to you, of going into Epirus; nor have I moved from Thessalonica, where I determined to remain till I should hear something from you about what you mentioned in your last letter; that something would be proposed in the senate on my behalf as soon as the comitia were over; and that Pompeius had told you so. Wherefore, since the comitia are passed, and you say nothing, I thence consider it the same as if you had written to tell me that nothing was done: nor shall I regret having been led by the hope of so near a termination. But as to the commotion which you said you fore-saw, and which seemed likely to turn to my advantage, they who have lately arrived, say there will be none. My remaining hope is in the tribunes elect. If I wait for this, you will have no reason to think me inattentive to my interest, and to the wishes of my friends. When you blame me for bearing my misfortunes so heavily, you ought to excuse me, seeing that I am afflicted as you never saw, or heard any one to be. For as to what you say you hear of my grief having turned my head, my head is sound enough. I wish it had been so in the time of my danger, when I was so unkindly and cruelly treated by those whom I supposed to have been my friends: who, when they saw me begin to waver in my resolution, urged me on in such a manner as to use all their wickedness and perfidiousness to my destruction. Now, since I am going to Cyzicum, where I shall have fewer opportunities of receiving letters, I hope you will be the more particular in letting me hear everything which you think I ought to know. Continue to love my brother Quintus. If in my own wretchedness I leave him safe, I shall not esteem myself wholly ruined. Dated the 5th of August.

LETTER XV.

On the 13th of August I received four letters from you: one, in which you reproach me with want of firmness; another, in which you mention that a freedman of Crassus had told you of my anxiety and emaciation; the third, in which you inform me what has been done in the senate; the fourth, about what you say Varro had confirmed to you respecting the disposition of Pompeius. To the first I reply, that my grief is so far from affecting my understanding, that it is an additional source of grief to have no opportunity, no person with whom I may employ that understanding which is unimpaired. For if you cannot without uneasiness lose me alone, what do you suppose I must feel, who lose you and everybody? And if you, who are living in security, yet want me, how do you suppose I must want that very security itself? I do not care to enumerate all that has been taken from me; not only because you are already acquainted with it, but also that I may not aggravate my affliction. This I affirm, that nobody was ever bereft of such great advantages, or ever fell into such miseries. Moreover, time does not only not mitigate this distress, but even augments it. Other troubles are softened by age; this cannot fall daily to increase, both from the sense of actual misery, and from the recollection of my past life: for I want not merely my goods, and my friends, but myself. For what am I? But I will not be the occasion either of distressing your mind with lamentations, or of handing oftener than is necessary, my own wounds. For as to exculpating those whom I mentioned to have injured me, and among the rest, Cato; I am so far from imagining him to be implicated in that crime, that it is a great source of pleasure to me that the proofs of his guilt should have had more weight with me than his honesty. The others whom you exculpate, ought to stand excused by

2 It is doubtful what this means, or whether there may not be some error in the text.
3 At Rome.
4 Ca. Planicus, a friend of Cicero, was quaestor under L. Appuleius, who had the praetorian government of Macedonia.
5 I agree with M. Mongault in understanding this to mean the hope he had cherished of being soon restored.

me, if they are so by you. But about these things we trouble ourselves too late. As for Crassus's freedman, I imagine he is not sincere in anything he has said. You describe the business to have been well managed in the senate. But what says Curio? Has he not read that speech which has been brought forward I know not from whence? Axius, however, giving me an account of the transactions of the same day, does not so much commend Curio. But he has told me something; you have unadvisedly said nothing beyond the fact. The conversation of Varro affords some hope of Caesar. I wish Varro may himself engage in my cause; which I am persuaded he will do, both of his own accord and from your solicitation. Should fortune ever restore me to the possession of you and my country, I shall certainly endeavour to give you, of all my friends, the greatest cause of rejoicing at it; and shall so fulfil the demands of duty and affection, (which have before, I confess, been too little manifested,) that you shall think me restored to you, no less than to my brother and my children.

If I have in anything behaved ill towards you, or rather since I have done so, pray pardon me; for I have behaved much worse towards myself. I do not write this because I am not fully aware of the advantage I have in great affection; but in truth, for the regard you have and have had for me, had I been deserved on my part, you never would have suffered me to remain in want of that prudence in which you abounded; nor would you have suffered me to be persuaded that it was to my advantage to have the law concerning the companies 6 carried through. But you administered to my grief nothing but tears, the effect of your love; as I did myself. Whatever might have been effected, had I possessed claim upon you to consider day and night what I ought to do; that has been omitted, not through your fault, but mine. But if not merely you, but anybody, when I took alarm at the ungenerous reply of Pompeius, 6 had called me back from that disgraceful counsel, which you of all people was most able to do, I should either have fallen with honour, or should now live victorious. You must forgive me what I say; I confess myself much the most; next I accuse you as another self, and at the same time an associate in my fault. If I am restored, I shall think myself even less to blame; and shall certainly possess your affection through your own kindness, since it will be independent of any received from me.

Concerning the conversation which you mention to have had with Caleo on the invalidity of a private law; there may be something in it; but it is much better to have it abrogated. For if nobody prevents it, what can be more secure? Or if anybody should not allow it to be carried, the same decree of the senate will still operate to invalidate it. Nor is there need of anything else besides the abrogation; for the former of Cidlius's two laws did not affect me. 6 And if at the time of its promulgation, I had either thought fit to approve it, or, as it deserved, to disregard it, it could have done me no harm. Here first my judgment failed, or rather injured me. I was blind, I say; blind in changing my habit, and supplanting the people; which, unless I should have been attacked by name, was prejudicial to me. But I am going back to things that are past. It is however with this view, that if anything is done in this business, you may not meddle with that law which contains many popular enactments. But it is foolish in me to prescribe what you should do, or how. I only wish something may be done; on which subject your letter is rather reserved, lest, I suppose, I should feel my disappointment too severely. For what do you see possible to be done? or by what means? By the senate? But you have told me yourself that Cidlius had fixed upon the door-post of the senate-house that clause in the law which makes it illegal to reconsider it, or to speak of it. How then is it that Domitius has said he would move for its reconsideration? or how is it that Cidlius should have been silent, while some, as you mention, were speaking of that affair, and demanding its reconsideration? But if anything is to be done by the people, can they act without the concurrence of all the tribunes of the people? What of my house? Can that be restored? or if not, how am I myself restored? Unless you see some means of solving these difficulties, what is the hope to which you call me? And if there is no hope, what is life itself? I shall therefore wait at Thessalonica for an account of the transactions of the 1st of August, from which I may determine whether I shall take refuge in your grounds, (that I may both avoid seeing people whom I do not like, and may, as you say, see you, and be nearer at hand in case anything is done,) and this I understand you and my brother Quintus to advise, or whether I shall go to Cyzicus. Now then, my Pomponius, since you have exerted no portion of your prudence for my safety; either because you supposed that I was sufficiently capable of judging for myself; or that you owed me nothing; you may merely have been excused by him; and since I have been betrayed, prevailed upon, seduced to neglect all my supports; have dispointed and deserted all Italy, ready to rise in my defence; have given up myself, my friends, into the power of my enemies; while you looked on in silence, who if your judgment was not better than mine, at least had less to fear, raise up, if you can, my afflicted friends, and in this yet assist me. But if all roads are obstructed, let me be informed even of that: and cease at length either to chide me, or civilly to offer me consolation. If I meant to accuse your want of faithfulness, I should not trust myself in preference to your roof. No, I accuse my own folly, in supposing that your love for me was equal to my wishes. Had this been the case, you would have shown the same fidelity, but greater care; and certainly would have held me back when I was hastening to my ruin; nor would you have encountered those troubles which you now sustain in my shipwreck. Take care then to let me know everything clearly and distinctly; and help me, as you do, to be again somebody, since I can no longer be what I was, and what I might have been.

TO TITUS POMPONIUS ATTICUS.

And believe that it is not you, but myself, that I accuse in this letter. If there are any, to whom you think letters should be sent in my name, I should be glad if you would write, and take care to have them delivered. Dated the 19th of August.

LETTER XVI.

All my motions are rendered uncertain from nothing else but the expectation of your letter of the 1st of August. If it affords any hope, I shall go into Epirus; if not, to Cyzicum, or some other place. The former I judge is more agreeable to you, the more my hopes decline; for the reading them weakens the hope they were meant to excite: so that it is very evident you are actuated by a regard both to my consolation and to truth. I, therefore, beg you distinctly to tell me what you know, as it really is; what you think, as you really think. Dated the 21st of August.

LETTER XVII.

The accounts I had received about my brother Quintus had been unfavourable, and without variation, from the 4th of June to the 31st of August. On that day Livineius, the freed-man of Regulus, came to me from his master; he reported that no mention of my brother's administration had been made; but that there had been some talk about the son of Caius Clodius. He also brought me a letter from my brother. The next day Sestius' servant arrived with your letter, not so free from apprehension as the verbal communication of Livineius. In truth, I am very anxious in the midst of my own great distress, and the more so, because the question will come before Appius. The other matters which you mention in the same letter, relating to my hopes, seem to be less flattering than what I hear from other people. But, since the time is not far distant when the business must be determined, I shall either go to your house,

[1] Epirus, has been referred to above.

[2] P. Clodius had two brothers, Caius and Appius. The former had died, leaving two sons; the latter is the same who is afterwards spoken of in this letter.

[3] The Latin is "ad te." Many instances might be produced to justify this translation. It is similar to what occurs in the Acts, xvi. 46. πόρος τῷ Άρτιο, meaning "Lydia's house."
CICERO salutes Q. Cecilius, the son of Quintus, Pomponianus Atticus*. That this should be so, and that your uncle should have discharged this duty to you, I exceedingly desire; I would say that I rejoiced at it, if I could use this word. Alas! how would everything be according to my mind, had it not been for want of courage, of prudence, of honesty, in those whom I trusted: which I care not to recollect, lest I add to my regret. But I am sure you must remember the life I led; how many delights it contained, how much dignity. To recover this, I beseech you by your fortunes; strive as you do; and enable me to spend the birth-day of my return with you and with my relations in your delicious house. I wished to have stayed at your place in Epirus for this hope and expectation, which is held out to me; but the letters I receive make me think it more convenient to remain where I am. Respecting my house, and Curio’s speech, it is as you say. The general restoration, if it be granted, will contain everything. But there is nothing about which I am more anxious than my house. However, I mention nothing to you in particular; I commend myself wholly to your affection and fidelity. It is very gratifying to me, that in so great an inheritance you should have been able to extricate yourself from all trouble. When you promise your services on my behalf, that on every occasion I may derive assistance from you, rather than from anybody else, I am very sensible how great a support this is; and I know that you undertake, and are able to sustain, many kind offices for my preservation; and that you need not be entreated to do so. When you forbid me to suspect that I had either done or neglected to do anything towards you, which could give you offence; I will comply with your request, and free myself from that source of uneasiness: nevertheless, I am indebted to you so much the more, in proportion to the excess of your kindness towards me, over mine towards you. I beg you to tell me what you see, what you hear, what is done; and to exhort all your friends to assist me. The proposed law of Sestius is deficient both in dignity and caution: for it ought expressly to name me, and to mention more particularly my effects; and I should be glad if you would attend to this circumstance. Dated the 4th of October, at Thessalonica.

LETTER XXII.

Though my brother Quintus and Piso had acquainted me with the state of affairs; yet I wished that your engagements had not prevented you from writing, as usual, about what was doing, and what conclusions you drew from it. The hospitality of Plancius has hitherto retained me, when I have several times attempted to go into Epirus. He has entertained the hope, which I cannot say I have, that we might be able to go away together; which he expects may do him honour. But now that soldiers are said to be coming, it will be necessary for me to leave him. When I go, I will immediately write to inform you where I am. Lentulus by his kindness towards me, which his actions, his promises, and his letters declare, affords some hope of the good disposition of Pompeius. For you have often told me in your letters, that he was entirely under Pompeius’s influence. My brother has written to me about Metellus, how much he hoped had been effected through you. My dear Pomponius, expect yourself that I may again be permitted to live with you and with my friends; and write to me everything. I am oppressed not only with grief, but with the want of all that was dearer to me than myself. Farewell! As I knew if I went through Thessaly into Epirus I should be a long while without intelligence, and as I have friends at Dyrrachium, I have come to them, after writing the former part of my letter at Thessalonica. When I set out again for your place, I will let you know; and I trust you will send me an exact account of everything, of whatever kind it may be. I now look for the thing itself, or lose all hope. Dated the 26th of November, at Dyrrachium.

LETTER XXIII.

On the 27th of November I received three letters from you; one dated the 25th of October, in which you encourage me to wait with firmness for the month of January*, and say everything that can lead to hope; such as the zeal of Lentulus, the good-will of Metellus, and the whole design of Pompeius. In another letter, contrary to your custom, you do not mention the date; though you sufficiently mark the time by saying that you write on the same day on which the law was promulgated by the eight tribunes†; that is, the 29th of October; and you add what advantage you conceive that promulgation to have produced. From which, if my restoration is become desperate by the fate of this law, I should hope, for your love of me, you will esteem this fruitless diligence of a mine rather unhappy than absurd; but if there be indeed any hope, that you will use your endeavour to make the new magistrates hereafter extort themselves with greater diligence in my support. For that proposed law of the old tribunes and

* This is the conclusion of the letter, to which what follows is a postscript: the letter having been written at Thessalonica, the postscript at Dyrrachium.

† Eight of the ten tribunes proposed the repeal of Cicero’s banishment, but it was necessary that they all be unanimous.

‡ He means the pains he was taking in this letter.
comprised three heads; one for my return, which was inaducibly drawn up; for by it nothing is restored besides my citizenship and my rank; which the condition is a great deal; but what ought to have been secured, and in what manner, cannot have escaped you. The next head is copied from the ordinary form of indemnity, in case anything should be enacted in support of this law, which was contrary to other existing laws. As for the third head, observe, my Pompomius, with what design, and by whom, it was inserted. For you know that Clodius added such sanctions to his law as should put it almost, or altogether, out of the power either of the senate, or of the people, to invalidate it. But you know also that the sanctions of laws which are abrogated, are never regarded. Were it otherwise, scarcely any could be abrogated; for there is none which is not fenced round by some obstacle to its repeal. But when a law is repealed, that very clause is repealed, which was meant for its security. Notwithstanding this is so, and has always been so held and observed, our eight tribunes have inserted this clause: ‘If there be anything contained in this law, which by any laws or decrees, that is, which by the Claudian law, it is not, and shall not be, strictly lawful to promulgate, abrogate, diminish, or supersede; or which subjects to a penalty, or fine thereupon, whosoever hath promulgated, abrogated, diminished, or superseded it; nothing of such kind is enacted by this law.’ And this could not affect those tribunes; for they were not bound by the enactment of their own law. It affords the greater suspicion of some malice, that they should have inserted what was immaterial to themselves, but prejudicial to me; that the new tribunes of the people, if they were at all timid, might think it still more necessary to use the same clause. Nor has that been overlooked by Clodius; for he said in the assembly on the 3rd of November, that under this head was prescribed to the tribunes elect what was the extent of their authority. But you are aware that no law has any clause of this kind; which, if it were necessary, all would have, that go to abrogate a former law. I wish you could find out how this should have escaped Ninnius and the other tribunes, and who introduced it; and how it happened that eight tribunes of the people should not have hesitated to bring my cause before the senate. Or can it be that they, who thought this clause might be disregarded, should at the same time be so cautious in abrogating it, as to be afraid of that, when they were free from the law, which need not be observed by those who were bound by the law? This clause I certainly should not wish the new tribunes to propose: but let them enact what they will; the clause which recalls me, provided the thing be accomplished, will satisfy me. I am already ashamed of having written so much about it: for, I fear, by the time you read it, the thing will be past hope, so that my cause may appear to you plain and ridiculous. But if there is anything to be hoped, look at the law which Visellius drew up for T. Radius, which pleases me exceedingly: for I do not like that of our friend Sestius, which you say you approved. The third letter is dated on the 13th of November, in which you explain sensibly and accurately what it is that seems to delay my business; about Crassus, Pompeius, and the rest. I beg you, therefore, if there is any hope that it can be accomplished by the wishes, the authority, the collected numbers of honest men, that a general push may be made; attend to this, and excite others. But if, as I too plainly see, both by your suspicions and my own, that there is really no hope; I pray and beseech you to love my brother Quintus, whom I have wretchedly ruled; and not to suffer him to adopt any measures which may be inexpedient for your sister’s son. As for your poor Cicero, to whom I leave nothing but ill-will and disgrace, protect him as well as you can, and support by your kind attention Terentia, of all women the most afflicted. I shall go into Epirus as soon as I have received the intelligence of the first day’s proceedings. I hope you will inform me in your next letter how the beginning passed off. Dated the 30th of November.

LETTER XXIV.

When you mentioned to me before, that the provinces of the consuls had been appointed with your approbation; though I was afraid how this might turn out, yet I hoped your better judgment might have some reason for it. But since I have heard, both by word of mouth and by letter, that this proposal of yours is very much blamed, I have been deeply concerned; inasmuch as that little hope, which remained, seems to be taken away. For if the tribunes of the people are offended, what hope can there be? And they may with reason be offended, when they, who had undertaken my cause, have been left out of consideration, and by our concession have lost the extirpation of their just rights; especially when they declare that they wished for my sake to have the power of making out the appointments of the consuls; not that they might throw any impediment in the way, but that they might attach them to my cause: but that now, if the consuls are ill disposed towards me, they may show it without constraint; or if they should be inclined to support me, still they can do nothing without the concurrence of the tribunes. For as to what you say, that unless my friends had consented, they would have attained the same purpose through the people: this could not be done against the sense of the tribunes: so that I fear we may have lost the good-will of the tribunes; or, if that still remains, that the bond of union with the consuls may have been lost. Another no small disadvantage attached to this is, that the

* Atticus had no other concern in it than as being one of Cicero’s principal friends and agents at Rome. It seems that the appointment of the provinces was a check upon the conduct of the consuls, which was exercised in great measure by the tribunes. By having the appointment previous to their entering upon their office, the tribunes lost this control, and the consuls became independent.

[3] This had been done in the case of Caesar.

[4] Any one of the tribunes might interpose to stop the progress of a law in the popular assembly.
solemn resolution, as it was represented to me, that the senate would pass no act before my cause was determined, has been broken; and that, on an occasion which was not only unnecessary, but quite unusual and novel. For I do not believe that the provinces were ever before appointed for the consuls elect. Hence that firmness, which was shown in my behalf, having been once infringed, there is nothing now which may not be decreed. It is not surprising that this should have pleased those friends to whom it was referred: for it would be difficult to find anybody who would openly give an opinion in opposition to such advantages of the two consuls. It was impossible not to favour either so friendly a man as Lentulus, or Metellus, who so kindly laid aside his resentment. But yet I fear whether we may be able to keep these, and may not have lost the tribunates of the people. How this has turned out, and what is the state of the whole business, I wish you to inform me; and with your usual frankness. For the truth itself, though it may not be agreeable, is yet acceptable to me. Dated the 10th of December.

LETTER XXV.

SUBSEQUENT to your departure, I have received letters from Rome, by which I perceive that I must pine away in this sad condition. For (you will pardon me) if any hope of my re-establishment had remained, such is your affection, that you would not have gone away at this time. But that I may not seem ungrateful, or willing that everything should be sacrificed along with me, I say no.

c From Rome. It is generally agreed by commentators that the words "a me" ought to be omitted. If they are retained, I should still understand it to mean "since you left my affairs at Rome." For the tenor of these letters forbid the supposition of Atticus's having been with Cicero.

d It is probable that Atticus might have written to say that some business called him away from Rome at this time; to which Cicero replies, that he would not be more upon the subject. This I beg of you, that you will endeavour, as you promised, wherever I may be, to stop your progress before the first of January.

LETTER XXVI.

I have received a letter from my brother Quintus with the decree of the senate concerning me. It is my intention to wait for the passing of the law; and if there is any malignant opposition, I will avow myself of the authority of the senate, and will rather lose my life, than my country. Pray make haste to come to me.

LETTER XXVII.

I see by your letters, and by the case itself, that I am utterly lost. I beg that in any concerns in which my family may stand in need of your assistance, you will have compassion upon my wretchedness. I hope, as you say, that I shall shortly see you.

[The law for Cicero's recall was for some time obstructed by the tribune Serranus, who had been gained over by Clodius. At length, however, it passed on the 4th of August, Cicero having already embarked for Italy, and arrived at Brundisium, where, three days afterwards, he received intelligence of the law having been ratified with great zeal and unanimity by all the centuries.]

though I wish to think that Atticus should sacrifice everything for his sake.

e The decrees of the senate had not the force of a law till they were confirmed by the people. But the law of Cicero's banishment having been carried by illegal means, the senate had on this occasion passed a vote, "that if, through any violence, or obstruction, the law for his recall was not suffered to pass, within the five next legal days of assembly, Cicero should be at liberty to return, without any further authority."—Life of Cicero, p. 102.

BOOK IV.

LETTER I.

As soon as I came to Rome, and met with anybody to whom I could properly entrust a letter to you, I thought nothing deserved my earlier attention, than sending to congratulate you upon my return. For I had found, to tell you the truth, that in giving me advice, you were as much in want of fortitude and prudence, as myself; and considering my former attachment to you, that you had not been ever diligent in protecting my safety. Yet you, who had at first partaken of my error, or rather madness, and had been the companion of my false alarm, bare our separation with much unæsiness, and spared no pains, no exertion, diligence, or trouble, to bring about my restoration. And I may truly affirm, that amidst the greatest joy, and most wished-for congratulations, the only thing wanting to complete my satisfaction, is to see, or rather to embrace you; whom once possessed, I hope never again to leave. If I do not make amends also for all the neglected fruits of your kindness in the time that is gone by, I shall verily think myself undeserving of this return of fortune. I have already obtained, what I conceived most difficult to be recovered in my situation, that distinction in the forum, that authority in the senate, and favour among good men, in a greater degree than I could have hoped. But in regard to my property, which, as you know, has been violated, dissipated, and plundered, I am in great difficulty; and I stand in need, not so much of your money, which I look upon as my own, but of your advice, in gathering and securing the remains of it.

f This explanation of this and the following sentences is found in letter 15, book iii.
Now, though I imagine that everything has been either related to you by your friends, or brought by messengers and common report: yet I will shortly describe what I think you will most wish to be informed of by my own letters. I left Dyrrachium on the 4th of August, on the very day when the law passed for my recall. On the 5th I came to Brundisium, where my dear Tullia was ready to receive me on her birth-day, which happened also to be the anniversary of the foundation of the Brundisian colony, and of the temple of Public Safety in your neighborhood. This was noticed by the populace and celebrated with great rejoicing. On the 8th of August, while I was at Brundisium, I heard from my brother Quintus, that the law had been confirmed in the assembly of centuries, with an astonishing zeal among all ranks and ages, and an incredible concurrence of all Italy. Thereupon, having been honoured by the principal people of Brundisium, as I pursued my journey I was met by messengers of congratulation from all parts. On approaching the capital I saw there not only any of the orders of citizens known to my nomenclator, who did not come to meet me, excepting those enemies, who could not either dissemble, or deny their hostility. When I arrived at the Capenan gate, the steps of the temples were filled with the lower classes of people, who signified their congratulations with the loudest applause; and a similar throng and applause attended me quite to the capital: and in the forum, and in the capital itself, the people cried aloud for my name, and the names of my friends. The day following, which was the 5th of September, I returned thanks to the senate. These two days the price of provisions being very high, the people collected tumultuously, by the instigation of Clodius, first at the theatre, then at the senate, crying out that I had occasioned the dearth of corn. At the same time, the senate having met upon the subject of the supplies, was being called upon by the voice, not only of the populace, but of the better sort, to provide for it, and being himself desirous of it, and the people calling upon me by name to propose a decree for that purpose, I did so, and explained fully my sentiments, in the absence of others of consular rank, who said they could not with safety declare their opinions, excepting Messalla and Afranius. A decree of the senate was accordingly passed agreeably to my proposal, that Pompeius should be engaged to undertake the business, and that a law should be brought in. Upon the recital of this decree, when the populace, according to this silly and new custom, had given their applause, repeating my name, I harangued the assembly by the permission of all the magistrates present, excepting one prator and two tribunes of the people. The next day there was a full senate, and all the consular senators granted whatever Pompeius asked for. Upon his demanding fifteen lieutenants, he named me at the head of them, and said that I should be in everything another self. The consuls drew up a law, giving to Pompeius the power of regulating the corn all over the world for five years. Messius Pompeius harangued upon my absence, and endeavored to make me believe, that I had one of the highest commands in the world, and a greater authority in the provinces, than was possessed by the governors themselves. That consular law of mine now appears quite modest; this of Messius intolerable. Pompeius says he prefers the former; his friends are for the latter. The consular senators, headed by Favonius, exclaim against it; I say nothing; more especially because the pontifices have yet given no opinion respecting my house. If they remove the religious impediments, I shall have a noble age, and, according to the resolution of the senate, the consuls will estimate the value of the buildings: if it is otherwise, they will pull down what is now there, will contract for a house in their own names, and will make an estimate of the whole amount. Such is the situation of my affairs; hazardous for a state of prosperity; for a state of adversity, good.

1 The most dignified assembly of the people was that in which the works were praised by the people and an publicans. Pompeius harangued on my absence, and endeavored to make me believe, that I had one of the highest commands in the world, and a greater authority in the provinces, than was possessed by the governors themselves. That consular law of mine now appears quite modest; this of Messius intolerable. Pompeius says he prefers the former; his friends are for the latter. The consular senators, headed by Favonius, exclaim against it; I say nothing; more especially because the pontifices have yet given no opinion respecting my house. If they remove the religious impediments, I shall have a noble age, and, according to the resolution of the senate, the consuls will estimate the value of the buildings: if it is otherwise, they will pull down what is now there, will contract for a house in their own names, and will make an estimate of the whole amount. Such is the situation of my affairs; hazardous for a state of prosperity; for a state of adversity, good.

2 Clodius, when he destroyed Cicero's house in Rome, consecrated part of the area on which it stood, and erected a temple there to the goddess Lactantia. The remaining part Clodius had planted, and appropriated to his own use. Hence it is that Cicero goes on to say, if the consecration of the area be set aside, he shall have a noble space for a new house; or if it should not he set aside, that the consuls were at least to clear the ground, and contract for the building of a house for him on the unconsecrated part.

LETTER II.

If it happens that you hear from me less frequently than from some others, I beg you will not attribute it to my neglect, nor even to my occupations; which, great as they are, yet can never interrupt the course of my affection and duty. But since I came to Rome, it is now only the second time that I have known of any body to whom I could entrust a letter; consequently this is the second I have sent. In the former I described to you the manner of my return, and what was my situation, and the condition of all my affaires, hazardous for a state of prosperity, for a state of adversity good enough. After the date of that letter, there followed a great contest about my house. I spake before the pontifices the last day of September. The cause was diligently debated by me, so that if ever I made a figure in speaking, or if ever else, then at least the sense of my injuries, and the importance of the issue, added new force to my language. I could not therefore, withhold the speech from my young friends; and, though you do not ask for it, yet I shall shortly send it to you. The sentence of the pontifices was to this effect—if he who said he had made a dedication had not been specially appointed to that purpose by any order of the people, either in their centuries of tribes; then that part of the area appeared capable of being restored to the use of the people without any religious impediment." Upon this I was immediately congratulated; for nobody doubted but the house was adjudged to me. But presently that fellow 1 mounts the rostra, by permission of Appius, 2 and tells the people that the pontifices had given sentence in his favour, but that I was attempting to get possession by force; and he exhorts them to support him and the pontifices to defend their own liberties. Upon this, while even among that lowest rabble some wondered, some smiled at the fellow's madness, I had determined not to come forward till the consuls, by the decree of the senate, should first have contracted for the rebuilding of Catulus's portico. 3

On the first of October was held a full senate, at which all those pontifices, who were senators, were present. Marcellinus, who was much attached to me, being first called upon to speak, inquired of them what they had intended by their sentence. Upon which M. Lucullus, in the name of all his colleagues, replied, that the pontifices were the judges of religion, the senate of the law: that he and his colleagues had given their opinion upon the point of religion; that they would speak of the law in the senate. Each of them then being asked his opinion in turn, argued at length in my favour. When it came to Clodius to speak, he wished to wear out the day; 4 nor was there any end to it, till having spoken for nearly three hours, he was at length compelled, by the disapprobation and clamour of the senate, to bring his discourse to a conclusion. A decree of the senate being then made agreeably to the proposal of Marcellinus, with only one dissentient voice, Serranus interceded. 5 Immediately both consuls referred it to the senate to take this intercession into consideration; and the most dignified opinions were pronounced, that it was the pleasure of the senate that my house should be restored to me; that Catulus's portico should be rebuilt; that the resolution of the senate 6 should be supported by all the magistrates; that if any violence was offered, the senate would consider it as being done by his means who had interposed his negative. Serranus took fright, and Cornicius had recourse to his old force; and having cast off his upper garment, he threw himself at the feet of his son-in-law. 7 He asked to have the night to consider of it, which they were not disposed to grant, for they had not forgotten the first of January. 8 With some difficulty, however, this was acceded to by my consent. The next day the decree of the senate was made, which I sent you. Then the consuls contracted for the restoring of Catulus's portico. What Clodius had done was immediately demolished by the contractors, with universal approbation. The consuls, by the opinion of their counsellors, 9 valued what had been erected upon the ground at 2000 sestertii (16,000l.); 10 the other things very illiberally. My Tusculanum at 400 sestertii (4000l.). The Formianum at 250 sestertii (2000l.). This valuation was very much censured, not only by all the best people, but even by the common sort. You will naturally ask, then, what was the cause of it. They say it was my modesty, in neither objecting, nor strenuously urging my claims. But that is not the case, for this might indeed have been of advantage to me; but these same people, my Titus Pomponius, I say these very people, whom you know well enough, who have clipped my wings, are unwilling to let them grow again; but I hope they are already growing. Do you only come to me, which I am afraid of your not doing till late, owing to the arrival of your and my friend Varro. Having put you in possession of what has been done, let me inform you of my further designs. I have engaged myself to Pompeius in such a manner, as in no degree to be prevented from being at liberty, if I should wish it, either to offer myself for the censorship, should the next consuls hold the comitia for that purpose, or to take a votive legation 11 of almost all the shrines and groves; for so my affairs required. 12 And I wished to have it in my power either to canvass, or at the beginning of the summer to go from Rome: and in the mean time I thought it desirable to keep in the sight of the citizens who had shown me such great kindness. These are my views with regard to the public, but my domestic concerns are greatly embroiled. The building of my house at Rome is going on. You know with what expense, and what trouble, I am restoring my Formianum, which I am neither able to relinquish, nor to see. My Tusculanum I have advertised for sale. I cannot easily do without a villa near the city. The kindness of my friends has been exhausted in that business, which has produced nothing but disgrace; which you felt at a distance, I do fear. 13 By their favour and assistance I should easily have obtained everything, if my own defenders had permitted it. But I have now great trouble from this source. The other things which vex me are of a more secret nature. I enjoy the affection of my brother and of my daughter. I am expecting you.

9 It appears that the magistrates were accustomed to have the opinion of a council in conducting business of importance that was entrusted to them.
10 Cicero had paid for it 29,000l.
11 The senators not being permitted by law to absent themselves from Rome without leave, used the suberget of an honorary lutenancy, or expiation of a vow, to set themselves at liberty. See book H., letter 18.
12 The disorder into which his affairs had been thrown in different parties. Had, made it, I suppose, either a rest, or a pretended reason, for having these votive legations in so many places.
13 The text is obscure, and perhaps faulty.
14 Probably alluding to the ill-humour of Terentia, which occasioned increasing vexation, and drove him at last to a divorce.
LETTER III.

I know you will be glad to be informed of what is doing here, and in what concerns me, to hear it from myself; not that such matters, which are done in the face of the world, can be more certain from my pen, than from anybody else who may write to you, or tell you about them; but that you may perceive from my style how I am affected by them, and what is the present feeling of my mind, and condition of my life. On the third of November, the workmen were violently driven from my ground by armed men; the vertice of Catulus, which was rebuilding by contract entered into by the consuls, agreeably to the decree of the senate, and which had already reached the roof, was thrown down. My brother Quintus's house was first injured by stones thrown from my area, then set on fire by order of Clodius, in sight of the whole city, with lighted materials, to the great grief and lamentation, I say not of all good people, for I know not if there are any, but fairly of all people. He rushed on impetuously; and after this outrage, seems to think of nothing but the slaughter of his enemies; went round from street to street, and openly invited the slaves to revolt. Before, when he avoided a trial, he had indeed a difficult case, and strong evidence against him; but yet he had a case, he might deny the fact, he might lay it upon others, he might even defend some of the charges as warranted by law. After this ruin, fire, plunder, he is deserted by his friends, and scarcely retains Declinius the marshal, or Cellius: he uses the counsel of slaves; he sees that if he should kill all whom he wished, his cause upon trial could not be worse than it is already. Therefore as I was going down the Sacred Street on the 3d of November, he pursued me with his mob; shouts, stones, sticks, swords, all unforeseen. I retreated into the vestibule of Tertius Damion; they who were with me easily prevented these rioters from entering. He might himself have been killed. But I begin to use dieting; I am tired of manual operations. When he saw that he was driven by the general voice not to trial, but to punishment, he afterwards imitated all the Catilines and Acidini. For on the 12th of November he was so determined to destroy and burn Milo's house on Mount Germanus, that openly at eleven o'clock in the morning he brought men with shields and drawn swords, and others with lighted torches. He had taken possession of the house of P. Sulla as his camp, to conduct the siege. At that time Q. Flaccus brought out from Milo's Annian house some determined men, killed the most notorious of the Clodian mob, and wished to kill him, but he took refuge in the inner part of the building. On the 14th Sulla came to the senate, Clodius stayed at home, Marcellinus was admirable, everybody was exasperated. Metellus wasted the time of speaking by cavilling, in which he was assisted by Oppius, and even by your friend, of whose firmness and excellence your letters have spoken so truly. Sextius was outrageous; Clodius, if his election were not to take place, threatened the city. Upon the proposal of Marcellinus's motion, which he delivered from a written paper, so as to include the whole of my case, the area, the burning, my personal danger, and made them all to precede the comitia; one declared that he would observe the heavens on all the comitia days. Then followed factious speeches from Metellus, rash ones from Appius, furious ones from Publius. This, however, is the sum; unless Milo had declared his observation of the heavens in the Campus Martius, the comitia would have taken place. On the 20th of November Milo came into the Campus Martius in the middle of the night with a great attendance. Clodius, though he had a chosen band of runaway slaves, dared not come into the field. Milo remained till noon with great honour, and to the great joy of the people. The struggle of the three brothers was disgraceful, their strength broken, their fury contemptible. Metellus challenges a prohibition in the forum the next day; that there was no occasion to come into the city by night; that he should be in the forum at seven

d Manius has not without reason conjectured that it ought to be written Appius, who was Clodius's brother, and was prior, and was in the senate.

e It is generally supposed that Cicero here means Hortensius.

f This is said ironically, Cicero having had some reason to suspect that Hortensius acted towards him ungenerously.

h He was at this time candidate for the office of ediles. His election would prevent all judicial proceedings against him till the expirations of his year.

i The comitia for the election of ediles.

j Prescript. It has been doubted what was the nominative to this verb. I believe it to be used indefinitely, and without a nominative. This is the sometimes done by ancient authors, has been observed by Bentley on the construction of the word "iniqui," Hor. 1 form. iv. 78. Bishop Pearson has extended this observation to some other words in his note upon 1 Cor. vi. 10. Many other examples of the same construction can be produced both in sacred and profane writings. Of the former I would instances the word διακόναλησσα, 1 Cor. iii. 13, which has given some trouble to commentators, and among the rest to Pearce himself. I apprehend that it should be used absolutely or indeffinitely, and without any nominative — 'it is revealed,' or 'it revelation le made.' It is used in the same manner again, o. xiv. 30. So 2 Cor. iii. 16, ἔρικα 3' ἐν ἑπταρφή — 'whenever any one turns.' 1 Cor. iv. 5 and 13, δικαιονόμην — 'one interpret,' or 'it be interpreted.' So Luke xvi. 9, δέκασιν ἢδαμ — 'that you may be received.' Among profane authors we find the same construction, as εὐρύχειν, Ath. Epist. i. 22, 'Does any one admit?' τῶν ἀνθρώπων προσωπικών κανόνων, Aristot. Eth. iii. 6, 'People define.' And in Latin, Ordinis haec virtus est evenus, aut ego fuerdo, Ut jam nunc dicas, etc. — 'that one should say.' Hor. Ars Poet. 42. So again, v. 228, Trumetrices ascendere jussit nomen Iambaei — it was ordained. And similar to these is εὐταυτον, Cic. Nat. Deor. ii. 15 — it is supposed.

k The magistrates only were allowed to observe the heavens for the purpose of divination; and when they did so, no comitia could be held.

l Clodius, Antonius and Metellus: the latter was not properly a brother, but a cousin. This use of the Latin word "frater" has been taken notice of.
in the morning. Therefore, on the 21st Milo came before sun-rise into the forum. Metellus at the first dawn was hastening secretly to the Campus Martius through by-ways; Milo comes up to him between the groves; forbids the comitia: he withdrew under the severe and opprobrious scoffs of Q. Flaccus. The 22d was market day. On that day, and the day following, there was no meeting. It is on the 24th that I am writing, at three o'clock in the morning: Milo is already in possession of the Campus Martius. Marcellus the candidate is snoring, so that I, who am his neighbour, might hear him. Clodius's vestibule, I am told, is deserted, there being but a few ragged fellows, without even a lantern. Their party complained that it was all my doing, little knowing the spirit and the ability of that hero. His courage is admirable. I send you rare news. But this is the sum of the whole: I do not think the comitia will be held, and I do think that Publius, if he is not first killed, will be brought to trial by Milo. If he came in his way, I foresee that he will be killed by Milo; he does not hesitate to do it; he openly professes it; my fate does not intimidate him, for he has had no envious and faithless counsellor, nor does he mean to trust to any inactive greatman. My mind alone is in full vigour, even more so than when I was in power; in my property I am wasted; yet I contrive to repay the liberality of my brother Quintus against his will, from the resources of my friends rather than my own, lest I should be quite exhausted. In your absence I am at a loss what measures to take respecting the general state of my affairs; therefore hasten up.

LETTER IV.

On the 30th of January, before it was light, Cincius made himself most agreeable to me by informing me that you were in Italy, and that he was going to send a servant to you, whom I would not suffer to go without a letter from me; not that I have anything particular to tell you, especially being now so near; but that I might assure you that your arrival is most grateful to me, and what I have been most anxiously expecting. Therefore, fly up, in order to gratify your own affection, and to feel the effects of mine. We will settle other matters when we meet. I write this in haste. As soon as you arrive, come with your attendants to my house; I shall be delighted to receive you. You will find a noble arrangement of Tyrannio for the library of my books, the remains of which are much better than I had supposed. I should be glad also if you would send me two of your library clerks, whom Tyrannio may employ in repairing my books, and other offices, and that you would direct them to bring some parchment to make indexes, which I think you Greeks call syllabuses. But this according to your convenience. But do you and events come, if you can stay in this part of the country, and bring Pilia, for this is reasonable, and Tuilla wishes it. In good truth you have brought a splendid situation. I understand your gladiators fight admirably. If you had chosen to contract for them, you might have saved yourself these two charges: But of these things hereafter. Only mind to come; and, if you have any regard for me, remember about the librarians.

LETTER V.

What say you? Do you suppose that I should wish my compositions to be read and approved by anybody, rather than by you? Why then have I sent them first to anybody else? I was pressed by him 2 to whom I sent them, and had no other copy. What? Besides (for I have some time been mulling at what must be swallowed at last) a recantation of my sentiments seemed to be rather disreputable. But farewell to upright, and true, and honourable counsels! It is not to be believed what perfidy there is in those chiefs, as they wish to be; and as they would be, if they had any honesty. I have understood and known them, having been invited, deserted, cast off by them; yet it had been my intention to co-operate with them in the republic. They are the same that they were: I have at length by your instruction grown wiser. You will say that you advised, and persuaded me what to do; but not to write also. But I chose to lay myself under an obligation to maintain this new connection; and to prevent my relapsing to those, who, when they ought to pity, do not cease to envy me. However I have, as I wrote you, word, been very temperate in my subject. I shall become more exuberant, if both he receives it kindly, and these people show their vexation; who ill endure that I should possess a villa which had belonged to Catulus, and do not consider that I bought it of Vettius 3; who say that it did not become me to build a house; that I ought rather to sell one. But what more? If in the public expression of my sentiments I have spoken anything which they might approve; yet their joy is, that I should have spoken contrary to the wish of Pompeius. But there is now an end of this; and since those, who have no power, do not choose to behave kindly to me, let me try to be kindly received by those who have. You will say, "I wished it long ago." I know that you wished it; and that I was a very

1 At Antium.
2 Pilia was betrothed to Atticus, but not yet married; unless we suppose with M. Mongaut that this letter should be divided into two, the first written from Rome, the other from Antium, after Atticus's marriage.
3 Purchasing gladiators, and purchasing a place for them to exhibit: so I understand this passage, which is not very clear. These gladiators are supposed to have been in honour of Cæcilius. See book iii. letter 20.
4 This seems to have been Cæsar, to whom Cicero had sent a complimentary poem.
5 He probably means those who, while they professed to support the republic, were actuated by jealousy towards Cicero, as he frequently insinuates in other letters.
6 There were several of this name, all of them people of obscurity, and thereby forming a contrast to the family of Catulus.
LETTER VI.

Respecting Lentulus, I bear it as I ought. We have lost a good, and a great man, and one who tempered a noble spirit with much kindness. It is some consolation, though a poor one, that I by no means lament his fate like Scaevulus, and the rest of your sect. For he so loved his country, that indeed I may consider him to have been snatched from its ruin by some favour of the gods. For what can be more disgraceful than our life? mine especially amongst you, though you have all those endowments of a statesman, you have addicted yourself to no party, but feel a common interest in all; while I, if I speak of the republic as I ought, am thought mad; if, as I am obliged to do, a slave; if I say nothing, oppressed and fettered. How much cause then have I for grief? which is also aggravated by this circumstance, that I cannot even express it for fear of appearing ungrateful. What if I should retire, and shelter myself in some port of rest? It is in vain. Rather let me rush into war, and take the field. Shall I then submit to be a follower, who have refused to be a leader? So it must be; for so I see it pleases you, whom I wish I had always minded. What remains is (according to the proverb) "Sparta is your lot, make the best of it. In good truth I cannot; and I approve the conduct of Philoxenus, who chose rather to be conducted back to prison*. But I study in this place to discard these sentiments; and you, when we meet, shall confirm my purpose. I perceive that you sent me several letters, which I received all at the same time; and this even added to my sorrow; for by accident I first read three, in which it was stated that Lentulus was rather better; then came this thunderstroke in the fourth.

The sense of this passage appears to me to have been misunderstood, by not advertsing to the force of the word isla, which I conceive to mean "such sentiments as he had hitherto held."

But, as I said, it is not he that is to be pitied; but we, who are slaves. Respecting the Hortensianab, which you advise me to write; I am engaged in other subjects, yet am not unmindful of your injunction. But in truth at the very outset I relinquished it, that I might not appear foolishly to have been offended with the unkindness of a friend; then again foolishly to proclaim it by writing. I was at the same time apprehensive lest the depth of my abasement, which has appeared in my actions, might become still more conspicuous if I should write anything; and that offering satisfaction might seem to partake of levity, but I will consider of it. Do you only let me hear something from you as often as possible. Desire Lucceius to show you the letter which I have just sent him, in which I ask him to write the account of my transactions; I hope you will be pleased with it. Encourage him to set about the work; and thank him for having agreed to undertake it. Look after my housec as far as you can. Say something proper to Venus, who is very liberal towards me.

LETTER VII.

Nothing could be moreseasonable than your letter, which relieved my mind from great uneasiness, on account of our dear boy Quintus. Carihappa come hither two hours before, and had quite frightened me. As to what you say of Apollonius; what evil spirit has possessed him, a fellow from Greece, to suppose he might throw his affairs into disorder, like the Roman knights: for Terentius might plead his right. With respect to Metellus, peace to the dead; but, however, for many years there has not died a citizen, who. I will be answerable for your money. For what need you fear, whomsoever he has made his heir? unless it is Publius. But he has not done improperly, although he was himself. Therefore, on his account, you will not have occasion to open your coffers. In what concerns the others, you must be more cautious. You will have the goodness to attend to my requests about my house; you will set a guard; you will warn Milo. The people of Arpinum are clamorous on the subject of Laterium. What say you? I for my part am sorry. But as a These expressions are attended with that obscurity which must always be found in familiar letters, from their relation to circumstances that are unknown to the reader. It seems to me most probable that they may refer to some letter of Attius's inviting Cicero to come to him at Rome. For that Attius was at Rome, appeare from his frequent visits to Cicero's house while it was rebuilding; and that Cicero was himself at Antium, may be concluded from the mention of his library, which is known to have been at his villa near that place.

* Tullia becoming a widow by the death of her husband L. Plao, was lately married to Crassipes, to whom Cicero had to pay her dowery.

b Of the sect of the Epicureans, who placed all their happiness in present enjoyment. See book 1, letter 8, note a.

b Rather than commend the verses of Dionysius the Tyrant.

The case of this passage appears to me to have been misunderstood, by not advertsing to the force of the word ista, which I conceive to mean "such sentiments as he had hitherto held."

b The Hortensian seems to have been some work either to be dedicated to Hortendelius, or complimentary and conciliatory towards him.

c This letter is still extant.—Ep. Fam. book v. letter 12.

d Which was rebuilding at Rome. See letter 2 of this book.

e The son of Q. Cicero, the same whom he afterwards calls the young Cicero.

f Terentius was a Roman knight. It is probable that Attius may have had some money dealings with him; and with Apollonius, and that they were both defaul ters.

g These breaks are evidently indicative of some reproachful expressions, of which Cicero checked the utterance of respect to the dead.

h This refers to Apollonius and Terentius.

i Cicero had likewise in a former letter begged his friend to look after it. Indeed it seems to have been necessary, not only for the sake of encouraging and directing the workmen, but also to protect it from the violence of Clo- disillusion. See letter 3 of this book.

j Laterium was a possession of Q. Cicero in the neigh bourhood of Arpinum. By some alterations he seems to have given offence to the people there.
Homer sings) "he disregards their words." It only remains to beg that you will continue to nurse and to love the young Cicero, as you do.

LETTER VIII.

Many passages in your letter delighted me, and nothing more than your "dish of potted cheese." To what you say about what came and went, I reply by the proverb, "call nobody great before you see his end!" I find nothing for you ready built in the country; there is something in the town; but it is uncertain whether it is to be sold. This is close to my house. Be assured that Antium is the Buthrotum of Rome, as that of yours is of Coreya. Nothing can be quieter, nothing more retired, nothing pleasanter. However desirable, our home is still dear.

But since Tyrannio has arranged my books, a new spirit seems to animate my house; and in accomplishing this, Dionysius and your Menophilus have been of wonderful assistance. Nothing can be more elegant than your shelves, now that the books are so highly distinguished by their covers. I should be glad to hear from you of the success of the gladiators; but it is on the presumption that they conducted themselves well; if otherwise, I do not ask about them.

Apenas was scarcely gone, when your letter arrived. What say you? Do you think he will not propose the law? Speak louder, I beseech you; for I seem scarcely to have heard it. But let me know presently, if it is not troublesome to you. As a day has been added to the holidays, I can the better spend that day here with Dionysius. I am quite of your mind about Trebostus. With respect to Domitius, "no fig, I swear, was ever so like another," as his situation is to mine; either because it happens through the same people, or because it is beyond all expectation, or because there are no honest men left. In one respect it is unlike; that he deserves it. But with respect to the misfortune itself, I do not know if mine were not the lesser; for what can be worse than this, that he who has been all his life looked upon as consul should, at last be unable to obtain the consulate? especially when he stood alone, or at most had only one competitor. But if it be, which I do not pretend to know, that he has in the memoranda of his calendar as long a list of consuls to come, as of those already made, what can be more wretched than he? unless it be of the republic, in which there is no hope even of any amendment. The first intelligence I had of Natta was from your letter. I dislike the man. You ask about my poem. What if it should endeavour to make its escape? Would you consent? With regard to Fabius Luscus, which I had been going to mention, he was always very friendly to me, nor had I ever borne him any ill will; for he was a sensible, modest, well-behaved man. As I did not happen to see him, I supposed he had been absent; till I heard from this Gavius of Firmum, that he was in Rome, and had been there all along. Can such a trifling cause, you will say, have offended him? He had given me much information about the Finican brothers. What may be the reason of his anger against me, if he is angry, I am quite ignorant. Respecting the advice you give me, to conduct myself like a good politician, and keep my own council; I shall do so. But I stand in much greater prudence; for which I shall apply to you, as I used to do. I wish, if you have any access to Fabius, that you would smell out, and just taste that guest of yours; and send me daily accounts of these, and all other matters. When you have nothing to tell me, tell me even that. Farewell.

LETTER IX.

(Gravo. x.)

It is strongly reported at Puteoli that Ptolemaeus is restored to his kingdom*. If you have any certain information, I should be glad to know it. I am here feeding on Faustus's Library. You might suppose perhaps that it was on the exquisite productions of Puteoli and Lucrinum. There is no want of these; but, to say the truth, in the present state of the republic, I have lost my relish for other enjoyments and pleasures; and find support and refreshment from books alone; and would rather occupy that little seat of yours under the statue of Aristotle*, than the curule chair of these people; and rather walk with you at your house, than with him*, with whom I see I must walk. But about this walk chance must determine, unless there be some god who has a regard to us. With respect to my gallery, and my stove, and all that Cyrus is engaged to do, I should be glad if, as far as you can, you would look after them; and press Philotimus to despatch; that I may have it in my power to make some return in this kind*. Pompeius came to Cumanum the 23rd of Pompeius and Crassus, at the instigation of Caesar, whom he had foolishly provoked.

* What if it should think of publishing it? This must be the poem to Caesar mentioned in letter 5 of this book.

 Supposed to mean Saffeius.

* Ptolemaeus was restored by Gabinius, who was governor of Syria, but was not authorised to re-establish Ptolemaeus in Egypt.

° In Atticus's library.

See letter ii. letter 3.

* By receiving Atticus in his library, as he had been received in that of Atticus.
April. He immediately sent a message of compliment to me. It is the following morning that I write this, and am going to him.

LETTER X.

(Græc. ix.)

I SHOULD be glad to know if the tribunes really prevent the census by vitiating the days for holding it; much is the more to be regretted, because they are doing, or what is their design, generally respecting the cenusurate. I have been here with Pompeius. He talked a good deal about the republic; and was dissatisfied with himself, “as he said.” For so we must speak of this man. He despised the province of Syria, and extolled that of Spain. Here again we must subjoin—”as he said.” And I imagine, whenever we speak of him, we should add this; as Phocylides does in the beginning of his poems—“This also is by Phocylides.” He expressed his thanks to you for having undertaken to place the statues for him: and towards me he showed particular kindness. He also came to me at Cumanum from his own villa. He appeared to me to desire nothing less than that Messala should stand for the consulship. If you know anything about it, I should wish to be informed. I am much obliged to you for saying that you will commend my name to Luceius; and that you frequently visit my house. My brother Quintus writes me word, that leaving now his dear Cicero with me, he should go to you the 7th of May. I left Cumanum the 27th of April: and the same day I was at Naples with Letus. The 28th of April, early in the morning, I have written this, setting off to Pompeianum.

LETTER XI.

I AM delighted with your letters, two of which I received together on the last day of the month. Go on to tell me the rest. I am anxious to know the whole business. Find out too, if you can, how this is: you may do it through Demetrius. Pompeius said that he expected Crassus in Albaeon on the 25th, and that as soon as he arrived, they should go immediately to Rome, to examine the accounts of the public renters. I asked if they would do it during the exhibition of the gladiators? He replied, before they came on. How this is, if you either know at present, or else when he is come to Rome, I wish you would send me word. Here I am devouring books with a wonderful man, (so in truth I esteem him,) Dionysius, who sends his compliments to you, and all your family. “Nothing is more delicious than universal information.” Therefore, as to a man of curiosity, write to me distinctly what takes place the first day, what the second, what the censors do, what Appius, what that popular Apuleia. Lastly

- We have before seen instances of this practice of the magistrates, who observed the heavens in order to prevent the public business.
- These statues were for the ornament of the theatre which Pompeius was now erecting.
- By this term Cicero is supposed to mean Clodius.

I wish you to inform me what you are doing yourself. For, to say the truth, I am not so much delighted with the news, as with your letters. I have brought nobody with me besides Dionysius: yet I am not afraid of being without your conversation. If I am charmed with the work, you will give my book to Luceius. I send you that of Demetrius Magnes, that you may have a person ready to bring me back a letter from you.

LETTER XII.

EGNATIUS is at Rome. But I spoke to him strongly upon Halimetus’s business at Antium, and he promised to exert his influence with Aquilius. You will be able to see him therefore if you wish it. I scarcely think I can offer my assistance to Macro; for on the 15th I see there is to be an auction at Lariurn, which will last three days. I hope, therefore, though you interest yourself so much about him, that you will excuse me. But, as you love me, come with Pilia to dine at my house the 2d of next month: in short you must do it. On the 1st I mean to dine in the gardens of Crassipes, by way of an inn. I shall elude the order of the senate and shall get home after dinner, that I may be ready the next morning for Milo. I shall there see you, and remind you of your engagement. All my family join in kind regards.

LETTER XIII.

I SEE that you are apprised of my having come to Tusculum the 15th of November: there I met Dionysius. We wish to be at Rome the 15th of next month. What do I say? we wish no, but we must be there. Milo’s marriage is to be celebrated; and there is some expectation of the comitia being held. If this is confirmed, I am not sorry to have been absent during the alterations, which I understand have taken place in the senate. For I must either have supported what I could not approve; or must have been wanting in attention, where I ought not. But I hope you will describe to me, as distinctly as possible, these matters, and the present state of the republic, and how the consuls bear this rude treatment.

Apuleius was the name of a seditionist tribune in Marius’s time, who had driven into banishment Metellus Numidicus. The feminine termination is added in contempt, to mark his effeminacy and degeneracy.
- This probably alludes to something contained in Atticus’s letters, and which must necessarily remain obscure.
- The Latin cena, which is usually translated supper, nearly corresponds to our dinner: it was commonly served about three or four o’clock in the afternoon. The praetium of the Romans resembled our bancheen.
- This order required every senator in Rome to attend at the meetings of the senate.
- The comitia for the election of the next year’s consuls, which had been factiously interrupted.
- These alterations probably relate to the proposal of confirming the governments of Gaul, Spain, and Syria, to Caesar, Pompeius, and Crassus, for five years.
- Demetrius Xenocharis and Appius Claudius Pulcher were elected almost at the end of the year, the election having been prevented from taking place at the ordinary time.
I am quite thirsty for news: and if you ask me, I must say that I have sad misgivings. They say that our Crassus went out in his military dress not quite with the same dignity as his coeval formerly L. Paulus, then a second time consul. O the wicked man!! I have finished the oratorial books with care: they have occupied much of my time and attention: you may get them transcribed. I have also to beg this of you, that you will make me an accurate representation of the present state of things, that I may not come thither quite a stranger.

LETTER XIV.

Our friend Vestorius has informed me by letter, that he believes you left Rome on the 10th of May, later than he had mentioned, because you had not been quite well. I shall be very glad to hear that you are better. I wish you would write home to your people to let me have access to your books, in the same manner as if you were there. Amongst others, I particularly want Varro’s works. For I must take some things from thence for the books which I have in hand, and which I hope you will approve. I should be glad, if you have any news, especially from my brother Quintus, next from C. Caesar, and if you can tell me anything of the comitia, or the republic, (for you commonly soon smell out these matters,) that you would let me know. If you have nothing to tell me, yet let me hear from you; for your letters can never be unseasonable, or unwelcome. But, above all, I beg you to come back to us as soon as you have finished your business, and completed your journey? to your mind. Make my compliments to Dionysius. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

You may judge how busy I am, by receiving this letter’s in the hand-writing of a clerk. On the frequency of your letters I am nothing to accuse you: but most of them only let me know where you were, as coming from you; or, besides, informed me that you were well. I was particularly glad to receive two letters of this kind almost at the same time, which you sent from Buthrotum; for I was anxious to know that you had had a good passage. But this frequent correspondence rather pleased me by its quickness than by its copiousness. The letter which your guest M. Paccius delivered to me was indeed important, and full of matter. To this, therefore, I shall write in answer; and, in the first place, must tell you that I have shown Paccius, by words and deeds, the weight of your recommendations; and when he came before me, I have received him into close familiarity. I shall now proceed to the other parts of your letter. Varro, about whom you write to me, shall be introduced in some place, if only a place can be found for him. But you are aware of the nature of my dialogues; so that in those upon oratory, which you so highly commend, no mention could be made of anybody, who was not known, or heard of, by those who carry on the disputation. This, which I have begun on the subject of government, I have attributed to the persons of Africanus, and Philus, and Lelius, and Manilius: and have added the young men G. Tubero, P. Rutulius, and Lelius’s two sons-in-law Scævola and Fannius. I thought, therefore, since I mean to prefix an introduction to each book, as Aristotle has done in those which he calls his public treatises, of making some occasion for naming him; which I have endeavoured to do: and I only wish I may be able to accomplish my undertaking; for I have embraced, as you perceive, a great and momentous subject, and one which demands much leisure, which I exceedingly want. When in those books which you commend, you miss the person of Scævola, you must know that I have withdrawn it not inadvertently; but have followed the example of our divine Plato in his Republic. There, when Socrates had come into the house of Cephalus, a rich and pleasant old man, as long as the first dialogue was going on, the old man is present at the disputation; then, having himself delivered his opinion, he says that he must go away upon some religious business; and he does not afterwards return. I imagine Plato thought it hardly proper to detain a person of that age any longer in so protracted a discussion. Much more I thought it right to use the same discretion in regard to Scævola, whose age and state of health you remember, as well as his honours; which made it hardly becoming in him to remain for several days in Crassus’s Tuscanian villa. Besides, the subject of the first book was congenial with Scævola’s studies; the others, as you know, contain technical reasons, at which I did not choose to have that cheerful old man, such as you knew him, to be present. I shall pay attention to what you tell me concerning my daughter’s settlement; for by the testimony, as you say, of Auruclius, it is a good security: and by this also I shall recommend myself to my dear Tullia. I am not wanting to Vestorius: for I understand this to be your wish; and I take care to let him know it. But are you aware of his disposition, that while we are both ready to serve him, nothing can be more untractable? Now for what you ask about C. Cato. You know that he was acquitted on the Junian and Licinian law; and I foretell that he will be acquitted on the Fufian; and that, with even more satisfaction to his accusers than to his supporters. He has, however, returned into friendship with me and Milo. Drusus is prosecuted by Licinius, with leave to challenge the judges on the 3rd of July. The rumours about Procilius are not favourable; but you know how the judgments are given.

That is, I will endeavour to introduce his name into some part of my writings.
Hirrus is reconciled with Domitius. The decree of the senate, which the consuls have proposed relating to the provinces, "Whoever hereafter," &c., never pleased me, because I knew that the declaration of Memmius* must be very offensive to Caesar. My friend Memmius, his competitor Domitius, have been very liberal towards the people. Nothing can exceed the favour in which they are held; they were sure of being consuls. But the senate has decreed, that previous to the comitia an inquiry should be made without publishing the result*. These resolutions, which were generally applicable* to each candidate, gave the candidates great alarm. But some of the judges, amongst whom was Opimius Antius, called upon the tribunes to prevent my judgment without the sanction of the people. This succeeded. The comitia were put off by a decree of the senate, till the law for the reserved judgment should be passed: the day for the law arrived: Terentius interceded: the consuls, who had conducted the business with an easy hand, referred it to the senate. Here was Abdera itself*, not without some observations from me. You will say, "Cannot you be quiet?" Pardon me; it is hardly possible. For what could be so absurd? The senate had decreed that the comitia should not be held till the law had passed, and if anybody interceded, that the whole business should be taken again into consideration. It was first moved with indifference; intercession was made without any apparent unwillingness: the business was referred to the senate; upon which they passed a resolution, that it was desirable the comitia should be held at the very earliest time. Scævola, who was acquitted during those few days of business, when I defended his cause with great eloquence, (for Scævola by his observation of the heavens had stopped the meetings of the people every day till the end of September, the day before I write this,) had given ample gratuities to the people by their tribes at his own house; but though his bounty was larger, that of the candidates who had been before him seemed to be more acceptable. I should like to see your constancy which I always, I may say, truth, you have some interest in having this traffic continue through several returns of the fair days*. But the senate was to be held to-day, that is, the 1st of October, for it is just beginning to dawn. There will nobody speak freely besides Antius and Favorius; for Cato is ill. About you me you need not fear: yet I make no promises. What more do you inquire about? the judgments, I imagine, which have been passed. Drusus and Scævola are

* A factious engagement entered into between the consuls and the two candidates, Memmius and Domitius, for their mutual support. The decree of the senate alluded to must have been founded on this iniquitous contract, which Memmius, who was supported by Caesar, declared afterwards in disgust to the senate. See letter 18 of this book.

The sentence was not to be declared till after the election, yet to make void the election of those who should be found guilty.

* The passage in the original is obscure, and probably corrupt. I have given what I suppose to be the meaning of it.

* Abdura was proverbially a land of folly and madness.

* The randia, or days of fair, were held every ninth day. Atticus had some concern with them by reason of his money transactions.

found not guilty. It is thought the three candidates will be accused; Domitius by Memmius, Messala by Q. Pompeius Rufus, Scævola by Triarius or by L. Caesar. "What," you will ask, "will you be able to say for them?" May I die, if I knew a fraction thereof while you commend*, I find nothing. Now, to give you my opinion of affairs, we must bear them. Do you ask how I conducted myself? with firmness and freedom. "But he," you will say, "how did he bear it?" Patiently; conceiving that he was bound to have some consideration for my dignity, till satisfaction should be made to me*. How, then, was he acquitted? Through the incredible weakness of his accusers, that is, of L. Lentulus the younger, whom everybody cries out upon as guilty of prevarication; then, through the extraordinary exertions of Pompeius, and the corruption of the judges. Yet, after all, thirty-two found him guilty, thirty-eight acquitted him. The other trials are still hanging over him: so that he is not fairly clear of his difficulties. You will say, "How, then, do you bear all this?" In truth, very well; and I am very well satisfied with myself for doing so. We have lost, my Pompeius, not only all the life, but the very complexion and ancient form of the state. There is no longer any republic, in which I can take pleasure, or sequience with any satisfaction. "Is this then," you will say, "what you bear so easily?" Even so: for I remember how flourishing the state was not long since, when I was at the head of affairs; and what return I have met with: so that I am troubled with no anxiety on that account. They, who were mortified at my having any share of power, are now outrageous that one man should possess all power. Many circumstances afford me comfort: yet I do not descend from my state; but return to that course of life which is most congenial to my nature, literature and study. The toil of pleasing I relieve with the charms of oratory: my house and my country-seats afford me delight: I do not consider from whence I have fallen, but from whence I have risen. If I possess but my brother and you, the rest may go to ruin, for me, I may still philosophise with you. That part of my mind where passion once resided is grown callous: private and domestic concerns alone afford me pleasure. You will perceive a wonderful exemption from care, for which I principally depend upon your return: for there is nobody on earth whose sentiments are so congenial with my own. But hear something more: things tend to an interregnum; and there is some surmise of a dictator*. Indeed there is much talk of it; which was of some use to Gabinius before timid judges*. The consular candidates are all charged with bribery. Gabinius, too, is added to the number;
whom P. Sylla accused, not doubting but that he was out of the city; while Torquatus opposed it without any effect. But they will all be acquitted; nor will anybody hereafter be condemned, unless he be guilty of murder. But all this is prosecuted with severity, so that the witnesses become eager. M. Fulvius Nobilior has been found guilty; many others, shrewd people do not even wait to answer to their accusation. What more new news? yet there is some. Upon the acquittal of Gabinius, other judges having been put into an uproar after its determination by the Papian law one Antiochus Gabinius from among the assistants of the painter Sopilis, a freed-man, and secretary of Gabinius. This man, therefore, charged by the Papian law with offence against the state, immediately said in Greek, "I have not known thee, Mars, along with Paphia!" Pontius wants to enter in triumph the 2nd of November. Cato and Servilius the pretors, and Q. Mucius the tribune, openly oppose it; for they say that no law has been passed for his command; and, in truth, it was passed in a foolish manner. But Pontius will have the consul Appius with him. Cato, however, affirms that, as long as he lives, he shall not have a triumph. I imagine this, like many other things of the same kind, will come to nothing. Appius thinks of going into Cilicia at his own expense, without waiting for the law. I have replied to the letter I received by Paccius: let me inform you of the rest. I have learned from my brother's letters more than I could have believed respecting Caesar's affection for me; and it is abundantly confirmed by Caesar's own letters. The event of the Britannic war is anxiously expected; for it appears that the access to the island is defended by prodigious bulwarks; and it is now known there is not a grain of silver in the island, nor any hope of plunder, unless of slaves; of whom I imagine you do not expect to find any skilled in letters or in music. Paulus has now newly built the court-house in the middle of the forum with the same ancient pillars; but that which he has begun is very magnificent. What say you? Nothing can be more acceptable, nothing more glorious, than that monument. Likewise the friends of Caesar (myself I mean and Oppius, though you should burst with envy) towards that public work, which you used to praise to the skies, of enlarging the forum, and opening it quite to the House of Liberty, have disregarded the sum of 60,000 sestertia (300,000l), as the claims of individuals could not be settled for less. We shall accomplish a most noble work. For in the Campus Martius we are going to make marble inclosures covered in for the cemitis of the tribes; and we shall surround them with a lofty portico a mile in circuit. To this work will also be added a public hall. You will say, "What good will this do me?" What should I conceal from you these Roman concerns? For when you ask what is doing at Rome, I cannot suppose you ask about the census, which is now past all hope; or about the judgments that may be given by the Cocian law. Now suffer me to scold you, if I have reason on my side. For you say in the letter, which C. Decimus delivered to me, dated from Butibroth, that you thought it would be necessary for you to go into Asia. To me, indeed, it seemed to signify nothing, whether you transacted your business by your agents or in person; since you so often go away, and stay away so long. But I would rather have considered this with you, while it was yet open to discussion; for then I might have done something: as it is, I shall check the reproof I was going to give you. I wish it may have any effect in hastening your return. I write to you less frequently, because I am uncertain where you are, or when you are likely to be. I have thought fit, however, to give this letter to one who, it was probable, would see you. Since you think that you shall go into Asia, I should be glad to know at what time I may expect you here, and what you have done about Eutychides.

LETTER XVI.

(GRAI. XV.)

I am much pleased with what you have done about Eutychides, who will have your old name of Titus with your new one of Cecilius: as Dionysius’s name is compounded of yours and mine into Marcus Pomponius. I shall be particularly glad if Eutychides understands that this has been done out of your attention to my wishes; and that his kindness towards me in my distress was not lost upon me at the time, and has not been forgotten since. I conclude it was necessary to undertake your Asiatic journey. For without sufficient cause you never would have gone so far from your friends and all that you hold dear. But your kindness of heart and affection will best be shown by your speedy return. I have some fear however lest you should be detained by the urbanity of the rhetorician Clodius, and by Pitanius; who, they say, is a man of great learning, and now addicted to Greek literature. But, if you would be esteemed a man of probity, come back to us at the time you appointed. You shall be at liberty to enjoy the society of these persons at Rome, when they are safely arrived. You say that you are willing to hear from me. I have written to you, and upon various subjects, all detailed in a journal. But I suppose, as you do not seem to have remained long in Epirus, my letter never reached you. But the kind of letters I send you is such,

1 It is not known what is meant by the Cocian law.
2 I conceive Cicero to mean that Atticus so often absented himself, that it was of little moment to him whether he went in person to Asia, or whether he remained at Butibroth.
3 See letter 16 of this book.
4 Eutychides seems to have been a slave, to whom Atticus had given his freedom at the instance of Cicero; and, as was usual on such occasions, had given him his own name in addition to what he bore before.

Probable alluding to the preceding letter.
that I do not care to entrust them to anybody, unless I can depend upon his delivering them to you. Now hear the state of affairs at Rome. On the 5th of July Sufenas and Cato* were acquitted; Prociulus was condemned. From hence we see that these mighty Arvocagies consider the canvassing, the comitia, the interrogum, the dignity of the state, nay, the republic itself, to be of no account. We ought indeed to avoid killing a housekeeper in his own house; yet this is no great matter; for twenty-two acquitted, twenty-eight condemned. Publius's indeed, eloquently summing up his accusation, had some effect upon the minds of the judges: Hortensius' appeared in the cause like himself; I did not say a word, for my timid girl who is now unwed, was afraid that what I might say would offend Publius's spirit. This business being concluded, the Residin brought me to their paradise to support their cause against the people of Interamna, before the consuls and ten commissioners; because the water of the lake Velinus, which had been let out by Manius Curio, by cutting through the hill, flows down into the Nar, upon which depends the drainage, yet moderate magistrates of the Sibyl, after Arbuscula, had also took me to the place called the Seven Waters. I returned to Rome on Fonteius's account the 9th of July. I came into the theatre, and, first, was received with a great and general applause (but this is of no consequence, and it was silly in me to mention it); then, I gave my attention to Antiphon. He had received his freedom before he came upon the stage. Not to keep you in doubt, he bore away the palm. Nothing could be more insignificant than his figure, nothing more defec than his voice, nothing more just than his acting. This you must keep to yourself; yet in the Andromache he was greater than Astyanax himself. In the other parts he had nobody equal to him. You will ask now how I liked Arbuscula. I was very much pleased with her. The games were magnificent, and well received. The fighting with bears was put off to another time. Follow me now into the Campus Martius. The canvass is carried on with great warmth: but, as Homer says, "I will give you a sign." Interest rose on the idea of July from four to eight per cent. You will say I am not sorry for that. O man! O

* This means Caius Cato, who with Sufenas and Procius had been guilty of great excesses, as tribunes of the people.

† Said in decision of the judges, before whom the three above-named were tried.

‡ Besides the charge of violence which attached to Cato and Sufenas, Procius appears to have been accused of murder.

§ F. Cicilius at this time attended to the business of pleading, and was a man of good ability.

* In the original it is Hortalus, which was another of Hortensius's names, by which he is also called elsewhere in these letters.

The inhabitants of Reate, about 40 miles N. E. from Rome, placed a statue of Creso for its beauty.

1 I understand Cicero to mean that Antiphon played the part of Astyanax, in the play of Andromache; and though his figure and voice were both very deficient, yet he acted with more justice than Astyanax himself could have exhibited.

2 It was usual, in ancient Rome, to collect the interest of money on the idea, or near the middle, of every month.

Caecilius, to whose fortune and name Atticus had succeeded, obtained his wealth by this kind of usury; and by citizen! Memmius is supported by the whole weight of Cesar's influence; with him the consuls have joined Domitius, under what conditions I dare not commit to a letter. Pompeius storms, and complains, and favours Scævus; but whether he does this in appearances, or in earnest, is matter of doubt. There is no eminence in any of the candidates; money levels all distinction. Messala is drooping; not that his courage or his friends fail him, but the junction of the consuls and Pompeius are against him. I expect these comitia will be put off. The candidates for the tribunate have sworn to petition under the arbitration of Cato. They have deposed with them 500 sesterces (4000l.), on condition that whoever should by Cato be found guilty of bribery, should lose that sum, which is to be divided amongst his competitors. I write this the day before the comitia are expected to take place. But if they do take place, and the messenger is not gone, I will give you the whole history of them on the 28th of July. If, as it is believed, the elections should be carried without expense, Cato alone will have been able to do more than all the judges. I have been defending Messala, who is recalled from his lieutenancy; for Appius has sent out a lieutenant to Cesar. Servilius ordered him to be present. He has the support of the tribes Pomptina, Velina, and Maecian. There is a sharp contest; but considerable progress is made. As soon as I am free from this, I am engaged for Drusus; then for Scævus. Here are noble titles provided for my speeches. Perhaps I shall have also the consuls elect. If Scævus is not one of them, he will have great delight in securing a favourable sentence. From my brother Quintus's letters I suspect he is now in Britain. I am in some anxiety to know what he is doing. One thing I have gained; that I have repeated and certain assurances of Cesar's kindness and friendship. I should be glad if you would make my compliments to Dionysius, and ask and persuade him to come as soon as he can, to instruct my young Cicero and myself too.

LETTER XVII.

With what pleasure did I receive your letter, which I had been looking for! O happy arrival! O well-observed promise, and rare fidelity! O charming voyage! How greatly was I alarmed when I recollected the coracles* of your former passage! But, if I am not mistaken, I shall see you sooner than you mention. For I imagine you thought that your ladies were in Apulia; which, being the case, why should I detain you? And for you must give up a few days to VESTORIUS, and taste again, after an interval, that Latin Atticism.*

what follows, it is probable that Atticus continued the same practice.

* Boats of wicker covered with leather, the Greek word of the text being probably equivalent to τυχόν διδόμενα, or διδόμενα, described by Cæs., B. C. i. 54; and such as are still used in some places. I suspect this, like many of the Greek terms in these letters, may have been used by Atticus himself. It is meant to indicate the smallness of the vessel in which he had crossed the sea.

v Vestorius. It must be supposed, used the Latin language with an elegance which justified this expression; Atticus denoting the perfection of just composition.

LETTER XVIII.

I suppose you think that I have forgot my custom and purpose, and that I write to you colder than I used to; but the truth is, that seeing the uncertainty of your actual situation and of your movements, I have not directed letters to Epirus, nor to Athens, nor to Asia, nor intrusted them to anybody that was not going to you. For my letters are of such a kind that if they should not be delivered it might occasion me a good deal of trouble, often containing secrets which I do not care to trust even to my own clerks. It is amusing to guess the issue; the consuls are in great disgrace, owing to C. Memmius the candidate having declared in the Senate the contract which he and his competitor Domitius had made with the consuls—that if through their influence they should get to be made consuls, they both bound themselves in the sum of 400,000 sestertii (3700 s.) to produce three augurs, who would assert that they had been present at the passing of a law for giving military command to the consuls in the provinces they desired, though no such law had ever passed; and two consular senators who would say they had been present at the signing of the decree for the consular provinces, though in fact there had not been even any Senate assembled. This contract, which was declared to have been made not verbally, but by names and entries in several tablets, was actually produced by Memmius, at the recommendation of Pompeius, with the names inserted. Hereupon Apelles was unalterable; he lost nothing. The other consul was confounded, and, I may say, completely prostrate. But Memmius, having broken off the engagement against the wish of Calvinus, had entirely cooled again, and was the more inclined now to think of a dictator, and to favour the suspension of public business and the general licentiousness. Observe the evenness and freedom of my mind, and my contempt of the Seleucian province, and indeed my agreeable connexion with Caesar; for this plank alone affords me pleasure in the general shipwreck. Ye gods! I wish to think the clearest, the most solid, and above all, the truest. The rest I must keep till we meet; that you may still look for some news. Remember me kindly to Dionysius, for whom I have not merely reserved, but have even built, an apartment. For to the supreme pleasure I take in your return, I derive a great accession from his arrival. The day you come to me I entreat you, by the love you bear me, to remain with your attendants at my house.

But then you fly up higher, and visit this genuine example of my republic. I think I told you about the money openly distributed amongst the tribes from a certain place, previous to the comitia; also that Gabinius was acquitted: I take it for granted that he will be in authority. As to your inquiries about Mccalla, I do not know what to say. I never saw candidates so equal. With the strength of Messalas you are well acquainted. Senecus has been arraigned by Triarius. If you ask, I must say there is no great sympathy excited in his favour; yet his sedition has rendered his memory not unacceptable, and the recollection of his father has weight with the country voters. The other two plebeians are so matched, that Domitius is strongly supported by his friends, and derives some advantage from his public shows, which, however, were not very well received; Memmius is recommended by Caesar's soldiers, and relies upon Pompeius's influence in the north of Italy. If he does not prevail with these helps, it is supposed that somebody will be found to put off the comitia till Caesar's arrival; especially now that C. Cato has been acquitted. On the 24th of October I received letters from my brother Quintus and from Caesar, dated from the shores of Britain; the latest on the 26th of September, at which time the war was finished and hostages had been received; there was no plunder, but a sum of money was imposed. They were going to transport the army back from Britain. Q. Filius had already set out to join Caesar. Now if you have any regard for me and your connexions, or if you have any faith or prudence, and think of enjoying your own comforts, you ought to make haste and come to us. In truth I cannot impatiently hear to be without you. What wonder that I should long for you, when I so much long for Dionysius; whom both I and my Cicero shall beg from you when the time comes. The last letter I received from you was dated the 9th of August from Ephesus.

[Between this and the following book there appears to have intervened a period of more than two years.]
BOOK V.

LETTER I.

I perceived your feelings, and am very conscious of my own, at our separation; which should make you take the more pains to prevent any fresh decree for the prolongation of my government, that this our want of each other may not last beyond a year. About Annius Saturninus you have managed very judiciously. As for the securities, I request that, as long as you remain in Rome, you will provide them; and there are some securities required upon taking possession, among which are those on the Memmius and Attilus estates. About Opplius you have done as I wished; especially by speaking to him of the 800 sesteria (6660l.), which I should be glad to discharge even by borrowing (if necessary) for that purpose, without waiting for the final settlement of my accounts. I come now to that cross line at the end of your letter, in which you remind me about your sister. The state is this: when I came to Arpinum that soon as my brother arrived, we first talked, and for some time, about you; from which I deviated into what I and you had said to each other in Tusculanum upon the subject of your sister. I never saw anything so gentle and placid as my brother was at that time towards her; so that if for any reason offence had been taken, it did not appear. So it passed that day. The day following we left Arpinum; and, it being a festival, Quintus was obliged to stop at Arcanum; I slept at Arcanum, but took some refreshment at Arcanum. You are acquainted with that estate. As soon as we got there, Quintus said in the kindest manner, "Pomponia, do you invite the ladies; I will send for the boys." Nothing could be more gentle, as it seemed to me, not only in words, but also in his intention and countenance. But she, in my hearing, replied, "I am only a stranger here myself," which, I imagine, alluded to Statius having gone before to prepare things for us. Then said Quintus to me, "See what I have to hear every day. You will say, "What was all this?" It is a great deal, and has given me much concern,—so absurdly and harshly did she answer in words and looks. I kept it to myself in sorrow. We all sat down, except her; to whom Quintus sent something from the table, which she rejected. In short, nothing could be milder than my brother, nothing ruder than your sister. I pass over many circumstances, which at the time were more offensive to me than to Quintus himself. Thence I proceeded to Aquinum. Quintus remained at Arcanum; but came to me at Aquinum the next morning, and told me that she had refused to sleep with him,—and that when she went away she continued just in the same humour in which I had seen her. In a word, you may tell her this, if you please, that I thought there was a great want of courtesy in her behaviour that day. I have written to you perhaps more at length than was necessary, that you might perceive there was occasion on your side, likewise, for advice and admonition. Further, I have only to beg that you will execute my commissions before you leave Rome; that you will send me word of all that happens; that you will drive out Pontinus; and that you will take care to let me know as soon as you go. Be assured nothing is dearer or sweeter to me than yourself. I took leave of A. Torquatus with great affection at Minturnae; he is an excellent man. I wish you would tell him in the course of conversation, that I mentioned him in my letter to you.

LETTER II.

I write this on the 10th of May, being on the point of leaving Pompeianum so as to sleep tonight with Pontinus in Trebalumum. From thence I mean to proceed by regular journeys without any delay. While I was at Cumarianum, Hortensius came to see me, which I took very kindly. Upon his asking if I had any commands, I gave him a general answer in other respects; but this I particularly requested, that, as far as lay in his power, he would not suffer my government to be prolonged. In which I should be glad if you would confirm him; and assure him that I was very much gratified by his visit, and by his promise of doing this or anything else I might want. In the same cause I have engaged my friend Furnius also, who I saw would be tribune of the people for the year. I had almost a little Rome in my Cuman villa, so great was the concourse in that neighbourhood: whilst my friend Rufio, seeing that he was watched by Vestorius, played a trick upon him; for he never called upon me. Indeed? when Hortensius came, both unwell, and so far; Hortensius too; when a vast number besides; did not he come? No, I say. Did you not see him then? you will say. How could I help seeing him, when I passed through the town of Puteoli? where I bowed to him while he was engaged, I believe, in some business; afterwards I saluted him as we went on for the farewell, when he came on purpose from his villa to ask if I had any command.
mands. Ought one to think him unkind? or ought one not rather to think him in that very circumstance deserving of commendation, that he ought not have pressed his house so closely. But return. Do not imagine that I have any other consolation in this great plague than that I hope it will not last more than a year. Many, judging from the custom of others, do not believe me really to wish this; you, who know me, will use all digilence when the time comes for its being settled.

When you return from Epirus I beg you to write to me on the subject of the republic if there is anything likely to happen. For, though I have not yet received satisfactory information how Caesar bore the vote of the senate respecting his authority.
There was a report, too, about the people beyond the Po, that they were ordered to elect four magistrates 4. If this be so, I am afraid of great commutations; but I shall learn something from Pompeius 6.

LETTER III.

On the 10th of May I came to Pontius in Tregulianum. There your two letters were delivered to me the third day after they had been written.

The same day I delivered to Philotimus a letter for you from Pansa's Pompeian villa. At present I have nothing particular to tell you. Pray let me know what are the reports about the republic; for I perceive great apprehensions in the towns here, though much of it is no doubt groundless. But I should be glad to be informed what you think likely to happen, and when. I do not know what letter you wish me to answer; for I have yet received none besides the two, which were delivered to me together in Trebalulianum,—one of which contained P. Licinius's proclamation, and was dated the 7th of May—the other was in answer to mine from Minturnae. I am afraid there may have been something of importance in that which I have not received, to which you wish me to reply. I will put you into favour with Lentulus. I am much pleased with Dionysius. Your servant Nicanor is of great use to me. I have now nothing more to say, and the day already breaks. I intend getting to Beneventum to-day. By my moderation and diligence, I trust I shall give satisfaction. From Pontius' house at Trebalulianum, the 11th of May.

LETTER IV.

I came to Beneventum the 11th of May, where I received the letter to which you alluded in one that reached me before, and which I answered the same day from Trebalulianum by L. Pontius 5. In-

6 It is probable Rufio and Yesterius might have had some dispute, which was to be referred to Cicero's decision.
7 I am not ignorant of the term authoritas being applied to such votes of the senate as were prevented from passing into a law. Still it appears to me that the best sense of this passage is by understanding the word to refer to Cesar's authority, which was at this time attacked by the consul Marcellus, who proposed a decree for shortening the period of his command in Gaul, and preventing one who was not present from being elected consul.
8 The election of four magistrates constituted a free town, and gave the right of voting in the Roman assemblies.
9 Cicero was afterwards to see Pompeius, who was at Tarentura, and wrote this letter on his way to that city.
10 Cicero having written this letter at Pontius's house, deed I have received two at Beneventum; one of which was brought me early in the morning by Puniculanos; the other by my secretary Tullius. The answer which I am to make to my first and principal commission is exceedingly grateful to me; but your departure weakens my hope. He brought me to this, not because I was altogether satisfied, but because the want of anything better obliged me to consent. Respecting the other, whom you seem to think not unsuitable, I doubt whether my daughter could be brought to admit him, and it would be difficult for your ladies to find out. On my part I have no such objection; but if you will be gone, and the business must be settled in my ab-

the business to an end, and make up the account. And, as you love me before you go away, enable me again to go on. You will have relieved me from a great source of uneasiness. I have now replied to all the contents of your letters: though I had almost omitted your want of paper. This is my concern, if your deficiency obliges you to write less. Take then 200 sestertii (17. 16s.), in order to supply yourself, though the smallness of this sheet shows my own parsimony in this respect; while it demands from you an account of all that is done or talked of. If you have any certain intelligence of Caesar, I hope to hear from you; and again more particularly by Pontinus about everything.

LETTER V.

I have positively nothing to say: for I have neither anything to desire of you, considering there has been nothing omitted, nor anything to tell you, for I know nothing, and have no room for joking—so many things press upon me. Know this however, that I send this on the morrow of the 15th of May, just setting out from Venusia. On this day it is probable that something will be done in the senate. Let therefore your letters follow me, by which I may not only be made acquainted with all facts, but likewise with the current reports. I shall be glad to receive them at Brundisium, for there I design to wait for Pontinus till the day which youmentioned. I will give you a particular account of the conversations I may have at Tarentum with Pompeius on the subject of the republic: though I wish to know how long I may properly write to you,—that is, how long you are likely to remain in Rome, that I may know to whom I ought hereafter to deliver my letters, and may not deliver them in vain. But before you go, at all events let that business be settled of the 20 and the 800 sestertii (166l. and 6660l.). I wish you would consider this as a thing of the very first importance and necessity; that what I have begun to entertain by your recommendation, I may complete by your assistance.

LETTER VI.

I came to Tarentum the 18th of May. Having determined to wait for Pontinus, I thought it best to pass the intermediate time with Pompeius, till he should arrive; especially as I found that Pompeius wished it, and even begged me to be with him, and at his house every day: to which I readily agreed,—for I shall get from him many good conversations on the subject of the republic; and shall besides be furnished with instructions suitable for my new office. But I begin now to be shorter in writing to you, from my uncertainty whether you are at Rome or already set out. As long as I remain in this ignorance, I will still write a few lines, rather than suffer an opportunity of sending to you to pass without a letter. At the same time I have now nothing to ask of you, or to tell you. I have made all my requests, which you will execute as you promised; when I have any news, I will tell you. One thing however I shall not cease to urge as long as I suppose you to remain in Rome, that you would leave that business completed respecting the account with Caesar. I look eagerly for your letters; especially that I may know the time of your departure.

LETTER VII.

I send you a letter every day, or rather each day, shorter; for I become every day more apprehensive that you may have set out for Epirus. However, that you may see I have attended to your request, Pompeius says he shall present five new prefects as before, with exemption of service, and with the authority of magistrates. After spending three days with Pompeius in his own house, I am going to Brundisium this 20th of May. I leave him an excellent citizen, and fully prepared to repel the evils which are apprehended. I shall hope to get a letter from you, that I may know both what you are doing, and where you are.

LETTER VIII.

It is now twelve days that I have been detained at Brundisium, partly by indisposition; from which however I am now recovered, having been free from fever; partly by the expectation of Pontinus's arrival, of which I have not yet received any intimation. But I am expecting to sail. If you are at Rome, which I scarcely suppose, but if you are, I should exceedingly wish you to attend to the following circumstance. I received information from Rome that my friend Milo complained in his letters of his unkindness, because Philotimus was a party in the purchase of his goods. This I desired to be done by the advice of C. Durinius, whom I knew to be much attached to Milo, and such a one as you esteem him. His intentions and mine were, first, that the property might thus come under my control, and that no ill-disposed purchaser might rob him of his slaves, of whom he has a great many with him; then, that the security he had wished to provide for Fausta.

a Different conjectures have been formed respecting the text and the meaning of this sentence. It seems to me most probable, that Pompeius was allowed to nominate to Cicero's prefectures, which were often honorary, and while they gave authority, admitted of exemption from service. Cicero only insisted on excluding all persons concerned in the theft of this book. The proper business of the prefect appears to have been to determine causes in such places where there were no authorised magistrates.

b Philotimus was a freed-man of Terentia, Cicero's wife. Milo had been found guilty of the death of Cidius, and in consequence went into a voluntary exile at Marseille; and his debts being very great, his estate was sold by public auction for the satisfaction of his creditors.

Fausta was Milo's wife. might be ratified; added to which, if anything could be saved, that I might the more easily save it.
Now I should be glad if you would examine into the whole affair,—for accounts are often exaggerated. But if he complains, if he writes to his friends, if Fausta is of the same mind, do not let Philotinus continue to have any concern in the property, contrary to Milo’s wishes; for so I told him in the person, and he engaged to do. It was no great object to me. But if what I have heard is undeserving of notice, you will judge what is right. Speak to Duronius. I have written also to Camillus, and to Lania; and the rather, because I could not depend upon your being in Rome. In short, you will determine what you think most consistent with my honour, my reputation, and my interest.

LETTER IX.

I ARRIVED at Actium 4 the 16th of June, hav- ing feasted like the Salii 5 at Coreya, and Sybotis, upon the presents which Arcus and my friend Eutychides had splendidly and kindly provided for me. I preferred going from Actium by land, after having had a very unpleasant voyage. The doubling of Leucate too seemed to be attended with difficulty; and I did not think it becoming to proceed to Patras in a small vessel without my equipage. I daily study myself, and direct my attendants, to carry into effect my determination (in which you often encouraged my speed), to discharge this office, which is out of the common 1 course, with the utmost moderation, and the utmost forbearance. I hope that the Parthians will be quiet, and that fortune will favour me: I shall do my part. Pray take care to let me know what you are doing, where you will be at successive times, how you left my affairs at Rome, and above all about the twenty and the eight hundred 2 stertia (166l. and 6600l.). This you will accomplish in one letter carefully despatched, so that it may reach me. But (though you are absent, while the business of the provinces is not under consideration, yet will, as you wrote me word, be present at the time) remember to provide through your own influence, and through all my friends, especially through Hortensius, that my year of service may remain in its present state, and that no addition may be decreed. I am so earnest in this request, that I doubt if I should not even beg you to contend against any intercalations. 6

4 On the coast of Acharnia in Greece. The same place that was afterwards distinguished by the engagement between Augustus and M. Antonius, which decided the empire of the world.
5 The Salii were priests of Mars, who, at the conclusion of their solemn processions, used to partake of a splendid entertainment; from whence Salaric feasts derived their name.
6 Arcus and Eutychides were freed-men belonging to Atticus, whose house at Euthromut was near to Coreya and Sybotis, through which Cicero passed after he had crossed the Adriatic. Eutychides is mentioned before, in letter 15.
1 It was usual for the consuls to take a government immediately upon resigning their office. Cicero having declined this at the time, was now appointed out of the regular course.
2 Mentioned above in letter 5 of this book.
6 This is said jestingly. The irregularities of the year, previous to Caesar’s reformation of the calendar, used to be rectified by the occasional insertion of a month, consist-ornaments of the city; with the affection of the people towards you, and their kindness also to me; but especially with the philosophical spirit which everywhere prevails. If there is any good, it is to be found in Aristus, with whom I lodge,—for I gave up your, or rather my Xeno, to Quintus; but the houses are so near, that we pass whole days together. As soon as you can, let me hear your plans, that I may know what you do, where you are, and, above all, when you will be in Rome.

LETTER XI.

How is this? so often to send letters to Rome, yet none for you? Hereafter, however, I will rather write in vain, than suffer an opportunity to pass without writing to you. I entreat you by your fortunes¹, while you are there, to secure by all possible means, that the period of my government may be extended. I cannot tell you how ardently I wish for the city; how ill I hear the impertinences of my present situation. Marcellus has acted shamefully about this citizen of Como². If he had not held a magistracy, at least he belonged to one of the colonies on the Po³: so that the offence given to our friend Pompeius, appears to me to be no less than that to Caesar. But this is his concern. I thought also, as you Varro assert, that Pompeius was certainly going into Spain. I was sorry for it; and easily persuaded Theophranes that nothing was more to be wished, than that he should not go away anywhere. The Greek⁴ therefore will try what he can do; and his authority has the greatest weight with him. I send this on the 6th of July, the day of my leaving Athens, after having been there ten whole days. Pontinuia is arrived; and at the same time Co. Volusius: the questor⁵ is here; and your Tullius alone absent. I have some open boats belonging to the Rhodians, and some double-cased vessels of the Mityleneans, and others. I hear nothing of the Partians. For the rest, I trust to the gods. Hitherto I have made my journey through Greece with great applause; nor have I yet any complaint to make of my people; they seem to know me, and my purpose, and the conditions of their service; and are entirely subservient to my good estimation. Henceforth, if that proverb be true, "Like master, like man," they will assuredly continue in the same disposition: for they shall see nothing in me to justify their delinquency. But if this be found insufficient, I shall adopt severer measures; for hitherto I have been gentle and lenient; and, as I hope, not without some effect. But, as some say, I have calculated upon this forbearance only for one year: take care then that I do not lose my character by any prolongation of my government. I now come back to what you desire of me. With regard to the prefects, there shall be an exemption of service for any you⁶ please; only name them: I shall not hesitate, as I did in the case of Appuleius. I love Xeno as much as you do, and am confident that he is sensible of it. I have put you in the highest favour with Patron, and the rest of these effeminate philosophers⁷; and have done no more than you desired; for he told me that you had thrice written to him, to assure him that in consequence of his letter I would take care of that business⁸; which he took very kindly. But upon Patron's applying to me, to request that your Areopagus would cancel the decree they had made in the praetorship of Polycharmus, it appeared both to Xeno, and afterwards to Patron himself, more proper that I should write to Memmius, who had gone to Mytilene the very day before I arrived at Athens, in order that he might signify to his friends a compliance with the measure. For Xeno was persuaded that the Areopagus would never grant it against the will of Memmius. But Memmius had already given up all thoughts of huilding: he was, however, displeased with Patron; which made me write particularly to him a letter, of which I send you a copy. I wish you to comfort Pilia for my sake⁹: for I will tell you; you need not mention it to her; I received a packet, in which was Pilia's letter: I took it, opened it, read it. It was written with great feeling. The letters you received from Brundisium, without anything from me, were despatched at a time when I was not well. For I would not have you put off with that servile excuse¹⁰ of business. Take care to let me hear everything; but especially take care of your own health.

LETTER XII.

A sea voyage is a serious thing, even in July. We were five days coming from Athens to Delos. On the 6th of July we proceeded from the Pireus².

¹ It does not appear that the governors of provinces were limited in their appointment of prefects. Cicero only excluded such as carried on any traffic. [See above, letter 7 of this book.] The translation here offered is new, but is most consonant to the words of the original thus pointed, "in prefectis, exceptis his quos voles: defendor." ¹ The Epicureans.
² Memmius had been obliged to quit Rome, and had taken up his residence at Athens, where he got from the council of the Areopagus a grant to build upon the site of a school of Epicurus. This the supporters of that philosophy were anxious to prevent.
³ It has been doubted to what this alludes, and indeed it is one of those private circumstances which it is impossible to ascertain; but it appears to me most probable that some letter from Pilia to Atticus had fallen by mistake into Cicero's hands, and that it contained some expressions of uneasiness, which Cicero takes this opportunity of requesting her husband to soothe.
⁴ The meaning of the original is uncertain. I have supposed it to be an excuse for being busy," which he represents as an excuse fit for a slave, who was forced to work.
⁵ The port of Athens.
boasting of so many years is now brought to the test. But as I hope I shall put in practice the lessons I have learned from you, and shall be able to satisfy all parties; and the more easily, because in my province the compositions have already been made. But enough of this; especially as Cæsius informed me, while I was at dinner, that he should set out this very night. I have attended to your little concerns at Ephesus; and to Thermus, (who previously to my arrival had generously promised his assistance to all your friends,) yet I have presented Philogenses and Solus, and have recommended Xeno of Apollonides. He promised to do everything you wished. I have besides explained to Philogenses the account of what I borrowed from you. So much for this also. I return to the affairs of the city. I entreat you by your fortunes, since you remain in Rome, first of all to support and secure this, that my government may be but for the year, that there be even no intercalation. In the next place, finish my commissions; especially if anything can be done in that domestic business, in which you know my difficulty: then have a regard to Caesar, whose friendship I have solicited at your recommendation; nor do I regret it. And if you know how much it concerns me to be informed and regardful of what is doing in the republic, (doing? say, rather what is hereafter to take place,) write everything to me, and exactly; particularly whether the state of the judgments that are either made, or to be made, is attended with difficulty. About the water, as you think it worth while. If Philipus should want anything, I shall be obliged to you to attend to it."

LETTER XIV.

TILL I am settled in some place, you must not expect me to send you either long letters, or always in my own hand; but when I have time, I will do both. I am now pursuing my journey on a hot and dusty road. I wrote to you yesterday from Ephesus; this I send from Tralles. I expect to be in my province the 1st of August. From that day, if you love me, endeavour to secure the termination of my government after one year. In the mean time I have received intelligence such as I could wish; first, that the Parthians are quiet; then, that the contracts with the farmers of the revenue are completed; lastly, that the sedition of the soldiers has been alloyed by Appius, and their pay delivered to them up to the middle of July. I am wonderfully well received in Asia. My arrival has occasioned not the smallest expense to anybody. I hope all my attendants will have regard to my reputation. I have great apprehensions; but hope for the best.

a By his boasting he probably means his philosophical prudence.

b There were the contracts entered into annually between the farmers of the revenue and the proprietors.

c This may have been borrowed from Atticus’s own expression.

d See letter 15 of this book.
e See letter 9 of this book.
f This probably alludes to the marriage of his daughter.
g See letter 4 of this book.
h See letter 5 of this book.
i See above, letter 12 of this book.
j See letter 10 of this book. I conceive this and the former clause to make two distinct sentences.
All my people have now joined me except your friend Tullius. I purpose going directly to the army, to appropriate the remaining summer months to military business, the winter months to civil concerns. I trust that, if you know me to be no less anxious than yourself about the republic, you will send me word of everything that happens, or will happen. You cannot gratify me more: unless by the execution of what I begged you to do, especially that inmost concern, which I have so much at heart. I write in haste, and in dust. My future letters shall be more particular.

LETTER XV.

I came to Laodicea the 31st of July. From this day you will begin the reckoning of my year. Nothing could be more desired, nothing more affectionately entertain'd, than my arrival. But it is not to be believed how sick I am of this business. The activity of my mind, with which you are so well acquainted, has not a sufficient field to exert itself, and the notable effect of my industry is lost. Is it for me to administer justice at Laodicea, and A. Plotius at Rome? And while our friend is commanding so large an army, for me to have the name only of two meagre legions? In short, I want not these things; I want the splendour, the forum, the city, my own home, and you. But I will bear it as I can, provided it be but for one year. If my government is prolonged, it is all over with me; but it may very easily be prevented if only you remain at Rome. You ask what I do here. I shall continue to live, as I do, at a great expense. I am wonderfully pleased with the plan I have adopted. I observe a strict self-denial; agreeably to your advice; so that I doubt whether it will not be necessary to raise money in order to pay off what I have borrowed of you. I do not exasperate the wounds of Appius, but they appear and cannot be concealed. I write this on the 3d of August, on my way from Laodicea to the camp in Lycaonia. Thence I mean to proceed to Mount Taurus, that I may contend in arms with Merganes, and, if I can, may decide the affair of your slave. The panniers, as they say, have been put on the wrong beast. It is confessedly a burden that does not belong to me, but I will bear it, only, as you love me, let it not exceed the year. Mind to be present in time, that you may solicit the whole senate. I am exceedingly anxious, because it is now a long while that I have remained in ignorance of all that is doing. Therefore, as I have before said to you, make me acquainted, besides other things, with the state itself. Should I write more by a tardy messenger? but I deliver this to a familiar and friendly man, C. Andronicus of Puteoli. You will have frequent opportunities of sending to me by the messengers of the public renters, through the collectors of the revenue and customs within my district.

LETTER XVI.

While I am on my journey, and actually on the road, the messengers of the public renters are setting out; yet I have thought it right to steal a little time, that you may not think me regardless of your injunction. Accordingly, I have stopped in the road to send you shortly this information, which should have occupied a larger space. My arrival, which was eagerly expected in this miserable and utterly ruined province, took place the last day of July. During three days that I staid at Laodicea, three at Apamea, and three at Synade, I heard of nothing but the inability of the people to pay the head money imposed upon them; the universal sale of goods; the groans and lamentations of the cities, the fatal traces, not of a man, but of some savage beast. In short, I am sick of everything, even of my life. The wretched cities, however, find some relief in being free from any expense either on my account or that of my lieutenants, questors, or anybody else. For I decline to accept not only forage, and what is allowed by the Julian law, but even my fire-wood; nor does anybody receive a single thing besides four beds, and a roof to cover them; in many places, not so much as that, for we more commonly remain under a tent. Hence we have a surprising concourse from the country, from the villages, and from every house. Indeed they revive again at my approach, at the justice, the moderation, the clemency of your Cicero; so that he has exceeded the expectations of all people. Appius, upon hearing that I was coming, went into the remotest part of the province, as far as Tarsus, where he holds a session. I hear nothing of the Parthians; but some, who are lately arrived, relate that our cavalry have been defeated by the barbarians. Bibulus does not even yet think of going into his province; which people attribute to this, that he wishes to remain there as late as he can. I am hastening to join the army, which is two days distant.

LETTER XVII.

I have received from Rome a packet of letters without one from you; which, if only you were there, and were well, I attribute to the fault of Philotimus, not to you. I dictate this sitting in my carriage, on my way to the camp, from which I am distant two days' journey. In a few days I shall have sure persons to whom I can deliver my letters, therefore I reserve myself for that. However, though I would rather you should hear it from others, I conduct myself in the province with such moderation, that not a penny is spent upon any of my people. This is accomplished also by the attention of the lieutenants, and tribunes, and prefects, for they are all zealous for my honour.

* Appius was Cicero's predecessor in the province of Cilicia.

* This is spoken, in the Greek manner, of people unacquainted with the Roman customs and discipline.

* Syria.
Our friend Lepta is admirable\(^7\). But I must be quick. I will tell you everything fully in a few days. The younger Deiotarous, who has received from the senate the title of king, has taken our Ciceros\(^7\) with him into his kingdom. While I am in my summer quarters, I considered it to be the best place for the boys. Sestius has informed me of the conversation he had with you on the subject of my domestic and greatest concern, and what was your opinion. I beseech you, pay every attention to that business: and let me know what can be done, and what you think. Sestius likewise said that Hortensius had mentioned something about extending the term of my government. He had distinctly promised me in Cæsanum that he would support my release at the end of twelve months. If you have any regard for me, fortiify this post\(^7\). It cannot be told how unwillingly I am kept away from you. Besides, I expect that this honour, which I derive from my moderation, will be the more distinguished, if I soon retire, as it happened to Scævola, who presided in Asia only nine months. Deiotaros, when he understood that I was approaching, removed from Laodicea as far as Tarsus. There he holds a session, while I am in the province; but I shall not quarrel with him for this wrong, for I have enough upon my hands in healing the wounds which have been inflicted on the province, which I endeavour to do with the least censure upon him. But I wish you would tell our friend Brutus that Appius has not behaved handsomely in going away as far as he could upon my approach.

LETTER XVIII.

How I wish you were in Rome, if it happens that you are not there, for I have no certain information, excepting that I have received two letters from you dated the 19th of July, in which it was mentioned that you were going into Epirus about the beginning of August. But whether you are in Rome or in Epirus, the Parthians have passed the Euphrates under the conduct of Pacorus, son of Orodes, king of the Parthians, with almost all his forces. There is yet no news of Bibulus's arrival in Syria. Cassius is in the city of Antioch with his whole army. I am with my army at Cybistra, in Cappadocia, at the foot of Mount Taurus. The enemy is in the Cynhestica, which is the part of Syria nearest to my province. I have written to the senate an account of this state of affairs\(^7\). If you are at Rome, you will see if you think my letter should be delivered; and many things, nay, everything which require your kind attention, the sum of which is, that between the slaying and the offering\(^7\), as they say, no additional time or burden may be laid upon me. For in this weak state of the army, and deficiency of allies, at least such as can be depended upon, my best security is the winter. If that season arrives without the enemy's having passed into my province, the only thing I fear is that the senate, under the apprehension of domestic disturbances, may he unwilling to let Pompeius go away. But if they send somebody else in the spring, I do not care, provided no addition be made to my time. So much then, if you are in Rome. But if you are gone, or indeed if you remain there, this is the state of my affairs: I have no distrust; and following, as I believe, prudent counsels—and possessing, I hope, a good body of men, I feel to be in a safe position, abounding in corn, almost looking down upon Cilicia, and convenient for moving. My army is small, but I trust, unanimous in affection towards me, and likely to be doubled by the arrival of Deiotaros with all his forces. I have much more faithful allies than anybody else has had, being struck with my kindness and forbearance. I am making a levy of Roman citizens, and transporting corn from the fields into places of safety. If it is necessary, we shall defend ourselves by arms; if not, by the nature of the country. Therefore be of good courage; for I see you, and am as sensible of your friendly sympathy as if you were actually present. But I beg of you, should the consideration of my case be put off till the first of January, that you would, if possible, be in Rome at that time. I shall feel quite sure if you are there. The counsels are my friends, and the tribune of the people, Furnius; still I have need of your assiduity, prudence, and influence. It is a most important time; but I am ashamed of using many words with you. Our young Ciceros are with Deiotaros, but if necessary they shall be removed to Rhodes. If you are in Rome, write to me with your usual exactness; if in Epirus, yet send me one of your messengers, that both you may know what I am doing, and I what you do, and mean to do. I attend to the concerns of your friend Brutus in a manner that he would not do for himself. But I now bring forth my ward\(^7\), without defending him, for it is a slow and fruitless business. Yet I will endeavour to give satisfaction, even to you, which is harder than to Brutus himself; but I will assuredly satisfy both.

LETTER XIX.

I had just sealed the letter which I imagine you have read, written with my own hand, and containing an account of everything, when Appius's messenger hastily delivered to me your letter of the 21st of September, the forty-seventh day from his leaving Rome. Ah, what a distance! By that I make no doubt you waited for Pompeius's return from Ariminum, and are now gone to Epirus; and I fear you will be not less, but, as you say, more anxious in Epirus than I am here. I have written

\(^\text{7}\) He was what may be called the chief engineer, and had the direction of the works—prefectus fabrum. Em. Proc. iii. 7.

\(^\text{8}\) The sons of Marcus and of Quintus Cicero.

\(^\text{9}\) Respecting the marriage of his daughter.

\(^\text{7}\) It may be supposed that Cicero uses this metaphor in consideration of his military character.

\(^\text{7}\) This letter is preserved in the beginning of the 15th book of the Familiar Epistles.

\(^\text{7}\) The meaning seems to be, that nothing may occur, at some unseasonable moment, to frustrate my designs, and prevent my hopes, of quitting the province at the expiration of the year.

\(^\text{7}\) This ward was Ariobarzanes, a king of Cappadocia, whose person and government the senate had recommended to the care of Cicero. He had been driven out of his kingdom by Mithridates, and his affairs were in great disorder. Cicero, while he offered to support him in his kingdom, did not undertake to defend him against the claims of his creditors, one of whom appears to have been Brutus.
to Philotimus about the Atellian debt, desiring him not to call upon Messala. I am pleased that the reputation of my progress should have reached you, and I shall be still more pleased if you hear the result. I am glad you take such delight in the daughter whom you have left in Rome; and though I have never seen her, yet I love her, and am sure she must be amiable. Farewell again and again, patron, and your fellow disciples. I am glad you are pleased with what I have effected in the army respecting the Tarentine light cavalry. When you say that you are not sorry he should have met with aresopulse, who contended with your nephew's uncle; it is a mark of great affection; and by it you have put me in mind that I ought to rejoice also, for it had not occurred to me. I cannot believe that, you say. As you please; but yet I rejoice; for being indignant, you know, is very different from being envious.

LETTER XX.

On the morning of the Saturnalia (December 17) the Punicissians surrendered themselves to me, the forty-seventh day after I had begun to besiege them. "Who are the plague of these Punicissians? who are they?" you will say; "I never heard the name." What can I do? Could I convert Cilicia into Aetolia or Macedonia? You must know this, however, that with such an army as I have here, no very great affairs could have been achieved. What has been done I will shortly explain to you; for so, in your last letter, you give me leave to do. You know of my arrival at Ephesus, for you congratulated me on that day's celebrity, than which nothing ever pleased me more. From thence I was honourably received in all the towns where I went, and arrived at Laodicea the last day of July. There I staid two days in great reputation; and by liberal expressions eradicated all former injuries. I did the same at Amaeza, where I staid five days; at Symmude, where I was three days; at Philomelum five days; and ten days at Iconium. My jurisdiction was exercised with the greatest equity, the greatest lenity, and the greatest dignity. Thence I came into the camp the 26th of August, and on the 30th I reviewed the army near Iconium. From this station, having received pressing messages about the Parthians, I proceeded into Cilicia through a part of Cappadocia which borders on the province, with the design of making the Armenian Artavasesos, and the Parthians themselves conceive that they were excluded from Cappadocia. After being encamped five days at Cystra in Cappadocia, I was informed that the Parthians had advanced from that place a great distance from Cappadocia, and were rather threatening Cilicia. Therefore I immediately made my way into Cilicia through the passes of Mount Taurus. I came to Tarsus the 5th of October; thence I went to Mount Amanus, which divides Syria from Cilicia by the opposite course of the waters. These mountains were full of eternal enemies. Here, on the 13th of October, we killed a great number of them; and Pontius having advanced by night, and myself the next morning, we took and burned the forts, which were strongly guarded. I was saluted Imperator. I occupied for a few days the very same position, at Issus, which, in his expedition against Darius, had been held by Alexander, not a little better general than either you or me. There I remained five days; and having spoiled and laid waste the Amanus, I departed. For you know that as there are certain things called panics, so there are also the empty rumours of war. The rumour of our approach both encouraged Cassius, who was shut up in Sardis, and alarmed the Parthians; so that Cassius pursued them with advantage as they retreated from the city. In this retreat Oseaees, one of the Parthian generals of great authority, received a wound, of which he died a few days after. My name was respected in Syria. In the mean time Bibulus arrived. I imagine he wanted to be equal with me in this empty title. He began to seek for laurels in the Amanus, as if they were strewed upon a cake. But he lost the whole of his first cohort, and the euritiation of the first division, a man distinguished in his situation, Asmus Dento, and the other officers of the cohort, and Sextus Lucilius, a military tribune, son to T. Gavius Cæpio, a rich and splendid man. In truth he sustained an ugly blow, both in itself and in the time when it happened. I invested Punicissium with a ditch and rampart: it was a strong place belonging to the free Cilicians, and had time out of mind been in arms against us. The people were a fierce and barbarous nation, and I thought it necessary to be well prepared for the attack in order of defence. We accomplished the business by a large mound, fascines, a lofty tower, great quantity of machines, a numerous body of archers, great fatigue and equipage, and many wounds received, but the army safe. The Saturnalia were truly joyous. I gave up the spoil, excepting the horses, to the soldiers. The slaves were sold on the third day of the Saturnalia. While I write this in the tribunal, the sum amounts to 12,000 sestertii (96,000.) I shall leave the command of the army to my brother Quintus, to be taken from hence

That is, farewell to the Epicureans, if you so far forget their love of indifference as to become fond of your children. See book vii. letter 2.

That is reason to believe that the Tarentines were a species of light cavalry. I have thought it right, therefore, to insert this illustration, without which it must be unintelligible to an English reader.

This is supposed to relate to Hirtus, who had formerly opposed Cicero to the curule chair, and had lately been rejected in his canvass for the office of sēcilia in opposition to Ceiius. The obscurity of this, as of many other passages, arises entirely from our ignorance of Atticus's letter, to which it alludes.

A humorous periphrasis for Cicero himself, perhaps taken from Atticus's own expression. It occurs again, (Book vi. letter 6,) in relation to the same event.

The expression, which in the original is in Greek, seems to be taken from Aristotle. His meaning is, that he may immediately rejoice through indignation against an unworthy candidate, though it would be wrong to rejoice through envy at another's want of success.

That is, at the part of the mountains whence the streams descend in opposite directions.

This title, as is well known, used to be conferred by the acclamation of the soldiers upon any signal success; the fasces were at the same time crowned with laurel. The general retained the title till he returned to Rome.

This is the original signal for a kind of cake, which was covered with laurel leaves, and from which consequently they were easily gathered.

These were various instruments for offences, such as continued in use till the introduction of fire-arms.
into winter quarters in a part of the country that is ill pacified, and am going myself to Laodicea. So much for this. But let me revert to what I have omitted. When you particularly advise me; and which is more than all, in what you labour with so much earnestness; that I should satisfy even this Ligarius (to whom I wonder if any thing could be said more elegantly.) But I do not call this forbearance, for that seems to imply a virtue opposed to pleasure, while in my life I never felt so great a pleasure as I do from this integrity of conduct. Nor is it the reputation (which is very great), but the thing itself that delights me. In short, such has been its value, I did not know myself, nor was I aware what I could do in this kind. I am justly proud. Nothing can be more honourable. In the mean time, it is something splendid that Ariothebrazes should live and reign by my assistance. I have preserved the king and the kingdom, as it were, in passing, by prudence and authority, and making myself inaccessible to his enemies, not merely shut against their presents. At the same time, not the smallest thing has been received from Cappadocia; and I even hope that during the whole year of my government not a farthing of expense will be incurred in the province. Brutus, who was desponding, I have cheered as much as I could. I love him no less than thou; I had almost said, than thee. This is all I had to tell you. I am now preparing to send a public account to Rome, which will be more full than if I had sent from the Amauns. But am I to understand that you will not be in Rome? Everything depends upon the first of March. For I am apprehensive that when the business of the province is taken into consideration, if any resistance is made on the part of Cæsar, I may be continued. If you were there to attend to this, I should have no fears. I come now to the affairs of the city, with which, after a long ignorance, I have at length been made acquainted by your most acceptable letter of the 28th of December. Your freed-man Philogeneus took great care to send it by a circuitous and not very safe route. For that, which you say was delivered to Lenius's servant, I had not received. I was pleased with what you say of Cæsar respecting both the decree of the senate and your own hopes. If he submits to this, I am safe. That Lenius should have scurched himself in this Pictorian configuration, I am not so much concerned. I want to know why Luccius should have been so vehement about Q. Cassius, and what has been done. As soon as I get to Laodicea, I am desired to present your nephew Quintus with his reboe of manhood. I shall endeavour carefully to regulate his conduct. He, from whom I have derived much good assistance, was to be sent to you; but he is said, with the young Ciceros. I am expecting a letter from Epirus, to bring me an account, not only of your occupations, but also of your retirement. Nicaro' is in office, and liberaly treated by me. I think of sending him to Rome with the public dispatches, both for their mere careful conveyance, and at the same time that he may bring me back certain intelligence of you, and from you. I am obliged to Alexius for his repeated salutations; but why does he not by his own letters fellow the example of my Alexius to you? I am looking out for a horn for Phœnixus. But it is time to stop. Take care of yourself, and let me know when you think of returning to Rome. Again and again, farewell. When I was at Ephesus, I carefully recommended your affairs and your friends to Thermus; and I now do the same by letter; and I have understood that he is of himself very desirous of serving you. I should be glad if you would use your influence about Pammenus's house, as I before mentioned to you, that what the boy has, through your and my assistance, may not by any means be disturbed. I consider this as a point of honour to both of us, and will, besides, be particularly acceptable to me.

LETTER XXI.

I was very glad to hear that you had arrived safe in Epirus, and had, as you say, an agreeable passage. I am rather concerned that you will not be in Rome at a period so important to me; but I comfort myself with thinking that you will not like to winter there, and unnecessarily to be out of the way. Cassius, the brother of your friend Q. Cassius, had sent the letter, of which you ask me the meaning, in a more modest style than that which he sent afterwards, where he pretends to have put an end to the Parthian war. They had indeed retreated from Antioch before the arrival of Bribonius; but in consequence of an interview with them, their part is now in winter quarters in the Lydias, and threaten us with a great war. For the son of Orodus, the Parthian king, is in our province; and Delioturus, whose son is engaged to the daughter of Artavadas, from whom it might

This expression is probably borrowed from a letter of Atticus. It is supposed to mean Cato; but the reason of the appellation is not known.

a. This is the recovery of his money.

b. When the new consuls were to bring before the senate the consideration of the provinces.

c. If Cæsar's friends resist the appointment of anybody to succeed him in Gaul; in that case the senate may deem it necessary to keep Pompæus at home, and to renew my government of Cilicia. For it was expected that Pompæus might be sent to put an end to the Parthian war. See letter 18 of this book.

d. It must be supposed that Philogeneus had previously pointed out the same route to this slave of Lenius.

e. The senate had decreed to entertain the question of sending a successor to Cæsar.

f. This is supposed to mean not a real fire, but a sentence of condemnation against Pictorius, in which Lenius was involved.

1 Young men at the age of seventeen used to change the bordered robe of youth for the plain one of manhood.

2 Delioturus. This parallel is probably taken from Atticus's letter.

3 The freed-man and amanuensis of Atticus.

4 This horn was for a musical instrument; and it has been with good reason conjectured, that the person for whom it was designed might have been a freed-man of Atticus, who had cultivated a taste for music, and had received the name of Phœnix from a musician mentioned in the Odyssey, i. 164. That Atticus was himself fond of music may be conjectured from book iv. letter 16: "Ex quibus (Britannics mancipis) nullus puto litteris ait musicos auditos exerceat."...
be known, has no doubt but the king himself will pass the Euphrates with all his forces in the beginning of summer. And the very day that Cassius's victorious letter was read in the senate, which was the 7th of October, mine brought an account of some disturbance. Our friend Axius says that mine carried with it great authority, while no credit was given to the other. Bibulus's had not then been received. I am confident it must have been full of alarm. I am afraid of this consequence from it; that whilst Pompeius is kept at home under the apprehension of sedition commotions, and Caesar is denied any honour from the senate; while this knot is disentangling, the senate may think I ought not to leave my government before a successor arrives; and that in such a disturbed state of affairs, it is not enough to have single lieutenants preside over such large provinces. Hence I dread some prolongation of my time, which not even the intercession of a tribune can stop; and the more so, because of your absence, who by your opinion, influence, and zeal, might obviate many difficulties. But you will say that I am raising troubles out of my own brain. I cannot help it; and wish it in the senate, which was of fears; though I admired the conclusion of the letter you sent from Buthrotum before you had recovered from your sea-sickness, in which you say: "As far as I see, and hope, you will meet with no impediment to your departure." I should have liked it better, "as I see," without that "hope." I received another, by a very quick passage, to Iconium, through the messengers of the public rents, dated the day of Lecunio's triumph. In this you repeat the same mixture of bitter and sweet, telling me first that I shall have no hindrance; then adding, if it should be otherwise, that you will come to me. Your hesitations sting me. You see by this what letters I have received. For that which you say you gave to Camula, the slave of the centurion Hermon, has never reached me. You repeatedly told me that you had sent one by Lenius's servant. This, which you did the 22d of September, Lenius at length delivered to me at Laodicea, upon my arrival there the 11th of February. Your recommendations I acknowledged to Lenius immediately in words, and shall do so in deed as long as I stay. The only new subject in this letter related to the Cyhiratian panthers. I am much obliged to you for answering M. Octavius, that you did not believe I meant to send any. In future, what you do not know to be certain, you may certainly deny. For, my own resolution being inflamed by your opinion, 4 have exceeded everybody, as you will find, in forbearance, and also in justice, easiness of access, and clemency. There is not anything excites so much surprise, as that no farthing of expense should have been incurred since I obtained the province, either for the state, or for any of my people, excepting L. Tullius the lieutenant. He, who is otherwise asthmatic, yet on his journey availed himself of the Julian law. I do not say I have not done as others had done, in all the villages he passed through; besides him nobody received anything even once; this obliges me to except him, when I assert that no farthing of expense was incurred. Besides him nobody received anything. For this pollution I am indebted to Q. Titiunius. The campaign being ended, I gave the command of the winter quarters and of Cilicia to my brother Quintus. I sent into Cyprus. Q. Moseunius conjured, that as Taurus, a steady man, and besides wonderfully abstemious, to remain there a few days, lest the few Roman citizens, who carry on business in those parts, should think that justice was denied them; for it is illegal to summon the Cypriots out of the island. I went myself on the 5th of January from Tarsus into Asia 4; I cannot tell you with what admiration of the cities of Cilicia, and above all of the Tarsians. And when I had passed the range of the Taurus, a prodigious expectation was raised in the districts of Asia under my jurisdiction, which in six months of my government had received no letter from me, and had seen no guest. For before me, that time had always been employed in a species of traffic, by which the opulent cities gave great sums of money to be excused having soldiers quartered upon them in the winter. The Cypriots gave as much as two hundred Attic talents (nearly 10,000l); from which island (I speak not hyperbolically, but truly) no money whatever will be exacted under my government. In return for these benefits, at which they express their astonishment, I do not permit them to decree any honours to me, except in words; I forbid all statues, temples, chariots; nor am I burdensome to the cities in any other way—but perhaps I am to you, while I proclaim all this about myself. Bear with me, however, if you love me; for it is you who desired me to do it. In short, I have made my progress through Asia in such a manner, that even famine, than which nothing is more wretched, and which was felt at this time in my part of Asia, owing to the entire failure of the crops, might seem a thing to be wished for by me. Wherever I have been, I have employed no force, no legal process, no insult; but have by authority and exhortation, prevailed upon those Greeks and Roman citizens, who had corn in store, to promise a large supply to the people. February the 13th, on which day I am writing, I have been appointed to hold a session at Laodicea for the affairs of Cyprus; on the 15th of March for those of Aparne; and at the same time I mean to hold one for Smyrna, Pamphylia, (when I shall look out for a horn for Phemius) Lyceania, and Isauria. The middle of May I shall return into Cilicia, to spend there the month of June, I hope unmolested by the Parthians. If things go as I I infer it is cordes, "fifth," which gives a propriety to St. Paul's expressions, 1 Cor. iv. 13, where he applies to the apostles the terms "fifth" and "outpouring;" for they must be supposed to have been familiar to the language of the Romans, at least at that time, however strange their use may now be. It is evident that Cicero here means Tullius, and that he so designates him on account of his misconduct. 4 Certain districts of the country, which lay in the province of Asia, but were attached to Cicero's government. 5 Letters demanding supplies. 6 No person who was to live upon them. 7 As it proved an additional subject of glory. b By Greeks he means the natives; so afterwards in speaking of the Cypriots. 1 This is mentioned likewise in the preceding letter. 1 I see the word conjures, that as Taurus, it stands in its proper place, ought to be Lycæanion, that being the only one not otherwise mentioned of the six Asiatic districts attached to Cicero's government.

b It had been usual for the governors of provinces to demand wild beasts to be sent up for the show of their friends in Rome.
wish, I shall employ July in passing again through the province on my return; for I arrived within the province at Laodicea, in the consulship of Sulpicius and Ind. 31st; and therefore, I must set out on my journey on the 29th of July, having first obtained my brother Quintus’s consent to his being left in command; which will be very much against both his inclination and mine; but it cannot with propriety be avoided; especially as I cannot even now detain that excellent man Pontinius; for Posthumius, perhaps also Posthumia, snatches him away to Rome. You have here my plans. Now hear what relates to Brutus. Brutus is well acquainted with certain creditors of the Salaminians of Cyprus, M. Scaptius, and P. Matinius, whom he has particularly recommended to me. Matinius I do not know. Scaptius came to me in the camp. I promised that I would take care, for Brutus’ sake, that the Salaminians should pay him the money that was owing to him. He thanked me; and at the same time asked to be made a prefect. I said I made it a rule never to appoint anybody engaged in traffic, as I had before told you. When Cn. Pompeius asked me, I gave to him the same answer; likewise to Torquatus, on his application for M. Lenius, your friend; and to several others. If he wished to he made a prefect for the sake of his broid, I would take care he should recover it. He thanked me, and took his leave. Appius had formerly given a few troops of horse to this Scaptius, for the sake of repressing the Salaminians; and had made him a prefect. But he harassed the people of Salamis; and I ordered the horse to remove from Cyprus, which Scaptius took very ill. However, that I might keep my promise to him, when the Salaminians came to me at Tarsus, and Scaptius with them, I ordered them to pay the money. They said a great deal about the bond, and about the ill-usage they had received from Scaptius. I said I could not listen to it. I exhorted; I begged, in return for the kindness I had shown towards their city, that they would conclude the business; at last I said I should compel them. Upon this they not only did not refuse, but they added, that they would pay then out of me. For as I had not accepted what they had been used to give to their governors, they in some measure gave it from my revenue; indeed the amount of Scaptius’s debt was less than the pretorian tribute. I commended them. Right, says Scaptius, but let us reckon up the amount. In the mean time, while I had declared in my opening proclamation, composed from different models, that I should maintain the interest of one per cent. per month, together with what accrued at the end of the year, he by the terms of his bond demanded four per cent. “What do you mean,” said I; “can I act contrary to my proclamation?” He then produced a decree of the senate in the consulship of Lentulus and Philippus, that whoever obtained the province of Cilicia, should pronounce judgment according to this bond. I was at first struck with horror; for it would have been the ruin of the city. But I find two decrees of the senate in the same year respecting this bond. The Salaminians, when they were desirous of raising money at Rome, were prevented by the Galbanian law. Upon which these friends of Brutus, relying upon his influence, offered to advance the money at four per cent. per month, if it could be authorized by a decree of the senate. Through the favor of Brutus, a decree was passed; and that no detriment should arise to the Salaminians, nor to those who furnished the money.” They accordingly paid the money. But it afterwards occurred to them, that the decree would be of no use to them, since the Gabian law prohibited the establishing a right upon the terms of a bond. Thereupon another decree of the senate was passed, “that this bond should have the same validity as others.” But to return: while I was about to express this, Scaptius drew me aside, saying that he did not mean to oppose my judgment; but that they believed they owed him two hundred talents (about 10,000l.), and this sum he was willing to accept; that they really owed him something less; but he wished me to bring them to this agreement. Very well, said I. So called them to me, after Scaptius had retired, and asked them what they offered, and what was the amount of their debt. They replied, one hundred and six talents, (about 5100l.). I reported this to Scaptius. The man began to clamour. “What is the use of this?” said I. “Compare your accounts.” They sat down, and made their computation, which agreed to a sixpence. They said they were ready to pay it, and pressed him to take it. Here Scaptius again called me aside, and begged that I would leave the matter as it stood. I gave way to his shameless request; and when the Greeks complained, and desired leave to deposit the money in some temple, I did not grant it. Everybody present exclaimed that nothing could be more shameless than Scaptius, who was not satisfied with one per cent. per month, with the annual compound interest; some said nothing could be more foolish. But to me he appeared more impudent than foolish. For thus he either satisfied himself with good security at one per cent., or took his chance for four per cent. on security which was not good. This is the statement of my case; which must be approved by Brutus, or he will no longer deserve our regard. It will assuredly be approved by his uncle, especially as a decree of the senate was lately passed, I believe after your departure, on the subject of creditors, that one per cent. should constantly be taken without compound interest. What difference this makes, if I rightly know your fingers, you have certainly computed. On this subject, by the-bye, Lucceius complaints to me by letter that there is great danger lest these decrees should lead, by the fault of the senate, to cancelling the old accounts. He refers to the mischief, which C. Julius formerly occasioned by the procrastination of a single day; the state never was in greater jeopardy. But to return to the business: consider my case against Brutus; if this may be called a case, where nothing can with honour be said in opposition; especially as I have left the whole affair open. What I have to say besides, relates to my private concerns. On that secret business

LETTER I.

I received your letter at Laodicea on the fifth day before the festival of the Terminalia; and read it with the greatest pleasure; for it was full of affection, of kindness, of attention, and diligence. To this therefore I will reply, as you desire; and shall not follow my own arrangement, but the order which you have adopted. You say that you have very recently got my letter from Cybiesta, dated the 22d of September; and you wish to know what letters of yours I have received. Almost all that you mention, except those which you say sent by Lentulus' servant from Equotucion and Brundisium. So that your pains have not been thrown away, as you apprehend; but have been admirably laid out; provided it was your purpose to gratify me: for nothing gives me greater pleasure. I am particularly glad that you approve of my reserve towards Appius, and my freedom towards Brutus. I had thought it might have been otherwise. For Appius had written to me two or three letters on his journey, complaining that I had rescinded some of his regulations. As if, when a patient changes his physician, he that was first in attendance should quarrel with his successor for deviating from the treatment which he had adopted. Just so Appius: having treated his province by deputation, having let it blood, and used every sort of evacuation, and delivered it up to me quite exhausted, now does not like to see it recruited under my care; but sometimes finds fault, while at other times he returns thanks; for I have avoided any personal reflection upon him. The dissimilarity alone of my conduct offends him. What indeed can be so dissimilar, as that the province, under his government, should have been drained with expenses and losses; and that from the time I have held it, there should have been no charge of a single penny, either privately or publicly? to say nothing of his pretexts, his attendants, and lieutenants; his plunderings also, his licentiousness, and insults; whereas now there is no private house managed with such prudence, such regularity, such moderation, as the whole of my province. This some friends of Appius absurdly misrepresent, as if I was studious of applause at his expense; and did my duty not for the sake of my own reputation, but of his discredit. But if Appius, agreeably to Brutus' letter which I have letters, as you desire. King Deiotarus protests that P. Valerius has nothing, and that he supports him. As soon as you know whether there is any intercalation at Rome, I should be glad if you would inform me on what day the mysteries will take place. I am in less expectation of hearing from you, than if you were in Rome; but yet I expect it.

BOOK VI.

sent you, expresses his thanks to me, I do not trouble myself about it: nevertheless, on the very day that I am writing before it is light, I think of abolishing many of his unjust acts and regulations. I come now to Brutus, whose interests I have embraced with the greatest warmth, at your desire; and for whom I had begun to entertain affection; but—shall I speak it? I check myself from fear of offending you. Do not, however, imagine that I have anything more at heart than to do as he directs; or that there is anything about which I have taken more pains. He gave me a list of instructions; and you had already conferred with me upon the same subjects; all of which I have prosecuted with the greatest diligence. In the first place, I have laboured to make Ariobarzanes pay him the talents he promised to give me. As long as the king remained with me, the transaction went on very well: afterwards he began to be pressed hard by a multitude of Pompeius' agents: and Pompeius has alone more authority than all other people; because, in addition to other reasons, it is thought he will come to the Parthian war. He is now paid by instamles of thirty-three Attic talents (6000£) every month; and that is scarcely sufficient for the monthly interest. But our friend Caesar¹ bears this patiently. He is without his principal; and is satisfied with the interest, though it is incomplete. Ariobarzanes pays nobody else, nor can he pay; for his treasury is exhausted, and he has no revenue. By Appius' ordinance, he demands tributes; but these hardly furnish the interest due to Pompeius. The king has two or three very rich friends; but they keep what belongs to them with as much care as I or you. On my part, however, I do not cease by letter, to entreat, to persuade, to uphold the king. Deiotarus has, likewise, told me that he has sent messengers to him about Brutus' business; who brought him back word that the king has nothing. In truth, I believe nothing can be more plundered than that kingdom, nothing more indigent than the king: so that I think either of renouncing my wardship; or, like Scævola in the case of Glabrio, of refusing to pay the interest and charges upon his debts. However, to M. Scæpius² and L. Gavius, who managed Brutus' business in the kingdom, I have given the prefectures which I promised Brutus through you, as they did not trade within my province: for you remember my conditions, that he should take what prefectures he pleased, provided it was not for one engaged in traffic. I had, therefore, given him two besides. But the persons for whom he had asked had left the province. Now let me explain to you the affair of the Salaminians*, which I perceive is as new to you as it was to me: for I never understood from Brutus that the money belonged to him. Indeed I have his own memorandum, in which it is said, "The Salaminians owe money to M. Scapius and P. Matinius, my intimate friends." These he recommends to me; and adds, as a sort of spur, that he was himself surety for them to a large amount. I had arranged that the Salaminians should repay it at twelve per cent. for six years, with an accruing interest at the end of each year. But Scapius demanded forty-eight per cent. I was afraid, if he had obtained this, that you would yourself cease to love me. For should I have receded from my own proclamation; and should have utterly ruined a city placed under the protection of Cato, and of Brutus himself, and distinguished by my benefits". At this very time Scapius suddenly produces a letter of Brutus, saying that the affair was at his own risk; which he had never mentioned either to me or you; and, at the same time, requesting that I would make Scapius a prefect. But I had, through you, made this exception, that it must not be a person engaged in traffic. Or if I did appoint anybody, least of all could I appoint him; because he had been a prefect under Appius, and having some troops of horse, had actually besieged the senate in their house of assembly at Salamis, in consequence of which five senators had been starved to death. As soon as I received information of this from certain Cyprus, who were sent to meet me at Ephesus, I wrote the very day I reached the province, to remove the troops out of the island. On this account I imagine Scapius must have written unfavourably of me to Brutus. This, however, is my feeling upon the subject: if Brutus should think that I ought to have awarded the forty-eight per cent., after having maintained the interest of twelve per cent. through the whole province, and declared it in my proclamation, and even had the courage, according to my au- thority, to refuse a preference to men who had brought down to me the interest of a city held as a hostage in a war against the Salaminians, I am afraid he would complain of my refusing a preference to one engaged in trade, which I have refused to Torquatus, in the case of your true friend Lenius, and to Pompeius himself, in the case of Sex. Statius, and have received their approbation of my conduct; or if he should be offended at my withdrawing the troops; I shall be sorry indeed to have incurred his displeasure, but much more so to find him a defect which was from what I had supposed. This, however, Scapius must acknowledge, that he was enabled to receive all the money according to the terms of my decree. I may add, too, what I doubt if you will yourself approve: for the interest ought to have stood as it was in the decree; and the Salaminians wished accordingly to deposit it: but I prevailed upon them to forbear. They gave way to me indeed; but what is to be become of them if Paullus should succeed to the province? All this I did for Brutus' sake, who has written to you very kindly about me: but to me, even when he is asking a favour, he writes in a dogmatical, haughty, uncivil manner. I wish you would write to him upon these matters, that I may know how he takes it: for you will inform me. I had indeed particularly mentioned this subject to you in a former letter; but I would have you distinctly understand that I had not forgot what you said in some of your letters, that if I brought back from this province nothing else besides his favour, it was sufficient. Be it so, since you desire it: but with this condition I presume that I incur no guilt. Accordingly I decreed the payment of Scapius' debt without delay. How properly the decree was formed I leave you to judge. I shall not appeal even to Cato. But do not suppose I have thrown aside your exhortations, which are imprinted in my bosom. With tears in your eyes you commended to me my reputation. What letter of yours is there in which you do not advert to it? Let then who will be angry; I shall be content with having right on my side; especially as I have bound myself by six books, as it were, so many pledges, with which I am rejoiced to find you so well pleased. In these you doubt about one historical fact, relating to Cneus the son of M. Flavius. But he did not live before the time of the decemviri: for he was curule-sole; which was an office instituted many years after the decemviri. What then was the use of his publishing the table of the festivals? It is supposed to have been at some time concealed, with the view of making it necessary to consult the few upon the proper days for transacting business. And many authors assert, that Cn. Flavius the scribe published the list of festivals, and composed the formulae of legal process; that you may not suppose it to be my invention, or, rather that of Africanus, for it is he that speaks. What is said about the gesture of a player has not escaped you. You entertain a wicked suspicion*: I wrote it in perfect simplicity. You say that you heard of my being saluted imperator through Philotimus. But I take for granted, since you have been in Epirus, you have received from me two letters, with a full account of the interesting matters which have since been in the province. And even after its capture, the other from Laodicea, both delivered to your servant. Upon the same subject I sent public despatches to Rome by two different messengers, for fear of the accidents of a sea voyage. About my daughter Tullia I agree with you; and have written to her, and to Teren- tius, to express my concurrence. For you had before said—"and I could wish you had gone back to your own flock". The correction of the letter brought by Memmius was a matter of so difficulty: for I greatly prefer him from Pontidia* to the other from Servilia: therefore you may get the assistance of Auius, who has always been very friendly to me; and now may be expected to be still more so, as he ought to succeed to his brother Appius' affection towards me, along with the rest of his inheritance. He often declared how much he esteemed me; and showed it in the affair of Bursa. You will relieve me from a great source of anxiety. I am not pleased with Furnius's exception; for the only time that I dread is the one which he excepts. I should write more to you upon this subject if you were at Rome. I am not surprised that you place all hope of peace in Pompeius. So it is; and I think that the charge of dissimulation must be removed. If the arrangement of my letter is confused, you must attribute it to the hurry in which I follow you in your sudden transitions. The young Ciceros are attached to each other, and pursue their studies and exercises together; but, as Isocrates said of Ephorus and Theopompus, one wants a bridle, the other a spur. I mean to present Quintus with his gown of manhood on the festival of Bacchus (March 18), as his father desired. I shall observe the day, on the presumption of there being no intercalation. I am very much pleased with Dionysius. The boys say that their father is very passionate; but there can be nobody of more learning, or better morals, or more attached to you and me. It is with justice that you hear the commendations of Thermus and Silius: they conduct themselves most honourably. Add also M. Nonius, Bibulus, me, if you will. I wish Socrates had an opportunity of distinguishing himself; for it is a situation of splendour. The others discredit the administration of Cato. I am much obliged to you for having recommended my cousin to Hortensius. Dionysius thinks there is no hope about Amiannus. I have been able to obtain no trace of Terentius. Mærages must certainly be dead. I have passed through his property, on which there was not a living creature remaining. I did not know this at the time I spoke to your freed-man Democritus. I have ordered the Rhodians to vases. But, pray what are you thinking of? In wrought dishes and splendid covers you use to entertain me with a dinner of herbs; what then can I suppose you will serve up in earthenware? Directions have been given to search out a horn for Philemæon: it will have doubt whom Cicero elsewhere speaks as his predecessor in the government of Cilicia.

² This M. Scæpius must be a different person from him who is afterwards joined with P. Matinius. See letter 13.

Cicero had formerly arranged T. Mumatius Planus Bursa, on which occasion it is probable this Appius might have spoken some civility to him.

On the subject of Thalia's marriage.

Furnius appears to have proposed a decree to permit the governors of Syria and Cilicia to resign their provinces at the expiration of their year, except the Parthians should advance before the month of July.

Two writers of history, brought up under Isocrates.

This is supposed to allude to some government of which Socrates was desirous, and for which the other candidates were unfit. The subsequent mention of Cato's administration probably relates to some expression used by Atticus on this occasion.

But this was here mentioned must mean his leave to return home.

This is the person to whom Atticus's slave had fled. [See book v. letter 15.] Those mentioned before were probably debtors of Atticus.

Rhesus was the name of a town on the confines of Syria and Cilicia, and might perhaps have been distinguished for its pottery; but I find no mention of it in Plinius or elsewhere.

be found. I trust he will perform something worthy of it. We are threatened with a Parthian war. Cassius has sent a foolish letter. Bibulus has not yet been received; when it is read, I imagine the senate will at length be roused. For my own part, I am in great perplexity. If, as I hope, the term of my service is not extended, I have still fears about June and July. Yet, suppose any irritation to be made, Bibulus will surely be able to hold out for two months. But what will be the situation of him whom I leave there; especially if it be not my brother will be my own, if I do not take my departure so soon? This is a great difficulty. I have, however, agreed with Delo- tarus, that he is to join my camp with all his forces. He has thirty cohorts of 400 men each, armed in our manner; and 2000 horse. He will support us till Pompeius arrives; who, by the letters I have received from him, gives me to understand that the business will be left to him. The Parthians have taken up their winter quarters in the Roman province. Orders himself is expected. In short, there is some stir. I have made no deviation from Bibulus's proclamation, besides that exception about which you wrote to me, as containing a reflection upon our order. I have adopted what is equivalent, but more guarded, from the Asiatic proclamation of Q. Mucins, son to Publius, 'that covenants should be performed with good faith, excepting when the transaction was of such a nature that it could not properly be observed.' I have also followed many parts of Scevolus; among the rest, that which the Greeks consider as the restoration of their freedom; that, in settling their disputes with each other, they should use their own laws. The proclamation is a short one, because of my having divided it under two distinct heads: one of them provincial; in which is contained what relates to the public accounts of the cities, to debts, interest of money, contracts, likewise all the concerns of the public renters, the other concerns what could not conveniently be determined without a proclamation, the entering upon inheritances and property, the appointment of commissioners and sales of effects; which are usually demanded and executed under a decree of the governor. A head, concerning the determination of all other causes, I left unwritten, professing to regulate my decrees of this sort by those of Rome. Thus I endeavour, and hitherto succeed in giving general satisfaction. The Greeks are delighted with having judges of their own nation. Poor ones, you will say, What does it signify? at least they think they have obtained their freedom by it. For your people truly have dignified judges in the persons of Turpio the cobbler, and Vettius the broker. You wish to know what I mean to do with the renters. I make much of them, I humour them, I commend them in words, and pay them honours; but take care they shall not be vexations to anybody. What is most, they are avowed, even Servilius abided by the interest of moneys as it had been ratified in their contracts. But I manage thus: I appoint a day at a considerable distance, before which if they Respecting M. Octavius, I now reply to you a second time, that you have given him a very proper answer. I wish you had done it a little more confidently. For Cælius sent his freed-man to me with a very civil letter; but spake of the panthers, and of the cities, most foolishly. I wrote word back that, in the first place, I was sorry you should be so little known in this obscurity, as to have it yet unheard in Rome that no expenses were imposed upon the people of my province, but only debts; and I informed him that it was neither lawful for me to procure the money he wanted, nor for him to receive it: and I admonished him, whom I really love, that having been himself the accuser of others, he should conduct himself more cautiously. In the next place, I gave him to understand that it was inconsistent with my honour, to make the Cybisrians have a public hunting by my command. Lepta is in raptures with your letter; for it is beautifully written, and has put me in high favour with him. I am much obliged to your daughter for having expressly desired you to send me her good wishes: I am obliged to Pilia also: but the former has been more forward in her kindness, by greeting me, whom she has yet never seen. Do you, therefore, in return make my compliments to both of them.

A passage of your letter dated the 31st of December contained a grateful recollection of the celebrated oath, which I had not forgotten; for on that day I was great in my robe of honour. You have my reply to all the subjects of your letters; not, as you ask me, gold for brass; but like for like. But there is another little letter, which I must not leave unanswered. Luceceius might indeed very well give up his Tusculanum; unless, perhaps, that he likes to retire there with his piper. I should be glad to know what is the real state of his affairs. I hear, too, that our friend Lentulus has offered for sale his Tusculanum on account of his debts. I wish to see them both free; and likewise Sestius, and add, if you please, Cælius: to all of whom may be applied that verse of Homer, "They were ashamed to refuse, and afraid to accept." I imagine you have heard of Curio's intention of proposing the recall of Memmis. About the security of Egnatius Sidicinus, I have just some thoughts, but cannot touch. Pina ius, whom you commend to me, is very unwell; but Deiotarus takes great care of him in his sickness. I have now replied also to your little letter. I hope you will let me frequently hear from you.

while I remain at Laodicea, that is, till the 15th of May; and when you come to Athens (for by that time we shall know about the city business, and about the provinces, which are all deferred to the month of March), send me a special messenger. But is it true that you have, through Herodes, already sent Caesar the Treatises of Vettius (9000c)? by which, as I hear, you have greatly incurred the displeasure of Pompeius; for he thinks you have deserved what belonged to him; and that Caesar will become more active in building at the Grove. I heard this from P. Vedius, a great prodigal, but well acquainted with Pompeius. This Vedius met me with two light carriages, and a larger one suitably equipped, and a litter, and a great retinue; for which, if Curio’s law should have passed, he will be obliged to pay a hundred sesterces (9000c). He had besides a dog-headed monkey in the carriage, and some wild asses. I never saw a more extravagant fellow. But hear the conclusion. He lodged at Laodicea with Pompeius Vindulhus, and there he left his equipage when he came to me. Presently Vindulhus dies, which event it is thought will concern Pompeius Magnus. C. Vennonius comes to Vindulhus’ house; and as he was sealing the effects, he lights upon the things belonging to Vedius. Among these were found five librae of gold and women, one of the sister of a friend of yours, a brutish man, who associates with him, and wife of that merry Lepidus, who hears these things so carelessly. I wished to send you this history by-the-bye; for we are both of us very curious. There is one thing besides I would have you consider. I am told that Appius is erecting a portico at Eleusis. Should I be foolish, if I were to erect one at the Academy? I think so; you will say. Then you must give it me in writing. I am very fond of Athens, and should like to leave some memorial, while I hate false inscriptions on other persons’ statues. But as it shall please you. You will also inform me on what day the Roman mysteries fall; and how you pass the winter. Take care of your health. The seven hundred and sixty-fifth day after the battle of Leuctra.

LETTER II.

Your freed-man, Philogenes, having called to pay his respects to me at Laodicea, saying that he was going to cross the sea to you immediately, I send this letter by him in answer to that which I received through Brutus’s courier; and I shall reply first to your last page, which has given me great uneasiness, owing to what Cincius has written about Statius’s conversation, in which it is very vexations that Statius should say I approved that design. I approve it! Upon this subject, I have only to say, that it is my wish to have as many kinds of connexion with you as possible,—though the strongest of all are still those of affection; so far am I from wishing to lessen any of those by which we are united. But that he is apt to speak too hardly about these matters I have often experienced, and have often app raised his anger, as I believe you know. And in this excursion or campaign of mine, I have repeatedly seen him inflamed with rage and calmed again. What he may have written to Statius, I know not. But, whatever he meant to do in an affair of that kind, at least he ought not to have detailed it to his freedman. I will, however, use my utmost endeavours that nothing may be done contrary to our wishes, and to his duty; for it is not enough in such a case, for every one merely to attend to his own conduct. The boy, or now the young man, Cicero, has especially his part in this duty; of which, indeed, I often remind him: and he seems to me to hear great affection, as he ought, towards his mother, and remarkably so towards you. He is a boy of good parts, but unsteady; in regulating which I have enough to do. Having now in my first page answered your last, I shall return to the beginning of your letter. In applying the term maritime to all the cities of the Peloponnesus, I have followed the synopsis of Dicarchus, no considerable author, but one approved even by your judgment. In relating Chereron’s account of Trophonius’s cave, he finds great fault with the Greeks for having so adhered to the sea-coast, and does not accept any place in the Peloponnesus. Though I was pleased with the author, (for he was well versed in history, and had lived in the Peloponnesus,) yet I was surprised; and communicated my doubts to Dionysius. He was at first struck with it; but having as good an opinion of Dicarchus, as you can have of C. Vestorius, or I of M. Cluvius, he thought I might safely trust him. He reckoned a certain place called Lepbron to be a maritime town of Arcadia; and considered Tene and Aliphera and Tritia as recently built, which he confirmed by Homer’s catalogue of the ships, in which there is no mention made of them. And I transcribed that passage from Dicarchus in so many words. I knew that the Phliasians were so called; and would have you put it in your copy: I have it so. But at first I was misled by analogy; Philus, Opus, Sipus, from whence are derived Opuntii, Sipuntii.

account to Scaptius, on condition of paying interest at twelve per cent. reckoned from the last contract, and not merely twelve per cent. throughout, but with the interest added to the principal at the end of each year. The money was paid down; but Scaptius refused to take it. And do you say then that Brutus is content to sustain some loss? It was forty-eight per cent. in the contract. The thing was impossible; nor if it had been possible could I have suffered it. I hear now that Scaptius repents. For what he affirmed to be by decree of the senate, that the contract should be good in law, was done from this consideration, that the Salaminians had raised money contrary to the Gabinian law. For the law of Aulus Gabinius forbids the cognizance of such bonds. The senate therefore decreed, that the bond should be cognizable. It consequently possesses just the same authority as others, and nothing more. This statement of what has passed, I think Brutus himself must agree with me. Now you may say; not say; Cato certainly will. But to return to you; can you, my Atticus, who praise so highly my integrity and politeness, can you from your own mouth, as Ennius says, ask me to send troops to Scaptius, for the purpose of extortion? Would you if you were with me, who sometimes say that you are vexed at not being so, would you suffer me to do it if I wished it? "Not more," you say, "than fifty men." There were at first not so many with Spartacus. And what mischief would they not have done in so exposed an island? But would they not have done it? Nay, what did they not do before my arrival? They kept the senate of the Salaminians shut up in their meeting-room so many days, that some of them perished with hunger. For Scaptius was a prefect under Appius, and had some troops from him. Do you then, whose image is presented to my mind as often as I think of anything honourable and praiseworthy—do you, I say, ask me to make Scaptius a prefect? I had formerly made a resolution to appoint nobody engaged in traffic, and Brutus approved of it. Should he have cavalry? why rather than infantry? Scaptius I suppose is grown prodigal of his money. The principal people you say wish it. I know how much they wish it: for they came as far as Ephe- sus to meet me, and with tears related the infamous conduct of the cavalry, and their own miseries. In consequence, I immediately despatched letters to have the troops removed from Cyprus before a certain day; and for this, among other reasons, the Salaminians applaud me to the skies in their decrees. But what need of troops now? For the Salaminians already pay,—unless indeed I wished to compel them by force of arms to reckon the interest at forty-eight per cent. And if I were to do such a thing, should I ever dare to read or look into those books which you commend? In this business, my sweet Atticus, you have shown too much, yes, too much regard to Brutus: I fear I may have shown too little. I have acknowledged, in a letter to Brutus, that you mentioned these particulars to me. Now let me turn to something else. I shall here do all I can for Appius, con-

He had been accused of peculation in the government of Cilicia, in which he had been Cicero's predecessor.
For, perhaps for Reason in expiring, the meant said, the few for Districts do or to offered for also who was volatile, and I apprehend and "I see hastening to Pammenian freed-man that nothing body a Philotimus some. is, only many and he upon terms, that Philogenes, I think, therefore, when what he is, thought to be Athenis in the month of September. I should be glad to know the times of your movements. I was acquainted with the simplicity of Sempronius Rufus, by your letter from Corcyra. What think you? I envy the superiority of V esto-rius. I should like still to prattle on, but the day breaks: the throng increases; and Philogenes is hastening to depart. I must therefore bid you farewell, and beg that you will make my compliments to Pilla and to our little Cecilia, when you write. My son Cicero sends his kind regards.

LETTER III.

Thoron I have no news to tell you of anything that has happened since I wrote to you by your friend-man Philogenes, yet as I am going to send Philogenes to Rome, whether I will or not, I have written a few lines to you; and first, what particularly concerns me, (not that you can at all help me, for the business does not admit of delay, and you are a long way off, and, as it is said, "the wind rolls many waves of the wide sea between us") the day as you see creeps on; for I leave the province the 30th of July, and there is yet no successor appointed. Whom shall I leave to take the command of the province? Reason and general expectation call for my brother; in the first place, because it is esteemed an honour, and therefore nobody is more proper; in the next place, because he is the only person I have of praetorinan rank. For Ponti- nius by the terms of his agreement, (having come out upon that condition,) has already left me. Nobody thinks my questor of sufficient dignity,—for he is volatile, licentious, and touchy. But what regard to my brother, the first consideration is, that I imagine he would not easily be prevailed upon, for he dislikes the province, and in truth nothing can be more disagreeable or more trouble-some. Then, supposing he should not choose to refuse me, what ought I to do? For, at a time when there is thought to be a great war in Syria, and that likely to force its way into this province, while there is here no defence, and supplies voted only for the year that is expiring,—what affection does it argue to leave my brother? or what attention to my duty to leave a mere trifer? You see, therefore, under what difficulties I labour, and how much I stand in need of advice. In short, I did not wish to have anything to do with this whole business. How much preferable is your province! You can leave it when you please, (unless perhaps you may have left it already,) and you may appoint over Theopatra and Chaonia whomsoever you choose.

think fit. However, I have not yet seen Quintus, to know whether, if I wished it, he could be brought to agree to it; nor, if he could, am I sure what effect it would produce. So much then for this. The rest is hitherto full of praise and thanks, and not unworthy of those books which you are pleased to commend. Cities have been preserved; the renters have been abundantly satisfied; nobody has been hurt by any insult, very few by the severe justice of my decrees, and nobody so that he dare complain. Deeds have been accomplished that would justify a triumph; about which I shall do nothing in a hurry, and nothing at all without your advice. The only difficulty is in delivering up the province; and this some god must determine. Respecting the affairs of the city, you know more than I; you have more frequent and more certain intelligence. Indeed I am concerned that I should not myself have received information from your letters, for there were unpleasant reports here about Curio and Paulus. Not that I apprehend any danger while Pompeius stands or even sits by us; let him but have his health. But yet I lament the condition of Curio and Paulus, with whom I am well acquainted. If therefore you are now in Rome, and I should wish you to send me a sketch of the whole state, which may meet me, and by which I may fashion myself, and consider beforehand in what disposition of mind I should approach the city. For it is something not to be quite a stranger and uninformed upon my arrival. I had almost forgot to add, that for your friend Brutus' sake, as I have repeatedly written to you, I have done everything I could. The Cyriots paid down the money, but Scipio was not satisfied with the interest of twelve per cent. accumulating at the end of each year. Pompeius has not been able to get more from Ariobarzanes through his own influence, than Brutus has got through mine, though it was impossible for me to ensure him. For the king was very poor; and I was so far off that I could only act by letters, with which I have not ceased to press him. The result is, that in proportion to the amount, Brutus comes of the number of talents (20,000,) have been procured for Brutus in the course of the year; and in six months two hundred (40,000,) have been promised to Pom- peius. But in the affair of Appius, it can hardly be told what consideration I have had for Brutus. Why then should I vex myself? His friends are mere trifles, Matinius, and Scipio; who because he could not get from me a troop of horse to harass on the Cypriots, as he had done before, is perhaps angry; or because he is not a prefect, which I have granted to nobody engaged in traffic; not to C. Ventonius, my own familiar acquaintance; nor to yours, M. Lenius. This I told you in Rome that I meant to observe; and I have persevered in it. But what reason can he have to complain, who refused to take the money when it was offered him? The other Scipio who was in Cappadocia, is, I imagine, satisfied. Upon receiving your expression of the opinion, which I offered him at the request of Brutus, he afterwards wrote to me to say that he did not wish to accept it. There is a person by the name of Gavius, whom I also made prefect by Brutus's desire; but he thought fit to say and to do many things against me, mixed with abuse,—a very spaniel of P. Clodius. This fellow neither escorted me on my way to Apamea; nor afterwards, when he had come to the camp and was returning again, did he ask if I had any commands; and he was, I know not why, manifestly unfriendly. If I had employed such a man as prefect, what would you think of me? I, who as you know could never bear the insolence of the most powerful men, should I bear it in this hireling? though it is something more than bearing it, to bestow a place of emolument and honour. This Gavius then, seeing me lately at Apamea on his way to Rome, addressed me thus: (I should hardly venture to address Culeolus in such a manner:) "Whence?" says he, "am I to get my allowances as prefect?" I replied, with more gentleness than those who were present thought I ought to have done, "that I was not used to give allowances to those whose services were not wanted." He went away in a passion. If Brutus can be moved with the anger of such a worthless fellow, you may love him by yourself, I shall not be your rival. But I think Brutus will show himself to be what he ought. I wished however that you might be acquainted with the real state of the case; and I have sent an exact account of it to Brutus himself. Between ourselves, Brutus positively sends me no letters, not even lately about Appius, in which there is nothing haughty and unfriendly. It is a saying often in your mouth, that "Granarius did not undervalue himself, and hated proud kings," in which however he rather excites my smile than my anger; but he is in truth too regardless of what he writes or to whom. Q. Cicero the son has I suppose, nay, certainly, read the letter addressed to his father. For he is in the habit of opening them, and that by my advice, in case there should be anything of importance to be known. In that letter was the same notice about your sister which you mentioned to me. I saw the young man wonderfully moved, and he uttered his grief to me in tears. In short, I observed a great degree of filial affection, of sweetness, and kindness; from which I entertain the greater hope that nothing will be done hastily. This I wished you to be acquainted with. I am sorry to add that young Hortensius has been conducting himself in a very unbecoming and disgraceful manner at the exhibition of gladiators at Laodicea. I invited him to dinner for his father's sake the day he arrived; and for the same father's sake I have done nothing more. He told me that he should wait for me at Athens, that we might return home together. "Very well," said I; for what could I say? In fact I imagine what he said is nothing at all... I should certainly be sorry from fear of offending the father, for whom I have a great regard. If he should go with me, I will so manage him as not to give offence where I should be very sorry to do it. I have nothing more to say, but that I should be glad if you would send me Q. Celer's speech against M. Servilius. Let me hear from you soon. If there is no news, at least let me hear by your messenger that there is none. My regards to Pilia and your daughter. Farewell.

LETTER IV.

I ARRIVED at Tarsus the 5th of June, where I met with several things which gave me uneasiness. There is a great war in Syria, great depredations in Cilicia, and any plan of administration is rendered difficult by reason of the short time that remains of my yearly office. But above all, my greatest difficulty is, that I am obliged by the decree of the senate to leave somebody in charge of the government. Nothing could be more unfit than the quaestor Mesocius; and of Caesius I yet hear nothing. It seems most proper to leave my brother with the command; but in this there are some unpleasant circumstances, such as my own departure, the danger of a war, the irregularities of the soldiers, and six hundred things besides. How hateful is the whole business! But this I must leave to fortune, since there is little opportunity for the exercise of prudence. When you are come safely, as I hope, to Rome, you will with your accustomed kindness see about everything which you think concerns me; and, in the first place, about my dear Tullia, respecting whose establishment I have written my opinion to Tertullia, while you were in Greece. The next thing to be considered is my honour. For in your absence I fear there has hardly been sufficient attention paid in the senate to my letters. I shall besides write a few words to you more mysteriously, which your sagacity will be able to unravel. My wife's freedman (you know whom I mean) has seemed to me lately, by what he has inconsiderately let out, to have confused the calculations arising from the sale of the goods of the Crotonian tyrant... I fear—Do you understand me?—What is the meaning of the word "friend," if I say, you are my friend? Looking then myself alone into this, secure the residue... I cannot write all that I fear. Contrive that your letters may fly to meet me. I have written this hastily on my journey, and surrounded by troops. You will make my compliments to Pilia, and to the pretty little Cecilia."

1 His character is given in letter 3 of this book. The quaestors were not usually appointed by the command mentors.

4 Milo, of the same name as a celebrated prize-fighter of Crotone. The addition of tyrannicide, it is almost needless to add, relates to his having killed Clodius.
5 It seems probable that Cicero's fears might arise from some suspicion of his wife's having availed herself of her authority over her freed-man Philomus to appropriate to her use part of the money obtained from the sale of Milo's goods. See book v. letter 8; book xi. letters 16 and 22; and book xi. letter 2, note v.
6 She appears to have been an improvident woman, and to have involved Cicero in debts. [Life of Cicero, p. 136.] What I have rendered "secure the residue," I suppose to allude to what is said in letter 1 of this book, towards the end—"Camillus sends me word that he has received the residue." The same thing is repeated in letter 5 of this book. See after the residue.

LETTER V.

By this time I presume you are in Rome, where, if it is so, I congratulate you upon your safe arrival. As long as you were away, you seemed to be farther from me than if you were at home, for I was more a stranger to the state, both of the public affairs, and of my own. Therefore, although I hope that I shall already have made some progress on my way by the time you read this, yet I should wish you to let me hear frequently from you, with every particular, upon all subjects; especially upon what I before mentioned to you, that my wife's freed-man has appeared to me, by his frequent hesitation and shuffling, in different meetings and conversations, to have admitted some incorrectness into his computation of the Crotonian's property. Be so good as to inquire into this with your usual kindness, but especially this: "From the walls of the city on the seven hills he delivered to Camillus an account of debts to the amount of 24 and 48 minae (761. and 153.); that he owed 24 minae from the Crotonian property; and from that of the Chersonesus 48 minae; and having entered upon a succession of 1280 minae (4096.), he had not paid a farthing, though the whole was due the first of February: his own freed-man, a namesake of Conon's father, had been wholly indifferent." In the first place, therefore, take care that the principal may be all secured; then, that the interest from the fore-mentioned day may not be overlooked. I had great fears whilst I suffered him to be here; for he came to make observations, not without some hopes. But failing in this, he went away abruptly, saying, "I give up," at the same time quoting a verse of Homer, that it is discreditable to remain long and return empty. And he reproached me with the old saying, "What is given," &c. See after the residue; and as far as possible let me clearly understand it. Though I have now almost served my yearly term, for there are only thirty-three days remaining, yet I am greatly harassed by the anxious state of the province. For while Syria is blazing with arms, and Bibulus in the midst of his sad affliction sustains the chief burden of the war; and his lieutenants, and questor, and friends, are sending to me to come to their assistance; though my army is but weak, yet, having good auxiliaries of the Galatians, Pisdians, and Lydians, which constitute its strength, I have thought it my duty to keep them as near as possible to the enemy, so long as the decree of the senate authorizes me to preside over the province. But, what gives me great satisfaction, Bibulus is not importunate with me, but rather writes to inform me of everything. In the mean time the day of my departure creeps on unnoticed. As soon as it arrives, it will be another question whom I shall leave in the command; unless Calpurnius Cælius, the new questor, should be come, of whom I have yet heard nothing certain. I intended to have written a longer letter, but I have nothing more to say, and am too full of care to triffe and joke. Farewell, therefore, and make my compliments to the dear little Attica, and to my friend Pilia.

LETTER VI.*

(Grørv. vi.)

YOUNG Quintus has, with all duty, reconciled the mind of his father to your sister. It is true that I encouraged him, but when he was already in his course. Your letter, too, was a great inducement. In short, I trust the affair will terminate as we wish. I have already written to you two letters about my private concerns, if only they have been delivered. They were in Greek, and in purposed ambiguity. But there is no occasion to do anything, besides simply asking about Milo's account, and exhorting him to use despatch as he promised me: you may thus be of some service. I have desired the questor Mæcinius to wait at Laodicea, that I may get the accounts made out agreeably to the Julian law, and left in two of the provincial cities. I design to go to Rhodes for the sake of the boys, and thence as soon as possible to Athens, though the winds are very much against us; but I want to reach home during the year of the present magistrates, whose good-will I have experienced in the decree for a supplication. But let me hear from you on my way, whether you think I ought to take more time, out of respect to the republic. I should have written by Tiro, but have left him very ill at Issus. They send me word, however, that he is better; but I am much concerned for him. For nothing can be more modest, or more attentive, than that young man.

LETTER VII.

(Grørv. vi.)

WHILEST in everything I support Appius's honour in the province, I am on a sudden become father-in-law to his accuser." "May it turn out happily!" you say. I hope it may, and I am sure that you wish it. But, believe me, I thought of nothing less, and had sent some confidential persons to the ladies about Tiberius Nero, who had applied to me on the subject. When they came to Rome the contract was already made. I hope this may be a more desirable party. I understand the ladies are exceedingly deluged with the young man's courtesy and complaisance. You must not try to pick out defects. But how is this? Do you distribute bread to the populace at Athens? Do you think this right? Though my treatise does not forbid it; for this is no bribe amongst fellow-citizens, but a liberal acknowledgment of hospitality. You still advise me to think of the portico for the Academy, though Appius no longer thinks of that at Eleusis. I am sure you must be sorry for Hortensius. I am myself deeply concerned; for I had looked forwards to living with him in great familiarity. I have appointed Cælius to the charge of the province. "A mere boy," you will say, "and perhaps giddy, and undignified, and intemperate." I acknowledge it, but it could not be otherwise; for I was grieved that the letter I had received from you some time since, in which you said that you doubted what I ought to do about resigning the command. I saw what was the cause of your doubt, and was sensible of the difficulty; that I was delivering it to a boy: but it was not desirable to deliver it to my brother; and, besides my brother, there was nobody whom I could with propriety advance before the question, especially as he was a person of noble birth. However, so long as the Parthians seemed to threaten us, I had determined either to leave my brother in the command, or even, for the sake of the republic, to remain myself, contrary to the decree of the senate. But since by a most unexpected good fortune they have retired, my doubt has been removed. I foresaw what would be said: "So, has he resigned to his brother? Is this holding the government for not more than a year? What avails it that the senate wished the provinces to devolve upon such as had not before had a command; while this man has commanded for three years together?" This then is what I say in public. But what shall I say to you? I should never be free from anxiety, lest he should do something angry, or disrespectfully, or carelessly, for such is the condition of mankind. What if his son should be guilty of some imprudence, a boy of great self-confidence? What vexation would it give me! For his father would not send him away, and was not pleased that you should advise it. But as for Cælius, I do not say that I care not what he does; but however I care much less. Add to this, that Pompeius, a man of that weight and experience, appointed Q. Cassius, and Cæsar, Antonius, without the form of a ballot, and I offend one who is given me by a ballot? and thereby induce him to pry into the conduct of the person whom I had left? What I have done is preferable, and is warranted by many precedents, and is more suited to my age. But, ye gods! in what favour have I put you with him, by reading to him, I do not say your letter, but that of your secretary. The letters of my friends invite me to demand a triumph, a thing, as I think, not to be despised in this regeneration of my fortunes. Therefore, my Atticus, do you also begin to wish it, that I may not be disinclined.

* See the following letter, note 4.
* A public thanksgiving, which used to be voted upon any signal success, and which might lead to his obtaining a triumph.

LETTER VIII.

As I was going to write to you, and had actually taken up my pen, Batonus came directly from the ship to the house in which I was at Ephesus, and delivered to me your letter of September 30. I rejoice at your favourable passage, your meeting with Pila, and, not least, at her conversation about the marriage of my daughter Tullia. But BatONUS has brought me strange alarms respecting Cæsar: to Legata he has spoken yet more at large. I hope his news may not be true; it is certainly dreadful; that he will on no account dismiss his army; and that the preators elect, and Cassius the tribune of the people, and the consul Lentulus, support him, while Pompeius thinks of retiring from the city. But how is this? Are you at all troubled for him, who sets himself before the idea of your son? And who are they that have defaced him? But to my purpose. The Etesian winds have greatly retarded me; and this undecked vessel of the Rhodians has made me lose twenty days. Whilst I am on the point of embarking from Ephesus, I deliver this letter to L. Tarquinius, who leaves the port at the same time, but will sail quicker. For in these open vessels, and other long boats of the Rhodians, we must watch for fair weather. I have, however, made as much haste as I could. I am pleased with what you say of the Puteolan crumbs. Now I wish you carefully to consider the state of the Roman affairs, and see what you think should be determined about demanding a triumph, to which my friends invite me. I should be quite easy about it, if Bibulus was not trying for it; who, as long as there was one enemy in Syria, no more put his foot out of the gate than he had formerly done out of his house. But now it is in danger to be silent. However, consider the whole matter, that as soon such as might be excited against him, if he offended his question.

1 Having begun, as it were, a new life, after his restitution from banishment, a life which required the support of new honours: for, before that event, the fame of his consulship had been such, as to make him disregard them.

1 The same expression is used in reference to the same event, book v. letter 10, and is no doubt taken from something said upon that occasion. The person alluded to is generally acknowledged to be Hirtius.

1 The word in the original, rudus, or rudus, is probably derived from rudus, "rubbish," and thence is used for the "sweepings," "crumbs," or "little remains" of a debt. It is used in the same sense, book iv. letter 1.

1 In the text it is "stranger," "stranger," but I have thought it better to adopt the very easy alteration of hositis, agreeable to book vii. letter 2.

1 Bibulus, when he was joint consul with Cæsar, had been insulted and violently driven from the forum; in consequence of which he was afterwards shut up in his house, and acted only by the publication of edicts. See book ii. letter 21.
as we meet, I may be able to make my determination. But I am writing more than enough; for I have no time to spare, and am sending by one who will either arrive with me or not much before. Cicero\(^a\) presents his compliments. You will present those of both of us to Pilia and to your daughter.

LETTER IX.

Immediately upon my landing in the Piræus\(^b\) the 14th of October, I received from my servant Acatus your letter, which I had long expected; but before I unsealed it, I took notice of its shortness; when I had opened it, I was struck with the unevenness of the letters, which you generally form very correctly and distinctly. In short, I perceived from thence, what you mention to be the case, that you came to Rome the 20th of September with a fever. Being greatly concerned, though not more than I ought, I immediately inquired of Acatus. He assured me that both you and he thought you were quite well, and that he had the same account from your own people; at the same time that he acknowledged, conformably to the conclusion of your letter, that you had some degree of fever at the time you wrote. I am very sensible of your kindness, yet surprised that you should nevertheless have written with your own hand. But enough of this; for I hope from your prudence and temperance, nay, as Acatus bids me, I trust, that you are, as I wish you, already well. I am glad you received the letter I sent you by Turannius. Watch, specially, if you love me, the greediness\(^c\) of this

\(^{a}\) The son.

\(^{b}\) The port of Athens.

\(^{c}\) In the original is a Greek word, derived from Philotimus, which marks the meaning of the author. The term ‘confounder’ refers to the confusion which Philotimus had admitted into his accounts. See letters 4 and 5 of this book.

\(^{d}\) It was probably expected that the censors might introduce some regulations upon these articles, with the view of repressing the luxury of the age.

BOOK VII.

I explained shortly why I had not left my brother in charge of the province. This was the substance of that letter. Now hear the rest. I entreat you by your fortunes, to employ all the affection with which you embrace me, and all your prudence, which I always admire, in taking into consideration the whole of my situation. For I seem to see such a contest; unless the same Providence, which delivered me from the Parthian war, better than I dared to hope, should have compassion upon the republic; such I say as never was before. But this calamity is common to me with everybody else; upon this I do not require your advice. That which is my own affair I beg you to undertake. Do you perceive how, at your instance, I have attached myself to both parties? And I wish I had from the first attended to your friendly admonition. ‘But,’ as Homer says, ‘your persuasions did not probably arise, for nothing is greater than one’s country.’ At length, however, you did persuade me to embrace the one, because he had been so kind to me; the other, because he was so powerful. I have done it, therefore, and done it with all readiness, so that nobody is more esteemed by either of them. For I considered that my connexion with Pompeius did not oblige me to transgress against the republic; nor, because I agreed with Caesar, was I to fight against Pompeius; such was their union. Now, as you show, and as I plainly see, the utmost contention between them is to be apprehended. And each reckons me of his side, unless one of them feigns. For Pompeius does not doubt (and he judges rightly) of my highly approving his present sentiments with regard to the republic. I have received letters to this effect from both parties, and I am certain that you received yours; as if neither esteemed anybody more than me. What should I do then? I do not mean when they come to extremities; for if it is to be decided by arms, I am clear that it is better to be conquered with the one, than to conquer with the other; but I speak of the questions which will be agitated at the period of my arrival; whether one, who is absent, be eligible; whether he should not dismiss his army. "Speak, Marcus Tullius! For, I say, "What shall I say? Wait, I beseech you, till I can see Atticus. There is no room for trifling. Shall I oppose Caesar? Where then is our strict attachment? For, I helped to procure him this permission by applying to Cælius the tribune of the people at the request of Pompeius himself" at Ravenna. "Of Pompeius?" Even of our Cælius, in that famous third consulate. Should I now change my sentiments? "I have too much respect (not only for Pompeius, but for the Trojan men and women. Polydamus will be the first to reproach me." Who? You yourself, who are used to commend both my actions and my writings. I have escaped this blow during the two preceding consulates of the Marcelli, when Cæsar’s province was taken into consideration. Now I fall into the very crisis. There let any blockhead give his opinion first; I am mightily pleased to be engaged about my triumph, and to have so good an excuse for remaining without the city. Yet people will try to efface my sentiments. You will perhaps laugh at what I am going to say. How I should wish even now to be staying in my province! It was clearly desirable if this was hanging over us, though nothing could be more disagreeable. For, by-the-bye, I would have you know, that all those first appearances, which in your letters you commended to the skies, have dissolved away. The practice of virtue itself is not an easy thing; but how difficult is a continual pretence of it! For when I thought it right and honourable, out of the yearly sums which had been voted for my expenses, to leave a yearly sum for the questor C. Cælius, and to bring into the treasury a thousand sesterces (6000s.); my attendants murmured, thinking it ought to have all been divided amongst us; and I should be more attentive to the treasures of the Phrygians and Cilicians, than to our own. But they did not move me: for my own applause has the greatest weight with me. Yet there is nothing that could be done for the honour of any person, which I have omitted. But this, as Thucydidæ says, is an excursion from the subject, not without its use. But pray consider my situation; bow, in the first place, I may retain the favour of Cæsar; then about my triumph; which, unless the times of the republic prevent it, I conceive to be easily attainable. I judge so both from the letters of my friends, and from the supplication, when he, who did not vote for it, voted more than if he had decreed the greatest triumph*. With him Favorinus, my familiar friend, was one who concurred in opinion; another was Hirrus, who was angry with me. Yet Cato was present at the drawing up of the decree, and wrote to me most pleasantly upon the subject of his vote. But Cæsar, in congratulating with me about the supplication, exults upon the opinion delivered by Cato; but mentions nothing of what Cato said upon the occasion; only that he voted against the supplication. I come back to Hirrus. You had begun to reconcile him to me: go on with it. You have Sorida, you have Silius to assist you. I have already written to them both, and am to have your account from them, that he could have stopped it, but did not choose to do so: but that he had concurred with Cato my particular friend, when he made such honourable mention of me; and that I had not written to him, though I wrote to everybody else. He said truly; for to him alone, and to Crassipes, I had not written. So much then for public affairs. Let us return home. I wish to separate myself from that man*. He has strangely perplexed my accounts, a very Larritius*; "but let us leave what is already done, however we may regret it." Let us despatch the rest; and this first, in which I have some care added to my affliction; but this Præcan affair*, whatever it is, I should be sorry to have confounded with those accounts of mine which he has in his hands. I have written to Terentia*, and likewise to him, that I should put together in your hands whatever money I could collect, for the equipment of my expected triumph. This, I conceive, must be unobjectionable. But as they please. Take upon you this care also*, how we may endeavour to accomplish what you propose. This both you have pointed out in some letter, (from Epirus was it? or from Athens?) and I will assist you in it.

LETTER II.

I arrived at Brundusium the 24th of November, after as favourable a voyage as your own; so charmingly did a gentle gale waft us from Epirus. The words have run into a verse, which, if you please, you may impose upon some young man for your own. I am most thankful at my return. The few letters show that you are very far from well; and I, who know your fortune, suspect it must be something serious that obliges you to give way.

* Cato resisted the application for Cicero’s supplication; but at the same time spoke of him in the most honourable terms.

* Philoctimus.

* It is not known who this is.

* Philoctimus was Terentia’s freed-man, and perhaps involved with her in embarrassing Cicero’s accounts.

* I conceive the conclusion of this letter to relate altogether to some new subject mentioned previously by Atticus, and not improbably concerning Q. Cicero, or Pompeius, whose dishonour is mentioned, book vi. letter 2.
and almost overpowers you; though your servant Pamphilus assured me that the quaran fits of your ague had left you, and that another milder form had succeeded; and Terentia, who came to the gate of Brundisium at the same time that I entered the harbour, and who met me in the forum, said that L. Pontius Pamphilus to Trebonia, that this also had left you: which, if it be so, is what I exceedingly wish, and hope indeed that your prudence and temperance may have effected. I come now to your letters, of which I have received six hundred a at once, each more acceptable than the former, and all in your own hand. I used to love Alexis's handwriting, because it bore so near a resemblance to your own; yet I loved it not, as showing that you were not well. The mention of his name brings to my mind Tiro, whom I have left sick at Patre; a young man, as you know; and add, if you please, an honest one; I know nothing better. Therefore I miss him sadly; and though he did not think himself dangerously ill, yet I cannot help being anxious about him, and place my greatest hope in the attention of M. Curius, which Tiro has signified to me by letter, and many persons have mentioned. Curius himself is sensible how much you wish him to be in my esteem: and indeed I am highly pleased with him, for he possesses a natural urbanity of manner which is very amiable. He has a will sealed with the seals of the Ciceros and those of the pretorian cohort, in which he has openly bequeathed to you a pound, to me a half-penny. I was sumptuously entertained by Alexion at Actium in Corecyra. There was no resisting Cicero's wish of seeing Thyamis. I am rejoiced that you take pleasure in your little girl, and that the affection of parents towards their children is proved to you to be natural. For without this there can be no natural union between man and man; and if this is taken away, the very intercourse of life is destroyed. May it turn out well, said Carneades grossly: yet more modestly than our friend Lucius, and Patron, who in referring everything to their own gratification, do not think any thing whatever should be done for the sake of another; and when they say that the reason why a man ought to be good, is that he may escape harm, not because it is naturally right; they do not perceive that they are describing a crafty man instead of a good man. But this belief is in those books, which you encourage me by praising. I return to my subject. I was eagerly expecting the letter, which you had sent by Philoxenus; for you had mentioned that it contained an account of your conversation with Pompeius at Naples; this Patron delivered to me at Brundisium. I believe he had received it at Corecyra. Nothing could be more acceptable. For it related to the republic; to the opinion which he entertained of my integrity; to the kindness which he showed in his discourse about the triumph. But what pleased me most of all was, that I understood you had visited him for the purpose of discovering his disposition towards me; this, I say, was the circumstance most agreeable to me. With respect to the triumph, however, I never had any wish for it before that barefaced letter of Bibulus, which was followed by so full a supplication. Had he really done what he described, I should rejoice, and favour his pretensions. But now, that he, who never set his foot beyond the gate so long as his enemy was on this side the Euphrates, should be loaded with honours; and that he, on whose troops his army placed their whole reliance, should not attain the same; this is a disgrace to us; to us, I say, including you. I shall therefore make every exertion, and hope I shall succeed. If you were well, I might already have had some particulars investigated: but I trust you will soon be well. I love you for this Numerian remnant. I want to know what is become of Hortensius; what Cato is doing, who has in truth been shamefully hostile towards me. He gave me his testimony for integrity, justice, eloquence, fidelity, which I did not ask; what I did ask, he refused. How therefore does Caesar, in the same letter in which he con-gratulates me and promises every thing, exult in the injury I have received from Cato's ingratitude? Yet this very man voted to Bibulus a supplication of 20 days. Pardon me; I cannot bear this, nor will I let this go. It is not that there is no occasion, since I shall see you so soon. But as to that business of Chrysippus (for about the other, a mere mechanic, I was less surprised, though nothing could be worse than his conduct); but for Chrysippus, whom on account of some little proficiency in learning I entertained with kindness, and had in esteem; that he should leave the hoy without my knowledge! I omit many other things which I hear of him; I omit his thefts; but his running away I cannot bear; there is nothing that I think more wicked. I have accordingly followed the old principle, as it is said, of the pretor Drusus, in the case of one who would not swear to observe the same conditions after he had obtained his liberty; I have not pronounced them free: especially as there was nobody present by whom their liberation could properly be asserted. You will receive this letter, I shall think it. I assent to your judgment. To one most eloquent letter of yours I have not replied, in which you speak of the dangers of the republic. What should I reply? I was exceedingly disturbed. But the Partians do nothing to occasion me much alarm, and have suddenly left Bibulus half alive.

LETTER III.

The sixth of December I came to Herculaneum and there read your letter, which Philippus delivered to me. The moment I saw it I had the satisfaction of recognising your own hand-writing; afterwards I was exceedingly delighted with the accurate information it contained. With respect to the first point, in which you say you differ from Diceranus, though I had earnestly requested (and that with your concurrence) that I might not be obliged to remain in the province longer than one year; yet this was not accomplished by our endeavours. For you must know that not a word was mentioned in the senate about any of us, who held provincial governments, remaining beyond the time appointed by the decree of the senate. So that I cannot justly be charged with any blame for having left the province earlier than might, perhaps, have been desirable. But what if it be better as it is? This has often appeared to be the case on other occasions as well as on this. For whether things can be brought to an agreement, or to the discontinuance of the evil-disposed, in either case I should be glad to give my assistance, or at least not to be out of the way. But if the good are overpowered, wherever I might be, I should be overpowered with them. Therefore, the quickness of my return ought not to be regretted. And if the idea of a triumph had not been thrown in my way, which you also approve, truly you should not now much want that character, which is drawn in my sixth book. For what should I do to satisfy you, who have devoured those books? I should not even now hesitate to lay aside this object, great as it is, if it be more proper to do so. But it is impossible to pursue both at the same time, and without any prejudice. Hence views in a triumph, to exert a free spirit in the cause of the republic. Do not, however, doubt, but that whichever is the more honourable, that will be to me the more desirable. For what you seem to recommend, that I should continue to hold my command, and remain out of the city, both as being safer for myself, and as affording the means of rendering service to the republic, how this is we will consider when we meet. It is a thing that admits of deliberation, though in great measure I agree with you. You do well in not doubting of my affection towards the republic; and you judge rightly that he who has by no means acted liberally towards me, considering my services and his profusion to other people; and you justly explain the reason of this, which entirely agrees with what you say has been done in the case of Fabius and Cæcinius. But if this were not so, and he had devoted himself wholly to me, yet that guardian of the city which you mention would compel me to remember its noble inscription, and would not permit me to imitate Volcacius or Servius, with whom you are satisfied, but would call upon me to feel and to act as became me. And this I would readily do, if it might be done in a different manner from what is now required. For at this time people are contending for their own power, or the risk of the state. If it is in defence of the republic, why was it not defended at the time when this very man was consul? And the year following why was not I defended, with whose cause the safety of the republic was identified? Why was his command prolonged? or why in that manner? Why was such a struggle made that the ten tribunes of the people should propose the decree for his eligibility in his absence? By these means he is become so powerful, that now it is left to a single citizen to resist him; who I wish had never given him such power, instead of now opposing him, when he is so strong. But since affairs are brought to this situation, I shall not, as you say, "look out for the vessel of the Atrides:" the only vessel for me shall be that which is steered by Pompeius. When you ask, what must be done if I am called upon—Speak, M. Tullius, my beloved! I assent to Co. Pompeius. Yet privately I shall exhort Pompeius to peace. For I am convinced that affairs are in the greatest danger. You, who are in the city, know more. But this I see, that we have to do with a man of the boldest and readiest spirit; that all convicts, all disgraced persons, and all that deserve to be convicted and disgraced, incline to that party; almost all the youth, all the city people, the powerful tribunes, with the addition of C. Cassius; all who are oppressed with debt, whom I understand to be more than I had supposed. That cause wants nothing but a good cause; it has everything else in abundance. To such a state everybody ought to exert himself to prevent a decision by arms, the event of which is always uncertain, but in the present case rather to be dreaded in favour of one party. Bibulus has left his province, and deputed the command on Veiento. He will not, as I hear, hurry himself in his departure. Cato, when he goes, in his hours, declared that the only persons towards whom he bare no jealousy were those whose influence could receive little or no increase. I come now to my private concerns; for I have mostly replied to your letter on the subject of the republic, and to that from your villa, and to that which you wrote afterwards. I come to my private concerns. One word, also, about Cassius. He is so far from shaking my opinion, that I think he will himself repent of having changed his own. But how is it that Lucceius's buildings should have been adjudged to him? I am surprised that you should have omitted to mention it. About Philippus I will do as you advice. I did not, however, expect from him at this time the accounts which he gave you; but the remainder which he desired me in Tusculumum to enter into my book with my own hand, and of which he also gave me a memorandum in Asia, written with his hand. If he made this good, he would himself owe me as much, or more, than what he there declares to be the amount of my debt. But hereafter, if only the condition of the republic permit, I will not subject myself to accumulations of this kind: not, indeed, that I had before been negligent; but I was occupied with the multitude of my friends. I shall be glad, therefore, to avail myself of your assistance and advice, as you promise, and hope I shall not be giving you much trouble. Respecting these clogs of my cohort, there is no cause for un easiness; for they corrected themselves on observing my integrity. But nobody vexed me more than one whom you least suspect. His behaviour was at first excellent, and is so now; but at the moment of my departure he intimated that he had hoped to receive something and that he would not reconsider which had gradually influenced his mind. But he soon recovered himself; and overcome by my honourable services towards him, he esteemed them of more value than any sum of money. I have received from Curius a will, which I carry with me. I have been informed of Hortensius's legacies. I now want to know what sort of a man the son is, and what it is that he intends to sell by auction. For if Cae lius has got possession of the house at the Flumentan gate, I know not why I may not take for myself that at Puteculi. I come now to the word Pireena, in which I am more reprehensible, that being a Roman, I should have written Pireea, not Pireeaus (as all our people call it), than that I should have added the preposition into; for I have not considered it as the name of a town, but of a district. Yet our friend Dionysius, who is with me, and Niclas the Caim, did not the book Pireeaus; but will see about it. My error, if it be one, consists in my having spoken of it not as a town, but as a district. And I have followed, I do not say Cae lius, "In the morning when I went out of the port into Pireeaus" for he is no authority for Latinity; but Terentius, whose comedies, on account of the elegance of their language, were supposed to be written by C. Laelius: "Yesterday, I and some other young men went together into Pireeaus." And again: "The merchant added this, that she had been taken out of Sunium." For if we choose to call districts towns, Sunium is as much a town as Pireeaus. But as you are a grammarian, if you can solve this question, you will relieve me from much embarrassment. Caesar writes in a kind manner to me: Balbus does the same in his name. My resolution is, never to stir an inch from the path of honour.

But you know how much remains due to him. Do you think, then, it is to be feared that anybody should object that debt to me, if I seem to act feebly or that he should demand it, if I act firmly? What do you find in answer to this? Let us pay it, you say. Well, then, I will borrow from Cae lius. Yet I would have you consider this well; for I imagine if ever I should speak with energy in the senate in behalf of the republic, that Tartessian friend of yours will call to me as I go out, "Pray direct the money to be provided." Have I anything more to say? Yes, my son-in-law is agreeable to me, to Tuilia, to Terentius. He has as much wit and kindness as you could wish. As to other things, to which you are no stranger, we must bear them. For you know about whom we inquired; who all, except him with whom I negotiated through you, think to make me responsible: for nobody will trust them. But of these matters when we meet; for they require a long talk. My hope of Tiro's recovery rests in M. Carius, to whom I have written that such service would be particularly acceptable to you. Dated the 9th of December, from Pontius's house at Tribulanium.

LETTER IV.

DIONYSIUS is impatient to see you. I have accordingly sent him, not with a very good grace; but there was no refusing it. I have found him learned, which I knew before; and besides, of correct behaviour, ready to oblige, studious of my reputation, careful, and (that I may not seem to be giving the character of a freed-man) in short an excellent man. I saw Pompeius the 10th of December. We were together perhaps two hours. He seemed to be much pleased at my arrival. He encouraged me in the affair of my triumph, and promised to do his part; advising me not to go to the senate till I should have finished this business, from fear of alienating any of the tribunes by the sentiments that might be delivered. In short, as far as words, nothing could be fuller of kindness. On the subject of the republic, he talked to me as if a war was inevitable. There appeared to be no hope of accommodation. His opinion of Caesar's hostility had lately been confirmed by the arrival of Hirtius from Cesar, with whom he was very intimate: for he had not called upon Pompeius; but having arrived on the evening of December 6th, and Balbus having engaged to go to Scipio before it was light upon this whole business, he returned late at night to Caesar. This he considered as a plain sign of hostility. In short, nothing else affords me comfort, but that I cannot suppose he, to whom even his enemies had given a second consul, to whom fortune had given the greatest power, would be so mad, as to bring these advantages to the hazard of a contest. But if he venture to rush on, I confess I am full of fears, which I dare not commit to paper. As things now are, I think of getting to Rome the 5th of January.
LETTER V.

I have received several of your letters at the same time; and though I had later intelligence from people who came to meet me, yet they were very acceptable, as they showed your attention and kindness. I am concerned at your illness; and perceive that you suffer still greater uneasiness from Philus's being attacked in a similar manner. Apply yourselves, both of you, to your recovery. I see the interest you take about Tiro. But, though he is of wonderful service to me, when he is well, in every species either of business or of study, yet I am more anxious for his recovery on account of his own kind and modest disposition, than for any advantage towards myself. Phileon has never said anything to me about Lucianus. Dionysius will inform you of other matters. I am surprised that your sister should not have come to Arcanum. I am not sorry that you approve of my determination respecting Chrysippus. I have no intention of going to Tarsus at this time. It is out of the way for those who might come to meet me, and has some other inconveniences. But I mean to proceed from Formium to Terracina the 31st of December; thence to the extremity of the Pontine marsh; thence to Pompeius's villa at Albanum; and so to Rome the 3d of January, my birth-day. I daily become more alarmed about the republic. For even the good, as it is supposed, are not agreed. How many knights, how many senators have I seen, who severely blame, among other things, this journey of Pompeius! We have great need of peace. From a victory must arise many evils, and most assuredly that of a tyrant. But these things we shall very soon have an opportunity of discussing in person. There is now absolutely nothing that I can write about. Not about the republic, because our information is the same; and our domestic affairs are known to both. It only remains to joke, if this man permit. For my part I should think it wiser to grant him what he asks, than to meet in arms. It is too late now to resist one whom we have for ten years fostered against ourselves. What do you advise then? you will say. Nothing but with your concurrence; nor indeed anything before my business is either concluded, or laid aside. Take care then to get well; and shake off at length thisague with the diligence you so highly possess.

LETTER VI.

I have absolutely nothing to say to you. You are acquainted with everything; nor have I anything to expect from you. Let me then only keep up my custom of not suffering anybody to go to you without a letter. I am in great fear about the republic; and have hitherto scarcely found anybody who did not think it better to grant Caesar what he demanded, than to go to war. His demands are indeed greater than was supposed. But why should we now first resist him? For this is not a greater evil than when we prolonged his government for five years; or when we introduced the law permitting him to be a candidate for the consulate in his absence. Unless forsooth we then gave him these arms, that we might now fight with him well prepared. You will say, "What then will be your opinion?" Not what I shall say. For I shall think that everything ought to be done to avoid a battle; I shall say the same as Pompeius. Nor shall I do this with an abject spirit; but this again is a very great evil to the state, and in some measure peculiarly improper for me, that I should appear to differ from Pompeius in so important a cause.

LETTER VII.

"Dionysius, an excellent man, as I have also found him, and very learned, and full of affection towards you, arrived in Rome the 18th of December, and delivered to me your letter. These are the very expressions contained in your letter about Dionysius. You do not add, and he returns thanks to you." But he certainly ought: and such is your kindness that, if he had done so, you would have mentioned it. I do not however recant the testimony given of him in my former letter. Let him therefore be called an excellent man. For even this is well done, that he should have given me this means of thoroughly knowing him. Phileon has informed you truly. He had provided what he ought; and I desired him to make use of the money till it should be wanted. He has accordingly had the use of it thirteen months. I hope Pontinius is well; but from what you mention of his having entered the city, I am fearful what may be the matter. For he would not have done so, but for some important reason. As the 2d of January is the day of the Compitalia, I do not care to go to Albanum that day, from fear of being troublesome to the family; I shall therefore go on the third; and thence to the city on the fourth. I do not know on what day your fit recurrs; but I should be sorry to have you disturbed under the inconvenience of your illness. Respecting the honour of my triumph, unless Caesar employ any secret measures through his tribunes, everything else seems to be tranquil. Most tranquil certainly is my own mind, which looks upon the whole with indifference; and the more so, because I hear from many persons that Pompeius and his council have determined to send me into Sicily, as holding a command. This is worthy of Abdera. For the senate has passed no decree, and the people no law, for my having a command in Sicily. But if the republic gives this authority to Pompeius, why should he send me, rather than any private person? If therefore this command is likely to give me trouble, I shall avail myself of the first gate I see. For as to what you say of there being a wonderful expectation of my arrival, though at the same time none of the good, or mo-

LETTER VIII.

What need of such strong affirmation on the subject of Dionysius? Would not a mere nod from you secure my belief? But your silence gave me the greater suspicion, both because you generally employ your testimony to consolidate friendships, and I heard that he had spoken differently to me to other people. But I am perfectly satisfied that it is as you say. I therefore continue to regard him as you would have me. I had also marked the day of your agreement from one of your letters written as if the fit was coming on, and I calculated that you might, if there was occasion, come to me in Albaetus without inconvenience the 3d of January. But pray do nothing that is inconsistent with your health. For what signifies one or two days? I understand that, by Livia’s will, Dolabella with two co-heirs succeeds to a third part of her property, but on the condition of changing his name. It is a question of propriety whether it be right for a young man of noble birth to change his name for a lady’s will. But we shall be able to determine this more philosophically, when we know about how much this third of the third part of her property amounts. What you would thought would be the case, that I should see Pompeius before I got to Rome, has accordingly happened. For on the 27th of December he came up to me at Laveronium. We came together to Formiae, and conversed privately from two in the afternoon till dusk. In answer to your inquiry, if there is any hope of accommodation, so far as I have learned from Pompeius’s full and accurate discourse, there is not even any inclination towards it. For his opinion is, that if Caesar should be made consul, even with the dismissal of his army, the government will be overturned. He even thinks, that when he is acquainted with the active preparations against him, he will neglect the consulate this year, and prefer keeping his army and his province. But if he should be driven to madness, he held him in great contempt, and relied on his own forces and those of the republic. In truth, though that saying often occurred to me, that the fortune of war was common; yet it was some alleviation of my solicitude, to hear a brave and experienced man, and one of the greatest authority, politically expose the dangers of a false peace. We had in our possession Antonius’s speech pronounced the 23d of December, which contained an accusation of Pompeius from the time of his entering into public life, complaining of those who had been condemned, and of the terror of his arms. Upon which he observed, “What think you that Caesar himself will do, if he should obtain the government of the state, when his weak and needy qustestor dares to utter such expressions?” In short, he appeared not only not to wish for such a peace, but even to dread it. Yet the apprehension of abandoning the city shakes, as I conceive, this resolution. It is a great vexation to me, that I must pay off my debt to Caesar and transfer the question of the materials of my triumph. For it is unseemly to be indebted to one of an opposite party. But of this, and many other things, when we meet.
LETTER IX.

"Am I," say you, "to receive a letter from you every day?" Yes, if I find anybody to whom I can give it. "But you are on the point of beingJune yourself?" Yes, I am, sir. "Then you must step when I arrive. I find there is one of your letters which has never reached me, owing to my friend L. Quintius, who was bringing it, being robbed and wounded at Basilus’s monument. Consider therefore, if it contained anything of importance for me to know. At the same time resolve me this political problem. Since one of these things must take place: either 1st, that Caesar should be deemed eligible, while he still retains his army through the senate, or through the tribunes of the people; or 2ndly, that Caesar must be persuaded to give up his province and his army, in order to become consul; or 3rdly, if this cannot be done, that the comitia may be held without any consideration of him, yet with his suffering it, and retaining his province; or, 4thly, if through the interference of the tribunes he does not suffer the comitia to proceed, but yet remains quiet, that the business may he brought to an interregnum; or, 5thly, if in order to enforce his claims he should bring up his army, that we must then contend in arms; and 6thly, that he may either begin the contest immediately, before we are sufficiently prepared; or, 7thly, after his friends have preferred at the comitia their request for his eligibility, and have been refused; he may also, 8thly, proceed to arms either for that single reason, that his claims are not admitted; or 9thly, for an additional reason if it happen that my tribune, in his attempt to interrupt the senate, or to excite the populace, should be marked or circumvented by a decree of the senate, or removed, or expelled, or should flee to him under pretence of being expelled: again, when war is actually begun, we must either, 10thly, remain in possession of the city,—or 11thly, we must leave it, in order to intercept his supplies of provisions and troops. Tell me of these evils, to one of which we must certainly submit, which do not seem the least. You will say, "that he should be persuaded to deliver up his army in order to be made consul." It is indeed a measure of such a kind, that if he consents nothing can be said against it; and if he does not obtain the admission of his claims, I shall be surprised if he does not do it. Yet there are some persons who think nothing is more to be dreaded than that he should be consul. "But so," you will say, "is better than with his army." Certainly. But this very so may well make one exclaim, O what a great calamity! and it admits of no remedy; we must submit at his discretion. Think of him a second time consul, whom you remember in his former consulate. At that time, in his weakness, he out-matched, you say, the whole republic; what do you expect now? And when he is consul, Pompeius is resolved to he in Spain. This is a sad state, that the very thing which is most to be deprecated, cannot be refused; and if he does it, he will presently attain the highest favour amongst all good men. But setting aside this, to which they say he can never be brought, of the remaining evils which is the worst? To yield to what Pompeius calls his most impudent demands? For what can he more impudent? You have held the province for ten years, granted you not by the senate, but oy yourself, through violence and faction. The period has elapsed, not of the law, but of your self-will; but suppose it to he of the law, a decree is passed for appointing a successor, you stop it, and say, "Have consideration for me." Have we not therefore, if his claims are sufficiently long, and against the will of the senate? "You must fight then, unless you agree to it." With a good hope, as Pompeius says, either of conquering or of dying in liberty. If now we must fight, the time depends upon accidents; the manner, on future events: on this subject therefore I do not call upon you. If you have anything to offer in reply to what I have said, let me hear it. I am tortured with anxiety day and night.

LETTER X.

I have suddenly come to the resolution of setting out before light, to avoid observation and discourse, especially as my lictors come with their laurels. For the rest, truly I neither know what I am doing, or what I shall do; so much am I disturbed with the rash determination of our general, who seems to have lost his senses. How can I advise you, who am myself waiting for your advice? What has been Cænsus’s object, or what is now his object, I cannot tell, cramped as he is within the towns, and appearing stupefied. If he remains in Italy, we shall all be together: but if he retires, our conduct must be a subject of consideration. Hitherto certainly, if I have any understanding, everything has been done foolishly and inconsequently. Pray write to me very often, whatever comes into your mind.

LETTER XI.

What, I beseech you, is all this? or what are people about? For I am quite in the dark. "We have got possession," you say, "of Cingulum; we have lost Anconis; Labienus has deserted from Cæsar." Are we speaking of a Roman general, or of Hannibal? O wretched man, and void of understanding, who has never known even a shadow of what is now before him! But you profess to do all this for honour’s sake. But how can there be honour, where there is not rectitude? Or is it right then to have an army without any public appointment? To occupy the towns of Roman citizens, in order to get a readier access to his own country? To cancel debts, to recall exiles, to institute six hundred other wicked practices, in order to obtain (as Cicero says) the greatest kingdom of the gods? I envy him not his fortune. I would assuredly prefer a single harking with you in your Lucarean sun, before all kingdoms of such a kind; or rather I would die a thousand times, before I would suffer such a thought to enter my mind. "What if you should wish it," this you for us. "We did you keep your army e The fasces borne by the lictors, or serjeants, attending one who had been soluted emperor, were bound with laurel till they entered the city. See book v. letter 20.

you say? "For everybody is at liberty to wish." But I consider this very wish a thing more wretched than being crucified. The only thing that is worse, is to get what you so wish. But enough of this; for I am too ready to dwell upon these troubles with you: let us return to our own general. Tell me then, what think you of this resolution of Pompeius? I mean his leaving the city. I am quite at a loss: nothing seems more absurd. That you should leave the city? Would you then do the same if the Gauls should come? He says, the republic, he says, does not consist in its walls, but in all that we hold dear. Themistocles did the same. For a single city was unable to withstand the united flood of foreign nations. But Pericles did not so, fifty years afterwards, when besides the walls he kept nothing. And our own people formerly, when the rest of the city was captured, still kept possession of the citadel; "so have we heard the deeds of ancient heroes." Yet by the grief of the towns, and the conversation of those I meet, this resolution seems likely to produce some effect. There is a wonderful complaint (I know not if it is made there; but you will tell me) that the city should be without magistrates, without a senate. In short, Pompeius by his flight creates a strong sensation. What think you? The case is quite altered, and now it is thought that nothing should be granted to Caesar. Explain to me how all this is. I have a charge attended with little trouble: for Pompeius wishes me to have the superintendence of all this district of Campania, and the sea-coast; so that the levies of troops, and all business of importance, may be referred to me. I therefore expect to be unsettled. I imagine by this time you see what is Caesar's impetuosity, what is the disposition of the people, what is the state of the whole business: about all these things I should be glad if you would write to me, and (as they are liable to change) as often as you can. For I feel some comfort both whilst I am writing to you, and whilst I am reading your letters.

LETTER XII.

I have hitherto received but one letter from you, dated the 20th, in which it is mentioned that you had previously despatched another, which I have not received. But I beg you will write as often as possible, not only if you have learned, or heard anything, but even if you suspect it; especially what you think I ought or ought not to do. As to what you ask me, that I should take care to inform you what Pompeius is doing; I do not believe he knows himself, and certainly nobody else does. I saw the consul Lentulus at Formiae the 22d, and saw Libo. Everything is full of alarm and confusion. Pompeius is gone to Larium; for there the troops are, and at Luceria, and Thessalinum, and other parts of Apulia. Thence it is uncertain whether he means to stop anywhere, or to cross the sea. If he remains, I doubt whether he can rely upon his army; if he goes away, what I should do, whether I should go, or where I should stay, I know not. For I apprehend he, whose have weight. Though you see the nature of this contest. It is a civil war of such a kind, as does not arise from divisions among the members of the state, but from the audacity of one abandoned citizen. He is powerful from his army; he retains many hopes and promises; but really aims at possessing everything belonging to everybody. To this man has the city been delivered up, full of supplies, and without a garrison. What is there that you may not dread from one who regards those temples and houses not as his country, but as his prey? What does he designs to do however, or by what means, I know not, without a senate, and without magistrates: he cannot so much as pretend to any public motive. But where shall we be able to raise ourselves up again? or when, having, as you must perceive, an augurial-like commander, who did not even know the circumstances of Picenum. How unadvised is he, the state of affairs testifies; for, to say nothing of the errors of the last ten years, what condition is not preferable to this flight? Nor do I now understand what are his intentions; and I do not cease in my letters to inquire. It is plain that nothing can be more timid, nothing more confused: so that I see no refuge, for the sake of which he was kept near the city; nor any place or situation for protection. All hope is placed in two legions that are invidiously retained, and ill-affecting. For the new recruits are hitherto raised against their inclination, and determined not to fight. The time for making conditions is lost. What is likely to happen I do not see. It has been committed by us, or at least by our leader, to go out and forget our rulers, and give our- selves up to the storm. I am in doubt what I should do with our young Ciceros: I have sometimes thought of sending them into Greece. And with respect to Tullia and Terentia, when the approach of so many foreign troops comes across my mind, I dread everything; then again when I recollect Dolabella, I a little revive. I should wish to consider what you think I ought to do; in the first place, securing to everybody (which consideration is due to them and to myself;) then for my reputation, that I may not be blamed for choosing to let them be in Rome at a time when all honest people are leaving it. You also, and Peduecus, who has written to me, must take care what you do; for such is your reputation, that as much is required of you as of the greatest citizens. But about this you will see; as I wish you to con- sider about myself, and my concerns. It remains for me to beg that you will find out, as well as you are able, what is doing, and will write me word: also what you can ascertain by conjecture, which I particularly look for from you. For, while everybody relates what is done, from you I expect what is going to be done. "The best prophet is one who guesses well," Pardon my loquaciousness; which the writer tells me some relief while I am writing to you, and calls forth your letters. I could not at first understand the enigma of the Oppii of Velia; for it is more obscure than Plato's doctrine of numbers. But I now understand your meaning; for you call the Oppii the Juices of Velia. This puzzled me a long time. But this being made out, the rest was clear, and agreed with Terentia's account. I saw L. Cæsar at Milvium the morning of the 25th of January with most extravagant instructions; a mere man of straw; so that he seems to me to have done it in mockery, to deliver to him instructions of such importance. Unless perhaps he did not deliver them, and this man ought hold of some expres- sions, which he pretended were instructions. Labienus, whom I look upon as a great man, came to Thessanum the 23d; there he met Pompeius and the consuls. When I know certainly what was said and done, I will inform you. Pompeius went from Thessanum towards Larium the 24th. That day he remained at Venafrum. Labienus seems to have brought us a little encouragement. But I have nothing yet to tell you from this quarter. I rather wait to hear what news is brought thither; how he bears this conduct of Labienus; what Domitius is doing among the Marxi, or Thermus for that ignominy, or of Attius at Clugium; how the people in the city are disposed; and what is your opinion of the future. Upon these subjects I should wish often to hear from you, and what you think best to be done about the ladies, and what you mean to do yourself. If I were writing with my own hand, I should send you a longer letter: but I employ an amanuensis on account of a weakness in my eyes.

LETTER XIV.

I SAW this on the 27th of January, on my way from Cales to Capua, having still a slight infama- tion of the eyes. L. Cæsar delivered Caesar's despatch to Pompeius on the 25th, while he was with the consuls at Thessanum. The terms were approved, with this reserve, that he should withdraw his garrisons from those places which he had occupied beyond the limits of his province. If he did this, it was repiled that we would return to the city, and conclude the business through the senata. I hope that we are at peace even at this present. For he begins to wear of his madness, and our general of his forces. Pompeius wished me to go to Capua, and to forward the levies; in which the Campanian settlers are not very ready to engage. Pompeius has very conveniently distributed Caesar's gladiators, which are at Capua, and about whom I had before sent you a wrong account from Tor- quatus's letters. Two are sent to each family. There were 500 of them in the schools. It was said they were going to make an insurrection; so that in this respect the republic has been well pro- "That the town of Picenum should have been garrisoned preven the approach of Caesar to Rome. They had been raised for the Parthian war. The original is quoted from Euripides. There is every appearance of this being the conclusion of one letter, and what follows, the beginning of another. The Oppii were probably scrivener and money agents. This doctrine of numbers was derived from Pythagoras, and is indeed most obscure. Plato has introduced it in his Timæus, and in some other parts of his works. I have thought it best to give this, which I conceive to be the meaning of the Latin resonare, derived from ῥῆσις, "success," or "joyce. There is an instance of a similar enigma on the name of Philothimus. [See book vi. letter 9.] Of the Oppii see book viii. letter 7, note m. These were all of them of Pompeius's party.
vied for. Respecting our ladies, amongst whom is your sister, pray consider how far it is reputable for us that they should remain at Rome, when all other ladies of any respect have left it. I have before written to you, and have written to them about it. I should wish you to encourage their departure; especially as I have estates on the seacoast, where I preside, in which they may be accommodated as occasion offers. For if offence is taken at my conduct, it arises from my son-in-law; for which I ought not to be responsible: but this is something more, that our ladies should have continued at Rome after all the others. I should be glad to know what you yourself, and Sextus, think about going away; and what is your opinion of the whole state of affairs. For my own part, I do not cease to recommend peace; which, even if it be unequal, is preferable to the most equitable war. But this as fortune shall ordain.

LETTER XV.

Since my departure from the city, I have suffered no day to pass without writing something to you; not that I had much to say, but that I might talk with you in my absence. For, when I cannot do this in person, nothing is more agreeable to me. Upon my arrival at Capua on the 27th, the day previous to my writing this, I met the consula and many of our order; all of whom wished that Caesar might withdraw his garrisons, and abide by the terms he had offered. Favorinus alone objected to our admitting any conditions imposed by him; but he was not attended to in the council. Even Cato thinks it now better to submit than to fight. He says however that he wishes to be present in the senate, when the terms are debated, if Caesar should be induced to withdraw his garrisons. Therefore he does not care to go into Sicily, where his presence is greatly wanted; but is desirous of being in the senate, which I fear may be prejudicial. Postumus also, whom the senate appointed by name to go immediately into Sicily to succeed Fufanus, refuses to go without Cato, and conceives that his own assistance and weight in the senate is of great importance. Thus the business devolves upon Fannius, who is sent before with a command into Sicily. There is a great difference of opinion in our consultations. Most think that Caesar will not adhere to the conditions, and that these requisitions were interposed by him only to interrupt our necessary preparations for war. But I expect that he will withdraw his garrisons; for if he is made comel, he will gain his purpose, and will gain it with less guilt than that with which he began. But a severe blow must be sustained; for we are shamefully unprepared both in men and money. The whole of which, whether belonging to individuals in the city, or to the public in the treasury, is left for him. Pompeius is gone to join the troops of Attius, and has taken Labienus with him. I want your opinion upon these matters. I design to retire immediately to Formiae.

W of the senators.
active. Trebutius sends me word, that he was desired by Caesar to write to me the 22d of January, requesting me to come to Rome, and saying that I could not do him a greater favour. Upon this he largely dilated. I understood, by reckoning up the days, that as soon as Caesar had heard of my departure he began to be uneasy, from the apprehension that we might all be absent. I do not doubt, therefore, of his having written likewise to Piso, and to Servius. I am rather surprised that he should not have written to me himself, or should not have applied to me through Dolabella or Cælius; not that I have any objection to Trebutius's writing, of whose affection I am well persauded. I wrote word back to Trebutius (for I did not care to write to Caesar, as he had not written to me), that it could not very well be done at this time,—but that I was at one of my farms, and had taken no part in raising troops or any other business: and I intend to maintain this posture as long as any hope remains. But if war breaks out, I shall not be wanting to my duty or to my dignity, having first sent the boys into Greece. For I perceive that every part of Italy will be involved in the contest,—so great is the mischief excited partly by wicked, partly by jealous citizens. But in a few days it will be understood, from the manner in which he receives our answer, how things are likely to go. Then, if we are to have war, I will write to you more at length; but if even a truce is agreed upon, I shall hope to see you myself. This 2d of February, on which day I write in Formium, being just returned from Capua, I am expecting the ladies, though I had written to them by your advice to desire they would remain in Rome; but I hear there has been a great alarm in the city. I mean to be at Capua the 5th of February, as the consuls desired. Whatever intelligence is brought thither from Pompeius I will immediately write to inform you; and I shall expect to hear from you upon these affairs.

LETTER XVIII.

On the 2d of February the ladies arrived at Formium, and brought an account of their attention and great kindness to them. I have thought it best that they should remain in Formium along with the young Ciceros, till I knew whether we were to have a disgraceful peace or a wretched war. I am going with my brother to the consuls at Capua the 3d of February, on which day I write; for we were desired to be there the 5th. Pompeius's answer is said to be liked by the people, and approved by the assembly. I had supposed it would be so. If he rejects this, he will lose his estimation; if he accepts it,—"Which then," you will say, "do you prefer?" I would answer you if I knew how well we were prepared. It was reported here that Cassius had been driven from Ancon, and that the place was in the possession of our people. If a war takes place, this may be an advantageous circumstance. They say that Caesar, at the very time when Lucius Caesar was sent with proposals of peace, was nevertheless eagerly raising recruits, occupying different posts, and securing himself with garrisons. O the wicked robber! O disgrace to the republic, scarcely to be compensated by any peace. But let us cease to complain, and bend to the times, and go with Pompeius into Spain. This is what I wish for in this sad state; since we have, without any pretense, refused to let the republic see him a second time consul. But enough of this. I forgot before to write to you about Dionysius; but it was my determination to wait for Caesar's answer,—that in case I should return to the city he might wait for me there, or if that should be put off then I might send for him. I say nothing of what he ought to do in the event of my flight, or what becomes a learned and friendly man, especially when he had been asked. But this I must not require too rigidly from Greeks. You will take care, however, if it is necessary to summon him (which I should be for) that I may not trouble him against his inclination. My brother Quintus is anxious to pay what he owes you through Egnatius; and there is no want of inclination on Egnatius's part, nor any want of funds: but the times being such that Q. Titinius, who has been a great deal with me, has not enough to defray his expenses on the road, and has informed his debtors that they must continue the same interest; that L. Libus also is said to have done the same; and that Quintus has at present no money in his house, and can neither get any from Egnatius nor borrow anywhere: he is surprised that you should have no regard for this general embarrassment. And I, whilst I observe that precept falsely attributed to Hesiod (for so it is supposed), to pronounce no judgment till you have heard both sides, especially against you, whom I never knew to do anything unadvisedly; yet I am moved by his complaint: at all events I wished you to be acquainted with it.

LETTER XIX.

I have nothing to tell you: nay, a letter which I had written I have not sent, for it was full of good hopes; as I had been informed of the disposition of the assembly, and imagined that Caesar would abide by the terms, especially as they were his own. Behold then on the morning of the 4th of February I received your letter, and that of Philotimus, of Furnius, and of Curio to Furnius, in which he ridicules L. Caesar's embassy. I feel quite overwhelmed, and know not what resolution to form. Yet it is not for myself that I care; but I am at a loss what to do about the boys. I write this, however, on my way to Capua, that I may more readily learn the state of Pompeius's affairs.

LETTER XX.

nothing weaker than these consuls; by whose directions I came to Capua yesterday in a violent rule, with the hope of hearing what they had to propose, and of learning the state of our preparations. They had not then arrived, but were coming crungy and unprepared. Cænæus was said to be at Luceria, where he was to join some troops of the Attian legion, not very soon. But Cæsar; they say, is rushing on and almost at hand; not with the view of fighting,—for with whom should he fight? but to intercept our flight. For myself, I am ready to die with the rest in Italy; about which I do not consult you. But if they go out of Italy what should I do? The winter, the licors which attend me, the imprudence and negligence of our leaders, all tend to make me stay: the motes to flight are, my friendship with Cænæus, the common cause of all honest men, the basescence of joining with a tyrant, who whether he will imitate Phalaris, or Pisistratus, is uncertain. I shoule be glad if you could resolve these difficulties, and assist me with your counsel,—though I imagine you must yourself be already in perplexity where you are,—but yet as far as you may be able. If I learn anything new here to-day, you shall know it; for the consuls will presently be here, as they appointed. I hope to hear from you every day.
You will answer this as soon as possible. I left the ladies and the young Ciceroes in Formianum.

LETTER XXI.

Of our calamities you have earlier intelligence than I, for they take their course from thence; and there is nothing good to be expected from hence.
I came to Capua the 5th of February, agreeably to the order of the consuls. Lentulus arrived late in the day; the other consul had not yet arrived on the 7th: for on that day I left Capua and sailed at Cales, from whence I send this the following day before it is light. I learned so much at Capua,— that the consuls are quite inefficient, and that no troops are raised. Those employed on the recruiting service dare not show their faces, as Cæsar is at hand; whilst the commander is nowhere, and does nothing; so that the people will not enlist,— not from want of inclination, but from want of encouragement. But our Cænæus (O wretched and incredible state!), how is he quite sunk! He has ac spirit, no counsel, no forces, no exertion; to say nothing of his shameful flight from the city, his timid harangues in the towns, his ignorance not only of his adversary’s forces, but of his own.

What is the meaning of this? On the 7th of February, C. Cassius, tribune of the people, came to Capua with instructions from Pompeius to the consuls that they should go to Rome and take away the money from the sacred treasury, and immediately quit the city. Return to Rome? under what guard? Then that they should go out again?
with whose permission? The coons wrote word back, that Pompeius himself must first occupy Picenum. But that was already lost; which I knew, and nobody else, from Dolabella’s letters. I had no doubt but that Cæsar would presently be in Apulia, and that our Cænæus would be on board a ship. It is a great question what I should do. I should have no difficulty, if everythung had not been conducted most disgracefully, while I was never consulted. But yet I would do what becomes me. Cæsar himself invites me to peace; but his letter is previous to his present imputuous career. Dolabella and Cælius assure me that my conduct is satisfactory to him. I am distracted with wonderful irresolution. Help me, if you can, with your advice; and at the same time, as far as you are able, provide for what may happen. In such a confused state of affairs I can write about nothing. I am expecting to hear from you.

LETTER XXII.

I perceive there is not a foot of ground in Italy that is not in Cæsar’s power. Of Pompeius I know nothing; and unless he gets on board a ship, I fear he will be taken. What incredible speed! But as for this our general.—Yet I cannot without pain find fault with one for whom I am bled and distressed. It is not without reason that you apprehend a slaughter; not that anything could be less calculated to secure the victory and authority of Cæsar; but I see by whose counsels he will act. May it turn out well! I apprehend it will be necessary to retire from these towns. I am at a loss what steps to take. You will do what you think best. Speak with Philotimus; and you will have Terentia on the 13th. What should I do? In what land, or what sea, should I follow him, whom I know not where to find? But how is it possible by land? And in what sea? Shall I then deliver myself up to Cæsar? Suppose I could do it with safety (and many people advise it), could I also do it with honour? Certainly not.
What then? I want your advice, as usual. It is a difficulty which cannot be cleared up; yet tell me what occurs to you, and what you mean to do yourself.

LETTER XXIII.

On the 9th of February in the evening I received a letter from Philotimus informing me that Domi-thus had an army to be depended upon; and that it had been joined by the troops from Picenum under the conduct of Lentulus and Thermus; that Cæsar might be intercepted, and that he was afraid of it: that the spirits of honest men in Rome were raised; that the wicked were almost thunderstruck.
I am afraid that this is but a dream; but, however,
Philotimus’s letter has quite revived M. Lepidus, L. Torquatus, and C. Cassius the tribune of the people, who are with me in the neighbourhood of Formium. I wish it may not be more true, that we are all nearly prisoners; and that Pompeius is returning from Italy; of whom (O bitter chance!) Cæsar is said to be in pursuit. Cæsar in pursuit

LETTER XXV.

After I had despatched my letter to you full of sad news, but I fear too true, on the subject of Lucretius's letter to Cassius from Capua; Cephalio arrived, and brought you a more cheerful letter, ye not written with your usual confidence. I can believe anything sooner than what you say, that Pompeius is at the head of an army. Nobody brings any intelligence of the kind hitherto, but everything that is unpleasant. It is a wretched state. He has always been successful in a bad cause; in the best of causes he has failed. What can be said, but that he understood the one, which was easy enough, and did not understand the other? For the right administration of the republic is a difficult art. But I shall very soon know everything, and will immediately write to you.

LETTER XXVI.

I cannot say, as you do, "how often do I revive?" For it is only now that I a little revive, especially by the intelligence that is brought from Rome about Domitius, and the troops of the Picentians. These last two days everything has become more favourable, so that the preparations for flight are put off. Caesar's declaration, "if I find you here two days hence," is discredited. The accounts of Domitius are good; those of Afranius excellent. Your friendly advice of keeping myself free from either party as long as I can, is very agreeable to me. When you add, that I must avoid the appearance of being inclined to a bad cause, I certainly may appear so; for I refused to take a lead in the civil contest while peace was in agitation: not that it was not right, but because that which was much more right had brought upon me the imputation of wrong. I certainly did not wish to make an enemy of him to whom Pompeius would offer a second consulate and a triumph: and in what terms? "for his most distinguished conduct." I know whom I should fear, and why. But if a war breaks out, as I see it will, I shall not be backward in taking my side. Terentia has written to you about the 20,000 sestertii (166.). While I thought I should be moving about, I did not care to be troublesome to Dionysius; and I made no reply to your repeated assurance of his attachment, because I expected from day to day to be able to determine what was to be done. Now, as far as I see, the boys are likely to pass the winter in Forminimum. Whether I shall be there too, I do not know; for if we go to war, I am resolved to join Pompeius. When I hear anything certain, I will take care to inform you. For my part I apprehend the foulest war; unless, as you know, some accident should occur on the side of Parthia.

* This is not to be supposed Caesar's actual declaration. It appears to be a line out of some poem, and probably means no more than to express the apprehensions entertained of Caesar's unlimited power.
* This alludes to the persecution and banishment which he suffered in consequence of his exertions in suppressing the Catilinarian conspiracy.
* This is to be supposed Caesar's actual declaration.

1. The Romans having sustained a signal defeat by the Parthians, at the time of Crassus's death, became peculiarly alive to any danger that might arise, and had already appointed Pompeius to go thither, [book vi. letter 1.] from whence it was hoped, that, in case of alarm from that quarter, the necessity of his absence might prevent a civil war from breaking out.
BOOK VIII.

LETTER I.

Presently after I had sent my letter to you, I received one from Pompeius. It mostly related to the transactions in Picenum, of which Vibullius had sent him an account; and to the troops raised by Domitius; all which is known to you. It did not, however, represent things in so favourable a light as Philotimus’s letter. I would have sent you the letter itself, but that my brother’s servant is in a hurry to set off. I will send it therefore to-morrow. But at the end of the letter is added in Pompeius’s own hand: “I think you should come to Luceria: you can nowhere be safer.” I understood this to signify, that he looked upon these towns, and maritime coast5, as given up. And I was not surprised that he, who had given up the head6 itself, should not spare the other members. I immediately wrote him word back by a confidential attendant, that I did not consider where I could be most in safety; but that if he wished me to go to Luceria on his own account, or that of the republic, I would immediately go: and I advised him to preserve the sea-coast, if he hoped to be supplied with grain from the provinces. I knew that I was saying this to no purpose; but as in the case of retaining the city formerly, so now in the case of not relinquishing Italy, I wished to declare my opinion. For I perceive that preparations are making to concentrate all the troops at Luceria, not because that place is tenable, but that from thence, if we are pressed, we may have a ready escape. You must not therefore be surprised, if I am unwilling to embark in a cause which has for its object neither peace nor victory, but only a disgraceful and calamitous flight. I must go; that, whatever issue chance may produce, I may rather submit to it with those who are called good than appear to dissent from the good. Though I see that the city will presently be full of good people in one sense, that is, of the luxurious and wealthy; and if these distant towns are deserted, it will overflow. I should he among their number, if I were not encumbered with these lieutes. Nor should I be sorry to have Manlius Lepidus, L. Volcacius, and Sergius Sulphius, for my companions; of whom none exceede L. Domitius in folly, or Appius Claudius in constancy. Pompeius alone affects me, not by his authority, but by his kindness. For what authority can he have in this cause? who professed his fondness for Caesar at a time when we were all afraid of him; and since he is become afraid himself, thinks that everybody ought to be Caesar’s enemy. I shall, however, go to Luceria; though he will not perhaps be much pleased with my arrival; for I cannot conceal my dislike of what has hitherto been done. If it were possible for me to sleep, I should not molest you with such long letters; if you are under the influence of the same cause, I wish you would make the same return.

LETTER II.

I am obliged to you on every account; both for telling me what you had heard; and for not giving credit to what was inconsistent with my usual correctness; and for giving me your own opinion. I wrote one letter to Caesar from Capua, in reply to what he had said to me about his gladiators. It was short, but expressive of kindness; not only without reproach, but even with great praise, of Pompeius. For so that purpose of my letter required, wherein I exhorted him to a reconciliation. If he has communicated this, he is welcome to publish it. I have written a second letter, the same day that I write this. I could not do otherwise, considering that he had himself written to me, and likewise Ballus. I send you a copy of my letter, and believe you will find in it nothing to blame: if there should be anything, show me how I could avoid it. “Do not write at all,” you will say. How will this enable one to escape those who shall please to invent? However, I will do so as far as possible. When you recall me to the recollection of what I have done, and said, and written, you act indeed a friendly part, for which I thank you; but you seem to me to judge differently from myself what is honourable and becoming for me in this cause. For, in my opinion, nothing was ever done, in any country, by any leader and head of a state, more disgracefully than by our friend; whose condition I sincerely lament. He has deserted the city, that is, his country, for which, and in which, it had been glorious to die. You appear to me not to see the magnitude of this calamity; for you remain still in your own house. But you cannot remain there without the leave of the most abandoned men. Can anything be more wretched, more disgraceful than this? We wander about like beggars with our wives and children. We have placed all our hopes in the life of one man, who is every year dangerously ill; and are not driven, but called, out of our country; which we have left, not to be preserved till our return, but to be plundered and burned; so many are there in the same situation with myself, not in their villas, not in their gardens, not even in the city; or if they are now, they will not be there long. In the mean time I must not remain even at Capua, but at Luceria. And we must now relinquish the sea-coast, and wait for Afranius and Petreius: for Labienus has lost his dignity. Here you will apply to me the proverb, “What you give, that you must bear.” I say nothing of myself; I leave that to others. But what dignity is there here? You, and all respectable people, are, and will continue, at your own homes. But before, who did not present himself to me? And now, who comes to this war? for so it must now be called. Vibullius has already done great things. You will know what this is from Pompeius's letter; in which observe the place that is scored. You will see what Vibullius's own opinion is of our Cænas. But whither does this discourse lead? I am ready to sacrifice my life for Pompeius; there is nobody for whom I have a greater regard: yet not so, that I think all hope of saving the republic depends upon him alone; for you give me to understand, something differently from what you used to do, that even if he should retire from Italy, you think I ought to retire with him: which seems to me advisable neither for the republic nor for my children, and, moreover, neither right nor honourable. "What then? Will you be able to support the sight of a tyrant?" As if it signified whether I saw him, or only heard of him! or as if he could look for a higher authority than Socrates; who, when there were thirty tyrants, did not set his foot beyond the gate. But I have besides a special reason for staying; about which I shall hope at some time to talk to you. I write this, the 17th of February, by the same lamp with which I have burned your letter; and am going immediately from Formiae to Pompeius: if it were to treat of peace, I might be of some consideration; if of war, what part can I take?

LETTER III.

In the anxiety occasioned by this critical and wretched state of affairs, while I have no means of consulting with you in person, yet I wish to avail myself of your judgment. The whole question is this: if Pompeius should quit Italy, as I imagine he will, what you think I ought to do; and that you may the more easily give me your opinion, I will shortly explain what occurs to me on both sides. My great obligations to Pompeius in promoting my restoration; the intimacy between us, and the cause of the republic itself, induce me to think that I ought to unite with him, whether in counsel or in fortune. Added to which, if I remain, and desert that assemblage of the best and most distinguished citizens, I must fall under the dominion of one man; who, though in many respects he shows himself to be friendly to me, (and that he might be so I have, as you know, long since provided, in apprehension of this storm which hangs over us,) yet we must take into consideration both the degree of credit that is to be given to his professions, and, if it should be clear that he will indeed be friendly to me, whether it becomes a brave man, and a good citizen, to remain in that city, in which he has enjoyed the highest honours and appointments, has conducted the greatest affairs, and held the sovereign priesthood, without being any longer his own master, and with the possibility of incurring danger, and perhaps some disgrace, ever Pompeius should restore the republic. This is what may be said on one side. See now what may be said on the other. Nothing has been done by our Pompeius wisely, nothing nobly, and I may add, nothing but what was contrary to my own opinion and authority. I omit those old errors of cherishing, raising, and arming Caesar against the republic; that it was he who got laws to be passed against the public interest, and contrary to the auspices; he that added the further Gaul to his command; he that is the son-in-law; he was at augur at the adoption of P. Clodius; he that was more earnest in my recall than in preventing my exile; he that extended the period of Caesar's government; he that was on every occasion the advocate of Caesar in his absence; and even in his third consulate, after he began to be the protector of the republic, exerted himself to obtain the consent of the two tribunes to his eligibility during his absence; which he afterwards ratified by a certain law of his own; and on the 1st of March opposed the consul Marcus Marcellus, who would have put an end to the Gallic provinces. But, to say nothing of these matters, what can be more disgraceful, what more inconsiderate, than this retreat from the city, or rather this base flight? What conditions were not preferable to the desertion of one's country? The conditions were bad, I grant; but could anything be worse than this? "But he will recover the republic." When? Or what preparations are there to encourage such a hope? Is not the country of Piseium lost? Is not the road left open to the city? Is not all the wealth of the metropolis, both public and private, surrendered to the adversary? In short, there is no party, no power, no place, where those may rally who wish well to the republic. Apulia is chosen, the most uninhabited part of Italy, and the most remote from the irruption of this war: flight, and convenience of the sea-coast, appear to be the first objects in this despondency. I took charge of Capua against my will; not that I disliked that office, but because there was no party to act with, none that showed any public sorrow, or any declared private sorrow; these things are always good men, but this was in a quiet way, as usual, and as I might have felt myself; the mob and all the weaker sort were inclined to the other side, and many were desirous of some change. I told Pompeius that I could undertake nothing without troops, and without money. I have therefore had nothing at all to do; for I saw from the first, that nothing was aimed at besides escape. If I now pursue this object, whether should I go? Certainly not with him: for when I had set out to join him, I understood that Caesar was in those parts, so that I could not safely get to Luceria. I must sail then by the Mediterranean sea, with no certain course, and in the depth of winter. Besides, should I go with my brother, or without him? or with my son? or how? Either way I shall have great difficulty, and great anxiety. And what violence will he commit against me and my fortunes in my absence! Greater than against those of other people; because he may think that in his attacks

They who now content themselves with staying at home, formerly professor their readiness to support the cause of the republic.

Lyseander having made himself master of Athens, placed the government in the hands of thirty tyrants.

This probably alludes to the conduct of Terentia.

That is, wanted to put an end to Caesar's administration in Gaul.
upon me he will be supported by some degree of popularity. Besides, how troublesome is it to carry with me these fletchers, these laurelled fasses I mean, out of Italy! And supposing the sea to be tranquil, what place would be safe for me, before I could reach him? I neither know what road I should take, nor whether I should go. But if I remain, and there be any place for me in these parts, I shall do no more than Philippus, than L. Flaccus, than Q. Mucius; did at the time of Cinna's domination, however it turned out to the last of them; who used nevertheless to say that he foresaw what must be the consequence; but that he preferred this, to coming up in arms against his country. Thrasybulus c judged otherwise, and perhaps better. But there is some reason in the conduct and sentiments of Mucius, as well as in those of Thrasybulus; both in bending to the times, when it is necessary, and not letting slip an opportunity when it is offered. But in this very consideration these same fasses create an embarrassment. For supposing him to be friendly towards me, which is uncertain; but supposing it, he will offer me a triumph 4. Would it be more dangerous not to accept it; or more invidious to accept it? This, you say, is a difficult and inexplicable point. Yet explained it must be. "But how can it be done?" Now, that you may not suppose 5 I incline to remain, because I have dwelt longer on that side; it may be, as it happens in many cases, that there is more pleading on one side, more truth on the other. Therefore I should be glad if you would give your opinion, as upon a point of great moment, on which I would exercise an unbiased judgment. I have a vessel ready for me, both at Caetia and at Brundisium. Whilst I am writing this account of my own concerns by night in the neighbourhood of Cales, there have arrived messengers with letters stating that Cesar is on his way to Corfinium, and that Domitius is at Corfinium with a steady army eager to engage. I cannot think that our Cæsars will be so negligent as to desert Domitius; though he had sent on Scipio before with two cohorts to Brundisium, and had written to the consuls to desire that one of them would conduct into Sicily the legion which had been raised by Faustus. But it will be disgraceful to desert Domitius, when he is imploring his assistance. I have some hope, but not much. (though it is generally believed in these parts,) that Afranius may have had an engagement with Trebonius in the Pyrenean mountains, that Trebonius has been repulsed, and that your friend Fabius has come over with his troops; and in short, that Afranius is approaching with a strong force. If this is so, we shall perhaps remain in Italy. As it was uncertain what road Cæsar would take, and it was expected that he would go either to Capua or to Luceria, I sent Lepta to Pompeius with a letter, and returned to Parmise, that I might not fall in with him. I wished to learn whether the news is true, if Afranius is in a much composed state of mind than I did lately, not meaning to interpose any judgment of my own, but to request yours.

3 Q. Mucius remained in the city, and was killed.
4 The second sentence is supposed to be a misprint.
5 The second sentence is supposed to be an accidental omission.

LETTER IV.

Your Dionysius, for so I must call him, not mine, (who was pretty well known to me, though I chose rather to rely upon your judgment than my own,) without any regard to your testimony concerning him, which had so often been given me, has displayed his insolence in this state of fortune in which he supposed me to be. However, as far as human prudence can effect, I hope to regulate the course of events with some discretion. But what honour, what attention, has not been shown him! What commendation to others in favour of a contemptible man! I have even chosen to have my judgment impeached by my brother Quintus, and generally by all people, rather than not extol him by my praises; and have taken upon myself part of the trouble of teaching the young Ciceros, instead of applying to any other master. Ye gods! what letters have I written to him! how full of honour! how full of affection! You would suppose I was inviting Dicarchus, or Aristozenes; not one who was such a prattler, and so little fit to teach. "But he has a good memory." He shall find that I have a better! He has replied to my letters in such a style, as I am sure a man of any one whose cause I declined. For I always added, "if it is in my power;" "if I am not prevented by some former engagement." I never gave to any client, however humble, mean, or guilty, so abrupt a refusal, as he has given me. He has positively, and without qualification, cut off all communications. I never knew an instance of greater ingratitude; in which vice is included everything that is bad. But more than enough on this subject. I have got a vessel ready: but wait for a letter from you, that I may know what answer it brings to my consultation. You are apprised of C. Attius Pelignus having opened the gates of Sulmo to Antonius, though he had with him five cohorts; and that Q. Lucretius has fled from thence. Our Cæsus is gone to Brundisium, and deserted the cause. It is all over.

LETTER V.

Before it was light on the 22d, I wrote to you about Dionysius; and on the evening of the same day Dionysius himself came to me, moved, as I suspect, by your authority. For how can I think otherwise? Though it is true that after having done anything intemperately, he often repents. But he never was more determined than on this occasion. For what I mentioned to you, I afterwards had confirmed to me, that before he had got three miles "he began to toss his horses into the air with anger." He uttered, I mean, many imprecations, to full, as they say, upon his own head. But observe my leality; I put into the same packet with your letter one directed to him. This I wish to have returned to you; and for this special purpose I have sent Pollux, one of my couriers, to Rome; and have written to you to beg that, if it should have been delivered to you, you would take care to send it back, that it may not come to his hands. If there was any news, I would have

He will take advantage of what I have said in his favour.

I shall show him that I can repress his ill behaviour.
LETTER VI.

After I had sealed the letter which I intended to send to the magistrate, (as in fact I did, for I wrote it in the evening,) C. Sosius, the praetor, came to Formianum to my neighbour M. Lepidus, to whom he had been quaestor; and brought him a copy of Pompeius's letter to the consul, as follows.

"I have received a letter from L. Domitius dated the 17th of February, of which I inclose a copy. Now, though I should not write, yet I am sure you see of your own accord, of what importance it is to the republic, that all the forces should be collected as soon as possible into one place. If therefore you think well of it, you will take care to join me as soon as you can; leaving at Capua what you consider will be a sufficient guard." Then he subjoined the copy of Domitius's letter, which I sent you yesterday. Good gods! What horror do I feel! How anxious am I about the issue? I hope however that the name of Pompeius will be considerable, and considerable also the terror of his approach. I hope also, as nothing has yet hurt us, that we have just heard that your auge has left you. May I die if I am not as much pleased as if it had been my own case. Tell Pilia that it is not right for her to keep her sons any longer; and that it is unbecoming the usual harmony between you. I hear that my Tiro has been freed from another illness of the same kind. I find he has borrowed elsewhere for his expenses. But I had requested Curius, in case he should want anything. I hope it is Tiro's modesty, rather than Curius's want of liberality, that is in fault.

LETTER VII.

The only thing remaining to complete the disgrace of our friend is, that he should refuse to assist Domitius. Nobody doubts but he will come to his relief. For my own part, I think he will not.

"Will he desert then such a citizen, and those who, you know, are with him? Especially when he is at the head of thirty cohorts?" Unless I am totally mistaken, he will desert them. He is inconceivably alarmed, and thinks of nothing but escaping. He it is (for I see what is your opinion) whom you think I ought to accompany. But while I have somebody to avoid, I have nobody to follow. When for you praise and extol my profession of choosing rather to be conquered with Pompeius, than to conquer with the opposite party, I do indeed choose it; but it is with Pompeius such as he then was, or such as I believed him to be: but with him, who runs away before he knows whom he has to fear, or which way he should go: who has betrayed our cause, left our country, and is going to leave Italy; with him if I chose rather to be conquered, it has happened already. I am conquered. As to what remains, I cannot bear to look at a state of things which I never apprehended; nor indeed to look at him, on whose account I must lose not only my friends, but my very self. I have written to Philotimus to procure the money for my journey, either from the mint (for nobody pays), or from the Oppii, your partners. I shall leave to you the care of what else is requisite.

LETTER VIII.

O SHAMEFUL business! and therefore miserable! For I hold that whatever is base, that, or rather that only, is miserable. He had fostered Caesar; he had suddenly begun to fear him; he had agreed to no condition of peace; had made no preparation for war; had deserted the city; had lost Piseum by his negligence; had thrust himself into Apulia; was going into Greece; was leaving us all without speaking to us, or consulting us upon so important and extraordinary a resolution. Then presently comes Demetrius's letter to him, his to the consuls. A sense of honour seemed to flash before his eyes, and I supposed him to have exclaimed with becoming maunfulness, "In this, which is my duty, let people attempt and plot what they will against me; for right is on my side." But he, bidding a long farewell to honour, goes on to Brundisium. It is reported, that Domitius, and they who were with him, when they heard it, surrendered. O grievous affair! I am prevented by anguish from writing more to you. I look anxiously for a letter from you.

LETTER IX.

I like exceedingly your advice, which is both honourable and suitable to the caution required in these times. Lepidus indeed (for we almost live together, which is very grateful to him) never approved of leaving Italy: Tullus still less. For his letters are frequently brought to me from other people. But their opinion has less weight with me. They had never given so many pledges to the republic. Your authority greatly influences

1. Cesar. It seems Cicero was preparing to retreat from Cesar and Italy, though without joining Pompeius.
2. So I venture to translate the word consulanes; for the Oppii being, as it appears, money-dealers, and living in one of Attius's houses, may well be believed to have been connected in business with Cecilius, to whose property Attius had succeeded. See book x. letter 16.
3. This probably relates to his proposed journey.
4. The original is taken from Aristophanes.
5. What usually stands as the former part of this letter, will be found after book ix. letter 11, to which it obviously alludes.

me. For it holds out the means both of recovering the time that remains, and of securing the present. But what, I beseech you, can be more wretched than this? that the one should gain applause in a most foul cause; the other, odium in the very best: that the one should be esteemed the preserver of his enemies; the other, the deserter of his friends. And in truth, however I may love my friend Cneus, as I do and ought; yet in this respect I cannot commend him, that he should not have come to the relief of so many people. If this is through fear, what can be more disgraceful? or if, as some suppose, he thought that his own cause would be advanced by their destruction, what can be more iniquitous? But let us have done with this; for we augment our sorrow by repeating it. On the 24th in the evening the younger Balbus called upon me on his way to the consul Lentulus; to whom he was hastening through by-ways, by command of Caesar, with a letter, with instructions, with the promise of a provincial government if he would return to Rome. I do not think it possible to persuade him, unless they should have a personal interview. He said that Caesar wished for nothing more, than to get up to Pompeius, which I believe; and to resume his friendship with him, which I do not believe. I even fear that all this clemency may be directed against that one object of cruelty. The elder Balbus indeed informs me, that Caesar wishes nothing more than to live in security, while Pompeius retains his authority. I suppose you believe this! But while I am writing, Pompeius may already have reached Brundisium, for he went lightly armed from Luceria before the legions. But this meteor has dreadful vigilance, swiftness, and diligence. What will be the issue I cannot guess.

LETTER X.

Dionysius having come to me contrary to my expectation, I spake to him with all civility, explained the peculiarity of the times, and desired him to let me know what were his intentions; that I did not require anything of him against his will. He replied that he was in uncertainty about his accounts; that some people did not pay; that from others the money was not yet due; with something else about his slaves: for which reasons he could not be with us. I let him have his way, and dismissed him; as tutor to the young Ciceros, not willingly; as an ungrateful man, not unwillingly. I wished you to know my opinion of his conduct.

LETTER XI.

Respecting the great agitation of mind with which you suppose me to be affected; it is true, indeed, yet not so great as you may perhaps imagine. For every care becomes less, when either the resolution is fixed, or when all consideration is fruitless. We may still grieve; and that I do all day long: but while it is ineffectual, I fear I may continue to wring my heart. So I have talked over my studies and learning. I waste therefore all my time in considering the excellence of that character which you thought I had accurately expressed in my treatise. Do you remember then that moderator of the state, to which I would refer everything? For it is thus, if I am not mistaken, that Scipio speaks in the fifth book: "For as the proper aim of the pilot is a favourable course; that of the physician, health; that of a general, victory; so is the happiness of his countrymen, of this moderator of the state; that they may live secure in wealth, rich in forces, abundant in glory, honourable in virtue: for I would have him the person to accomplish this greatest and best of works." This has at no time been duly considered by our Cneus, and least of all on the present occasion. It is dominion that has been sought by both parties; not any endeavour to render the state happy and virtuous. Nor has he left the city because he was unable to defend it; nor Italy because he was given over to him; but this was his purpose from the beginning, to move all lands and seas, to call up distant kings, to introduce savage nations armed against Italy, to raise the greatest armies. A dominion like that of Sylla has long since been his object, and many who are with him desire it. Think you that no agreement, no convention, could be made between them? Even yet it might: but it is not the aim of either to make us happy; both of them wish to oppose it. I have already exposed these matters at your request; for you wished me to give you my opinion of these calamities. I forewarn you therefore, my Atticus, not with the prophetic spirit of her whom nobody believed; but anticipating by conjecture: "already in the great ocean," &c. Nearly in the same strain, I say, I may prophesy; so great a weight of evils hangs over us. And in one respect the condition of us, who remain at home, is worse than theirs who have passed over with Pompeius; inasmuch as they have only one to fear, whilst we have both. Why then did I stay behind? you will say. It may be either in obedience to you; or because I could not get up to him; or because this was more proper. I say, next summer you will see the wretched Italy trampled under foot, and shaken by the violence of both parties, who will collect together the slaves of every description. Nor is a proscription (which was the general subject of conversation at Luceria) so much to be dreaded, as the ruin of the whole country; so great will be the forces of both in this contest. I send you my opinion. But you expected perhaps some source of consolation: I can find none. Nothing can be more wretched, nothing more deplorable, nothing more disgraceful. You ask what Caesar has written to me. What he has frequently said; that he was much pleased with my remaining quiet; and he bade me to continue so. The younger Balbus brings the same instructions. He was on his way to the consul Lentulus with Caesar's letter, and the promise of rewards, if he would return to Rome. But upon reckoning up the days, I think he will pass over before a meeting can take place. I wish you to be made acquainted with the meagerness of two letters which I have received from Pompeius, and my own full replies. I send you a copy of them. I am expecting the issue of this rapid march of Caesar through Apulia to Brundisium. I wish it were anything like the Parthian incursions. As soon as I hear anything, I will write to you. I should be glad if you would tell me what good people say. There are reported to be a great many in Rome. I am aware that you do not go into public; but you must necessarily hear a great deal. I remember your receiving a book, sent you by Demetrius Magnes, upon Concord. I should be glad if you would lend it to me. You see what subject I am considering.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Cicero, Imperator.

Q. Fabius came to me the 29th of January. He brings information that L. Domitius with his own eleven cohorts, and fourteen cohorts which Vibullus has brought up, is on his way to join me: that he had intended to leave Corfinium the 13th of February; and that C. Hirus with five cohorts would follow. I am of opinion you should come to me at Luceria; for here I think you will be in the greatest safety.

M. Cicero, Imperator, to Cn. Magnus, Proconsul.

I received your letter at Formiae the 15th of February, by which I understood that the transactions in Picenum were much more favourable than had been represented to me; and it was with pleasure that I recognised the courage and diligence of Vibullus. On the coast, over which I have been placed, I have hitherto thought it right to have a ship in readiness: for what I hear, and what I apprehend, is of such a nature, as to make me think it my duty to follow whatever plan you should advise. Now, since by your authority and counsel I am in better hope, if you think it possible to maintain Terracina and the sea-coast, I will continue there, although there are no garrisons in the towns. For there is nobody of condition in these parts, except M. Epinius, whom I have desired to remain at Minturnae. He is an active and careful man. But L. Torquatus, who is a brave man, and in authority, is not at Formiae: I imagine he is gone to you. I came to Capua, agreeably to your last instructions, the very day on which you left Teanum Sidicinum; for you had desired me, together with M. Considius the proprietor, to take care of the affairs in that part. When I came thither, I found that T. Annius was raising troops with great diligence, which were transferred to Libo, who had also great zeal and authority in the colonym. I remained at Capua as long as the consuls; and came thither again the 5th of February, as the consuls had appointed. After being there three days, I came back to Formiae. At present I am uncertain what is your intention, or what is your plan of conducting the war. If you think this coast should be maintained, as I think it may, there must be somebody to take the command: it possesses great convenience and respectability, and has in it many distinguished citizens. But if all our forces are to be collected into one place, I shall not hesitate to join you immediately; which I shall be very glad to do, as I told you the day I left the city. If I appear to anybody to have been backward in this business, I do not regard it provided I do not appear so to you; yet if, as I perceive, war must be waged, I trust I shall easily satisfy everybody. I send to you M. Tullius, my confidential freed-man, by whom, if you think fit, you may write to me.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to M. Cicero, Imperator.

I hope you are well. I read your letter with great satisfaction, and recognised also your former spirit in support of the common safety. The consuls have joined the army which I have had in Apulia. I earnestly exhort you, by your distinguished and unceasing regard for the republic, to come to us, that we may by our united counsels afford help and assistance to this afflicted state. I think you should travel by the Appian road, and reach Brundisium quickly.

M. Cicero, Imperator, to Cn. Magnus, Proconsul.

When I wrote the letter which was delivered to you at Canusium, I had no suspicion that you would cross the sea for the service of the republic; but was in great hope that we might in Italy either establish some agreement, which seemed to me very desirable, or with the highest dignity defend the republic. In the mean time, before my letter could have reached you, understanding from the instructions which you sent to the consuls by D. Lælius what was your intention, I did not wait till I should hear from you, but immediately set out, with my brother Quintus and our children, to join you in Apulia. When I came to Teanum Sidicinum, C. Messius your friend, and several others, informed me that Caesar was on his way to Capua, and would stop at Esernia that very day. I was truly concerned, because if it were so, I considered not only that my road was intercepted, but that I was myself quite cut off from you. I therefore proceeded at that time to Cales, where I might remain till I should receive some certain information from Esernia about what I had heard. While I was at Cales there was brought to me a copy of the letter which you sent to the consul Lentulus, saying that you had received one from L. Domitius, the 17th of February, of which you subjoined a copy; and that it was of great importance to the republic, that all the forces should be collected into one place as soon as possible; and directing him to leave a sufficient guard at Capua. Upon reading this letter I was of the same opinion as everybody else, that you would proceed with all your forces to Corfinium. But as Caesar had encamped before the town, I did not think it safe for me to go thither. While we remained in anxious expectation of the issue, we heard at one and the same time both what had happened at Corfinium, and that you had begun to make your way to Brundisium: and when I and my brother had determined to go to Brundisium, we were warned by some people, who came from Samnium and Apulia, to take care that we were not surprised by Caesar; for that he had set out for the same place to which we were going, and would reach his destination quicker than we could. Upon which neither I, nor my brother, nor any of our friends, thought it right to run the risk of injuring not merely ourselves, but the republic, by our rashness; especially as we had little doubt but that, if even the road were safe, yet we should not now be able to overtake you. In the mean time I received your letter of the 20th of February from Canusium, in which you beg that we would come quickly to Brundisium. This I received on the 27th, when I did not doubt but you would already have arrived at Brundisium. The road seemed to be quite closed against us; and ourselves to be taken as carrion, for I consider as taken, not only those who have fallen into the hands of armed people, but those likewise who are excluded from certain districts, and have come within the garrisons and posts of their enemies. In this state my first wish was, that I had always been with you, as I mentioned to you when I wanted to decline the command of Capua; which I did, not for the sake of avoiding the trouble, but because I saw that the city was incapable of being kept without an army, and I was unwilling to expose myself to the same accident, which I lamented in the case of our brave friends. But when I was prevented from being with you, I wish I could have been made acquainted with your designs: for it was impossible for me to guess them; as I should sooner have thought anything, than that this cause of the republic could not be maintained in Italy under your direction. I do not mean however to find fault with your determination; but I mourn over the fortune of the republic; nor do I the less believe you to have acted with good reason because I am unacquainted with your purpose. I am persuaded you remember what was always my opinion, first, respecting the maintaining peace, even upon unequal conditions; then respecting the city; for on the subject of Italy you never opened yourself to me. But I do not assume to myself that my opinion ought to have prevailed: I adopted yours. And I did this, not for the republic’s sake, about which I despaired, rent as it now is, and incapable of being raised up without a ruinous civil war; but I sought you, and wished to be with you, and will not omit an opportunity of it, should any present. In all this business I was well aware that I should not give satisfaction to such as were eager for fighting: for, in the first place, I professed that I wished nothing more than peace: not but I feared the same consequences as they did, but I esteemed those to be more tolerable than a civil war. Then again, after the war was begun, when I found that conditions of peace were offered to you, and that you made an honourable and full reply to them, I formed my own determination, which I trusted, according to your usual kindness towards me, I should easily explain to your satisfaction. I recollected that I was one who, for my distinguished services to the republic, had been subjected to the saddest and most cruel sufferings; that I was one who, if I had offended him, to whom even while we were in arms there was granted a second consulate, and a most ample triumph, I should be again exposed to the same persecution; since the attacks of wicked men on my person seemed always to have something of popularity. And this I was not forward to suspect, till it was openly threatened.

Nor did I so much dread it, if it were necessary; as I thought it prudent to avoid it, if it could be done with honour. You see shortly the motives by which I was actuated as long as there was any hope of peace. Circumstances have removed all power of doing anything further. But I have a ready answer for those who are dissatisfied with me: for I have been no more a friend to C. Caesar than they; nor have they been more attached to the republic than I. The difference between us consists in this: that while they want an exact citizen, and I am not deficient in the same reputation, I preferred settling these disputes by treaty, which I understood to be your wish also; they by arms. And since this opinion has prevailed, I shall take care that neither the republic may lose the affection of a citizen, nor you that of a friend.

LETTER XII.

The weakness of my eyes is become more troublesome even than it was before; I determined, however, to dictate this rather than send no letter at all by Gallus Fabius, who is so much attached to us both. Yesterday I wrote myself as well as I was able, and called a prophecy, which I wish may prove false. The occasion of this letter is, not only that I may let no day pass without writing to you, but what is a juster reason, that I may beg you to employ a little portion of your time (and it will not cost you much) to let me thoroughly understand your sentiments. I am still at liberty to choose what course I should adopt. Nothing has been neglected which does not admit, not merely of a plausible, but a satisfactory excuse. For surely I have not done wrong in wishing to decline the proffered administration of Capua, that I might avoid any suspicion either of backwardness in raising troops or of treachery; nor, after the conditions of peace brought by L. Cesar and Fabatus, in taking care not to offend him, to whom Pompeius, while they were both in arms, had offered the consulate and a triumph. Neither can anybody justly blame these last measures of not crossing the seas, which, though it was matter of necessity to me, yet it was not in my power to accomplish; nor ought I to have suspected such a step, especially as from Pompeius’s own letter I concluded (and I perceive that you were of the same opinion) that he would go to support Domitius. And in truth I wanted a longer time to determine what was right, and what I ought to do. In the first place then, though you have given me generally your opinion on this subject, yet I should be glad if you would write to me more particularly. In the next place I wish you to look a little into futurity, and fancy to yourself the character I ought to support, and how you think I can be of most use to the republic,—whether there is any room for a pacific personage, or whether everything rests with the military. I, who measure everything by duty, consider, however, your advice, which if I had followed I should not have felt the miseries of those times. I remember what you then recommended through Theophaones and Culeo, and I often recollected it with regret. Now then at least let me revert to that estimation of things which I formerly rejected, and consider not only what is glorious but a little also what is expedient. But I prescribe nothing; I wish you to give me exactly your own opinion. I should be glad also if you would find out as compendiously as you can (and you will more easily than persons through whom you may do it) what our friend Lentulus, what Domitius, is doing, or what he means to do; how they conduct themselves,—whether they accuse or are angry with anybody. With anybody, do I say? With Pompeius. Pompeius throws all the blame upon Domitius, as appears by his letter, of which I send you a copy. You will see after these matters; and, as I mentioned to you before, I should be obliged to you to send me the book which Demetrius Magnes presented to you upon Concord.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to C. Marcellus and L. Lentulus, Consul.

As I considered that, while our troops were dispersed, we could neither render any service to the republic nor defend ourselves,—therefore I wrote to L. Domitius first to come to me himself with his whole force, or if he doubted about himself, to send me the nineteen cohorts which were on their way to me from Picenum. What I feared has happened,—that Domitius was hemmed in, without being strong enough to form an encampment, because he had my nineteen cohorts and his own twelve distributed in three different towns, having placed part at Alba and part at Sulmo,—nor could he disengage them if he would. I am now, therefore, in the greatest anxiety. For I wish to relieve so many valuable men from the hazard of a siege, and am unable to go to their assistance,—for I do not think it safe to let these two legions he conducted thus,—out of which I have not been able to collect more than fourteen cohorts, having sent a garrison to Brundisium, and not thinking that Canusium ought to be left unprotected in my absence. I sent word to D. Lælius that I hoped to have an increase of force, so that if you thought well of it one of you might join me; the other might go into Sicily with such troops as you have obtained at Capua and in the neighbourhood, together with those which have been raised by Faustus; that Domitius with his twelve cohorts should proceed to the same destination; that all the remaining forces should be collected at Brundisium, and from thence should be transported in ships to Dyrrachium. Now, since at this time I am no more able than you to go to the assistance of Domitius, I must leave him to extricate himself through the mountains. I cannot suffer the enemy to attack these fourteen cohorts, which I have in a doubtful disposition, or

1 In the text it is M. Marcellus; but, as there can be little doubt of this being a mistake, I have taken the liberty of altering it.

2 The complete legions contained seven cohorts, each cohort being divided into three manipuli, and each manipulus into two centuries. Had the numbers therefore been complete, which they seldom were, the legion would have contained 9000 men.

3 The passage in the original is defective. I have given what I suppose to be the true meaning.

to come up with me in my march; on which account I have thought it right (and I find that Marcellus, and the rest of our order who are here, are of the same opinion) to conduct the force I have with me to Brundisium. I beg you to collect whatever soldiers you can, and to come to the same place as soon as possible. I think you may distribute among the men which you have with you the arms you were going to send me. You will confer a great service on the republic by transporting the supernumerary arms on beasts of burden to Brundisium. I should be glad if you would give notice to my people upon this subject. I have sent to the pretors P. Lupus and C. Coponius to join me, and to conduct to you what troops they possessed.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Domitius, Proconsul.

I am surprised that you have not written to me, and that all information about the republic should come to me from others rather than from you. While our troops are dispersed it is impossible for us to be equal to our adversaries. With our forces united I hope we may be of service to the republic and to the common safety. When therefore, you had determined, as Vibullus wrote me word, to leave Corfinium the 9th of February with the army, and to come to me, I wonder what should have caused you to change your mind. For the reason which Vibullus mentions is of little weight, that you had heard of Caesar's having left Firmum, and being arrived at Castrum Truentinum; for the nearer the enemy approached, the more expeditiously ought you to have acted, in order to join me before Caesar could obstruct your road or cut off the communication between us; therefore, I beg and entreat you again and again, as I have not ceased to do in my former letters, to come to Luceria on the earliest day, before Caesar can bring together into one place the forces which he purposed to collect, and separate us from each other: or if you meet with impediments from some who would save their own troops, at least it is reasonable that you should desire you would send me those cohorts which are come from Picenum and Casmirnum, and have left their own fortunes.

Cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Domitius, Proconsul.

M. Calenus brought me your letter the 18th of February, in which you say that you mean to observe Caesar's motions, and if he should attempt to come towards me by the sea-coast that you will immediately join me in Samnium,—or if he should loiter about those parts that you are disposed to resist him, whenever he comes within your reach. I have a just sense of your spirit and courage in this determination; but we must take great care that our forces are not so divided as to render us unequal to our adversary, who has already a great many troops, and will shortly have more. For with your usual prudence you ought to consider not only how many cohorts Caesar can at present bring against you, but what numbers of cavalry and infantry he will in a short time collect. This is confirmed by a letter which I have received from Bussenasius, in which he says, what I have heard also from others, that Curio is collecting the

1 The order of senators.

2 I have translated this as if it were written altis, instead of alta; for this, I doubt not, is the proper reading.
garrisons from Umbria and Tuscany, and proceeding to join Caesar. If these forces should unite, and part should be sent to Alba, part should come against you,—without fighting, but only defending themselves in their quarters, you will be embarrassed, and unable alone to resist such numbers with your present force, so as to admit of your foraging. For these reasons I strongly advise you to come hither as soon as possible with your whole force. The consuls have determined to do the same. I sent you advice by Metuesculus, that it was necessary to prevent my two legions from being brought to face Caesar without the Picentine cohorts. You must not, therefore, be uneasy if you should hear of my retreating, in case Caesar comes towards me,—as I think it right to provide against the embarrassment of being surrounded; for I can neither form a camp, owing to the season of the year and the disposition of the soldiery, nor can I safely bring together the troops out of all the towns for fear of having my retreat cut off. I have therefore collected at Laceria not more than four thousand men. The consuls will either bring all the garrisons, or will go into Sicily: for it is expedient either to have a strong army with which we may rely upon breaking through the enemy, or else to get possession of such countries in which we can defend ourselves,—neither of which is at present the case; for Caesar is already master of a great part of Italy, and his army is superior both in appointments and numbers to mine. We must, therefore, take care to pay the utmost attention to the republic. I beg you again and again to come to me as soon as possible with all your forces. We may yet raise up the republic if we unite our counsels in conducting the business; but if we are disinclined we must be weak. Such is my ultimate opinion.

Since writing this, Sica has brought me your letter and instructions. Respecting your wish that I should go to you, I do not consider it possible for me to do it, because I have no great confidence in these legions.

cn. Magnus, Proconsul, to Domitius, Proconsul.

I received your letter the 17th of February, in which you inform me that Caesar has pitched his camp before Corfinium. What I supposed, and forewarned you, has happened,—that he does not wish at present to engage in battle with you; but that he will collect together all his forces and hamper you so as to prevent your joining me, and uniting those troops of the best citizens with these legions, whose disposition is doubtful,—which makes me the more concerned at your account. For I cannot sufficiently rely upon the disposition of the soldiers whom I have with me to risk the whole fortune of the republic; nor have those joined who have been enrolled by the consuls out of the levies. Therefore try if by any means you can even now manage to extricate yourself, that you may come hither as soon as possible before all the adversary's forces are united. For men cannot very quickly arrive here from the levies,—and if they did, it does not escape you how little they can be trusted against veteran legions while they are not so much as known to each other.

LETTER XIII.

The hand-writing of a clerk will show you that my eyes are not yet well; and the same cause will make me short; though at present I have nothing to tell you. My only expectation is in the news from Brundisium. If Caesar should have come up with our friend Cnaeus, the hope of peace is very doubtful; but if he should have passed over first, there is danger of a destructive war. But do you perceive with what a man the republic has to do? how acute! how vigilant! how ready! If forsooth he puts nobody to death, and plunder nobody, he will be most loved by the very people who were most afraid of him. I have a good deal of conversation with the towns-people, and with those from the country: they care absolutely about nothing but their fields, and their pleasure-houses, and their pelf. See how things are changed. Him, on whom they once relied, they fear; and they love this man, whom they used to dread. I cannot without grief reflect upon the errors and misconduct of our party, through which this has happened. I told you what dangers I apprehended. I am in expectation of hearing from you.

LETTER XIV.

I am afraid my daily letters must be troublesome to you, especially as I can send you no news, nor indeed find any new subject to write upon. And if I were expressly to send messengers to you about nothing at all, I should act absurdly; but when people are going, particularly my own servants, I cannot suffer him to go without writing something to you. Besides, believe me, I feel some relief in these miseries while I talk, as it were, with you; and still more when I read your letters. I think indeed there has been no time since this flight and trepidation, when this intercourse of letters could with more propriety be interrupted; as nothing new is heard at Rome; nor in these parts, which are two or three days nearer to Brundisium than you are. It is at Brundisium that all the struggle of this first season passes. I am distracted with anxiety about the event. But I shall know all before you; for I find that Caesar set out from Corfinium on the afternoon of the same day on which Pompeius set out in the morning from Canusium, that is the 21st of February. But such is the manner of Caesar's march, and with such allowances does he urge the speed of his soldiers, that I dread his getting to Brundisium sooner than is to be wished. You will say, 'What good is there in anticipating the distress of such an event, which in three days you will know?' There is none indeed. But, as I said before, I love to converse with you. Besides, you must know that I begin to waver in my opinion, which seemed to be already fixed. For the authorities, which you approve, are not satisfactory to me. For what have they ever done to distinguish themselves in the republic? or who expects from them anything praiseworthy? not that I mean to applaud those who have crossed the sea for the purpose of increasing the preparations for war; however intolerable may be the present state of affairs; for I see how great and how ruinous the war must be. But I am influenced by regard for an individual, to whom it seems due that I should be a companion in his flight, and an assistant in restoring the republic.

"So often then do you change your mind?" I converse with you as with myself; and who is there "in a case of such moment argues variously with himself? at the same time I wish to elicit your opinion; that if it is still the same, I may be the more determined; if it is changed, that I may assent to it. It is of importance to the subject of my doubt, to know what Domitius will do, and what our friend Lentulus. We have various reports about Domitius; sometimes, that he is at Tiburium, or at Lepidus's house; or that Lepidus is gone with him to the city; which I find is not true; for Lepidus says that it is uncertain where he is gone, and that he does not know whether his object be to conceal himself, or to reach the sea. He is equally ignorant about his son. He adds, what is distressing, that a large sum of money, which Domitius had at Corfinium, has never been delivered to him. We hear nothing of Lentulus. I should be glad if you could find out these things, and let me know.

LETTER XV.

On the 3d of March, Egypt delivered to me two letters from you; one an old one, dated February 26, which you mention to have given to Pinarius, whom I have not seen. In this you express your anxiety to know what has been done by Vibullius, who was sent on before. But Caesar has not so much as seen him. In another letter I perceive that you are aware of this. You desire also to know how I receive Caesar on his return; but I mean to avoid him altogether. You mention besides, that you meditate a Harmonian flight, and a change of your life; which I think you must adopt: also that you are uncertain whether Domitius has his fascia? with him; but as soon as you know, you will inform me. You have my reply to your first letter. There are two subsequent ones, both dated the 28th of February, which have plucked me from my former resolution, in which, as I before wrote to you, I was already wavering. What you say, "that Jupiter himself forbids it," has no weight with me. For there is danger in displeasing either party: and the superiority is still uncertain, though the worst cause has the appear-

Vibullius was of Pompeius's party, was taken by Caesar at Corfinium, and thence despatched to Pompeius with proposals of peace, which the latter disregarding never sent back Vibullius at all.

The text is probably corrupt. It appears to be copied from Atticus's own expression, in allusion to some story that has been lost. It may be believed that he meant to signify a design of retiring into Epirus.

Domitius had been nominated to succeed Caesar in Gaul. If he had the fasces curried before him, it would be a mark of his assuming the authority of his position to Caesar. His example would be valuable to Cicero, who was likewise encumbered with his lictors. See letter 1 of this book.

Persuading him now to leave Italy, contrary to the determination he before formed.

The words are, no doubt, copied from Atticus's own expression: the meaning probably is, that the cause of the republic seemed to be abandoned by the gods.
than I, when I see him, whom I love more than myself, conducting himself in his consulate like any thing rather than a consul. But if he will be ruled by the, and will take my word about Caesar, and spend the remaining part of his consulate in Rome; I shall begin to entertain hope, that by the recommendation even of the senate, upon your authority and at his motion, Pompeius and Caesar may be united. If this is accomplished, I shall think I have lived long enough. I am sure you must approve of Caesar's whole conduct respecting Corfinium; as in such a business it could not terminate more favourably, than by being effected without bloodshed. I am glad you were pleased with the arrival of mine and your friend Balbus. All that he has told you about Caesar, or that Caesar has written, I am persuaded, whatever turn his affairs may take, he will prove to you by his conduct that he has written in great sincerity.

LETTER XVI.

EVERYTHING is ready for me, excepting a road to conduct me in secrecy and safety to the Adriatic sea. For I cannot take advantage of the sea here, at this season of the year. But how shall I get thither, where my inclination leads me, and circumstances call me? For it is necessary to set out speedily, that I may not meet with some obstacle to stop me. Yet my inducement to go is not he whom one might suppose; whom I have long known to be a bad politician, and now find to be also a bad general. It is not he therefore that influences me; but the talk of the world, of which I am informed by Philotimus. He says that I am reproached by all the principal people. Ye gods, by what principal people? By those who are running to meet, and to sell themselves to Caesar? The towns salute him as a god. And they do not dissemble, as when they put up vows for Pompeius in his sickness: but whatever this Pisistratus has not inflicted, is as much a subject of gratitude, as if he had prevented some other person from inflicting it. This man they hope to propitiate; the other they think exasperated. What greetings do you think are made from the towns? What honours? "They are afraid," you will say. I believe it; but they are more afraid of the other. They are delighted with Caesar's insidious cleverness; they dread Pompeius's anger. The 850 judges, who were particularly attached to our Cause, some of whom I see every day, dread certain threats of his at Luceria. I ask again then, who are these principal people, who would drive me out, while they remain themselves at home? Nevertheless, whoever they are, "I respect the Trojans." At the same time I know what I have to hope; and go to join one, who is better prepared to lay waste Italy than to conquer it; in short, whom I expect—indeed while I am writing this, March 2d, I am expecting to hear something from Brundisium. What something? How shamefully he has run away from thence; and by what road this conqueror returns, and whither. Which when I have ascertained, if he comes by the Apian road, I think of going to Arpinium.

LETTER IX.

BEFORE you read this, I imagine I shall know what has been done at Brundisium; for Cnaeus set out from Canusium the 22d of February, and I am writing the 6th of March, the 13th day afterwards. In the mean time I am distracted with the expectation of every hour; and am surprised that no rumour even should yet have reached us. This silence is quite wonderful. But it is perhaps idle to vex oneself about what must soon be known. I am uneasy at not yet having been able to find out where our friend Lentulus, where Domitius is. And I want to know, that I may the more readily understand what they mean to do; whether they will join Pompeius; and, if so, by what way, or when they will go. I understand the city is already full of the principal citizens, and that Sosius and Lepus, whom our Cnaeus expected to be at Brundisium before him, are trying causes. From these parts numbers are going up. Even M. Lepidus, with whom I used to spend my day, thinks of going to-morrow. I shall however remain in Formium, that I may receive the earlier intelligence; I then design to go to Arpinium; and thence to the Adriatic sea by the most unfrequented road, having first set aside or wholly dismissed my lictors. For I hear that many respectable people, who on this and former occasions have rendered good service to the republic, disapprove of my delay, and make many severe observations upon me in their convivial meetings. Let us give way then, and in order to show that we are good citizens, let us make war upon Italy by sea and land; and let us once more light up against us the emnity of wicked men.

3 This is evidently said with a mixture of irony.
which was just extinguished; and let us follow the counsels of LUCEIUS and THEOPHANES. For SICPIO either goes into Syria by his lot, or honourably attends his son-in-law, or avoids the anger of CESAR: the MARCELLI, if they were not afraid of CESAR’s sword, would stay behind: APPIUS is influenced by the same apprehension, and some recent causes of enmity: besides him, and C. CASSIUS, the others are lieutenants; Fausanu is proconsul: I am the only person at liberty to choose the course I shall take. My brother will go with me; though it is not reasonable that he should share my fortunes on this occasion, which will more particularly expose him to CESAR’s displeasure; but I cannot prevail upon him to stay. We shall thus give to POMPEIUS what we owe him. Indeed nobody else moves me; neither the talk of good men, of whom there are none, nor the cause itself, which has been conducted timidly, and will be prosecuted wickedly. To him, to him alone I give this, while he does not even ask it, but supports (as he says?) not his own cause, but that of the public. I shall be glad to know what you think about going to EPIRUS.

LETTER II.

THOUGH I am expecting a longer letter from you on the 7th of March, which I think is your well day, yet I have thought it right to reply to that short one which you despatched on the 5th, when the fit was going off. You say you are glad that I have said; and tell me that you continue in your opinion. But in your former letters you seemed to me not to doubt but that I ought to go, provided CNEUS should embark with a respectable attendance, and the consuls should pass over. Have you then forgot this? or did I not rightly understand you? or have you changed your opinion? But either in the letter which I am expecting I shall see distinctly what you think, or I shall solicit another. Nothing has yet been heard from BRUNDISIUM. What a difficult and hopeless state! How in reasoning upon it you leave nothing unsaid! Yet in conclusion, how you explain nothing of your real sentiments! You are glad that I am not with POMPEIUS; and yet you state how disgraceful it would be for me to be present while anything is said against him, and how impossible to approve it. I must certainly then oppose it. "God forbid," you say. What therefore is to be done, if in the one case there is guilt, in the other punishment? "Obtain, you say, "from CESAR leave to absent yourself, and to remain quiet." Must I then descend to supplication? O sad! and what if it is denied me? And respecting my triumph, you say that I shall be at liberty to do as I please. But what if CESAR should press it upon me? Should I accept it? What can be more disgraceful? Should I refuse? He will think that he is wholly spurned: more so than in the affair of the twenty commissioners: and he is accustomed, in exculpating himself, to throw upon me all the blame of those times; that I am so hostile to him, that I will not even receive honour at his hands. How much more unhappily will he hear this! just so much as the honour itself is greater, and he is more powerful. For as to what you say, that you don’t but POMPEIUS is greatly offended with me at this time; I see no reason why he should be so at this time. Can he, who never acquainted me with his intention, till CORVINUS had been lost; can he complain that I did not go to Brundisium, when CESAR was between me and it? Besides, he knows that his complaining on that account is unjustifiable: he supposes me to have been better informed than myself about the weakness of the towns, about the levies, about peace, about the state of the city, about the treasury, about the occupation of PONNUM. But if I would not go when it was in my power, then indeed he might be angry. Which I do not regard from fear of his doing me any harm; (for what can he do? "Who is a slave, that is not afraid to die?"") but because I abhor the imputation of ingratitude. I trust therefore that my going to him, at whatever time it should be, would, as you say?, be acceptable. As to what you say, that if CESAR acted with more moderation, you could give a more deliberate opinion; how is it possible that he should not act ruinously? His life, his manners, his former actions, the plan of his undertaking, his companions, the strength of the good, or even their firmness, demand it. I had scarcely read your letter, when POSTUMUS CURIUS came to me on his way to CESAR, talking of nothing but fleets and armies he was seeing Spain; occupying Asia, Sicilia, Africa, Sardinia, and presently pursuing POMPEIUS into Greece. I must go therefore, that I may be his companion, not so much in war as in flight; for I cannot hear the scoffs of those people, whoever they are. They assuredly are not, as they are called, good; yet I wish to know what it is they say; and I earnestly beg you to find out, and to inform me. HIBERTO, I am of opinion, he will be at Brundisium. When I know, I shall take counsel from circumstances and opportunity, but shall be regulated by you.

LETTER III.

DOMITIUS’s son passed through FORMIS on the 8th, hastening to his mother at Naples; and upon my servant DIONYSIUS asking particularly about his father, he desired I might be told that he was in the city. But I had heard that he was gone either to POMPEIUS, or into SPAIN. I should be glad to know how this is: for it is of consequence to the subject of my present deliberation; that he is not more any more gone nowhere. Caeus may understand the difficulty of my leaving Italy, while it is all occupied by troops and garrisons, especially in winter. If it were a more favourably time of year, it would be possible to go by the Southern sea: now nothing can pass but by the Adriatic, the road to which is intercepted. You will inquire therefore about Domitius, and about Lentulus. No report has yet arrived from Brundisium, and this is the 9th of March, on which day, or the day before, I imagine Cæsar would reach Brundisium; for on the first he stopped at Arpi. If you would hasten to Postumus, he will pursue Cæsus; for, by conjecture from state of the weather and the number of days, he supposed him already to have passed over. For my own part, I do not think Cæsar will be able to get sailors; he is himself very confident, and the more so, because the liberty of the man is known to the people concerned in the boats. But it is impossible I can much longer remain in ignorance of this whole Brundisian business.

LETTER IV.

Though I feel some repose so long as I am writing to you, or reading your letters; yet I want myself a subject to write about, and am persuaded you do so too. For that familiar correspondence, which passes between us, while our minds are at ease, is excluded in these times; and what is appropriate to the times, is already exhausted. But, that I may not resign myself wholly to sadness, I have taken up certain subjects of a political nature, and suited to the times; that I may both withdraw my mind from complaints, and may exercise myself in matters of present concern. Such are the following. If it be right to remain in one's country after it is subjected to a tyrant. Being so subjected, if every means should be employed to dissolve the tyranny, even at the risk of ruining the city. If care must be taken, that the person who executes this be not himself exalted. If it be right to succour one's country, under a tyrant, by opportunity and reasoning, rather than by war. If, when one's country is subjected to a tyrant, it be consistent with the dignity of a good citizen to be quiet, and retire. If every danger ought to be hazarded for the sake of freedom. If war and siege ought to be brought upon one's country when oppressed by tyranny. If one, who does not attempt to put down a tyrant, may yet be reckoned among the number of good citizens. If we ought to support our benefactors and friends in political struggles, even when we think them to have acted imprudently. If one who has rendered signal service to his country, and on that very account has incurred troubles and envy, should voluntarily expose himself for his country's sake. If it be permitted him to make provision for himself and his family, and to leave state affairs to those in power. Exercising myself in these questions, and writing on both sides in Greek and in Latin, I divert my attention a little from unseasiness, and contemplate something of real interest. But I fear I may address you unreasonably; for if the person who brought your letter came straight hither, it will fall upon your sick day.

LETTER V.

You wrote to me on your birthday a letter full of advice, and at once expressive of the greatest kindness, and the greatest good sense. Philotimus delivered it to me the day after he had received it from you. The circumstances you mention are very difficult to arrange; the way to the Adriatic; the voyage by Brundisium; the departure to Carthage if to avoid Cæsar; the remaining at Formiae, as if on purpose to congratulate him. But nothing is more wretched than to see what presently, presently I say, must be seen. I have had Postumus with me; I told you how consequential he was. Q. Fufius likewise called upon me; with what an air! with what insolence! He was hastening to Brundisium; charging Pompeius with wickedness, the senate with fickleness and folly. Shall I, who cannot bear this in my vills, be able to bear Curtilus in the senate? Or suppose me to bear it with ever so good a stomach; what must be the issue when I am called upon; “Speak, M. ‘Tullius?’ I say nothing of the republic, which I consider as lost both by the wounds it has received, and by the remedies which are prepared for it. But what shall I do about Pompeius? with whom (for why should I deny it?) I am quite angry. For the causes of events always affect us more than the events themselves. When I consider therefore these miseries (and what can be worse?) or rather when I reflect that they have been brought on by his means and his fault, I am more irritated against him than against Cæsar himself: in the same manner as our forefathers marked the day of the battle of the Allia*, as sadder than that of the taking the city; because the latter calamity was the consequence of the former; therefore the one is still held sacred, the other not even known to the common people. Thus am I angry while I recollect the errors of ten years past (among which was that year of affliction to me, when he, to say nothing worse, did not defend me), and perceive the rashness, the baseness, the negligence of the present time. But these things are now erased from my mind. I think of the benefits I have received from him, and think also of his own dignity, I understand, later indeed than I could wish, on reason of Plautus’ letters and conversation; but I see plainly that nothing else is aimed at, nothing else has been aimed at from the beginning, but his death. Shall I then, (if Achilles, according to Homer, when his mother goddess told him that his fate would presently follow that of Hector, replied, “Would that I might die immediately, since I could not prevent the death of my friend’; what if not only a friend, but also a benefactor; such a man too, and engaged in such a cause? And shall I then) think these duties to be trafficked away for the sake of life? I place no reliance on your principal people, and now no more defer to them. I see how they give themselves, and will give themselves, to this man. Do you think those decrees of the towns for Pompeius’ health hear any comparison with these congratulations of victory? They are afraid, ’you will say. Themselves say they were afraid too. But let us see what has been done at Brundisium. From that perhaps will arise my determination, and another letter.

* Postumus Curtius. See letter 2 of this book.

The Gauls invested the Romans at the river Allia, previous to their taking the city.

LETTER VI.

I have yet heard nothing from Brundisium; Balbus has written from Rome, saying that he supposes the consul Lentulus to have crossed the sea, without being met by the younger Balbus; who had already heard this at Canusium, from whence he wrote to his uncle. And he added that the six cohorts, which had been at Alba, had gone over to Curius by the Minucian road; that Caesar had written to inform him of it, and would shortly be at Rome. I shall follow your advice, and shall not hide myself at Arpinum at this time; though I wished to invest my son with the toga of manhood at Arpinum, and had intended to leave this as my excuse to Caesar. But he might perhaps be offended at that very circumstance, that I should not rather do it at Rome. If, however, it is right to meet him, it is best here. We will then consider the rest; whither I should go, and by what road, and when. Domitius, as I hear, is in the neighbourhood of Cos^a^, and as they say, is prepared to sail. If to Spain, I do not approve it; if to Caneus, I commend him: but anywhere rather than to see Curitus^a^, whom even I, that have been his patron, cannot bear to look at. What then? Must I bear others? But I must be quiet, that I may not aggravate my own fault: for through my affection to the city, that is, to my country, and hoping that affairs might be compromised, I have managed so as to be completely intercepted and taken. Since writing the above I have received a letter from Capua to this effect: Pompeius has crossed the sea with all the troops that he had with him, amounting to 30,000 men, besides the two consuls, and those tribunes of the people and senators, who were with him, all with their wives and children. He is said to have embarked the 4th of March, from which day the winds have been northerly. They say that he either cut in two, or burned, all the vessels which he did not use. The letter containing this account was brought to L. Metellus, the tribune of the people, at Capua, from his mother-in-law, Clodia, who herself passed over. I was before solicitous and anxious, as indeed the circumstances required, while I could bring my mind to no conclusion: but now, since Pompeius and the consuls have gone, I am no longer anxious, but burn with grief; and, as Homer says, "Neither is my mind sound, but I am distracted." Believe me, I am not master of myself, so great is the disgrace I seem to have incurred. In the first place, by not having been with Pompeius, whatever plan he adopted; then, in not having been with the good, however ill their cause was conducted. Especially when the very persons for whose sake I was more timid in exposing myself to the risks of fortune, my wife, my daughter, the young Ciceros, wished me to follow that course; and considered this to be base and unworthy of me. My brother Quintus, indeed, said he should be satisfied with whatever I chose; and he followed it with perfect complacency. I now read over your letters from the beginning; and they afford me some comfort. The first advise and beg me not to throw myself away; the next show that you are glad I have remained. When I read these, I think myself less blamable; but it is only while I am reading them: afterwards my regret again bursts forth, and, as it is said, "I am haunted with shame." I beseech you, therefore, my Titus, pluck out from me this trouble, or at least diminish it either by consolation, or advice, or any way you can. But what can you do? or what can any man? Hardly any god. I am considering (as you advise, and hope may be effected) how I can get Caesar's permission to absent myself when anything is agitated in the senate against Caneus; but I fear I may not obtain it. Furnius has arrived from him; and, that you may know whose example I follow, he brings word that Q. Titius' son is with Caesar. He sends me greater thanks than I could wish. What he asks of me, in few words indeed, but energetically, you shall see by his own letter. How unfortunate that you should have been unwell! Had we been together, there surely would have been no want of counsel—"And going two in company," 8 Sc. But, let us not act over the past; let us provide for what remains. These two things have hitherto decoyed me; at first, the hope of accommodation; upon which taking place I had wished to pass my old age free from anxiety and popular strife; after wards, the understanding that Pompeius had actually engaged in a cruel and deadly warraie. In truth I thought it argued a better citizen, and a better man, rather to undergo any punishment, than not only to take the lead, but to take any part in such cruelty. It appears preferable even to die than to be leagued with such men. Think of these matters, my Atticus, or rather resolve. I can bear any event better than my present anguish.

Cæsar, Imperator, to Cicero, Imperator.

Having but just seen our friend Furnius, without being able conveniently either to speak to him or hear him, being in a hurry, and actually on my road, with my troops already sent on before; I could not, however, let pass the opportunity of writing to you, and sending him to thank you. If I have frequently done this, yet I am likely to do it still more frequently; so greatly am I obliged to you. Especially I have to beg of you, as I trust I shall soon arrive in Rome, to let me see you there, that I may be able to avail myself of your advice, influence, dignity, and assistance in everything. I must end as I began, and request you to excuse my haste, and the shortness of my letter. You will bear the rest from Furnius.

8 The original is part of a verse from Homer, well known to both Cicero and Atticus, expressive of Diomedes' wish to have a companion in his night expedition to the Trojan camp.

9 Several conjectures have been offered by commentators in explanation of this passage, which however appears to be sufficiently clear, if we only admit the slight alteration of of in the place of uit.
LETTER VII.

I had written a letter to you, which should have been sent the 12th of March; but the person to whom I meant to entrust it did not go that day. But the very same day, came that swift-foot, as Salvius called him, and brought me your very satisfactory letter, which again instilled into me some little life. Restored I cannot call myself: but what is next to this you have done. Trust me, I now no longer think of a prosperous termination: for I see that as long as these two, or this one, is living, we shall never have a republic. Therefore I now lay aside all hope of retirement, and am prepared for every severity. My only fear was that of doing, or, I may say, of having done anything discreditable. Let me assure you then that your letter is very valuable to me; and not only that longer one, than which nothing can be more explicit, nothing more complete; but also the shorter one, in which it was particularly agreeable to me to understand that my sentiments and conduct were approved by Sextus. You have done me a great kindness; for I know that he loves me, and that he understands what is right. Your longer letter has relieved not me only, but all my family, from anxiety. I shall accordingly adopt your advice, and stay in Formi-anum; lest either my going to meet him in Rome may create observation; or if I neither see him here nor there, he may think that I try to avoid him. As to what you advise, that I should ask him to let me pay the same regard to Pompeius which I pay to him, you will see by the letter of Balbus and Oppius, of which I send you a copy, that I have already done so. I send also Cæsar’s letter to them, written with great temper, for such a distempered state. If Cæsar does not grant me this, I perceive that you approve of my undertaking a negotiation for peace; in which I do not regard the hazard that attends it. For when so many dangers threaten us, why should I not comound for the most honourable? But I apprehend I shall bring some embarrassment upon Pompeius, and this again is to be inclined to turn upon me “the appalling book of the Gorgon’s head.” For our friend Cænus has been strangely ambitious of a sovereignty like that of Sulla. I say it with confidence. He never was less secret. “Would you then,” you say, “join such a man?” I follow him, believe me, from a sense of the benefits I have received, not from a love of his cause, as in the case of Milo; as in—enough of this. Is not then his cause a good one?” Yes, the very best: but it will be conducted, mind you, most duly. The first object is, to starve the city and all Italy by famine; then to lay waste and burn the country, and not to spare the property of the opulent. But, as I apprehend all the same calamities from this party; if there were not on the other side a sense of benefits received, I should think it more proper to hear at home whatever might happen. But I consider myself under such obligations to him, that I dare not expose myself to the charge of ingratitude, however just an excuse for it you point out. About my triumph I agree with you, and easily and willingly give up all thoughts of it. I am uncommonly pleased with the hope that in the midst of all our arrangements the season for sailing may creep on unobserved. “If only,” as you say, “Pompeius is strong enough.” He is stronger even than I thought. But whatever hope you may entertain of him, I engage that, if he prevails, he will leave no tile in Italy unbroken. “And will you then be his associate?” Against indeed my own judgment: and against the authority of all antiquity. I wish to get away, not so much to promote what is done there, as that I may not witness what is done here. For do not suppose that the madness of these people can be supposable, or confined to one kind: though nothing of this has escaped your penetration. When the laws, the judicial proceedings, and the senate, are taken away; neither private property nor the republic will be able to support the licentiousness, the boldness, the extravagance, the needs of so many needy men. Let us away then by any passage, though I submit this to your judgment; but by all means let us away. We shall soon know that which you wait for; what has been done at Brundisium. It gives me great pleasure, if indeed there is now any room for pleasure, that you say my conduct hitherto is approved by the good, at the same time that they know I have not left the country. I will endeavor to find out more particularly about Lentulus: I have entrusted this to Philotimus, a bold man, and more than enough attached to the senatorian party. In conclusion, you may perhaps be at a loss for a subject to write upon; for it is imposable at this time to write about anything else; and about this what more can now be said? But as both your wit supplies you (I speak forsooth as I think), and your affection, by which my wit likewise is sharpened; continue as you do, and write as much as you can. I am half angry that you do not write more; but I should not be a troublesome companion. But farewell. For as you must exercise and anoint yourself, so I must sleep; which your letter enables me to do.

Balbus and Oppius to M. Cicero.

The counsels, not only of incomparable people, as we are, but even of the greatest men, are apt to be interpreted by the event, not by the intention. Yet relying on your goodness, we give you the best opinion we can upon the subject about which you wrote to us. And if it be not wise, at least it procceeds from honest minds, and the kindest regards. Unless we were assured from himself that Cæsar would do what in our judgment he ought to do; that as soon as he comes to Rome he will enter upon measures of reconciliation with Pompeius; we should cease to exhort you to take a part in this affair, in order that the whole may be effected a The original is a verse of Homer. The meaning here is, that he might have to encounter the frown of Pompeius, who was averse from any compromise. It is possible that some severity of countenance spoken of by Plutarch, as "τὸ γερανὺ καὶ τὸ βασιλεῖον," may have given occasion to the application of this line to him.

more easily, and with more dignity, through you, who are connected with both parties. On the other hand, if we thought that Caesar would not do so, but was desirous of engaging in war with Pompeius; we never would persuade you to bear arms against one who has shown you the greatest kindness; as we have always treated you not to fight against Caesar. But still, since we are rather able to guess than to know what Caesar will do, we can only say, that it does not appear suitable to your dignity and known probity, being so attached to Caesar and borne averse against Pompeius; and we have no doubt but Caesar will highly approve this, agreeably to his accustomed humanity. But, if you wish it, we will write to Caesar, in order to ascertain more certainly what he will do in this affair: from whom if we receive an answer, we will immediately let you know our opinion; and promise you, that we will advise what seems to us most becoming your dignity, not what may be most beneficial to our cause; and this, we believe, Caesar will approve, according to his indulgence towards his friends.

Balbus to Cicero, Emperor.

I hope you are well. After I had despatched to you the joint letter with Oppius, I received one from Caesar, of which I inclose a copy. From thence you may perceive how desirous he is of peace and of reconciliation with Pompeius; and how far he is from all cruelty; and I sincerely rejoice, as I ought, that he entertains such sentiments. With respect to yourself, and your integrity, and duty, I think, my Cicero, as you do, that it is impossible your reputation and attachment can permit you to bear arms against one from whom you profess to have received such kindness. That Caesar will approve this I am confident, from his distinguished humanity; and I know for certain that he will be abundantly satisfied with you, provided you take no part in the war against him, and do not join his adversaries. And be will not only deem this sufficient in one of your high character; but, of his own accord, he has given me leave to absent myself from the army, that might have to act against Lentulus or Pompeius, to whom I am under great obligations: and he said, that he should be satisfied if, when I was called upon, I would undertake for him the business relating to the city; and that I was at liberty to do the same for them. Accordingly I am at this time conducting and supporting Lentulus’s affairs at Rome; and I maintain towards them my duty, fidelity and gratitude. But, in truth, I consider the hope of agreement to be now again cast off, not entirely desperate; since Caesar’s disposition is such as we ought to desire. In this case I think, if it meets with your approbation, that you should write to him, and request him a guard; as you did from Pompeius, with my approbation, at the time of Milo’s trial. I will engage, if I know anything of Caesar, that he will sooner consider your dignity than his own advantage. How prudently I may advise you I know not; but this I know, that whatever I write to you, I write from the purest affection and regard; for, so may I die without prejudice to Caesar¹, as I esteem few equally dear to me as yourself. When you have come to any determination about this business², I wish you would write to me; for I am not a little earnest that you should be able, as you desire, to show your kindness towards both. And this I trust you will do. Farewell.

Cesar to Oppius and Cornelius.

I am very glad that you express in your letter how much you approve of what has been done at Corfinium. I shall willingly adopt your advice; and the more so, because of my own accord I had resolved to show every leality, and to use my endeavours to conciliate Pompeius. Let us try by these means if we can regain the affections of all people, and render our victory lasting. Others, from their cruelty, have not been able to avoid the hatred of mankind, nor long to retain their victory; except L. Sulla alone, whom I do not mean to imitate. Let this be a new method of conquering, to fortify ourselves with kindness and liberality. How this may be done, some things occur to my own mind, and many others may be found. To this subject I request your attention. I have taken Cn. Magius, Pompeius’s prefect. I accordingly put in practice my own principle, and immediately released him. Already two of Pompeius’s prefects of engineers have fallen into my power, and have been released. If they are disposed to be grateful, they should exhort Pompeius to prefer my friendship to that of these people, who have always been the worst enemies to him and to me; by whose artifices it has happened that the republic has come into this condition.

LETTER VIII.

While I was at dinner on the 14th, and it was late, Statius brought me a short letter from you. Respecting the inquiry you make about L. Torquatus, not only Lucius, but Aulus also, is gone, the former several days ago. I am concerned for what you mention about the assemblies of the Reatinis, that there should be any seeds of proscription in the Sabine country. I had heard likewise that many senators were at Rome. Can you tell why they ever left it? It is the general opinion in these parts, rather from conjecture than from any message, or letter, that Caesar will be at Formiae the 22d of March. Here now should I like to have thatMinerva of Homer, who took the form of Mentor, to whom I might say, “Mentor, how shall I go; or how shall I accost him?”. Nothing more difficult ever occurred to me. I think of it, however; and at least shall not, as sometimes happens, be taken by surprise. But take care of your health,—for I think yesterday was your bad day.

TO TITUS POMPONIUS ATTICUS.

LETTER IX.

I received three letters from you on the 16th. They were dated the 12th, 13th, and 14th. I shall, therefore, reply to them in their order. I agree with you, that it is best to remain in Formia; also about the passage by the Adriatic sea; and, as I mentioned to you before, I will try if I can get his consent to my taking no part in public affairs.

What you approve, that I told you I forget the precious conduct and errors of our friend, it is even so. Nay, I remember not those very circumstances which you mention of his misconduct towards me. So much do I desire that my gratitude for his kindness may overpower all sense of his ill-treatment. Let us do then as you advise, and recollect ourselves. For I philosophize as soon as I get into the country; and in my walks I do not cease to meditate upon the subjects I mentioned to you. But some of them are very difficult to determine. Respecting the principal citizens, he it as you please; but you know that saying, "Dionysius in Corinth."

Tullius' son is with Caesar. But what you seem to fear, that your advice may displease him; this is so far from being the case, that your opinion and your letters are the only thing that give me pleasure. Therefore continue, as you profess, to write to me whatever comes into your mind. Nothing can be more acceptable to me. I come now to the next letter.

You are not rightly informed about the number of Pompeius' soldiers. Clodius mentioned more by one half. The story too about the ships that were destroyed, is not true. When you commend the consuls, I also commend their intentions, though I blame their conduct: for owing to their dispersion, the negotiation for peace is prevented, which I was meditating. Accordingly, I have sent back to you by Philotimus the treatise of Demetrius upon Concord. I cannot doubt but a most destructive war hangs over us, the first operation of which will be felt in the want of provisions. Yet I am vexed that I have no part in this war, notwithstanding such a load of wickedness will attend it; for, whereas the not supporting a parent is criminal; our chief design to destroy that most venerable and sacred parent, their country, by famine. And this I fear, not from conjecture, but from the conversations at which I have been present. All this fleet from Alexandria, Cilicia, Tyre, Sidon, Aradius, Cyprus, Pamphylia, Lycia, Rhodes, Chios, Byzantium, Lesbos, Smyrna, Miletus, Cos, is collected for the purpose of intercepting the supplies of Italy, and of occupying the provinces from whence they are drawn. Then, in what wrath will he come! especially against those who wish best to their country; as if he had been deserted by those people whom in fact he deserted.

In my doubt therefore what I ought to do, my gratitude towards him has great weight. Were it not for this, I should think it better to perish within my country, than in saving my country to ruin it. Respecting the northern parts, I think with you; and fear that Epirus may suffer. But what place in Greece do you suppose will escape being plundered? For he professes openly, and holds out to his soldiers that even in his bounties he will show himself the superior. You very justly advise me, when I see Caesar, not to address him with over civility, but rather to maintain my dignity. And so I shall certainly do. After our meeting, I think of going to Arpinum; for I would not be absent when he comes; nor should I like to be running backwards and forwards on so wretched a road. I hear, as you mention, that Bibulus arrived, and returned again the 14th. In the third letter you say that you were expecting Philotimus. He left me on the 15th. This was the reason that the answer, which I wrote immediately upon the receipt of your letter, was later in reaching you. Respecting Domitian, I imagine, as you say, that he is in Cossanum, and that his intention is not known. That base and sordid man, who says that the consular comitia may be held by the praetor, is the same that he always was in the republic. This is the real meaning of what Caesar writes in the letter of which I sent you a copy; and he wishes to avoid himself of my advices: well, suppose this to be a general expression, my influence,—this is absurd; but I imagine he pretends this with regard to some opinions of the senators: my dignity, meaning perhaps the opinion of one of consular rank: at last comes my assistance in everything. I began to suspect from your letter, that his intention was what I have hinted, or not very different. For it is of great consequence to him that the business should not come to an interregnum. If the consuls are created by the praetor, he gains his point. But in our augural books we read not only that the consuls, but even the praetors, cannot lawfully be created by a praetor, and that it never has been done. In the case of consuls it is not allowed, because a higher command cannot be instituted by an inferior one: and in the case of praetors, because they are elected as assistants to the consuls, and are at the same time, you are well aware, to be continued in their office after the consuls be abolished. Hence it would seem likely to refer this to me, and not to rest satisfied with the opinion of Galba, Scaevola, Cassius, Antonius. "Then may the wide earth give to receive me?" You see what a storm hangs over me. I will send you the names of the senators who have passed over, when I have ascertained them. You are quite right about the supplies of corn, which cannot possibly be managed without subsidies; nor is it without reason that you fear those who are about him, full of demands; and tended, among which was situated Atticus' property in Epirus.

dread an iniquitous war. I should be glad to see our friend Trenchus, though, as you say, he has no hope of anything good. Press him to make haste: for it will be convenient that he should come before Caesar’s arrival. Respecting Lanuimum, as soon as I heard that Phanes was dead, I wished, if there should ever be a republic, that one of my friends might buy it. But of you, who are most especially mine, I never thought. For I knew that you used to inquire at how many years’ purchase, and what is the productiveness of the soil; and had seen your book of accounts not only at Rome, but at Delos. However, though it is very pretty, yet I should value it lower than it was valued in the consulship of Marcellinus, when I thought, on account of the house which I then had at Antium, that those gardens would be pleasanter to me, and less expensive, than the refitting my villa at Tusculum. I offered 500 sestertia (4000L.), through a surety to whom he might surrender it, when it was to be sold at Antium; but he would not accept it. Now however I imagine everything of that kind is lowered on account of the scarcity of money. It will be most convenient for me, or rather for us, if you purchase it. Take care not to undervalue his absurdities. The place is exceedingly beautiful: though I look upon all these things as already devoted to destruction. I have answered your three letters; but am expecting others. For hitherto it is your letters that have supported me. Dated on the Liberalia.

LETTER X.

I have nothing to tell you; for I have heard no news, and I answered all your letters yesterday. But while my anxiety not only deprives me of sleep, but does even suffer me to awake without great annoyance, I have determined to write I know not what, upon no particular subject, that I may, as it were, converse with you; in which alone I find consolation. I seem to have lost my reason from the beginning; and this one consideration vexes me, that while Pompeius was sinking, or rather rushing to destruction, I should not in all events have accompanied him, like one of his troop. I saw him in the greatest danger full of alarm; and from that day I perceived what course he would take. He has never pleased me since, nor has he ever ceased to commit one error after another. In the mean time he has never written to me; and has thought of nothing but flight. In short, as in affairs of love we are disgusted by a want of cleanliness, of sense, or of delicacy; so the baseness of his flight, and his neglect, turned away my affection: for his conduct has been void of all that should induce me to join him. But now my affection again rises up; now I cannot bear to be without him; now neither books, nor study, nor philosophy, afford me any relief; so that, like Plato’s bird, I look upon the sea day and night, and long to take my flight. I pay, I pay the penalty of my folly: yet what folly have I committed? What have I done, but with due deliberation? For, had no object besides flight, I might have fled with all readiness; but I shuddered at the idea of a cruel and extensive war, of which people do not yet see the wretchedness. What threats are held out to the towns! and to good men by name! and in short to all who stay behind! How often does he repeat. “Sulla was able, shall not I be able?” Besides, this stuck with me: Porcius actis illis, Octavius Mamilus against his country: Coriolanus most undutifully, who solicited succour from the Volsci: Themistocles nobly, who chose rather to die: and Hippias, the son of Pisistratus, was branded with infamy, who fell in the battle of Marathon bearing arms against his country. But Sulla, but Marius, but Cinna, did well, perhaps even rightly; yet what could be more cruel, more destructive, than their victories? A war of this kind I wished to avoid; and the more so, because I saw that still greater cruelties were devised and prepared. Should I, whom some have called the preserver, the father of that city, bring against it the forces of the Getae, and Armenians, and Colchians? Should I bring famine upon my fellow-citizens, ruin upon Italy? I considered that this man in the first place was mortal; then, that he might be destroyed in many ways; but I thought the city, and people, ought, as far as in us lies, to be preserved to immortality. At the same time a certain hope presented itself to me, that something might be agreed upon, rather than that either the one should admit such a degree of wickedness, or the other such a degree of profiricity. Now the general concern is altered, and my particular concern is altered with it. To me, as it is expressed in one of your letters, it seems as if the sun had fallen out of the world. As they say of the sick, that while there is life, there is hope; so I, as long as Pompeius was in Italy, did not cease to hope. This, this was that deceived me; and, to speak the truth, my age already declining from continual labours towards a state of repose, soothed me with the charm of domestic life. Now, though the attempt be attended with danger, I certainly will attempt to fly, and to escape. I ought indeed to have done it sooner; but the circumstances I have mentioned delayed me, and above all your authority. For when I got to this place I opened the bundle of your letters, which I have under my seal, and keep with the greatest care. In one, that was dated January 23, I find it thus: "But let us see what Cæsar does, and in what direction his designs flow. If he should leave Italy, he will act altogether wrong, and in my judgment inadvisedly; and in his absence, compared himself to a bird longed to make its escape.

1 This is generally understood of Cæsar; I rather understand it of Pompeius: the sense being, that Cicero was not so to support Pompeius, who might die at any time, as to ruin his country, which ought to be preserved for ever. And this he gives as a reason for not immediately joining Pompeius. He besides still cherished hopes of peace; and that neither Pompeius would be so wicked as to destroy his country, nor Caesar so profligate as to enslave it. But now that I have thrown off the mask, and shown their real intentions, and extinguished all idea of accommodation, the whole state of affairs was changed, and Cicero’s duty changed likewise.
that case our plans must be changed." This you write four days after I left the city. Again, on the 25th of January: "Provided our Cæsus does not relinquish Italy as inadvisedly as he has relinquished the city." The same day you send a second letter, in which you distinctly reply to my questions. It is thus: "I come now to your consultation. If Cæsus leaves Italy, I think you should return to the city: for what end is there of travelling about?" This struck me forcibly—and I now see it to be even so, that a boundless war is united with a wretched flight; which you represent as a travelling. There follows an oracular opinion on the 27th of January: "If Pompeius remains in Italy, and no agreement is made, I think there will be a protracted war; but if he leaves Italy, I apprehend that a war is prepared, which will hereafter be interminable." In this war I am obliged to be a partaker, a companion, and an assistant; a war interminable, and with fellow-citizens! Then on the 7th of February, when you began already to hear more of Pompeius's design, you conclude one of your letters in this manner: "I do not indeed advise, if Pompeius leaves Italy, that you should also remove; for you will then be relinquished, and will not benefit the republic; which you may benefit hereafter, if you remain." Who that has any love for his country, or any public spirit, would not be moved by such advice, upon the authority of a prudent man and a friend? Further, on the 11th of February, you again reply to my inquiries thus: "What you ask me, whether I think preferable, a flight in which I preserve my fidelity, or a stay which may be relinquished? I certainly think at present that a sudden departure and precipitate journey would be useless to Cæsus himself, and hazardous to you: and I think it better that your friends should be dispersed, and in places of observation; and in truth I think it disgraceful for us to entertain any design of flight." This disgraceful thing our friend Cæsus meditated two years ago; so long has his mind dwelt upon Sulla, and upon proscriptions. Afterwards was, as I imagine, you had written to me something in a more generous strain, and I had supposed some expressions to mean that I should quit Italy,1 you distinctly reprobate this on the 14th of February: "I assure you I never meant in any letter to express that if Cæsus went out of Italy, you should go with him; or if I expressed it, I must have been, I do not say an inconsistent man, but a mad man." In another part of the same letter: "Nothing is left for him but flight; but by no means think, or have ever thought, that it was your duty to accompany him." But this whole consideration you unfold more particularly in a letter dated the 12th of February: "If M. Lepidus and L. Volcaetius remain, I think you ought to remain; yet so, that if Pompeius is in safety and makes a stand anywhere, you may leave this ghastly troop, and rather suffer yourself to be defeated in battle with Pompeius, than reign with Cæsar among that rabble, to which it is evident they will be reduced." You then use many arguments in support of this opinion; and in conclusion you say, "What if Lepidus and Volcaetius go away? I am completely at a loss: and whatever happens therefore, and whatever you do, I shall think that we ought to be satisfied with it." If you then doubted, now at least you do not doubt, as they remain. Then, at the very time of his flight, February 25: "In the mean time I do not doubt but you will remain in Formia; for you can there with most conveni- nence wait for what may happen." On the 8th of March, when he had already been four days at Brundesium: "We shall then be able to deliberate, while the cause is not indeed whole and entire, but certainly less infringed, than if you threw yourself away with him." Again, March 4, when your wife was coming on, in consequence of which you wrote very briefly, you add however: "To-morrow I will write more, and reply to all your observations: so much however I will say, that I do not repent of the advice I gave about your stay; and, though it must be attended with great anxiety, yet as I think it less objectionable than your going, I continue in the same opinion, and am glad that you have remained." But when I was uneasy, and afraid lest I might have acted unbecomingly; on the 3d of March you say, "Nevertheless, I am not sorry that you are not with Pompeius. Hereafter, if there is occasion, it will not be difficult; and whenever it is done, it will be very gratifying to him. But I must add, that if Cæsar goes on to act, as he has begun, with candour, moderation, and prudence, I shall think again, and consider more deliberately what is best to be done." On the 9th of March you write also that our friend Pædæcus approves of my remaining quiet; and his opinion has great weight with me. With these letters of yours I comfort myself by thinking that hitherto I have not done wrong. Do you consider your own opinion. With regard to myself it is unnecessary; but I want to have others know it. If only I have not erred, I will take care of the rest. Let me have your encouragement, and assist me altogether with your judgment. Here nothing is yet heard about Cæsar's return. So much at least I have gained by this letter, that I have read over all yours, and in so doing have found consolation.

LETTER XI.

You know our friend Lentulus is at Puteoli. Upon hearing this from a passenger, who said that he recognised him on the Appian road, where he was travelling in a litter partly opened; however improbable it might be, yet I sent a servant to Puteoli to ascertain the fact, and sent a letter to him. He found him just excluding himself in his villa, from whence he wrote back to me full of gratitude to Cæsar, and saying that he had delivered to Cæsar instructions for me about his future plans: him I expect to-day, that is, the 20th of March. Matius also came to me the 19th,—a man, as he has appeared to me, temperate and prudent; and has always been supposed to be in favour of peace. How much he seemed to disapprove these proceedings! How much to dread that ghastly troop, as you call them! In a long conversation which I had with him, I showed him Cæsar's letter to me, of which I before sent you a copy, and asked him to explain to me what it was he meant by saying that he wished to avail himself of my advice, my influence, my dignity, my assistance in everything.2

1 See book viii. letter 2.
2 See letter 9 of this book.
He replied, that he had no doubt he wanted my assistance and influence to promote an accommodation. Would that it were possible for me to effect, or help forward, any measure of public utility in this wretched state of the country! Marcus likewise was persuaded that he was so disposed, and promised that he would himself advise it. Yesterday Crassipes was with me, who said that he had come from Brundisium the 6th of March, and had left Pompeius there; which was the report also of those who had come from thence on the 8th. And all agreed (amongst whom was Crassipes also, who would listen with more prudence) that they used threatening language, unfriendly towards the principal citizens, hostile to the towns, mere proscriptions, mere Sullas; that Lucceius, that all Greece, that Theophanes also, talked in this manner. Yet in these people is all our hope of safety; and I watch in my mind, and take no rest, and in order to avoid the calamities at home, am wishing to be with persons most unlike myself. For what else do you suppose Scipio, and Faustus, and Libo, will not commit; whose creditors are said to be meeting? And, if they are successful, how will they harass the citizens! But what distant views do they relate of our Cæsus; that he thinks of going to Egypt, and Arabia, and Mesopotamia, and has laid aside all idea of Spain. Such stories are monstrous; but perhaps they are not true. Assuredly things are both rumins here, and there by no means well disposed. I am already wishing the news from you. Since my retreat from the city, there has never been on my part any interruption of our correspondence. I send you a copy of my letter to Caesar, by which I hope to produce some effect.

Cicero, Imperator, to Caesar, Imperator.

Upon reading your letter, which I received by my friend Furnius, relative to my being in the city, I was not so much surprised at your wishing to consult yourself of my advice, and dignity; but I asked myself what you meant by my influence and assistance. And I was led by my hopes to this conclusion; that agreeably to your admirable and singular prudence, I supposed you might wish some steps to be taken for the tranquility, the peace, the union of the citizens; and for that purpose I thought my character and person sufficiently suited. Which if it be so, and if you are touched with any regard for protecting my friend Pompeius, and reconciling him with yourself and the republic, you will indeed find nobody more ready than I am in such a cause; having always been to him, and to the senate, as soon as I could, the counsellor of peace. Nor have I by taking up arms had any part in the war; but have thought that you were injured in it, and that unkindly and envious persons were resisting the honour which had been granted you by the favour of the Roman people. But as at that time I not only supported your dignity, but also got others to assist you; so now am I greatly interested for the dignity of Pompeius. It is now some years since I selected you two, whom I might particularly cultivate, and with whom I might be, as I am, in the strictest friendship. I therefore request of you, or rather I beg and entreat you with all earnestness, that among your great cares you would allot some time also to this consideration, that by your favour I may be enabled to sustain the part of a good man, grateful and dutiful in the remembrance of the greatest benefits. If this concerned myself only, I should nevertheless hope to obtain it from you; but, as I conceive, it concerns both your own enlightened, and the republic, that out of a few I should be reserved by your means, as one particularly suited to renew the harmony of you two, and of the citizens. Though I have before thanked you on account of Lentulus, whom you have saved; as he did me; yet upon reading the letter, which he wrote to me full of gratitude for your liberality and kindness, I considered myself to have received from you the same benefit you have conferred upon him. If then you perceive that I am grateful towards him, give me the power of being so likewise towards Pompeius.

LETTER XI

I am not sorry for what you say about my letter being made public; and have even myself allowed several people to take copies of it. For after what has happened, and still threatens us, I should be well pleased to have my sentiments recorded concerning a peace. But in recommending this, especially to such a man, I thought there was no readier means of moving him, than by affirming that the measure, to which I exhorted him, was worthy of his prudence. And if I have spoken of his prudence in terms of admiration while I was calling upon him to save his country, I am not afraid of appearing to flatter a man, at whose feet I would willingly have thrown myself in such a state; as well as if I had said, that you would allot some time; this is not that he should consider about peace; but about me, and my duty. For when I affirm that I have not engaged in the war, although it is evident from the fact, yet I added it for the purpose of giving weight to my persuasion. And it is with the same view that I approve his cause. But why is this brought forward now? Would that any good had followed! Nay, I should be glad to have my letter read in the public assembly; since Pompeius himself made public his own letter to him, in which he says, for your most distinguished conduct. More distinguished than his own? than that of Africanus? Such was the current of the times. Even you too, so respected, go to meet him at the fifth mile-stone. What? to meet him on his return from whence? doing what? or purposing to do what? With what additional spirit will be trust in his cause, when he sees you, and others like you, greeting him not only with their numbers, but with cheerful looks? Are we then to blame? I do not mean at all to accuse you: but the marks which should distinguish real good-will from mere pretence are strangely confounded. But what decrees of the senate do I foresee? I am speaking however more openly than I had intended. I mean to be at Arpinum the last day of the month, and thence to visit my several villas, which I despair of seeing afterwards.

LETTER XII.

While I was reading your letter on the 20th of March, I received one from Lepta, informing me that Pompeius was surrounded, and that even the passage out of the harbour was occupied with rafts. I cannot bear to think or write the rest for weeping. I send you a copy of it. Wretched as we are! why did we not all follow his destiny? The same intelligence is brought from Mattius and Trebatius, who met with Caesar’s messengers at Minturnae. I am distracted with grief, and already envy the fate of Mucius *. But how honourable, how clear are your counsels! how well considered, respecting my journey by land, my passage by sea, my meeting and conversation with Caesar! All is at once honourable and cautious. And how kind, how generous, how brotherly, is your invitation to Epirus! I am surprised about Dionysius, who was treated by me with more honour than Pansa-tius was by Scipio, and yet has most foully insulted this present state of my fortune. I hate the man, and will hate him, and wish I could punish him; but his own honour will punish him sufficiently. Now especially I beg you to consider what I ought to do. An army of the Roman people invests Cn. Pompeius! keeps him inclosed with a trench and rampart! prevents his escape! Do I live? And in my very bonds? Do the priests continue to pronounce judgment? Do the ediles prepare the public games? Do substantial men continue to register their interest? And do I myself sit idle? Should I madly endeavour to go thither, to implore the faith of the towns? The honest will not follow me; the inconsiderate will laugh at me; and those who are eager for a change, especially being armed and victorious, will use violence, and lay hands upon me. What then? Have you any counsel for the remains of this wretched life? I am grieved, and vexed; while some think me prudent, or fortunate, in not having gone with me. But I think otherwise. For though I never

* This appears to be asked as by Atticus and Peducreus.
* Q. Mucius Scaevola was killed in a former civil war by order of Marius. This is before alluded to. See hook viii. letter 3.

That is, do things go on as usual? or are not all orders of men eager to vindicate the country from such menorous proceedings? Not unlike to this is that of Catillus, "Quid est Catilina, quid moriar amnis?"
take a part in those calamities. I have been the slower in removing, because it is difficult to make up one's mind to a voluntary departure without any hope of returning. For I perceive that Caesar is well provided with infantry, and cavalry with fleets, with auxiliaries from Gaul: which latter Matius, a little ostentatiously I suspect, but certainly, estimated at 10,000 foot and 6000 horse, to be furnished at their own expense for ten years: but, supposing this to be an exaggeration, he has certainly great forces; and he will have for their support, not subsidies, like Pompeius, but the property of the citizens. Add to this the confidence of the man; add the weakness of all those attached to the republic; who, because they think Pompeius may with reason be angry with them, therefore hate the game, as you call it; would it were such! You say too that one had observed, "That fellow sits idle," because he had professed more than he performed; and generally those who once loved him, love him no longer; but the towns and country people are afraid of him, and bicker are fond of Caesar: from all this, I say, he is so well provided, that even if he should not be able to conquer, yet how he can himself he conquered I do not see. But I fear no fascination from this man so much as the persuasion of necessity. "For you must know," says Plato, "that the requests of tyrants are blended with necessity." I see you do not approve of those places which have no harbour; and indeed they did not please me; but I could be there without observation, and with a trusty attendance; which if I could have at Brundisium, I should like it better. But there it is impossible to be concealed. But, as you say, when we shall have learned. I am not anxious to exculpate myself to your good men. For what dinners does Sextus inform me they are giving and receiving? How luxurious! How joyous! But he these people as good as they may, they are not better than ourselves: they might move me if they had more courage. I was mistaken about Phanes' Lannium; I was dreaming of his Trojana. It was for that I offered 500 sestertia (4000l). But the other is worth more. I should wish however that you might buy it, if I saw any hope of enjoying it. What strange things are daily heard and daily known, with note is closed in my letter. Our friend Lentulus is at Puteoli pining with grief, as Cæcilius relateth. What should he do? He dreads a repetition of the disgrace of Corinhiæ: he now thinks he has done enough for Pompeius, and is moved by Caesar's kindness; but yet is moved by the actual state of affairs. Can you hear this? Everything is wretched, but nothing more wretched than this; that Pompeius has sent M. Magnus to propose conditions of peace, and is yet besiegéd, which I did not at first believe; but I have received a letter from Balbus, of which I send you a copy. Read it, I beseech you, and that paragraph of Balbus himself, the excellent Balbus to whom our friend Cæcilius gave a piece of ground to erect a villa; whom he often distinguished by a preference to any of us. So, he is sadly distressed! But that you may not have to read the same thing twice, I refer you to the letter itself. As to any hope of peace, I have none. Doloabella, in his letter of March 15, speaks of nothing but war. I must remain then in that same wretched and desperate determination, since nothing can be more wretched than this.

Balbus to Cicero, Imperator.

I HAVE received a short letter from Caesar, of which I subjoin a copy. By the shortness of it you may judge how greatly he is occupied, who writes so briefly upon so important a subject. If there should be any further news, I will immediately write to you.

"Cæsar to Oppius, and to Cornelius."

"I ARRIVED at Brundisium the 9th of March. I pitched my camp close to the wall. Pompeius is in Brundisium. He has sent M. Magnus to me to treat of peace. I made such reply as seemed proper. This I wished you immediately to know. When I entertain hope of accomplishing anything towards an agreement, I will immediately inform you.

How do you imagine, my Cicero, that I am now distressed, after being again brought to have some hope of peace, lest anything should prevent their agreement? For, in my absence all I can do is to wish. If I were there, I might perhaps seem to be of some use. Now I am in a cruel state of expectation.

LETTER XIV.

I SENT you on the 24th a copy of Balbus's letter to me, and of Caesar's to him; and the very same day I received one from Q. Pedius at Capua, informing me that Caesar had written to him the 14th of March in the following terms. "Pompeius keeps within the town. We are encamped before the gates. We are attempting a great work, which must occupy many days on account of the depth of the sea; but there is nothing better to be done: we are constructing piers from each extremity of the port, so as either to oblige him to transport immediately the forces he has at Brundisium, or to prevent him from getting out." Where is the peace, about which Balbus professed himself to be so distressed? Can anything be more bitter? anything more cruel? And some confidently relate that he talks of avenging the sufferings of Carbo, and M. Brutus, and of all those who had felt the cruelty of Sulla while Pompeius was his b I give this translation of an obscure, and perhaps faulty, passage, not without great hesitation. I propose to point the Latin thus: "Oderunt, ut tu scribili, ludum; ac vellem! Sermis quinam hic significet, Sedit isle; quia plus ostendor, quam fecit."

C The well-proc is a Greek word, which is probably copied from an expression of Atticus, to which this is meant as a reply.

d This refers to what is said in the beginning of this letter.

associate: that Curio under his command did nothing while Pompeius had not done under the command of Sulla: that to serve his own views he had recalled those only, who by the former laws were not liable to banishment; but that Pompeius had recalled from exile the very traitors to their country: that he complained of Milo's being driven out by violence: that, however, he should punish nobody but those who were found in arms. This was contradicted by one Bæbius who came from Curio on the 13th, a man not without some eloquence; but who may not say so to anybody? I am quite at a loss what to do. I imagine Cassius is now gone from thence. What is really the case, we must know in two days' time. I have heard nothing from you, nor is Anteros arrived, who might bring a letter from you. But it is no wonder; for what can we write? Nevertheless I omit no day.

After I had finished my letter, I received one, before it was light, from Leptis Capua, informing me that Pompeius had embarked from Brundisium the 15th of March; and that Caesar was to be at Capua the 26th.

LETTER XV.

After I had sent my letter to inform you that Caesar was to be at Capua on the 26th, I received one from Capua, saying that he would be with Curio in Aalaeum the 28th. As soon as I have seen him I shall go to Arpinum. If he grants me the permission I ask, I shall accede to his terms; if not, I shall make terms for myself. He has, as he wrote to me, placed single legions at Brundisium, Tarantum, and Sipontum. He seems to be closing up the passages by sea; and yet himself to look rather to Greece than to Spain. But these are more distant considerations. At present I am worried with the idea of meeting him; for he is just here, and I dread his first steps. For I imagine he will want a decree of the senate, he will want a warrant of the augurs (and I shall be hurried away), or shall be exposed to great vexation if I absent myself, either for the prætor to propose the consuls, or to nominate a dictator: neither of which is consistent with law. But if Sulla could procure his own appointment to the dictatorship by an interrex, why may not Caesar? I cannot resolve the difficulty, unless by suffering under the one the punishment of Q. Mucius, or under the other that of L. Scipio. By the time you read this, our interview will perhaps have taken place—"Beware, my heart, you have borne a severer trial." No, not that which was peculiarly my own. For when there was hope of an early return; there was a general complaint: now I am anxious to get away, and any idea of returning never enters my mind. Besides, there is not only no complaint among the provincial towns, and country people; but on the contrary they fear Pompeius, as cruel and exasperated. Yet nothing is to me a greater source of sorrow than that I should have remained; nor anything which I more desire, than to fly away; not so much to be the companion of his warfare, as of his flight. You deferred giving any opinion till such time as we should know what had been done at Brundisium. Now then we know, nevertheless my doubts continue. For I can scarcely hope that he will grant me the permission I want, though I produce many just reasons for it. But I will immediately send you an exact account of all that passes between us. Do you strive with all affection to assist me with your care and prudence. He comes so soon, that I shall not be able even to see Trebiatus, with whom I had appointed. Everything must be done without postponement. But as Mentor says to Telemaohus,—"You would provide one thing, but the Deity provides another." Whatever I do, you shall immediately know. As for any despatches from Caesar to the consuls and to Pompeius, about which you ask, I have none. What Egypt brought, I sent to you before on my way lither; from which I think the despatches may be understood. Philippos is at Naples, Lentulus at Putzell; respecting Domitius continue to inquire, as you do, where he is, and what are his intentions. When you say that I have expressed myself about Dionysius with more asperity than is consistent with my disposition, you must know that I am one of the old school, and imagined you would feel this insult with more indignation than myself. For besides that I thought you ought to be moved at the ill-treatment I might have received from anybody, this man has in some measure injured you also by his misconduct towards me. But how much you value this I leave to your own judgment; nor in this do I wish to impose any burden upon you. For my own part, I always thought him a little crazy; but now I also think him disingenuous, and wicked; yet not more an enemy to me than to himself. You have been properly careful towards Philippius; yet had certainly had a just and good cause; that I was myself deserted, rather than that I deserted him. After I had delivered my letter, on the 25th, the servant, whom I had sent to Trebiatus also, as well as to Matius, brought back a letter, of which the following is a copy.

Matius and Trebiatus to Cicero, Imperator.

After we had left Capua, we heard on our road that Pompeius had gone from Brundisium the 17th of March with all his troops; that Caesar had

2 At the time of Milo's trial the forum had been occupied by armed men under the direction of Pompeius.

3 This seems to be the most obvious interpretation of the text, which has been variously understood.

4 One of Atticus' freed-men.

5 The meaning is, that if Caesar did not accede to the proposal of Cicero's absenting himself when any business was aimed against Pompeius, he should, without leave, return from Italy.

6 Shall be obliged to go to Rome, as a senator and augur to assist at these measures.

7 In the time of the former civil wars, Q. Mucius had been given to death by Marius. L. Scipio proscribed by Sulla.

8 The original is taken from Homer. Cicero applies it to his former sufferings in his banishment.

9 So I read it, agreeably to letter 9 of that book, wherein Cicero expressed his wish to see Trebiatus before Caesar's arrival.

10 This probably means Dionysius, on whose subject Atticus might have spoken to Philippius in explanation of Cicero's conduct towards him. It is uncertain if this Dionysius be the same that is represented to have run off entered into the town the day following, and, having harangued the people, had proceeded from thence towards Rome, and hoped to be in the city before the first of April, and then, after staying there a few days, to set out for Spain. We have thought it advisable, having for certain this account of Caesar's motions, to send your servant back, that you might know it as soon as possible. We will attend to your instructions, and execute them as occasion requires. Trebatius Scaevola hopes to be with you in time.

Since writing our letter we have been told that Caesar means to pass the 25th of March at Beneventum, the 26th at Capua, the 27th at Sinussa. We believe this may be depended upon.

LETTER XVI.

Though I have nothing particular to tell you, yet, not to omit any day, I send this letter. They say that Caesar will stop on the 27th at Sinussa. I received a letter from him the 26th, in which he now expects every kind of assistance from me, not simply my assistance, as in his former letter. Upon my writing to commend his clemency in the affair of Corfinium, he replied in the following terms:

*Cæsar, Imperator, to Cicero, Imperator.

You rightly conceive of me (for I am well known to you) that nothing can be further from my disposition than cruelty. And while I have great pleasure in the transaction itself, I rejoice with triumph that what I have done meets with your approbation. Nor does it disturb me that those whom I have set at liberty are said to have gone away in order again to make war upon me; for I wish nothing more than that I should be like myself, and they like themselves. I should be glad to have you in the city, that on all occasions I may avail myself of your advice and every kind of assistance, as I have been used to do. Let me assure you that nothing can be more agreeable to me than your Dolabella. To him accordingly I shall owe this favour; for he cannot do otherwise, such is his kindness, his feeling, and his affection towards me.

LETTER XVII.

I write this on the 28th, on which day I expect Trebatius. From his report, and from Matius's letter, I shall consider how I am to regulate my conversation with him. O sad time! And I have no doubt but he will press me to go to the city; for he has ordered it to be publicly announced even at Formiae, that he wishes to have a full attendance of the senate on the first of April. Must I then refuse him? But why anticipate? I will immediately write you an account of everything. From what passes between us I shall determine whether I should go to Arpinum or elsewhere. I wish to invest my young Cicero with the mantle robe, and with some valuable books from Cicero's library.—Ep. Fam. xiii. 77.

* Before Caesar's arrival.
+ Of persuading Cicero to go to Rome.
' Cæsar.
" This was usually done at the age of seventeen.

I think of doing it there. Consider, I beg you, what course I should take afterwards; for anxiety has made me stupid. I should be glad to know if you have received from Curius any account of Tiro. For Tiro himself has written to me in such a manner as makes me fearful how he may be; and those who come from thence only say so much, that he is going on well. In the midst of great cares this also troubles me; for in this state of things his assistance and fidelity would be extremely useful.

LETTER XVIII.

I have done both according to your advice; having ordered my discourse so that he should rather think well of me than thank me; and having adhered to my intention of not going to the city. I was mistaken in supposing that he would easily be persuaded: I never knew anybody less so. He said that he stood condemned by my resolution; and that others would be slower to comply, if I refused to attend. I replied, that their case was different from mine. After a good deal of discussion, "Come, then," said he, "and propose terms of peace." "At my own discretion," said I. "Have I," said he, "any right to prescribe to you?" "This," I replied, "is what I shall propose: that it is not agreeable to the senate that troops should be sent to Spain, or that an army should be transported into Greece; and I shall lament at some length the situation of Pompeius." Then he—"But I do not like that to be said." "So I supposed," said I; "and for that reason I wish to absent myself; because I must either say this, and much more which it will be impossible for me to withhold if I am there; or else I must stay away." The conclusion was, that, as if he wished to get rid of the subject, he desired I would consider of it. This I could not refuse. So we parted. I imagine he was not much pleased with me; but I am pleased with myself, which I have not been for some time past. As for the rest, O gods, what an attendance! Or, as you used to say, what a ghastly troop! Among whom was the Eros of Celer. O ruinous state! O desperate forces! What think you of Servius? and Titinius? How many have been in that very camp, by which Pompeius was besieged! Six legions! He is himself extremely vigilant and daring. I see no end of evil. Now at least you must deliver your opinion. What I have mentioned was the last thing that passed between us; yet his winding up, which I had almost omitted, was ungracious; that if he was not permitted to use my advice, he should use whose he could; and should think nothing beneath him. You see the man then, as you expressed it. "Were you grieved?" Undoubtedly. "Pray what followed?"

"Cicero had left him sick at Patres. See book vi. letter 2.
1 The text is perhaps faulty. It may, however, be understood according to the above interpretation by pointing it thus:—at modo nuntiant; Sane. In magnis, &c.
2 Rather esteem me for my attachment to Pompeius, than thank me for compliance with his own wishes.
3 Others were not under the same obligations to Pompeius.
4 Supposed to be some freed-man.
He went directly to Pedumnum, I to Arpinum. Thence I look for your warbler. "Plague on it," you will say, "do not act over again what is past: even he whom we follow has been much disappointed." But I expect your letter: for nothing is now as it was before, when you proposed that we should see first how this would come out. The last subject of doubt related to our interview; in which I questioned not that I have given Cæsar some offence. This is a reason for determining the quicker. Pray let me have a letter from you, and a political one. I am very anxious to hear from you.

LETTER XIX.

I have given my young Cicero the plain toga at Arpinum, in preference to any other place, as there was no going to Rome: and this was kindly received by my fellow-countrymen: though I saw the people there, and wherever I passed, afflicted and downcast; so sad and so dreadful is the contemplation of this great calamity. Levas are making, and troops taking up their winter-quarters. And if these measures, even when adopted by good citizens, in prosecution of a just war, and conducted with moderation, are yet in themselves grievous; how harsh do you suppose they now are, when they are adopted by desperate men, in a profligate civil war, and with all insolence! For you may be assured there is not an abandoned man in Italy who is not among them. I saw myself the whole body at Fornae; and in truth never thought they deserved the name of men. I knew them all; but had never seen them together. Let me away, then, whither I may, and relinquish all I possess. Let me go to him, who will be more glad to see me than if I had originally been of his company. For then we had the greatest hope; now, I at least have none: yet, besides myself, nobody has left Italy, who did not believe Cæsar to be his enemy. And

This is probably taken from some expression used by Atticus, and meant to denote the harbinger of spring, as which season Cicero would sail.

"Whom we follow," I imagine to be said by Cicero in his own person, thereby meaning Pompeius, though the sentence in which this stands is put into the mouth of Atticus.

The toga worn in mature age was without the purple border, which distinguished the praetors of youth, and was therefore called the plain toga, or manly toga.

Arpinum was the place of Cicero's birth, where he continued to have a family seat.

I do this not for the sake of the republic, which I look upon as utterly extinct; but that nobody may think me ungrateful towards him, who raised me out of the difficulties which he had brought upon me; and, at the same time, that I may not witness what is doing, or at least what will be done. Indeed, I imagine that some decrees of the senate have already been passed; I wish it may he in favour of Velleatius's opinion. Yet what does it signify? for all are of one mind. But Servius will be the most to blame, who sent his son to destroy Cn. Pompeius, or at least to take him prisoner, with Pontius Titinius. This latter was actuated by fear; but the former—but let us cease to rail, and at length come to some conclusion; though I have nothing new but this, which I wish were the shortest possible, that there is life remaining. The Adriatic Sea being closely guarded, I shall sail by the Tyrrenian; and if the passage from Puteoli be difficult, I shall make my way to Croton, or Thurii; and, good citizens as we are, and attached to our country, shall go to infest the sea. I see no other manner of conducting this war. We go to bury ourselves in Egypt. We cannot be a match for Cæsar with our army; and there is no reliance on peace. But all this has been abundantly deplored. I should be glad if you would deliver to Cephalius a letter about everything that is done, even about the conversation of people, unless they are quite dumbfounded. I have followed your advice, especially by maintaining in our interview the dignity I ought, and persisting in not going up to the city. It only remains to beg you will inform me as distinctly as possible (for there is no time to lose) what you approve, and what you think: though there is no longer any doubt. Yet if anything, or rather whatever occurs to your mind, pray let me know it.

9 To propose terms of peace.
10 The object of Cæsar's army at Brundisium could be nothing but either to destroy Pompeius, or to make him prisoner.
11 This must be the same as Titinius' son, mentioned before. See letter 18 of this book.
12 The fear of being ruined by Cæsar, if he had not joined him.
13 The text is obscure, and very probably corrupt, so that I offer this translation without any confidence.
14 That is, shall go to join Pompeius, even though his present purpose be to intercept the supplies of his country; for at that time Italy was furnished with corn by importation chiefly from Sicily and Egypt.
15 See letter 12 of this book.

LETTER I.

On the 3d of April, having come to my brother's house at Laterium, I received your letter, and was a little revived; which had not been the case since this ruination. For I most highly value your approbation of my firmness, and conduct. And when you tell me that Sextus also approves it, I am as much pleased as if I thought I had the commendation of his father, for whose judgment I always entertained the greatest respect: who formerly said to me, what I often recollect, on that 5th of December, when I asked him, "Sextus, what then do you advise?" "Let me not die," said he in the words of Homer, "indolently and ignobly; but after some great deed, which may be heard by generations to come." His authority therefore lives with me; and his son, who is like him, has the same weight with me which the father had. I beg you to make my kindest compliments to him. Though you defer giving your opinion to no distant period; for I imagine that hired peace-maker has already summed up; already something has been done in that assembly of senators; for I do not esteem it a senate; yet by that you keep me in suspense; the less so however, because I cannot doubt of your opinion about what I ought to do. Why else should you mention Flavius's having a legion and the province of Sicily, and that this is already carried into effect? What crimes, think you, are partly in preparation, and now contriving; partly on the point of being executed? And should I disregard that law of Solon, your fellow-citizen, as I esteem it, and mine too, who made it a capital crime to join neither party in a civil commotion? Unless you are of a different opinion, both I and the children shall away from hence. But one of these is more certain than the other; I shall not however be in a hurry; I shall wait for your advice, and for the letter which I desired you would send by Cephalius, unless you have already sent another. When you say, not that you had heard it from any other quarter, but that you thought it within yourself, I should be induced to go up, if the question of peace were agitated; it has never entered into my mind that any question of peace can be agitated, while it is most certainly his wish, if possible, to deprive Pompeius of his army and province: unless perhaps that summary speaker can persuade him to be quiet, whilst the negotiators go backwards and forwards. I see nothing now that I can hope, or think possible to be done; yet this deserves the attention of an upright man, and is a great political question; whether one should enter into the counsels of a tyrant, when he is going to deliberate on some good cause. Therefore if it should happen that I am summoned (which I do not regard; for I told him what I should say upon the subject of peace, which he strongly reprobated), but yet if it should happen, let me know what you think I ought to do. Nothing has yet occurred which is more deserving of consideration. I am glad you were pleased with Trebatius's report; he is a good man, and a good citizen; and your own repeated expression of "excellent well," is the only thing that has hitherto given me satisfaction. I eagerly expect a letter from you, which I imagine has already been sent. You and Sextus have maintained the same dignity which you recommend to me. Your friend Celer is more eloquent than wise. What you heard from Tullia about the young men is true. What you mention about M. Antonius, appears to me not so bad in fact as in sound. This irresolution, in which I now am, as bad as death: for I ought either to have acted with freedom among the ill-disposed; or, even at some hazard, to have joined the good party. Let us either follow the rash measures of the good; or let us lash the boldness of the wicked. Both are attended with danger: but the course I take is not dishonourable, and yet is not safe. I do not think that he who sent his son to Brundisium on the subject of peace (about which I entertain the same sentiments as you, that it is a palpable pretence, and that war is preparing with all vigour) is likely to be appointed. Of this, as I hoped, no mention has hitherto been made. I have therefore the less occasion to write, or even to think what I should do, in case I were appointed.

7 This place was close to Arpinum. It is mentioned book iv. letter 7.

LETTER II.

I received your letter the 5th of April, which was brought by Cephalion; and had designed to remain the following day at Minturnae, and thence immediately to embark; but I stopped at my brother’s house in Acrenum, that, till the arrival of some surer information, I might be less observed, and yet everything might be done which could be done without me. The warlier is now here, and I am eager to be off; no matter whither, or by what passage. But this will be for my consideration with those who understand it. Continue, as far as you can, to assist me with your counsels, as you have hitherto done. The state of affairs is incapable of being disentangled: everything must be left to fortune. I struggle without any hope. If anything better should occur, it will be a surprise. I hope Dionysius has not set out to come hither, as my daughter Tullia wrote me word. Not only the time is unsuitable; but I do not care to have my troubles, great as they are, made an exhibition to one who is not friendly. I do not however wish you to quarrel with him on my account.

LETTER III.

Though I have really nothing to tell you, yet this is what I wanted besides to know: whether Caesar was set out; in what state he left the city, and whom he had appointed over different districts and offices; whether any commissioners had been sent by decree of the senate to treat with Pompeius and the consuls on the subject of peace. Wishing therefore to know this, I have for that purpose sent this letter, and I shall be obliged to you to inform me about this, and anything which it may concern me to know. I shall wait in Acrenum till I hear. This is the second letter I have dictated to you this same 7th of April, having written a longer the day before with my own hand. They say that you were seen in the court; not that I mean to accuse you; for I am myself open to the same accusation. I am expecting to hear from you, yet do not know very well what I should expect. However, if there is nothing, I shall be glad to hear even that. Caesar by letter excuses me for not going up, and says that he takes it in good part. I do not regard what he adds, that Tullus and Servius have complained of his not granting the same liberty to them as to me. The silly men! who would send their sons to besiege Cn. Pompeius, yet hesitate themselves to go into the senate. But I send you a copy of Caesar’s letter.

LETTER IV.

I have received several letters from you the same day, all full of information; one particularly, which is equivalent to a volume, deserves to be repeatedly read, as I do. I assure you that your pains have not been thrown away, and that I am extremely obliged to you. And as long as you can, that is, as long as you know where to find me, I earnestly beg that you will continue to write very frequently. But let us at length make an end, if possible, or some moderation, which is certainly possible, of the wailing which I daily utter. For I now no longer think of the dignity, the honours, the state of life, which I have lost; but what I have enjoyed, what I have done, in what reputation I have lived; and, even in these calamities, what difference exists between me, and those on whose account I have lost everything. These are they who, unless they had driven me from the country, thought they could not obtain the indulgence of their wishes; of whose association and wicked combination you see the issue. The one burns with fury and wickedness, and, instead of relaxing, is daily growing more violent; first he drove him from Italy; now he endeavours to persecute him in another province; nor does he any longer refuse, but in some measure demands, that, as he is, so also he may be called, a tyrant. The other; he, who formerly would not so much as raise me up when I was prostrate at his feet; who said he could do nothing contrary to Caesar’s will; having escaped from the hands and sword of his father-in-law, is preparing war by sea and land, not indeed without provocation; but however just, or even necessary, yet ruinous to his fellow-citizens, unless he conquers; calamitous even if he does conquer. Great as these generals are, I do not set their actions, nor their fortune, before my own, however flourishing they may seem, however afflicted I. For who can ever be happy, that has either abandoned his country, or enslaved it? And if, as you remind me, I have rightly said in my book, that nothing is good but what is honourable, nothing evil but what is base; then assuredly each of those men is most wretched; both of whom have always preferred their own power and their private advantage before their country’s prosperity and honour. I am therefore supported by an excellent conscience, when I reflect that I have either rendered the greatest services to my country when it was in my power; or certainly have never thought of it but with reverence; and that the republic has been overthrown by that very storm which I foresaw fourteen years ago. I shall go then with this conscience accompanying me, in great affliction it is true; yet that, not so much on my own or on my brother’s account, (for our age, whether well or otherwise, is already spent) as on account of the boys, to whom I sometimes think it was due to have transmitted also our free constitution. One of these, being better disposed, does not so prodigiously torment me: but the other... after me. To my whole life... ever happened more vexatious. Spoiled by my indulgence, he has gone such lengths as I dare not mention; but I am expecting to hear from you; for you said you would write fully when you had seen him. All my kindness towards him has been tempered with such severity; nor is it a single or small fault that I have suppressed, but many and great ones. And his father's lew... Sicily.

And this was that Corio, and Hortensius' son; not any fault of their parents. My brother is dejected with sorrow, and afraid not so much for his own life as for mine. To this, to this evil, bring consolation, if you can find any. I should wish particularly that his wife may either receive the report that have been brought to me as false, or suppose them to be less than they are. If they are true, I know not what may be likely to ensue in this condition and flight. If we had yet a free government, I should not be at a loss respecting either the severity or the indulgence to be used. Either anger, or grief, or fear, has prompted me to write this with more asperity than accords with either your or my affection towards him. If what I have heard be true, you will pardon me; if false, I shall be very glad to have you pluck from me this error. But however this be, you will impute nothing to the uncle, or to the father. When I had written so far, I received a message from Curio, that he would call upon me; for he had arrived in Camnunum the evening before, that is, the 13th. Therefore, if I collect from the conversation anything to tell you, I will add it to my letter.

Curio passed by my house, and sent me word that he would come presently. He went to address the people at Puteoli; and having done so, he returned, and was with me a considerable time. O foul affair! You know the man; he concealed nothing. In the first place, nothing is more certain than that all who had been condemned by the Roman law was now restored; accordingly he is to make use of their services in Sicily. He made no doubt of Caesar's getting possession of his property; that he would then pursue Pompeius with his army, wherever he might be; and that his death would be the termination of the war. Nothing could be nearer accomplished: that Caesar had wished in the transport of his anger to have had the tribune Metellus put to death; and if this had been executed, a slaughter must have ensued; that many had advised a slaughter; and that he abstained from cruelty, not by inclination, or natural disposition, but because he thought that clemency was popular; but that if he lost the affections of the people, he would become cruel; and he was much disturbed when he understood that he had given offence to the populace in the affair of the treasury. In consequence of which, though he had determined to harangue the people before he left the city, he did not venture to do so, and set out with his mind greatly agitated. Upon my asking him what he foresaw; what conduct; what republic; he plainly acknowledged that there was no hope remaining. He was afraid of Pompeius's fleet; and said that if it should be collected, he should quit Sicily. What, said I, are those six fates of yours? If they are granted by the senate, why are they covered with laurel? If Caesar had not been there, I wished," says he, "to get them by a surreptitious decree of the senate, for it could not be done otherwise; but now he is become much more hostile to the senate, and says, from me everything shall proceed. They are six, because I did not choose to have twelve, as I might." Then said, how much I wished that I had asked Caesar for what I understand Philipus has obtained; but I was ashamed, because he had not obtained anything from me. He would willingly have granted it to you," says he; "but suppose yourself to have obtained it; for I will inform him, as you yourself shall please, of our having talked together about it: but what does it signify to him where you are, since you refuse to come into the senate? Yet now you would have given him no offence on that account, if you had not been in Italy." To which I replied, that I sought for retirement and solitude, especially as account of my licitor. He applauded my conduct. Well, then, said I, my way to Greece lies through your province, since the coast of the Adriatic is occupied by soldiers. "What," said he, "could be more desirable for me?" And he added a great deal with much liberality. So that this is now settled, that I can sail not only safely, but openly. The rest he postponed to the next day, in which if there should be anything worth relating, I will let you know it. There are some things, however, which I omitted to ask; as, whether Caesar would wait for an interregnum? or—how can I pronouncea it? He said that the consulate had been offered to himself, but that he had declined it for the next year. There are other circumstances, also, about which I shall inquire. In conclusion, he swears, that he would easily accomplish, that Caesar ought to be most friendly towards me. "For what, I say," has Dolabella written to me?" I asked what? He asserted, that when he had written to desire that I would go to Rome, Caesar expressed the greatest thankfulness, and not only approved, but was even glad that I had acted as I did. What think you? I have resumed my composure. For that suspicion of domestic calumny, and of the conversation with Hirtius, has been greatly relieved. How I wish him to prove worthy of us! And how I invite myself to find some excuse for him! But it is necessary to have some communication with Hirtius. There must be something; but I should be glad if it might turn out to be inconsiderable. And yet I wonder he should not have come back. But we shall see how it is. You will let the Oppii give credit to Terentia. This is now the only thing to be apprehended in the city. Assist me, however, with your advice, whether I should go by land to Rhegium, or should embark from hence. But since I do not go immediately, I shall have something to write to you, as soon as I have seen Curio. Pray take care, as usual, to let me know how Tiro goes on.

LETTER V.

Of my general intention I conceive I have already written to you explicitly enough; respecting the day, nothing can be said with certainty, but that it will not be before the new moon. Curio's discourse the next day came to the same amount, unless that he still more openly gave me to understand that he saw no end to this state of things. The charge you impose upon me of regulating the young Quintus, is an Arcadian undertaking. However, I will leave nothing untried; and I wish you could do too; but I shall not spare him. I wrote immediately to Vestorius about Tullia; and indeed she pressed me earnestly. Vestorius has spoken to you more reasonably than he was disposed to be; but I cannot sufficiently express my surprise at the carelessnes of the inscription. For upon hearing from Philotimus that I might purchase that cottage from Camillus for 50 sestertia (404L.), and might have it for less, if I applied to Vestorius; I did apply to him to get some abatement, if he could, from that sum. He engaged to do so; and sent me word a little while ago, that he had bought it for 30 sestertia (240L.), and desired I would let him know to whom I would have it assigned; that the money was to be paid the 15th of November. I wrote to him rather angrily, yet with a familiar joke. But now, as he acts with liberality, I do not mean to find fault with him, and have written to tell him that I had been too right by you. I shall be glad to hear what you intend about your journey, and when. April 17.

LETTER VI.

Nothing now stops me but the season. I shall use no cunning in my proceedings, happen what may in Spain. Nevertheless keep my counsel. I have explained to you all my intentions in a former letter, for which reason this will be short: besides, I am in a hurry, and busy. Respecting young Quintus, "I take all pains"—you know the rest. The advice you give me is both friendly and prudent; but everything will be easy, if I can only guard against him. It is an arduous task. There are many excellent points about him; but nothing plain, nothing candid. I wish you had undertaken to manage the young man; for his father, by his over-indulgence,undo whatever I do. If I could act without the father's interference, I could manage him. This you can do. But I forgive him. It is, I say, an arduous task. I have been confidently told that Pompeius is going through Illyrium to Gaul. I must now consider how and which way I shall proceed.

LETTER VII.

I quite approve your going to Apulia and Sipontum, and that appearance of unsuiteness, and do not consider you to be under the same circumstances as myself. Not that we have both the same duty to perform in the republic; but that is not the question. The struggle is, who shall be king; in which the more moderate king has been driven out, he who is the better and honest of the two, who must conquer, or the very name of the Roman people will be extinguished: yet if he conquers, he will conquer after the manner and example of Sulla. In this struggle, therefore, it is Cicero by the title of "Proconsul," [see letter 11 of this book,] in consequence of which Cicero in return called him montaltis, or "money-stamper." Cicero seems to have been displeased with the abrupt manner in which Vestorius had concluded the purchase, and fixed the day of payment, without consulting him. Shall not wait to see how things turn out in Spain. This alludes to a passage in Terence, where an old man exposes the pains he has taken to educate his son.

Young Quintus.

[See letters 10 and 12 of this book.

Cicero was living with his brother Quintus, whereas Atticus was beyond the reach of his influence. I suppose on his way to Spain; but it was not true.

Atticus, not willing to offend Caesar by abruptly quitting Italy, seems to have intended to pass some time irregularly in the south-eastern parts previously to his departure.
not for you openly to espouse either party, but to bend to the times. But my case is a different one, being under such obligations that I cannot bear to appear ungrateful. I do not, however, think of going into the field; but of retiring into Malta, or some other place of equal insignificance. You will say, "By this you do not help him, towards whom you wish to show your gratitude: nay, perhaps he would rather have wished you did not go." But about this we shall see afterwards. Let me but get out; which Dolabella and Curio enable me to do at a better season, the one by the Adriatic sea, the other by the straits of Sicily. I have had some hopes that Servius Sulpicius might wish to converse with me; and I sent my freed-man Philotimus to him with a letter. If he will act a manly part, it may prove a valuable meeting; if otherwise, I shall still maintain the same character as I used to do. Curio has been staying with me, thinking that Caesar is defected by the popular displeasure, and himself diffident about Sicily, if Pompeius should have set sail. I have given the young Quintus a rough reception. I find it was avarice, and the hope of a handsome present. This is bad enough, but I trust there is nothing of that baseness which I had apprehended. This fault I imagine you will attribute not to my indulgence, but to his natural disposition, while I endeavour by discipline to regulate him. You will arrange with Philotimus what you think best about the Oppii of Velia. I shall consider Epirus as my own; but I think of taking a different course.

LETTER VIII.

The state of things admonishes, and you have pointed out, and I see myself, that it is time to put an end to our writing upon such subjects as it might be hazardous to have interceded. But as my daughter Tullia frequently writes to me, begging me to write of what is doing in Spain, and constantly adds that you are of Surium opinion, which indeed I perceive by your letters; I have thought it not unsuitable to let you know my sentiments upon that subject. I think the advice would be prudent, if I meant to shape my conduct by the fate of Spain, which you say I ought to do. For it must necessarily happen, either that Caesar is driven out of Spain, which I should exceedingly desire; or that the war is protracted; or that he, as he seems confidently to expect, seizes upon Spain. If he is driven out, with what grace or honour shall I then go to Pompeius, when I imagine Curio himself will go over to him? If the war is protracted, for what am I to wait, or how long? It remains, that if we are beaten in Spain, I should be quiet. But upon this point I think otherwise. For I would not assert him, a conqueror, than conquered and doubtful (instead of confident) of his affairs. Inasmuch as I foresee executions if he is victorious, and violation of private property, and the recall of exiles, and cancelling of debts, and honours bestowed upon the basest men, and a kingdom such as not only no Roman, but not even any Persian can bear, is it possible for my indignation to be silent? Can my eyes sustain the sight of my delivering my opinion in the company of Gabinius? And even of his being called upon to speak first? In the presence of your client Clodius? In that of C. Atinius's client Plautius? And the rest? But why do I enumerate my enemies? while I cannot without pain see in the senate my own connexions, whom I have myself defended, nor act amongst them without shame. What if it is by no means certain that I should be allowed to do so? For his friends write me word that he is far from being satisfied with me, because I have not gone into the senate. However, I cannot entertain a thought of recommending myself to him, and that with some risk, with whom I refused to be united even with recompense. Then consider this, that the whole contest is not to be decided in Spain; unless you suppose that, upon losing this, Pompeius will throw up his arms; notwithstanding his whole plan is Thesmisticola. For he deems him who is in possession of the sea to be necessarily master of affairs. Hence, without ever striving to keep Spain by itself, he has always made naval preparations his principal care. He will accordingly sail, when the season is fit, with a prodigious fleet, and will come to Italy; where what shall I be, sitting idle? For it will no longer be allowable to be neuter. Shall I then oppose his fleet? What evil can be greater, or even so great? What indeed can be basier? Have I fresh and alone borne his wickedness against the absent; and shall I not bear it in company with Pompeius and the other chiefs? But if, setting aside duty, we consider only the danger; there is danger from those, if I do wrong; from him, if I do right: nur can any plan be devised in these troubles which is free from danger. There can therefore be no doubt but I should avoid doing anything base with danger, which I would avoid even with safety. Should he not have crossed the sea along with Pompeius? It was not in my power; there is in the account of the days. Besides (to confess the truth, without that concealment which I might use), one thing deceived me, which perhaps ought not, but did deceive me; for I thought there would be peace; and if this had taken place, I did not care to have Caesar angry with me, at the time that he would be reconciled to Pompeius. For I had already felt the effect of their union. It was through fear of this that I fell into this dizziness, if I shall obtain every purpose if I make haste: if I delay, I shall lose it. And yet, my Atticus, certain auguries inspire me with confident hope; not the auguries of our college collected by Appius, but... those of Plato on the subject of tyrants. For I do not see by what means he can long remain without falling off himself, even without any exertion on our part: since fresh and flourishing, in the space of six or seven days, he became the object of the bitterest hatred to that same indigent and abandoned multitude; having so soon lost the pretension of two things; of eleunicy, in the case of Metellus 2; of wealth, in the affair of the treasury 4. Now what companions or ministers can he employ, if the provinces, if the republic is to be governed by persons, no one of whom has been able to regulate his own patrimony for two months? There is no enumerating all the particulars, which you will readily comprehend; only place them in your view, and you will presently understand that such a kingdom can hardly last six months. If I am mistaken in this, I shall bear it, as many excellent men, distinguished in the republic, have borne it; unless you imagine that I would rather die like Sardanapalus in his bed 3, than in a Themistoclean exile; who being, as Thucydides says, "the ablest to apprehend things present, after the shortest consultation; and for the best to conjecture of things to come, what was likely to take place;" yet fell into those straits, which he would have avoided, if nothing had deceived him. Though he was one who, in the words of the same author, "eminently foresaw advantages and disadvantages, while they were yet in obscurity," yet he did not see either how to escape the envy of the Lacedemonians, or that of his own fellow-citizens, nor what he was promising to Artaxerxes. That night would not have been so calamitous to the prudent Africanus; nor that day of Sulla's superiority so sad to the shrewd C. Marius; if nothing had deceived them. Nevertheless I support my opinion by the augury I have mentioned. This does not deceive me; nor will it turn out otherwise. He must fall either by his enemies, or by himself, who indeed is his own worst enemy. I hope this may happen during my life, though it is time for me to think of that eternal, not of this short life. But should anything happen to me sooner than I expect, it signifies little whether I see it done, or foresee that it will be done. This being so, it is not to be borne, that I should submit to those against whom the senate armed me with authority to see that the republic received no detriment 5. To you I commend all my concerns; though such is your affection towards me that they need not my commendation. In fact I have nothing to tell you; for I sit here only waiting for an opportunity to sail. Yet nothing ever so demanded to be told, as that of all your multiplied kindnesses none was at any time more acceptable to me than the sweet and assiduous attention you have bestowed on my dear Tullia. She is herself highly gratified by it; and I no less so. Her excellence is indeed wonderful. How does she bear the public misfortunes! How her own domestic embarrassments! And what a courage does she show at my departure! Call it natural affection, or the closest union of minds; yet she would have me do what is right, and be well esteemed. But of this too much, lest I call forth my own sensibility. If you hear anything certain about Spain, or anything else, while I remain in Italy, you will write to me. And at my departure, I shall perhaps send again to you; and the rather, because Tullia seemed to think you would not at present leave Italy. I must manage to get Antonius's consent, as well as Curio's, to my residing at Malta, without taking a part in this war. I wish I may find him as accommodating and kind, as Usur, whom he has been before a gracious letter, of which I inclose a copy.

Antonius, Tribune of the People, Propurator, to Cicero, Imperator.

UNLESS I had a great regard for you, indeed much greater than you imagine, I should not have minded the report which is spread about you, especially as I do not believe it; yet loving you as I do, I cannot dissemble that it is very rumour, however unfounded, greatly affects me. I cannot think that you will cross the sea, considering your affection for Dolabella and your daughter, that accomplished woman, and the esteem in which you are held by all of us, to whom indeed your dignity and splendour are almost dearer than to yourself. But I have not thought it the part of a friend to be indifferent to what is said even by ill-disposed persons; and I have acted with the greater zeal, because I consider the task imposed upon me to be the more difficult, owing to the offence which has arisen between us, rather from my jealousy than from any injury on your part. For I would have you believe that, excepting my Caesar, nobody is dearer to me than you, and that at the same time I am persuaded Caesar esteems M. Cicero among his best friends. Therefore I beg you, my Cicero, to take no hasty step,—but to distrust the attachment of one, who first injured you that he might afterwards confer a kindness; and on the other hand not to run away from one, who, though he should not love you (which, however, cannot be the case), yet would wish you to be in safety and in honour. I have expressly sent to you my intimate friend Calpurnius, that you may be assured of the great interest I take in your life and dignity.

The same day Philotimus brought the following letter from Caesar.

Cesar, Imperator, to Cicero, Imperator.

THOUGH I was persuaded that you would do nothing rashly or imprudently, yet I have been moved by common report to write to you, and to request, by the intimacy between us, that you would not in this declining state of affairs take any step which you did not think it necessary to take in their sound state. For you will both inflict a severer blow on our friendship, and less well consult your own advantage, if you appear to be influenced not by the course of events (for everything seems to have fallen out most favourable to us, most adverse to them), nor by attachment to the cause (for that was the same when you judged it proper to abstain from their counsels), but by condemnation of some act of mine,—than which you can do nothing more painful to me. That you may not do it I beg of you, by the right of our friendship. Besides, what can be more proper for a good and peaceable man and a good citizen than to abstain from civil broils? This some who would wish it cannot do because of the danger; you, to whom the testimony of my life and the assurance of my friendship are well known, will not find anything more honourable than to abstain from all hostility. April 16. On my journey.

LETTER IX.

The arrival of Philotimus (what a fellow he is! how silly! how often misrepresenting in favour of Pompeius!) has frightened to death all my compatriots. As for myself, I am become callous.
None of my people entertained a doubt of "Caesar's having checked his progress;" whereas he is said to advance with the utmost speed: and that "Petreius had joined Afranius," though he brings no intelligence of the kind. In short it was even believed that Pompeius was passing with a great force through Illyrium into Germany; for this was confidently asserted. I am of opinion, therefore, that I ought to get away to Malta, till we see what is done in Spain. From Caesar's letters it appears as if I might almost do this with his consent; for he says that I can do nothing more honourable or more safe than to withdraw from all contention.
You will say then, " where is that resolution which you professed in your last letter." It is here, and it is unaltered. But I wish it were possible to determine only at my own risk. The tears of my family sometimes soften me, when they entreat me to await the issue of the war in Spain. The boys could not without great emotion read a letter from M. Cælius written in a lamentable strain, and entreating me to wait for the same event, and not to betray so rashly my fortunes, my only daughter, and all my connexions. My own son, indeed, is of greater spirit, and for that very reason affects me the more, and seems to be anxious only about my reputation. To Malta, therefore: thence wherit shall seem prudent. Do you, however, even now let me hear from you, especially if there is any news of Afranius. If I have any conversation with Antonius, I will let you know what has been done: but, as you advise, I shall be cautious in trusting him; for the means of concealing my design are both difficult and dangerous. I expect Servius on the seventh of May, for whom I shall wait, at the desire of Postumia and the young Servius. I rejoice to hear that your auge is better.
I send you a copy of Cælius's letter.

Cælius to Cicero.

I am distressed by your letter, in which you show that your thoughts are engaged about nothing but what is sad. What this is you do not expressly say; nevertheless you sufficiently declare the nature of what you contemplate. I therefore write this letter to you without loss of time, to beg and beseech you, Cicero, by your fortunes, by your children, not to adopt any measure prejudicial to your happiness and security. To all that, and my friendship, to witness that I have told you beforehand, and have given you this counsel not hastily, but have informed you after being with Caesar, and knowing what his disposition would be should he gain the victory,—if you imagine that Caesar will continue to observe the same moderation in liberating his adversaries and submitting to their conditions, you are mistaken.
His thoughts, and indeed his declarations, breathe nothing but what is severe and cruel. He went away much out of humour with the senate, and thoroughly provoked by the opposition to his wishes. There will assuredly be no room for mercy. Therefore, if you have any regard for yourself, for your only son, for your family, for your remaining hopes,—if I, if that excellent man your son-in-law, have any weight with you, you ought not wilfully to disturb their fortune,—so that we should be obliged to hate, or relinquish, that cause in the success of which our happiness consist, or else entertain the impious wish of injuring you. Lastly, think what offence you must already have given by your delay. But now, to oppose Caesar in the time of victory, whom you were unwilling to offend while his cause was doubtful, and to join those in their flight whom you refused to follow as long as they resisted, is the height of folly. Take care that while you are ashamed to be wanting in the duties of the best citizen, you are not too negligent in choosing what is the best course. But if I cannot entirely prevail with you, at least wait till it is known how we go on in Spain; which, I announce to you, will be ours upon the arrival of Caesar. What hope they may have after Spain is lost I know not: and what can be your object in uniting with a desperate cause, I cannot for my life discover. This, which without saying it you gave me to understand, Caesar had heard; and as soon as he had asked me how I did, he mentioned what he had heard about you. I professed my ignorance; but begged him to write to you in such a manner as might be most likely to induce you to stay. He takes me with him to Spain. If this were not so before I went to the city, wherever you were, I would have run down to you and argued the point with you in person, and used my utmost endeavour to keep you. Consider, Cicero, again and again, that you may not utterly ruin yourself and all your family, nor plunge yourself, with your eyes open, into a situation from whence you see no retreat. But if the language of the best citizens affects you, or if you cannot bear the insolence and haughtiness of certain persons, you may choose, I think, some town free

This relates to the expediency of obtaining Antonius's consent to Cicero's departure, since it was both difficult and dangerous to attempt it by stealth.

Postumia was the wife of Servius Sulpicius, the person here intended.

The motions in the senate for permitting Caesar to take the money out of the treasury were stopped by the intercession of the tribune L. Metellus. Caesar, however, got possession of it by force. See letter 4 of this book.

from war while these matters are deciding, which will presently be concluded. If you do this I shall think you have acted wisely, and you will give no offence to Caesar.

LETTER X.

Blind that I am, not to have foreseen this! I sent you Antonius's letter. Having repeatedly written to him that I entertained no designs against Caesar's measures,—that I was mindful of my son-in-law, mindful of our friendship,—that if I thought otherwise I might have been with Pompeius, but that I wished to be out of the way, because I did not like to be running about with my licors,—that this measure, however, was not even now determined. To these observations see how superciliously he replies:—

"How true are your professions! For one who wishes to be neuter remains in his country; he who goes away appears to pass judgment upon one of the parties. But I am not the person to determine whether anybody is at liberty to go away or not. Caesar has laid this duty upon me, that I should suffer nobody at all to leave Italy. My approving your intention is, therefore, of little consequence, as I have no authority to remit anything. I think you should apply to Caesar, and ask leave from him. I do not doubt but you will obtain it, especially as you promise to observe the relations of our friendship."

Here is a Spartan despatch for you! I shall by all means deceive the man. He was to come on the evening of the third, that is to-day; therefore to-morrow he may perhaps call upon me. I shall endeavour to appear in no hurry. I shall give out that I mean to apply to Caesar; I shall conceal myself somewhere with very few attendants, and shall certainly fly away from hence in spite of these people. I wish it may be to Curio; this I say to you, God willing. I have received a great additional uneasiness. Something worthy of me shall be accomplished. I am exceedingly sorry for your dysury. Attend to it, I beseech you, while it is yet recent. I was pleased with your account of the people at Marseilles! I beg to be informed of everything you may hear. I should like Sicily, if I might go open; which I had obtained from Curio. I wait here for Servius, as I am requested by his wife and son, and as I think it expedient. This fellow takes Cytheria with him in an open carriage; a second conveys his wife; and there are besides seven others together, of his girls think you or boys? See by how vile a death we perish; and doubt, if you can, of the havoc he will make, whether he come back conqueror or conqueror.

* The original is expressed in two Greek words, signifying a particular kind of cipher used by the government of Sparta, to which their generals were expected to pay implicit obedience.
* The text is evidently corrupt; but I read it with the least alteration—Tentabo autem nihil properare.
* I should be glad to get to Sicily under the command of Curio,* who, though of Caesar's party, was personally attached to Cicero. From thence Cicero would proceed to Malta.
* This is said perhaps from a feeling of some dissatisfaction at the part he had inthero acted.
* They shut their gates against Caesar.
* Cytheria was Antonius's mistress.
* Caesar.

But if, there should be no ship, will go even in a cock-boat, to snatch myself from the violence of these people. I will write more after I have seen him. I cannot help loving our young nephew, though I plainly see that I am not loved by him. I never saw anything so intractable, so set against his family, so absorbed in his own conceit. What an incredible weight of troubles! I will, however, and do, take pains to correct him; for he has excellent abilities,* but requires great attention to his temper.

LETTER XI.

After sealing my last letter, I did not choose to deliver it to the person I had intended, because he was not one of my own servants. For this reason it was not delivered that day. In the mean time Philotimus arrived, and brought me yours; in which you say about my brother certainly shows a want of steadiness; but has nothing insincere, nothing fraudulent, nothing that may not be turned to good, nothing that you may not by a single word lead whither you will. In short, he is affectionate towards all his friends, even those with whom he often quarrels; and me he loves better than himself. I do not blame him for sending a different account to you about your nephew, and to the mother about her son. What you mention about the journey, and about your sister, is vexatious, and the more so, because my time is so contracted that it is not in my power to remedy it; for remedy it I certainly would. But you see in what troubles and difficulties I am. The money concerns are not such (for I often hear from him) that he does not wish to pay you, and is earnest to do so. But if Q. Axius, in this my flight, does not repay me thirteen sestertia (160l.) which I lent to his son, but excuses himself on account of the times; if Lepta, if others do the same; I cannot forbear wondering, when I hear from him that he is pressed for some 20 sestertia (160l.). For you see the difficulties. He has ordered, however, that the money may be provided for you. Do you think him slow, or backward, in such affairs? Nobody is less so. But enough about my brother. Respecting his son, it is true that his father always indulged him: but indulgence does not make one deceitful, or covetous, or without natural affection; though it may perhaps create haughtiness, and arrogance, and moroseness. Accordingly he has these faults also, which arise from indulgence; but they are supportable; for why should I aid, at his time of life? But the former, which to me who love him are more grievous than these very calamities in which I am placed, are not the effects of our tenderness; no, they have roots of their own; which, however, I would pluck out if it were possible. But the times are such that I must put up with everything. My own son I easily restrain; for nothing is more tractable; and it is in compassion to him that I have hitherto adopted less vigorous counsels; and the more he wishes me to exert myself, the more I am afraid of injuring him. Antonius arrived yesterday evening. He says

w See letter 12 of this book.
* I understand this to mean different from that which Cicero had given in the preceding letters. Some suppose that he means Quintus had given one account to Atticus another to Pompellia.
LETTER XII.

What will become of me? Or who is there not only more unfortunate, but more disgraced, than I am? Antonius says that he has received orders about me by name. He has not however yet seen me, but mentioned this to Trebatius. What can I do now? Nothing prospers with me; and what has been considered with the greatest care, turns out the most unhappily. For when I had gained Curio, I thought I had obtained everything. He had written to Hortensius about me; and Regius was entirely with me. I never suspected that Antonius would have anything to do with this sea 7; which says the very contrary. If he received this otherwise than he ought, you will soften it. I addressed him coiner, because he had addressed me proconsul. But since he is an honest man, and friendly towards me, I am ready also to be friendly towards him.

12 I must not have the appearance of a plan concerted between him and Cesar for the purpose of his remaining in Italy.

TO TITUS POMPONIUS ATTICUS.

LETTER XIII.

Your letter was particularly acceptable to me dear Tullia, and indeed to me. Your letters always bring something agreeable with them. Write, therefore; and if you can offer any ground of hope, do not omit it. You need not be alarmed at Antonius's lion. Nothing is pleasanter than this man. Listen to - trait worthy of a minister of state. He summoned the council of ten from the free towns; and the four magistrate came to his residence early in the morning. First, he was asleep till nine o'clock; then, upon being told that the Neapolitans and Campanians were arrived (for Caesar was displeased with these people), he ordered them to come again the next day, as he wanted to bathe, and was taking a levement. This he did yesterday: and to-day he has determined to go over to Enaria. He promises to recall those that have been banished, and will omit the rest of the matters, let me say something about myself. I have had a letter from Aixius. I am obliged to you for what you have done about Tiro. I am quite satisfied with Vetcousus. I have paid the money to Vestorius. Servius is said to have slept at Minturnae the 6th of May; to-day he was to lodge with C. Narcellus in Litterum; he will therefore reach me early to-morrow, and will furnish me with matter for writing to you; for I now find nothing to say. I am surprised that Antonius should not so much as send a message to me, especially as he has always been very civil. I suppose he does not choose to deny before my face his having received a harsh command concerning me. But I should not ask any favour; nor, if I obtained it, should I place any reliance upon it. Yet I must devise something. Pray let me know if anything is done in Spain; for it might be heard by this time; and everybody is anxious, as supposing that, if things go right, there will be no further trouble. But for my part, I neither think that the preservation of Spain will decide the business, nor its loss render it desperate. I imagine Sillius, and Ocella, and the others, are obliged to delay their departure. I perceive too that you are hindered by Curtius; though I suppose you have a passport.

LETT

LETTER XIV.

O wretched existence! For to remain so long in fear, is a greater evil than the thing itself which is feared. Servius, as I before mentioned, having arrived the 7th of May, came to me the next day. Not to detain you unnecessarily, we came to no conclusion. I never saw anybody more disturbed by apprehension; nor in truth did he bear any thing that was not a just cause of fear. That man was angry with him, this by no means pleased; and the victory of either party was to be dreaded, owing to the cruel disposition of the one, the audacity of the other, and the pecuniary difficulties of both, from which they can never be extricated but through the property of private individuals. This he said with so many tears, that I wondered they had not been dried up by such protracted misery. As for me, even this weakness of the eyes, which prevents my writing with my own hand, is unattended with any weeping, though it is often so troublesome as to keep me awake. Collect, therefore, what consolations you can, and send it to me; not from books and philosophy; for that I have at home; though somehow the remedy is less powerful than the disease: but do you rather find out what relates to Spain, and to Marseilles. Servius brings a sufficiently good report on these subjects, and says there is good authority for that of the two legions. Let me then hear this from you, if you can, and other things of the same kind. Something must necessarily be known in a few days. But I revert to Servius. We adjourned our conversation to the next day. But he is loath to go out of the country. He would sooner bear whatever might happen, in his bed. He has a painful scruple arising from his son's joining the army before Brundusium. This, however, he positively asserted, that if the exiles were restored, he would go into banishment himself. To this I replied, that that would certainly take place; and that what was now doing was not at all better; and I produced many instances. But this, instead of giving him encouragement, increased his fear; so that now it seems necessary rather to keep him in ignorance of my purpose, than to invite him to do the same. Therefore, there is not much to be expected from him. I shall think of Celsus, according to your suggestion.

LETTER XV.

While Servius was with me, Cephalio arrived with your letter, on the tenth which brought us great hope of better things respecting the eight cohorts; for they also which are in these parts, some manner to signify "a passport," which is there called diploma; whence it may be suspected that the word here might have been borrowed.

Pompeius would be angry with him for having sent his son to join Caesar's army before Brundusium.

Cesar was displeased with him having moved the senate not to approve of the expedition to Spain against Pompeius's lieutenants; as Cicero had informed him he should himself do if he went to Rome. See book ix letter 18.

are said to waver. On the same day Funisulanus brought another letter from you, corroborating the same circumstance. On the subject of his own business I satisfied him amply, giving him to understand all his obligation to you. He has not yet paid me. He owes me a considerable sum, and is not supposed to be rich. He now says that he will pay it; but that one, who is in his books, delays: that, when this is paid, if there should be sufficient at your house, you may send it by the messengers. Philoelius’s freed-man, Eunus, will tell you how much it is. But let us return to greater matters. That Celian business, which you wish for, ripens space; and I am distracted with doubt whether I should wait for a favourable wind. There wants but a standard, and people will flock to it. I am quite of your mind in thinking it best to go openly, and I think to set off accordingly: but I shall first wait for another letter from you. Nothing is to be got from Servius’s opinion: every objection is raised every proposal. He is the only man I have known of a more timid disposition than C. Marcellus, who regretted that he had been made consul. How dishonourable! He is said too to have confirmed Antonius in his opposition to my departure, that he might himself, I suppose, remain with the better grace. Antonius set out for Capua the tenth. He sent me word that he was prevented from waiting upon me by shame, because he thought I should be angry with him. I shall go then, and in the manner you advise, unless any hope should previously be afforded of sustaining some more important character. But this can scarcely happen so soon. Allicus the pretor however thinks that one of his colleagues will be appointed, if I am not. I care not who it is, so there be but some-body. I am pleased with what you mention about your sister. I take pains about young Quintus; and hope things are better. As for my brother Quintus, I assure you he is making every exertion to pay the interest that is due: but he has hitherto squeezed nothing out of L. Égnatius. Axius d necessarily applies for 12,000 (1002.) for he has frequently written to desire I would advance to Gallius whatever he wants. But if he had not written, could I do otherwise? In truth I have repeatedly promised: but this money he wants im-imediately. I wish people e would have consideration for me in these troubles. May the gods confound them! But of this at some other time, I rejoice at your being freed from your auge, and also Pilia. While the stores and other things are putting on board, I mean to run down to Pom-epsilonum. I should be glad if you would make my acknowledgments to Vectenuis for his attention. If you have anybody to send, let me hear from you before I go.

LETTER XVI.

I had just sent you a letter on a variety of subjects, when Dionysius came to me at an early hour. I should not only have shown myself ready to forgive him, but should have remitted the whole, if he had come in the temper of mind you described. For in the letter I received from you at Arpinum, he said that he would come, and would do whatever I desired. Now I desired, or rather wished, to have him with me. This he had positively refused, when he came to Formianum, which occasioned me to write to you angrily about him. And I have said very little; but the amount of his harangue was, that I would forgive him; that he was so embarrassed with his own affairs, that he was unable to go with me. I replied in a few words, but felt great vexation. I saw clearly that he despised my present fortune. What think you? Perhaps you will be surprised; but I must tell you that I reckon this among the greatest vexations of these times. I would have him continue your friend. The wishing you this, is wishing that all may go well with you: for just so long will his attachment last. I trust my design will be unattended with danger; for I shall both dissemble, and mean to keep a sharp look-out. Let but the passage be such as I wish; for the rest, so far as it is under the control of prudence, due care shall be taken. While I remain here, I should be glad if you would write me letter not merely of what you know, or have heard, but also of what you foresee will happen. Cato, who might have kept Sicily without any difficulty, and (if he had kept it, all respectable people would have flocked to him) went from Syracuse the 24th of April, as Curio wrote me word. I wish, what is said, that Cotta may keep Sardinia. There is such a report. If it be so, poor Cato! In order to lessen any suspicion of my departure, or of my design, I went to Pompeianum the 12th, that I might remain there, while the things requisite for the voyage were got ready. Upon my arrival at the house, information was brought me that the centurions of three cohorts which are at Pompeii wished me to go thither the next day; it was my friend Ninnius communicated this to me; that they wished to deliver themselves and the town to me. But I, look you, was off on the morrow before it was light, that they might not so much as see me. For what was there in three cohorts? What if there had been more? How were they furnished! There occurred to me the same idea upon that Celian attempt which I read in the letter I received from you the same day, as soon as I arrived at Cum-num; and yet it might only have been done to try me. I therefore removed all suspicion. Upon my

7 Atticus, we have seen, succeeded to the property of Cassius, who was a sort of banker; and I imagine the same business to have been continued on Atticus’s account. Hence I understand this passage to mean, that if Funisulanus, after the money that was owing to him should have been paid, had enough at Atticus’s banking-house to answer Cicero’s claims, it might be sent down to him. [See book viii. letter 7, note 3.] This receives considerable weight from what occurs in several letters of book xii., from which it appears that Atticus was a long time engaged with his accounts, so as to show that they must have been voluminous and intricate. This may either mean, that there were many people dissatisfied with Cæsar, and ready to unitate under and very leader in opposition to him: or, that many people were desirous of leaving Italy as soon as an opportunity offered.

a See letter 12 of this book. "I must act, therefore, either by force or by stealth.

b Of being a negotiator for peace.

d Axius is mentioned before, in letter 11 of this book, as owing Cicero 13,000 sestertii on account of his son, who is probably the same Gallius here spoken of. And now he says, that Axius, instead of repaying the money, borrows 12,000 more, and wants it immediately.

e Adjutant seems to be used absolutely, in the man-

Hortensius came to me the 14th, after my letter was written. I wish the rest of his conduct may correspond with this. His attention towards me is inconceivable, and of this I mean to avail myself. Afterwards came Serapio with your letter. But before I opened it, I told him that you had already written to me about him, as you had done. Then, when I had read the letter, I entered upon the rest very fully; and in truth I am much pleased with him, for he seems to be at once a man of learning and of probity. I think of employing his vessel also, and taking him with me. The weakness of my eyes has frequent returns, and though not very troublesome, yet it prevents my writing. I am glad your health is now both restored from its old complaint, and strengthened against any fresh attacks. I wish I had Ocella here; for these matters seem to be rather more feasible. At present I am stopped by the equinox, which is very much out of its natural course. If this blows gently, I hope Hortensius will continue in the same disposition, for hitherto nothing could be more kind. You are surprised at my having spoken of a passport, as if I were charging you with I know not what offence; and cannot imagine how it should have come into my mind. But as you had mentioned an intention of going away, and I had understood that nobody was permitted to go without one, therefore I concluded you had one; as likewise because you had got a passport for the boys. This was the reason of the opinion I expressed. But I should be glad to know what you think of doing, and above all if there is yet any news. May 16.

LETTER XVIII.

My dear Tullia was brought to bed the 19th of May of a seven months' child. I rejoice in her safe delivery. The child is very weakly. The calms have hitherto delayed me surprisingly, and have been a greater impediment than the watch which is kept over me. For Hortensius's professions are all idle words, so that he must be a most base man. He has been corrupted by the freed-man Salvius. Henceforward therefore I shall not write to inform you what I am going to do, but what I have done. For all the Corycii seem to listen to what I say. But still if there is anything from Spain, or anything else, pray continue to write; and do not expect to hear from me till I arrive at my destination, unless I send to you on my passage. But I write even this with fear: so slowly and difficulty has everything hitherto been done. As I said ill the first beginning, so the rest follows. I am now proceeding to Formia. The Puries will perhaps pursue me by the same route. From the conversation which Balbus had with you, I do not approve of Malta. Do you then doubt of his reckoning me among the number of the enemies? I have written myself to Balbus, telling him that you had informed me of his good-will, and of his suspicion. For the one I have returned my thanks; on the other subject you must excuse me to him. Did you ever know anybody more unfortunate? I say no more, that I may not also distress you. I am worried to death with thinking that a time is arrived, when neither courage nor prudence can any longer avail me.

20 The basidi of Mount Corycii were noted for their secret intelligence; from whence the term Corycii was used proverbially to signify any spies or discoverers of secrets.—Erasmus Adag.

[In the interval between the tenth and eleventh books of Cicero's letters, it appears that he actually visited Italy the 11th of June, and passed over to Dyrrachium, with his brother and the two young Ciceros, to join Pompeius. In the mean time Caesar had made himself master of Spain; and having been created dictator at Rome, marched to Brundium, and thence embarked the 4th of January in pursuit of Pompeius. At first Pompeius obtained some advantage over Caesar before Dyrrachium, but was soon after totally defeated in the memorable battle of Pharsalia. Cicero was not present on this occasion, but remained at Dyrrachium out of health, and out of spirits. After this defeat Pompeius's party dispersed. The greater part went to renew the war in Africa, which Caesar also followed them. Some retired into Greece; but Cicero returned to Brundium about the end of October, and from thence wrote the 5th letter of the following book.] BOOK XI.

LETTER I.

I have received from you a sealed packet brought by Anteros; but from which I have been able to learn nothing of my domestic affairs, about which I am deeply concerned. For he who has had the management of them is not there, nor do I know where in the world he is. But I place all hope of my reputation and private concerns in your kindness, which I have so often experienced. This if you will extend to me in these sad and desperate times, I shall bear with a better heart the dangers which are common to me with the rest; and that you will do so I conjure and entreat you. I have two-and-twenty hundred sesterces (17,600l.) in cistophori in Asia; by exchanging which money you will easily support my credit. Had I not thought that I left it quite clear, trusting to whom you have long since ceased to trust, I would have waited a little longer, and not left my private affairs in embarrassment. The reason of my writing to you so late, is, that I have been late in finding what I had to apprehend. I beg you again and again to take me wholly under your protection; that if those, with whom I am, are safe, I may escape along with them, and may owe my safety to your kindness.

LETTER II.

I received your letter the 4th of February, and the very same day I formally accepted the inheritance according to the will. Out of my many sad troubles one is removed, if, as you say, this inheritance is adequate to the support of my credit and reputation; which, however, even without this, I understand that you would have defended from your own means. As to what you mention respecting the dower, by all the gods I conjure you to take the whole affair under your management, and to protect that poor creature (who is suffering by my fault and negligence) out of my property, if I have any; or by any means you can employ without putting yourself to inconvenience. Do not, I beseech you, suffer her to remain, as you say, destitute of everything. On what expenses has the produce of the farms been consumed? Nobody ever told me that those sixty sesterces (480l.) which you mention had been deducted from her

LETTER III.

What is doing here you will be able to learn from the bearer of this letter, whom I have kept the longer because I have been in daily expectation of something new; though at present I have no other reason for writing, than that, about which you desired an answer, respecting what I would have done relative to the first of July. Either alternative is attended with difficulty in such difficult times; the risk of so large a sum; or, in this doubtful issue of events, that breaking off which

d It was proposed to take from Cicero his house in Rome, on account of his going over to Pompeius.

e Probably for his slaves.

f Cicero being now with Pompeius's army at Dyrrachium, was under the restriction of military discipline, and, it is probable, might be watched with some jealousy.

h This was probably the day on which some portion of his daughter's fortune became due to Dolabella. Cicero, as well as Tullia, was dissatisfied with Dolabella, and meditated a divorce. But considering Dolabella's credit with Caesar, it was difficult to determine, in the present doubtful state of affairs, whether it were better to incur the danger of losing so large a sum, if he paid it; or to cut the matter short by suing for a divorce, and thereby making Dolabella his enemy.

i The expression is probably borrowed from Atticus, and means the separating his daughter from her husband.
you mention. Therefore as other things, so this especially I commit to your protection and kindness, and to her judgment and inclination. I should have done better for my poor daughter, if I had formerly deliberated with you in person, rather than by letter, on the subject of my own security and circumstances. When you deny that any peculiar disadvantage attaches to me, though this affords no consolation, yet there are many peculiar circumstances which you must see to be, as they are, very grievous, and which I might easily have avoided. But these very things will be less, if, as has hitherto been done, they are lightened by your care and attention. The money is with Eg natius. Let it remain on my account, as it is, (for things cannot long continue in their present state), that I may be able to see what is most expedient; though I am in want of everything; because he also with whom I am in difficulties, and I have advanced him a large sum of money, thinking that when matters are settled, this may likewise be an honour to me. I should be glad, if there are any persons to whom you think I ought to write, that you would execute this, as you have done before. Present my compliments to your family, and take care of your health. In the first place make every care and provision for what you mention; that nothing may be wanting to her for whom you know how uneasy I am. From the camp, June 13th.

LETTER IV.

I received a letter by Isidorus, and two of later dates. From the last I find that the estates have not been sold. You will therefore see that she may be supported through you. With respect to Frusinas, if only I survive, it will be a convenient possession for me. You desire me to write, but I am prevented by want of matter, for I have nothing worth writing; entirely disapproving, as I do, both what happens, and what is doing. I wish I had formerly consulted you in person, rather than by letter. I support your cause here among these people as well as I can. Celer will tell you the rest. I have hitherto declined all office, the more so because it was impossible to do anything as became me and my circumstances. You ask what new has happened: you will be able to learn from Isidorus. What remains does not appear to be more difficult. I should be glad to have you take care (as you promise, and as you do) of what you know I have especially at heart. I am worn with anxiety, which has also brought on extreme bodily weakness. As soon as this is removed, I shall join the leader of the business, who is in

The subsequent part of the letter appears to have been written after that affair of Dyrrachium in which Caesar was worsted. The victory of the armies made Caius very cautious and reserved in what he wrote.

There did not appear any reason why Pompeius should not be equally successful in any subsequent engagement.

great hope. Our friend Brutus engages zealously in the cause. So far I have been able to write with caution. Farewell. Respecting the second payment, pray consider with all attention what is to be done; as I observed in the letter which I sent by Pollex.

LETTER V.

I cannot without the greatest pain describe to you what causes, how bitter, how grievous, how unexpected, have moved me, and compelled me to act from a certain impulse of mind, rather than from consideration. They were such as have produced the effect you perceived. I therefore neither know what to tell you about my concerns, nor what to ask of you. You see the result and sum of the business. I have understood from your letters, both from that which you wrote in conjunction with others, and from that which was in your own name, (what indeed I perceived by myself), that your declining influence made you look out for some new means of defending me. As to what you propose of my coming nearer, and travelling through the towns by night, I do not well see how that can be done; for I have not such convenient resting-places, that I can pass in them all the day-time; nor is it of much consequence for the purpose of your inquiry, whether people see me in the towns or on the road. But yet I will consider, among other things, how this can best be done. My uneasiness both of mind and body is beyond belief, and makes me incapable of writing many letters: I have only answered those which I received. I wish you would write to Basilus, and to whomsoever you think proper, also to Servilius, in my name. That I should have written nothing to you in so long an interval, you will understand to arise from want of matter to write upon, not from want of inclination. Respecting your inquiry about Vatinius, I should not want his services, nor anybody's else, if they could find how to assist me. Quintus was at Patre, in a disposition very hostile towards me. To the same place his son went from Corecyra. I imagine they are since gone from thence along with the rest.

LETTER VI.

I perceive your anxiety not only about your own, and the common calamities, but more particularly about me, and my affliction. And this my affliction is so far from being lessened, that it is even increased by associating yours with it. However, you see with your usual prudence to what source of consolation I am most open. For you approve of my determination, and declare that at such a time I could have done nothing better. You add also (what, though of less weight than your own judgment, yet has some weight with me) that the step which I have taken is approved by others also; that is, persons of consideration. If I thought this, I should be less afflicted. "Believe me," you say. I do believe you; but I know how desirous you are that my distress should be lightened. I have never regretted my withdrawing from the army; there was such a cruel spirit, such a cooperation with barbarous nations, that a prescription was contemplated not individually, but collectively; so that it was determined by common consent that the property of you all should be the prey of his victory; of you all, I say; for there was no thought even of you unmixed with cruelty. I shall never repent of my good-will; I do repent of the measures I adopted. I could wish that I had retired to some remote town till I was sent for. I should have created less observation, and should not have been left exposed to this present trouble. To lie miserably at Brundisium, is every way painful. How can I advance nearer, as you advise, without the licitors, which the people gave me, and which can never be taken from me but by violence. These with their fasces I lately mingled for a time in the crowd, as I approached the town, through fear of some insult from the soldiers. I contrived to get home in time. I want you now to go to Oppius; and, provided it be thought right to advance with these licitors, I imagine they will authorize me to consider of it. For so they engage; that Caesar will have regard not only to the preservation of my dignity, but even to the increase of it; and they exhort me to be of good courage, and to entertain the best hopes. They give me the strongest assurance of what I should more readily credit if I had remained at home. But I am entering upon things that are past. Consider then, I beg you, what remains, and consult about it with these people; and, (if you think it expedient, and it meets with their approbation,) that Caesar may be the more inclined to approve what I do, let it appear to be at their suggestion. Let Trebonius, Pansa, and any others, be admitted to this consultation, and let them write to inform Caesar that what has been done has been done at the suggestion of persons who are quite alarmed at Tullia's illness and debility. I understand you are very kind to her, for which I am greatly obliged to you. I never had any doubt about Pompeius's fate. For all princes and people were so impressed with the desperate state of his affairs, that wherever he had gone, I supposed this would happen. I cannot help lamenting his fall; for I knew him to be a vacation. I should offer to conspire you about Fanius. He talked mischievously about

LETTER VII.

I thank you for your letter, in which you have accurately stated everything which you supposed to concern me. It is settled therefore, according to the opinion you give me from these people, that I should continue to be attended by the same licitors, as it was granted to Sestius: though I apprehend he did not retain his original licitors, but had others given him by Caesar. For I understand that he disallows such decrees of the senate, as were passed subsequently to the departure of the tribunes. If therefore he chooses to be consistent with himself, he may still approve of my licitors. But what have I to do with licitors, who am almost ordered to quit Italy? For Antonius sent me the copy of a letter he had received from Caesar, in which it was stated that he had heard of Cato's and L. Metellus's arrival in Italy, with the design of living openly in Rome; that he did not like this, from fear of its occasioning some disturbance; and that all should be excluded from Italy, except those whose case he should himself have heard; and he expressed himself on this subject with great warmth. Therefore Antonius wrote to me requesting that I would pardon him, but that he was not at liberty to disobey these instructions. Upon this I sent L. Semius to explain to him that Caesar had desired Dolabella to write to me, pressing me to come to Italy as soon as possible, and that I had come agreeably to his letter. He then issued an order to except me and Lelius by name; which I was sorry for, as he might have excepted us in fact, without publicly making us. O the many heavy causes of uneasiness! which you kindly endeavour to alleviate, and not without effect; for you do indeed lessen my affliction by the very circumstance of your taking such pains to lessen it; and this I trust you will not think it burdensome to do very often. You will especially attain your purpose, if you can bring me to think that I have not entirely lost the good opinion of respectable people. Yet what can you do in this respect? Nothing, truly. But if circumstances should give you any opportunity, this will afford me the best consolation. It cannot be done at present; but if anything should arise in the course of events: like what has happened now. For it was said that I ought to have gone with Pompeius, but his fate lessens the reproach of having neglected that duty. So of all things nothing is more censured, than that I should not have gone into Africa: but I considered that the republic ought not to be defended by the barbarous troops of a faithless nation, especially against an army that had gained repeated victories. This perhaps will not be approved. For I hear that many good men are arrived in Africa; and I know there were many before. I am very much perplexed on this subject. Here then I stand in need of some favourable chance. It may be that some, or possibly all of them, may prefer their safety to the issue of war. For if they persevere, and gain their cause, you see in what a condition I shall be. You will say, what will be their condition if they are defeated? It will at least be a more honourable wound. These considerations distract me. You do not say why you do not prefer Sulpicius's determination to mine: for though it is less glorious than Cato's, it is however exempt both from danger and from remorse. The last thing to be considered, is the situation of those who are in Greece. However, these are so far better off, than I am, that they are together in considerable number; and whenever they come to Italy, they will come to their own home. Continue, as you do, to soften these matters, and to conciliate as many as you can. When you excuse yourself, I am well aware of your reasons, and consider it for my interest that you should be there; if it be only to manage for me, as you have hitherto done, what can be managed, with those in authority. In the first place I should be glad if you would attend to this: I apprehend there are many who have or will accuse me to Caesar, as either repenting of the step I have taken, or disapproving what is done. And though both are true, yet these persons assent it out of ill-will towards me, not that they have any knowledge of its being so. But that Balbus and Oppius may defend me against all such attacks, and by their frequent letters may confirm Caesar's kind disposition; that this may effectually be done, you will use all diligence. Another reason why I should be sorry to have you leave Rome is, that you say you have been entreated—O bad business! What should I write? or what should I desire? I shall be very short, for my tears burst forth. I commit it to you, and beg you to take it under your care. Only see that, at such a time, it involve you in no difficulty. Pardon me, I beseech you: I can dwell no longer on this subject for my tears and grief. I will only say, that nothing can be more gratifying to me than your affection towards her. You do kindly in undertaking to write to whom you think it proper. I have met with a person who saw Quintus the son at Samos, the father at Sicyon. Their excuse is easily made. I wish they, who have seen Caesar before me, may be as ready to promote my interest with him, as I should be to promote theirs, if I had any opportunity. When you ask me to take it in good part, if there should be anything in your letter that vexes me, I do take it in the very best part; and request you to tell me everything without disguise, as you do; and to do it as often as possible. Farewell.

December 19.

LETTER VIII.

Though you perceive indeed how greatly I am afflicted, yet you will know it from Lepta and Trebiatus. I pay severely the penalty of my rashness, which you would faint persuade me is prudence: nor do I prevent your disputing the point, and writing to me as often as possible. For your letters afford me some comfort at this time. You must use every exertion through those who wish well to me, and have influence with Caesar, particularly through Balbus and Oppius, that they may write on my behalf with all diligence. For, as I hear, I am attacked both by some in person, and by letters. These must be met, as the importance of the occasion demands. Furnius is there very unfriendly towards me; and Quintus has sent his son not only to make his own peace, but to accuse me. He gives out that I have traduced him to Caesar; which is refuted by Caesar himself and all his friends; and yet he does not cease, wherever he goes, to heap all sorts of reproaches upon me. Nothing ever happened to me so unaccountable, nothing in all these troubles so painful. Some atrocities were related to me by those who had heard him talking openly at Sicyon in the hearing of many people. You know his manner; perhaps you have experienced it. It is all turned against me. But I add to my uneasiness by speaking of it, and make you uneasy too. Therefore I return to my subject, and beg you to let Balbus send somebody expressly for this purpose. I should be glad if you would write in my name to whom you think fit. Farewell. December 27.

LETTER IX.

I have indeed acted both incursively, as you observe, and more hastily than I ought, and am out of all hope, being kept by these exceptions to the edicts. If they had not been made, through your care and kindness, I might be at liberty to go into some unfrequented place: now I cannot even do this. What advantage is it to have arrived before the tribunes enter upon their office, if the coming at all is of no advantage? What can I hope from him, who has never been a friend to me; since I am already undone and crushed by this law? Balbus's letters to me become daily less encouraging; and there may probably be many things.

from many quarters to Caesar against me. I am ruined by own fault. No part of my troubles has been brought on by accident; everything is the effect of folly. For when I saw the nature of the contest; that all was unprepared, and feeble, against troops in the highest order; I separated from them (what could I do?), and adopted counsels not so much held, as allowable for me beyond other men. I yielded to my friends, or rather I obeyed them. Of one of them, him whom you commend to me, you will see the disposition from his own letters which he has sent to you and to others, and which I should never have opened but from the following circumstances. A parcel was brought to me, which I undid, to see if there was any letter for myself; which there was not. There was one to Vatinius, and another to Lucinius, which I ordered to be taken to them. They presently called upon me howning with grief, crying out upon the perfidy of the man. They read to me the letters, filled with all sorts of calumnies against me. Lucinius was quite in a rage, saying that he knew Caesar had hated him; yet had not only shown him kindness, but had also given him so much money, out of regard to me. After receiving this shock, I was desirous of knowing what he had written to others; for I considered that it would be prejudicial to himself, if this great guilt of his should be generally known. I found they were all of the same kind. I have sent them to you, that if you think it desirable for him that they should be delivered, you may deliver them; no harm will accrue to me; for as to their being opened, I imagine Pomponia has her seal. It was his using this bitterness when we first set sail, which so affected me, that I was afterwards quite sunk; and now he is said to be solicitous not so much for himself as against me. Thus and I pressed by all circumstances; which I am hardly able, or rather quite unable, to bear. Amongst these distresses there is one equivalent to all the rest, that I shall leave my poor daughter plundered of her patrimony, and all her fortune. I should therefore be particularly glad to see you, as you promise; for I have not heard of the poor woman whom I consider as I understand her mother is threatened with the same dangers as myself. But if you should not find me, yet let this be a sufficient commendation, and do you, as far as you can, mollify her uncle towards her. I write this on my birthday; when I wish that I had never been born; or that my mother had produced nothing afterwards. I am prevented by teas from writing more.

LETTER X.

To my inconceivable distresses there has been a fresh addition from what has been related to me respecting the two Quintuses. P. Terentius, a friend of mine, has had a good deal to do as deputy contractor for the customs and revenues in provincial Asia. He met with Quintus the son at Ephesus the 15th of December, and particularly invited him to his house through friendship to me. Having made inquiries from him about me, he said the young man informed him that he was very angry with me, and showed him a roll of paper containing a speech which he intended to make to Caesar against me. Terentius said what he could to check his senseless conduct. Afterwards, at Patrae, Quintus the father talked to him a great deal in a similar strain of slander. You are acquainted with his extravagance by the letters which I sent you. I am sure this must give you pain; to me it is most distressing, and the more so, because I imagine there will be no room for me even to expostulate with them. On the state of things in Africa, I hear accounts very different from what you mention. For they say nothing can be more steady, or better prepared; add to this, Spain, and the disaffection in Italy, the declining strength and zeal of the legions, and the confusion in the army; where can I find any tranquillity, but while I am reading your letters? which would no doubt be more frequent, if you had anything to offer by which you thought my cares could be lessened. But I beg you not to omit writing to me whatever happens; and those who are so cruelly hostile to me, you may blame at least, if you cannot hate them; not with the expectation of doing any good; but to let them see that you love me. I will write more to you when you have answered my last letter. Farewell. January 31.

LETTER XI.

I am so exhausted with the torment of my great distresses, that if there were anything upon which I ought to write to you, I should not easily be able to execute it; much less then, when I have nothing to tell you, when especially there is not even any prospect of things becoming better. So that I am no longer anxious even for your letters, though they always bring something agreeable with them. Therefore continue to write, whenever you have an opportunity of sending. I have nothing to reply to your last, which I received now a long time ago. For in this interval I find that everything is changed; the right cause has acquired strength, and I pay the heavy penalty of my folly. I must procure for P. Sallustius thirty sesterces (200l.), which I received from Cn. Sallustius. I shall be

m The word seleveram in this place evidently comes from secare, and though I do not find any corresponding signification of it, I suspect it is here equivalent to desecquare, and has translated accordingly.

n It would have argued more courage to join either of the contending parties; but Cicero was excusable in not joining Pompeius, by the hope of acting as a mediator of peace; and his solicitations to Pompeius were such as forbad him to act against Caesar.

obliged to you to see that they are provided without delay. I have written about it to Tarentum.
Even this is now almost gone. I wish therefore you would arrange with her, that I may have enough for present use. I shall perhaps be able to take it up here, if I only know that it will be supplied at Rome. But without knowing that, I have not ventured to do so. You see the state of all my affairs. There is no sort of misfortune which I do not suffer and apprehend. And the misery of this is the greater, in proportion to the greatness of my folly. He does not cease to slander me in Greece; so that your letters have been of no avail. Farewell. March 8.

LETTER XII.

Cephalio delivered your letter to me the 8th of March in the evening; and the same day in the morning I had despatched a messenger with a letter to you. Nevertheless, upon reading your letter, I have thought it right to make some reply, especially as you express yourself doubtful what except I shall make to Caesar for my going away at the time when I quitted Italy. I have no occasion for any new excuse: for I have repeatedly told him by letter, and have sent word by several people, that I was unable, if I wished it, to bear the reflections that were made upon me; with many things to the same effect. There was nothing that I less wished him to suppose, than that I had not acted upon my own judgment in a thing of such moment. Afterwards, upon hearing from Balbus Corneius the younger, that he conceived my brother Quintus to have been the trumpet to my march, for so he expressed himself, before I knew what Quintus had been writing to so many people about me; though he had said, and done, many severe things to me in person, yet I wrote notwithstanding⁴ to Caesar in these words: "I am no less anxious for my brother Quintus, than for myself; but in my present situation I cannot venture to commend him to you. So much however

I shall venture to ask of you, that I beg you will not suppose he has done anything to lessen my duty and affection towards you; but has always rather contributed to unite us together; and has been the companion, not the adviser, of my going away. Therefore in other matters you will attribute to him whatever your kindness and the friendship between you demands. That I may be no detriment to him in your esteem, I earnestly entreat of you again and again." If then I should have any meeting with Caesar, though I do not doubt but he will be kind towards him, as he has already declared, yet I shall behave in the same manner as I have always done. But, as I see, I have much more reason to be concerned about Africa; which you represent as being daily conformed in the hope of making terms, rather than of victory. I believe this were so; but I understand it is very much otherwise, and apprehend that you are yourself of that opinion, only write differently, not with a view to deceive me, but to encourage me; especially when to Africa is joined Spain like-wise⁷. Respecting your recommendation of writing to Antonius and others; if you think it necessary, I should be glad if you would do this which you have often done before. For nothing occurs to me that I ought to write. If you hear that I am unreasonably broken in spirit, what think you, when you find those noble⁸ actions of my son-in-law added to my former troubles? However, I hope you will not cease to write to me, as often as you can, although you should have nothing to write about. For your letters always bring me some comfort. I have formally accepted Gallo's legacy.

I suppose it was a simple inheritance, since no form has been sent me. March 8.

LETTER XIII.

I have hitherto received no letter by Muræna's freed-man. P. Sier brought that which I am now answering. What you mention about the letter of the elder Servius, and what you say of certain people having brought information of Quintus's arrival in Syria, are neither of them true. In reply to your inquiry, how those, who have come hither, are, or have been affected towards me, I have understood that nobody has manifested any disrespect. But how little this signifies to me, I am quite sure you can judge.
In my present grief everything is intolerable to me; and nothing more so, than that I find myself in a situation, where the only things that are apparently desirable⁹, are what I have always disappproved. P. Lentulus the father is said to be at Rhodes; the son at Alexandria; and C. Cassius, it appears, is gone from Rhodes to Alexandria.
Quintus offers me some explanation by letter, but in terms more bitter than his heaviest accusation.

For he says that he has understood from your letters, that you were displeased with his having written to several people so unkindly about me;
and that you would have given you any uneasiness, but that he had done what was right.

Then he details most fully the causes of his doing so. But neither at this time, nor before, would he have manifested his hatred towards me, unless he saw me to be every way distressed. I wish that evenly travelling in the night, as you proposed. I had approached nearer to you. I can now form no conjecture either when, or where, I am likely to see you. There was no occasion for your writing to me about the co-heirs of Pudibuns: for what they ask is just in itself; and whatever you had done I should have been satisfied with it.

You have long since known my wish of redeeming
The Frusinian estate¹; though at that time my affairs were in a better condition, and I did not think my case so desperate; yet I have still the same wish. You will consider how this may be accomplished. And I should be glad, as far as

⁷ Dolabella was at this time tribune, and wished to pass several seditious acts, in which he was opposed by Trebelliyou can, that you would secure me supplies for my necessary expenses. What means I had, I presented to Pompeius at a time when I thought I did it prudently. For which purpose I then both took it from your bailiff, and borrowed elsewhere; while Quintius complained by letter that I had given nothing to him; though he never asked me, nor have I beheld the money myself. But I wish you would see what there is, that can be done; and what advice you can give me about everything; for you know the state of my affairs. My affliction prevents my writing more. If there is anything, which you think should be written to anybody in my name, I should be glad if you would do it as usual. Whenever you have an opportunity of sending a letter to me, I hope you will not omit it. Farewell.

LETTER XIV.

I am far from being offended with the honest truth conveyed in your letter; in which you do not even attempt to console me, as formerly, under the general, and particular calamities, which I suffer; but acknowledge that it can no longer be done. For things are not now, as they were before, when, to say nothing more, I thought I had companions and associates. But all who were supposed to be making their peace in Greece and in Asia, both those who knew the state of affairs, and those who did not, are said to be going into Africa. So that, besides Lelius, I have no partner in my fault; and even he is so far better off, as he has been received. About myself however, I do not doubt but Caesar has already written to Balbus and to Oppius; from whom I should have heard, if there had been anything good; and they would also have spoken with you. But I wish you would confer with them upon this subject, and let me know what answer they give you. Not that a grant of safety from Caesar can have any assurance; but yet it will afford an opportunity of consideration and forecast. Though I dread the sight of everybody, especially with such a son-in-law, yet in such great troubles I do not see what else I should wish for. Quintius still goes on, as both Pansa informs me and Hirtius. He too is said to be on his way to Africa with the rest. I will write to Minucius the father, and will send your letter. I will let you know if he does anything. I wonder that you should have been able to send thirty sesterces (240L), unless it have arisen from the Fufidian estate. Yet I see it is so. I look for you; whom I should be particularly glad to see, if it can any how be managed; for the occasion demands it. The last act is already drawing to a conclusion; when it is easy to judge more soundly what everything really is. Farewell.

LETTER XV.

As you produce sufficient reason why I cannot see you at this time, pray what ought I to do? For Caesar seems to hold Alexandria in such a manner, that he is ashamed even of writing about what is done there. But it looks as if the opposite party would soon pass over from Africa; the Greeks, also, will return from Asia to join them, or will remain in some neutral place. What, therefore, do you think I ought to do? I see that it is a difficult question: for I am alone, or with one other, and can neither return to that party nor derive any degree of hope from this. But I am desirous at least of knowing what you think; and this among other things made me wish to see you, if it could be done. I informed you before that Minucius had furnished me with only twelve sestertia (100L); I should be glad if you could secure the payment of the rest. Quintus has written to me not only without asking pardon, but with great bitterness: the son with a degree of hatred which is surprising. No sort of evil can be imagined with which I am not assaulted. Yet everything is more tolerable than the sense of my own error, which is both strong and constant. If I were to have those companions in my error which I expected, yet it would be but a slender consolation. But every body's conduct besides admits of some excuse; mine admits of none. Some have been captured, some intercepted, so as not to call in question their attachment,—especially when, upon being at liberty, they have rejoined their party. Even those who voluntarily delivered themselves up to Fufius can only be charged with timidity; and there are that money, which he would replace with Minucius's correspondent at Rome.

So I understand the original, which is concise and then obscure. It may be worth while here to advert to the form of the present passive, expressive of that which is in the act of being done. The want of a correspondent tense in English has sometimes occasioned a misapprehension of the just meaning in both Greek and Latin authors; as Luke ix. 51, Εν τῷ συναγαγόμενῳ τῷ διδάσκαλῳ ἀπαντάσας ἔτερον, "When the day of his being received up into heaven was drawing towards their accomplishment"—not, as in the common translation, "when the time was come." This seems to me to have been generally misunderstood; I conceive it to allude to the demesne of a stage play, like what is said afterwards in letter 19 of this book, "Jan enim milii videtur adesse extremum." Caesar, seduced by the charms of Cleopatra, was engaged in a war to support her cause in Egypt against her brother Ptolemaeus.

Egypt and Africa are generally distinguished by the Roman writers, the latter signifying that part which was reduced to a Roman province. Here, the party in Africa means the army attached to Pompeius's cause, who were in force in the neighbourhood of Carthage, from whom Cicero apprehended they might make an attack upon Italy.

These Greeks are those of Pompeius's party, who had fled into Asia Minor after the battle of Pharsalia.

Cesar's lieutenant in Greece.
many of various descriptions who, whenever they to them, will readily be received. You need the less wonder, therefore, that I cannot support such a weight of affliction: for my error alone admits of no reparation,—and perhaps Lelius's;
but how does that help me? They say that C.
Cassius has 4 changed his intention of going to Alexandria. These things I detail to you, not that you can remove my trouble, but that I may know whether you have anything to offer about what preys upon me. In addition to all the rest is my son-in-law, and these other matters, of which I cannot write for weeping. I am vexed too about esopus's son 5. In short I am completely miserable. But to return to my first point; what do you think is to be done? Should I try to come closer to you unobserved I or should I cross the sea? For it is impossible to remain here much longer. Why can nothing be settled about the Fufidian estates? For the nature of the conditions was such as is not usually disputed; since the portion which appears too little may easily be made up by a valuation. It is not without reason that I make these inquiries; for I suspect the co-heirs may think my situation very doubtful, and may on that account keep the business in suspense.
Farewell. May 14.

LETTER XVI.

Ir is not by my fault at this time (though before I have been faulty enough) that I derive no consolation from that letter 6: for it is written in a meago style, and bears strong marks of not coming from Cesar, which I imagine you must have perceived. About meeting him, I will do as you advise 7; for there is no great expectation of his arrival; and those who come from Asia say that nothing has been heard about peace,—in the hope of which I have fallen into this error 8. I see nothing to be hoped,—now, especially, when such a wound has been received in Asia, in Ilyricum, in the affair of Cassius's, in Alexandria itself, in Rome, in Italy. For my part, I fear he should come back notwithstanding the war 9 in which he is still said to be engaged, yet I apprehend the business will be settled 10 before his return. As to what you mention of a certain degree of joy being excited in all good people upon the news of Cesar's letter, you indeed omit nothing which you think can be any source of comfort; but I cannot persuade myself that any good man would think my safety worth the begging it of Cesar, and the rather because I have now no companion in such a course.

Those in Asia wait for the issue of events; the Greeks afford a hope of pardon to Fufius himself 11.
These people had at first the same fear as I, and adopted the same resolution; but the delay at Alexandria has righted their cause 12 and overcast mine. Therefore I still request of you, as in my former letters, that if you can do any thing in my ruined condition which you think I ought to do, you will inform me. If I am received by Cesar's party (which you see is not the case), yet as long as the war lasts I am uncertain what I should do or whither I should go. But if I am cast off, the difficulty is still greater. I look, therefore, for a letter from you, and beg you will write explicitly.
With regard to your advice of writing to Quintus on the occasion of this letter,—I would do it if the letter gave me any satisfaction. Though somebody wrote to me lately in the following terms: "In these troubles I am not sorry to be at Patrae.
I should be there with more satisfaction if your brother spoke of you in a way that I liked to hear."
When you say that he complained of my not writ-ting to him,—I once only received a letter from him, to which I sent an answer by Cephalio, who was detained several months by contrary weather.
I have a brother 13 mentioned to you that Quintus
the son had written to me with great rudeness.
The last thing I have to hog of you is, that if you think it right, and can undertake it, you would join with Camillus in speaking to Terentia about her will 14.
The times require that she should consider of it, and give satisfaction where it is due. I have understood from Philotimus that she is guilty of some great 15 misconduct, which I can scarcely believe.
But at all events, if anything can be done, it must be looked to. I long to hear from you about everything, especially what you may say about her.
Upon this I want your opinion, even if you have nothing to propose; for I shall consider that as conclusive. June 3.

LETTER XVII.

I send this by another person's messenger who is in a hurry to set off: for this reason it will be the shorter, and because I am going to send one of my own. My dear Tullia came to me the twelfth of June, and acquainted me with the numerous instances of your attention and kindness to her, and brought me three letters. But I not only

1 He had purposed to go to Alexandria to make his peace with Cesar.
2 Cicero, the actor, had been received into familiarity by Cicero, but his son was a profligate.
3 A letter pretending to come from Cesar.
4 Atticus seems to have advised him not to put himself forward in saluting Cesar on his return.
5 The error of returning to Italy after the battle of Pharsalia, when he had expected that the opposite parties would have made peace.
6 Q. Cassius Longinus had been left in the command of Spain, where the people and soldiers revolted to the Pompeian party. In the other provinces here mentioned Cesar's troops had met with some check.
7 The war in Egypt.
8 Cicero was apprehensive of the army in Africa getting possession of Italy, in opposition to Cesar.

b I understand this to mean that Fufius, who had been left in Greece, and to whom the Greeks had sent for pardon, now rested the hope of his own pardon from the reviving ascendency of the Pompeians, upon the intercession of these very Greeks.

c By Cesar's delay at Alexandria the Greeks had time to recover from their first alarm, and to observe the actual progress of affairs. Cicero, who had acted upon the prosumption of Cesar's superiority, now found himself in a difficult strait.

d Terentia's conduct and extravagance had now made Cicero resolve upon a divorce. And in such a case, where there were children, it was the custom for the parties make a settlement by will on their common offspring, proportioned to their several estates. For when a wife was not guilty of infidelity, her dowry was restored to her.

* This misconduct probably related to her appropriation and waste of Cicero's property. See book vi. letter 4, note 9, and letter 22 of this book.
could not take that pleasure which I ought in the virtue, gentleness, and affection of an exemplary daughter, but was even touched with inconceivable grief at the thought of such a mind being involved in such a sad fortune,—and that by no fault of hers, but by my egregious folly. Now, therefore, I neither expect consolation from you, which I know you are anxious to administer, nor advice, for which there is no room. I perceive, indeed, both by your former letter and by the last, that you have tried everything, I think, to satisfy Cicero f to Caesar with Sallustius. I see no reason why I should detain Tullia here any longer in such a state of general affliction: I therefore mean to send her back to her mother as soon as she will let me. In return for your letter of consolation, I suppose me to have said what your own understanding suggests as proper for the occasion. What you mention of Oppius’s conversation is quite consonant with my suspicion; yet, speak as I might, I should never persuade these people that I approved of their conduct. However, I will observe what moderation I can; though I see not what it signifies to me if I should incur their displeasure. I find you have just cause to prevent your coming to me,—for which I am very sorry. Nobody brings any account of Caesar’s departure from Alexandria. It is certain that no person has come from thence since the 15th of March, nor has any letter been received from him since the 15th of December; by which you see that the affair of the letter i dated February 9 (which, even if it were genuine, would be of little account), is not true. I understand that L. Terentius is come from Africa, and has arrived at Paestum. I should like to know what intelligence he brings, and how he got away, and what is doing in Africa. He is reported to have been despatched by Nasidius. If you find out how this is, I wish you would let me know. Respecting the ten ses-tertia (80l.), I will do as you direct. Farewell. June 14.

LETTER XVIII.

There is yet no rumour of Caesar’s departure from Alexandria; on the contrary, it is believed that he is fully occupied. I shall not, therefore, send my son, as I had intended; and must beg of you to extricate me from hence: for any penalty is better than continuing here. Upon this subject I have written to Antonius, and to Balbus, and to Oppius. For whether there be war in Italy by land or by sea, it is by no means desirable for me to be here. Both of these may possibly happen; certainly one of them. I learned from your account of Oppius’s conversation what was their plan of proceeding; but I beg you to make them alter it. I expect nothing whatever but what is miserable; yet nothing can be worse than my present situation. I wish you, therefore, to speak to Antonius and those others, and to expedite this business as you can. Write to me about everything as soon as possible. Farewell. June 20.

LETTER XIX.

(Graev. xxv.)

I readily assent to your letter, in which you say, in many words, that you have no advice to offer that can be of service to me. There is assuredly no consolation that can alleviate my suffering. For nothing has happened by accident, else it might be borne: but I have occasioned everything by those errors and distresses of both mind and body, which I wish my nearest con-nexions 2 had chosen to heal rather than to aggravate. Since no hope is afforded me either of your advice or of any consolation, I will not hereafter ask it of you. I trust, however, that you will not cease to write,—but will let me know whatever occurs to your mind, whilst you have anybody to send or there is anybody to send to,—which will not be very long. There is a doubtful report of his 3 having left Alexandria; which arose from a letter of Sulpicius, and has received confirmation from all the subsequent accounts. Whether it be true or false is of so little moment to me, that I know not which I should prefer. What I wrote to you some time since about the 4 will I wish they could place among the adverse letters. I am quite distressed at the wretched means of this poor creature; I think nothing ever happened like it,—and wish you could point out to me any way in which I might assist her. I see the same difficulty which there was in giving advice before. But this object disturbs me beyond everything. I was blind in the second payment of her fortune. I wish somebody else,—but it is now past. I beg you, in these ruinous circumstances, if anything can be raised and got together out of my plate, with some part of my furniture, so as to be in security, that you would pay attention to it. For things seem to be drawing to a conclusion with our losses and conditions of peace; and the present state, even without an enemy, is incapable of subsisting. You may take an opportunity, if you think fit, of talking with Terentia upon these matters. I cannot write all that I feel. Farewell. July 5th.

1 This probably relates to Caesar’s lieutenants in Italy, who acted, he says, as if they were determined to keep him shut up in Brundisium, being perhaps unwilling to determine anything about his letters till they should receive instructions from Caesar. He applies to Attius to procure authority for his removal without compromising his dignity.

2 Alluding in the first place to his brother, and perhaps also to Dolabella and Terentia.

3 Said in a sort of despair of his being able to support his troubles. See letter 9 of this book, note b. 4 Caesar.

5 See letter 16 of this book. The subsequent line is of very doubtful interpretation. It may perhaps allude to some expression of Attius’s, or his friends, calling the letter of Cicero in which he spoke of hiswill, as one of his croaking letters.

6 His daughter Tullia; for in the very next, and several other letters, he speaks of her in similar terms.
LETTER XX.

(Graec. xxiii.)

Camillus has informed me that you had spoken to him on the subject, about which I wrote* to beg you would communicate with him. I am now expecting to hear from you; though if it is otherwise than it ought to be, I do not see how it can be altered: but having received a letter from him, I want one from you also; and conclude that you had not learned all you wished,—provided only that you are well; for you mentioned your being attacked with some kind of indisposition. One Acusius arrived from Rhodes the 24th of June, and brought word that Quintus the son had set out to join Caesar the 29th of May; and that Philotimus had arrived at Rhodes the day before with a letter† for me. You will hear Acusius himself,—but he travels slowly; in consequence of which I shall deliver my letter to a more expeditious messenger. What may be in Caesar's letter I know not; but my brother Quintus highly congratulates me. To say the truth, so great has been my error that I can obtain nothing; even in imagination, which can be tolerable to me. I entreat you to think about this poor creature, and (what I lately mentioned to you) that something may be made up to secure her from want, and likewise about this will. I wish also that I had attended before to that other business*, but I was afraid of everything. There was nothing better in this deplorable situation than a separation. I should then have done something, like one alive*;—whether the cause assigned were the law for expunging debts, or the nightly violences, or his commerce with Metella, or all together*. Her property would not then have been lost, and I should have appeared to feel a becoming indignation. I well remember your letter; but I remember also that time: though anything was preferable. Now he seems himself to threaten it*; for I hear such things respecting the state of the republic*; O gods! My son-in-law especially. That he should do this; even expunge all former debts when I think with you, therefore, that a bill of divorce should be sent. He will perhaps demand the third instalment of her dower. Consider, therefore, whether I should wait till it originate with himself, or whether I should anticipate him. If it be any how possible, even by travelling at night, I will try to see you. I hope you will write to me upon these matters, and anything else which it may concern me to know. Farewell.

LETTER XXI.

(Graec. xix.)

Having an opportunity of writing by your servant, I would not let it slip, though I have nothing to say. You write to me less frequently than you used, and shorter,—which I implore to your having nothing that you think I can like to read or to hear. But if there is anything, of whatever kind it may be, I should wish you to let me know it. The only thing that would be desirable for me is, if anything can be done respecting a peace,—of which in truth I entertain no hope. Yet since you sometimes slightly mention it, you compel me to hope for what is hardly within the compass of my wishes. Philotimus is expected the middle of August: I know nothing more about him. I shall be glad to receive your answer to what I mentioned to you in a former letter†. I have yet time enough in the midst of calamities to use some precaution, though I have hitherto never used any. Farewell. July 22.

LETTER XXII.

(Graec. xxiv.)

What you some time since mentioned to me, and what you have twice repeated in your letters to Tullia about me, I perceive to be true. And I am the more miserable (though my wickedness appeared to admit of no addition) because I not only must not resent the great injury I have received; but cannot even lament it with impunity. Therefore I must try to bear it. But when I have borne it, yet all the calamities are to be sustained, which you caution me to prevent*. For such is the offence I have committed, that in very state of affairs, and under every party, it is likely to be attended with the same consequences*. But I shall proceed in my own hand, since what follows demands secrecy. See, I beseech you, even now about the will. The idea of its having been made at the time when she began to inquire, did not I imagine strike you (else she would not have asked), neither did it strike me. Yet, as if it were so, having once entered upon the subject, you may advise her to entrust it to somebody, whose fortune is exempt from the hazard of this war. I should like, above all, that it might be to you, if she is of the same mind. I conceal from the poor creature that in this I am apprehensive of that other danger*. I am well aware that nothing can be sold now; but things may be laid by and secreted, so as to escape that ruin which hangs

* Namely, the urging Terentia to make her will. See letter 16 of this book.
† The context appears sufficiently to warrant the reading with Manutius, ab illo. The text of this letter seems to be faulty in several parts.
‡ From Caesar.
§ To Tullia.
* The business of his daughter's divorce.
+ Alive to his situation.
* Any, or all of these offences on the part of Dolabella, would have justified Cicero in suing for a divorce for his daughter.
† In which it is to be supposed that Atticus advised Tullia's divorce.
* By his conduct, regardless of all propriety.
† The text is very uncertain.

* This probably alludes to Cicero's speaking too freely upon the state of affairs; which is mentioned more distinctly in the latter part of this letter, and was before noticed in letter 17 of this book.
* His not being at liberty to quit Brandianus.
+ The danger of giving offence to Caesar.
* Cicero conceived so much displeasure with his having joined Pompeius, and the Pompeians with his having deserted them, that his own ruin would ensue either way.
+ The former part of his letter being written by an amanuensis.
* The confession of his property, in apprehension of which he wished to have Terentia's settled by will, and over us. For when you say that my own property will be ready for my use, and yours for Terentia; yours I grant; but what can there be of mine? Respecting Terentia however (to pass by all other grievances, which are innumerable), what can be worse than this? You had written to her to send a bill of exchange for twelve sestertia (100L), this being what remained out of the silver. She sent me ten sestertia (80L), and added that this was all which remained. You see what a person would do in a large concern, who could parol this little from a small one. Philotimus has not only not arrived, but has not even acquainted me by letter, or by message, what he is doing. Some, who are come from Ephesus, relate that they saw him there going to law about some disputes of his own, which it is probable he may put off till Caesar’s arrival. So that I imagine he either has nothing which he thinks it of importance to deliver quickly to me (in which case I am the more neglected); or, if he has anything, he does not trouble himself to convey it to me till all his own business is finished. All this gives me great uneasiness; yet not so much, as perhaps it ought; for I apprehend nothing signifying less to me, than what is brought from thence. Why I think so, I am persuaded you know. When you caution me about accommodating my countenance and language to the time; difficult as this is, I would however command myself, if I thought it at all signified to me. When you say in your letter that you think the business of Africa may be settled, I wish you had added why you think so. No reason occurs to me to suppose that it can be done; but if there should be anything, which has a ray of consolation, I hope you will write to acquaint me with it: or if, as I perceive, there should be nothing, write to tell me even this. If I should soon hear anything, I will write to you. Farewell. August 6th.

LETTER XXIII.

On the 16th of August arrived C. Trebonius from Seleuces Pieris, after a voyage of twenty-seven days. He reported that he had seen Quintus, the son, and Hirtius, with Caesar, at Antioch; and that they had obtained all that they asked on behalf of Quintus without any difficulty. At which I should the more rejoice, if this concession afforded me any assurance of hope. But there are other things to be feared, and from other quarters; and what is granted by Caesar, as by a master, is still under his control. He has also pardoned Salustius; and indeed is said to refuse nobody. Which itself is suspicious that inquiry may only be deferred. M. son to Quintus Gallius, has restored Salustius’ slaves. He came to transport the legions into Sicily; and brings word that Caesar is presently going thither from Patrae. If he does, I shall go to some place nearer Rome, as I wish I had done before; and I am longing to receive your answer to the letter in which I lately requested your advice. Farewell. August 17.

LETTER XXIV.

(Gravi. xxii.)

On the 27th of August I received your letter, dated the 21st; and the pain arising from Quintus’s former misconduct, which I had now laid aside, I felt most severely upon reading his letter. Though you could not any how avoid sending me the letter, yet I would rather it had not been sent. In answer to what you say about the will, you must judge what can be done, and how. About the money, he wrote as I informed you before. If there is occasion, I must draw from the resource you mention. It is not probable that Caesar will reach Athens by the 1st of September. Many things are said to detain him in Asia, especially Pharmacis 6. The 12th legion, to which Sulla came in the first instance, is reported to have driven him away by stones 6. They do not suppose that any of them will stir. It is expected that Caesar will proceed directly from Patrae to Sicily; but if this is true, he will be under the necessity of coming hither. And I wish he had come before: for I should then have got away somewhere or other. Now I am afraid of being obliged to wait, and among other things to bear in misery the unhealthiness of this place. What you advise of my taking care to act suitably to the time, I would do, if circumstances permitted, and if it were any how possible. But midst such great offences on my part, and such great injuries on the part of my relations, I can neither do anything with becoming dignity, nor wear the appearance of it. You compare the times of Sulla: when everything was conducted splendidly in its kind, though a little intemperately in the manner. But I lay aside all considerations of this sort; and I rather prefer what may be advantageous to the community, with whose interest I have united my own. I should hope however that you will write to me as often as you can, particularly as nobody else writes: but if everybody

1 It may seem at first contradictory, that Cicero should here speak of removing from Brundisium, when in the preceding letter he regrets his inability to do so. But probably his stay at Brundisium may have been thought preparatory, in order to salute Caesar on his arrival; and this reason would often been reason why he would pass into Sicily and Africa without touching in Italy. 6 I care 22 of this book. 6 Pharmacies, the son of Mithridates, had successfully opposed Caesar’s forces in Asia Minor under Cu. Domitius Calvinus. 6 They refused to go into Africa till they should have received their pay. See letter 25 of this book. 6 This account of the troops refusing to march. 6 Alluding to Torentius, to Quintus, and to Dolabella, whose behaviour had very much vexed and mortified his too irritable mind. 7 Atticus had probably recommended the necessity of temporising, as in the times of Sulla; to which I understand Cicero to reply, that the cases are not similar; and that at all events his own view was directed to the public good, not to his private security. Literally thus—"But these things are of such a kind as I must forget."
wrote, yet I should be very anxious for your letters.
You say that Caesar will be more disposed to forgive Quintus at my intercession; but I before wrote you word, that he at once granted to Quintus the son everything he desired, without any mention of me. Farewell.

LETTER XXV.
(Cweek, xxii.)
Balbus's messenger delivered the packet 1 to me very carefully. For 2 you write as if you were afraid I may not have received those letters, which I wish indeed had never been delivered to me; for they increased my affliction; and into whose ever hands they had fallen, they would have communicated nothing new. For what is so universally known, as his 3 animosity against me, and this style of his letters? Which I imagine Caesar transmitted to these persons, not because he was offended with Quintus's baseness, but for the sake of making my misfortunes more public. For when you say that you are afraid they may injure him 4, and that you are endeavouring to remedy this, Caesar did not even wait to be asked about him 5. This I am not sorry for: I am more sorry that my own

2 This packet contained copies of Quintus's letters, which seem to have been transmitted to Italy by Caesar's direction.
3 This explains the reason of Cicero's mentioning the safe delivery of the packet.

BOOK XII.

LETTER I.
It is now the eleventh day since we parted, and I scrwwl these few lines, on the point of going from home before dawn. I design to get to-day to Asculum, to-morrow to Tusculum, and to spend there one day; so that on the 28th I shall observe our appointment. And I wish I may be able to run immediately afterwards to the embrace of my dear Tullia, and to get a kiss of Attica 6.
Pray write to me all about her; 7 that while I stay in Tusculum, I may know what she prattles; or, if she is in the country, what she writes to you. In the meantime either send her, or give her, my love, and likewise to Pilia; and though we shall soon meet, yet write to me if you have anything to say.

While I was folding up this letter, the messenger, who had travelled all night, came to me with yours. Upon reading which, I have been much concerned at Attica's indisposition. I have learned from your letter everything else, which I expected. But as to what you say of the fire in the morning 8, it is a greater sign of age to waver

6 Attica's daughter.
7 What relates to Attica.
8 It is reasonable to suppose this may refer to some expression of Atticus joking with Cicero for wanting a fire in the morning, like an old man; to which Cicero replies, requests should have no effect. Sulla, as I conjecture, will be here to-morrow with Messala.

They are hastening to Caesar after being driven away by the soldiers, who refuse to go anywhere till they have received their pay. He will therefore come bither, which was not expected. But it will be some time first; for he travels so as to spend several days in the principal towns. And, do what he will, Pharnaces will occasion some delay. What therefore do you think I ought to do?
For my health already supports with difficulty the effect of this unwholesome air, which occasions additional uneasiness in my distress. Shall I beg these people, who are going to him, to make my excuses? And shall I proceed nearer to Rome?
Pray consider this; and, what in spite of my repeated entreaties you have not hitherto done, assist me with your advice. I know it is a thing of difficulty; yet do it as may be in these troubles.
It is besides of great consequence to me to see you: I shall have gained something, if that happens.
You will attend to the business of the will, as you mention.

[3 days after Cicero had sent this last letter, Caesar unexpectedly arrived in Italy. He landed at Tarentum in September, and on the first notice of his setting forward towards Rome, Cicero set out on foot to meet him.
Caesar no sooner saw him, than he alighted and ran to embrace him; then walked with him alone, converting familiarly with him, for some time. Cicero followed Cesar to Rome. At the end of the year Caesar embarked for Africa, to pursue the war against Scipio and the other Pompeian generals.]

LETTER II.
Here, however 9, it is rumoured that Marcus has perished by shipwreck; that Attius has been delivered up alive into the hands of the soldiers 10; that fifty ships have been carried into Utica by this adverse wind; that Pompeius is not to be found, nor has he been in the Balearic islands, as that it is a greater sign of age to lose one's memory, as Atticus appears to have done in making some mistake respecting the arrangement of the days after Cicero should have returned to Rome.

9 To be presumed that this refers to a previous letter received from Attius, in which he might have said there was no news.
10 The Pompeians.
11 The son of Ca. Pompeius Magnus.
12 Mafrocom, Minores, and Iv.res.
Patient, affirms. But there is no authority for anything. I send you what has been talked of in your last. We shall be celebrated at Prænestæ: it will be Hirtius, and all that party; and the games are to last eight days. What feasting! What gaiety! While this is going on, the business has perhaps been settled. O marvellous men! But Balbus is building: for what cares he? Yet, if you consider, for one who studies not what is right, but what is agreeable, has he not done well? "And are you as well advanced in life as I? If you have time you shall explain your purpose, if you mean to do anything."
If you ask what I think, I think the proper purpose of life is, to be useful. But why should I say much? I shall presently see you; and, as I hope, from the road straight to me; when we will together appoint a day for Tyrannio, and arrange anything else that is to be done.

LETTER III.

EXCEPTING yourself, I believe nobody is less of a flatterer than I am; or if we are either of us occasionally so towards anybody, at least it is never towards each other. Listen to me, then, when I say this without any deceit: that I wish I may die, my Atticus, if not only my Tusculenum (where I am otherwise very happy), but the islands of the blessed spirits are so precious in my sight, that I could be content always to be there without you.
Therefore, to attribute to you the same feeling (which, indeed, is the case), let these three days of which you speak be endured patiently; but I should be glad to know whether you come to-day immediately from the auction, or on what day. In the mean time, I occupy myself with my books, and am sorry that I have not yet gonn usus island's history. However, not to be silent about my affairs, there are three ways of recovering that debt which is granted me by Cesar; either by purchasing at 1 Caesar's party.

2 The loss of the war in Africa.
3 To be given to sports at such a time.
4 Agreeably to the maxims of the Epicureans, which Atticus had adopted.
5 I understand the foregoing to be addressed to Cicero in the person of Atticus, to which Cicero subjoins his reply.
6 Confomably with what he says in his first book De Legibus, c. 20. "Quique cum antiquis annus, quod secundum naturam esset, quos favererum in silvis, bonum esse deceretupern." And De Fin. iv. 8, "Sumnum leonum est-onnibus, aut maximis rebus ilia, quae secundum naturam sint, frumentum vivere."
7 To read together some work which Tyrannio had already written. See letter 8 of this book.
8 Collected also the Fortunate Islands, into which the spirits of good men were supposed to pass after death.
They are believed to be the same as the Canaries. These were formerly only casually and imperfectly known, and had ascribed to them beauties which they never really possessed.
9 Hod tridium probably refers to Atticus's own expression in some former letter, putting off his visit to Cicero for three days. It may be observed that Cicero was a very careful writer, often writing his letters before it was light; he may very well, therefore, have sent to Atticus at Rome, only about twelve miles distant, to know if he might expect him that day.
10 It having been seen that at the approach of the war Cicero was induced to Cesar, it is not probable that he could subsequently have become his creditor. I am in-the sale (I would rather lose it: though independent of its baseness, I imagine this would itself be to lose it); or by assignment from a broker at a year's credit (who is there, that I could trust? Or when that Metonic year arrive?); or by Vectenus's agreement for one half.
Think about it. I am afraid, after all, that this man may make no sale; but that he may hasten to add his applause at the conclusion of the games, lest a person of such importance should be disregarded. But it shall be attended to.

LETTER IV.

Your letter was most acceptable and delightful to me. How say you? I have recovered my holiday. For I was troubled at Tiro's account of your having appeared to him to be flushed. I shall add, therefore, one day more, as you propose.
Respecting Cato, it is a problem fit for Archimedes. It is impossible for me to write what your companions will read, not merely with satisfaction, but even with patience. For even if I should refrain from mentioning the opinions he has de-divered, and all that zeal and wisdom which he showed on behalf of the republic; if I should dily attempt to commend his dignity and firmness;

this itself may be worth hearing; but such a man cannot justly be praised, unless it is set forth that this state of things which is now established he saw while it was yet future, and strove to prevent;
and that he might not see it accomplished, reliished his life. Of these things what is there that I can render palatable to Aledius? But pray take care of your health, and that prudence, which you show in everything, show especially in your own recovery.

LETTER V.

"QUINTUS the father for the fourth time," or rather for the thousandth time, shows his want of sense in taking pleasure at his son and Statius being clined to think, therefore, that this debt to Cicero may have been due from one of Pompeius's party, whose gods were contubercled, but out of which Cicero may have permitted Cicero to indemnify himself. See letter 1 of this book, note 5.

6 Alluding to the cycle of 19 years invented by Meto, in which time it was calculated (but not correctly) that the sun and moon would return to the same positions about the earth.
7 Being content to receive one-half of the debt, as it is probable Vectenus might have done on some similar occasion.
8 Said ironically, importing that this partisan of Cesar's, whoever he was, might be glad to push himself into notice by his applause, and escape the discharge of his debt.
9 The recovery of his money.
10 Probably Cicero might have designed to go up to Rome on occasion of his friend's illness, but upon receiving a good account, determined to prolong his holidays another day.
11 It was a problem of exceeding difficulty to write his proposed panegyric upon Cato so as not to offend Caesar.
12 Of Cesar's party.
13 Some one studious of pleasing Caesar. He is mentioned again, letters 23 and 34 of this book.
14 The original is part of a verse of Ennius, quoted by \textit{Aul. Gell.} x. 1, "Quintus pater quantum fit consul."
made Lupercans a, to see his family loaded with this double disgrace. I may add also Philomitus as a third. What singular folly; if my own b were not still greater. But what face can he have to ask you to defray his expenses for this purpose? Suppose him to have come to no "dry spring," but to Pirene itself; or, as you say, to drink in your fountain *the emerging flood of Alpheus c, e specially under his great embarrassments. Where can this be his affair. I am much pleased with my "Cato:" but so was Lucilius with his performances. About Calvis you will inquire, as you mention; I am quite ignorant. Not only his ability, but his character should be known. You will let me know if you have any doubts about Hortensius and Virginius; though, as far as I see, you will not easily find anything more desirable. You will negotiate with Mustella, as you mention, when Crispus arrives. I wrote to Aulus, to tell him that I had explained to Piso what I knew for certain about a gold. For I agree with you that this business is protracted too long, and that everything should now be got together from all parts. I plainly perceive that your whole time and attention is taken up with my concerns; and that your desire of coming to me is prevented by my business. But I consider you as actually with me, not only because you are conducting my affairs, but also because I seem to see how you conduct them. For no hour of your occupation passes without my knowledge, I find that Tubulus d was prator in the consulship of L. Metellus and Q. Maximus. Now I wish to know under what consuls P. Scævola, the Pontifex Maximus, was tribune of the people. I imagine it was under the next, Cæpio and Pompeius; for he was prator under P. Furius and Sex. Atius. You will give me, therefore; the date of his tribunate; and, if you can, let me know with what crime Tubulus was charged. Pray see, too, whether L. Libo (he who accused Sex. Gallus) was tribune of the people in the consulship of Censorinus and Manilius, or in that of T. Quintus and Manius Acius. For I am perplexed by the Fannian epome of Brutus, or rather Brutus's epome of Fannius's history. I wrote what I found in the latter part of that work; in following which I called this Fannius, who wrote the history, son-in-law to Luælius: but you demonstratively refuted it. Now Brutus and Fannius refute you. I had understood from Hortensius, who is good authority, that it was as Brutus states. Disentangle, therefore, this matter. I have sent Tiro to meet Dolabella. He will return to me the thirteenth; and I shall hope to see you the next day. I perceive the great interest you take in my dear Tullia; and that this may always be the case I earnestly entreat you. So, then, all is still open to consideration; for so you write word. Though I wished to avoid the beginning of the month, and to escape the ledger of the Niciasios, and I have my own accounts to make up; yet nothing is of sufficient moment to make me absent myself from you; being actually at Rome, and hoping very soon to see you; though I understand that every hour long which I am expecting you. You know that I am not flatterer, and say, therefore, something less than I feel.

LETTER VI.

With respect to Calvis, pray take care that there is no defect in the gold. I know the way of these things; but the loss from the exchange is quite enough; and if to this is added the gold itself—but what am I saying? You will see after it. Here you have something in Hesiodus's style, which Varro commends. I come now to Tyrannio e. What say you? Is this true? and without me? How often have I, when I was at leisure, yet refrained from reading it without you? How, therefore, can you excuse this? There is but one way; by sending me the book, which I particularly beg you to do; though the book itself will not delight me more than I have been delighted with your admiration of it. For I love everybody that shows his attachment to his countrymen f; and am pleased with your great admiration of so subtle a speculation. Though indeed your observations are all of that kind g; for you are fond of that science by which alone the understanding is nourished. But pray, what is there in that acute and deep research, which has reference to the ultimate principle h of a The Lupercans were those who conducted the festivities of the Lupercalia, instituted in honor of Pan, on which occasion they ran about the streets almost naked. There were formerly two companies of Lupercans, to whom Cæsar had lately added a third, into which people were desirous of being admitted; but Cicero thought this flattery unbecoming his family. Statius was a freed-man of Quintus's.

b By his own folly he probably means the part he had acted in the civil war, with which he always appears to be dissatisfied.

c An abundant spring near Corinth, sacred to the Muse of Homer.

d The original is taken from Plutarch, who has characterized the fountain Arethusa, feigned to be derived from the river Alpheus in the Peloponnesus, passing under the sea and rising up in Sicily. Cicero means to say that it was absurd for his brother, who was considerably embarrassed in his fortune, to incur such an expense, and to rely upon Atticus's resources.

e Some obscure author, whose works pleased nobody but himself.

f This part of the letter seems to allude to Cicero's negotiations with different bankers, or brokers, about the sale of his plate, which he wished to exchange for gold, either to be secreted or taken with him, in case of insurrection, or counter-revolution.

g This and what follows probably alludes to Cicero's treatise "De Finibus," on which he was then engaged, and doubtful of some circumstances and dates mentioned in the second book.

h I understand this to relate to his daughter's divorce.

i This is supposed to be owing to his unwillingness to appear in the senate convened by order of Caesar on the first of August.

j The meaning of this is uncertain, but most probably relates to the payment of interest to some usurers of this name, if he should be obliged to borrow money.

k I understand this to mean, I know how liable gold is to be adulterated.

l Some author, whose manner of writing bore some resemblance to the preceding sentence, perhaps the interpolation and interjection.

m See letter 2 of this book.

n Atticus, though not properly an Athenian, is elsewhere considered as such: as "Hs enfim ex Athens collocavit, ut nunc unus ex Atticis." [De Fin. v. 8.] as indeed his name implies. Cicero's meaning in this place is, that Atticus, by his approbation of Tyrannio's subtility in reasoning, shows his attachment to the taste of his countrymen the Athenians.

o Distinguished by niceness of judgment and acuteness, by which the mind is exercised.

moral? However, this is a long inquiry; and you are engaged, perhaps, in some business of mine; and instead of that dry hasking which you overdid on my lawn, I shall expect to be entertained with ointments and engravings. But, to go back to my former subject: if you love me, send the book; for it is truly yours since it has been sent to you. "Have you so much leisure from your affairs, Cato," that you can read also my "Orator?" Well done! I am much obliged; and shall be still more so, if not only in your own copy, but in those for other people, you will get your librarians to insert Aristophanes in the place of Eupolis. Cesar, I imagine, meant to rally you upon using the word quidnon, which, however, is quaint and pleasing. At the same time he so insists upon you being under no anxiety, that I can have no doubt of his intention. I am sorry that Attica’s indisposition should continue so long; but as she has now no shivering, I hope all is going on as we could wish.

LETTER VII.

I HAVE made a short note of everything that you desire, and have delivered it to Eros; indeed, more than you ask; and amongst other things what relates to my son, the first notice of whose wish I received from you. I talked freely with him: and, if it is convenient to you, should be glad if you would inquire about it from himself. But why should I delay to inform you? I explained to him that by my desire you had applied to him to know whether there was anything that he wished or wanted; and that you had acquainted me with his wish of going to Spain, and his want of a liberal allowance. With respect to his allowance, I told him I would do as much as Publius, or the flamen Lentulus, had done for their sons. Respecting Spain, I mentioned two objections; one, the same that occurred to you, that I was fearful of incurring reproach. Was it not enough to have relinquished our arms in support of the Pompeian party? Must we also take arms against it? The other objection was, that he would be mortified by seeing his cousin admitted to greater familiarity and favour. I would rather he should enjoy my liberality than his own liberty. Yet I gave my consent: for I understood that you did not greatly object to it. I must think about it again and again, and I beg you to do the same. It is a great thing, and one that involves no difficulty to remain quiet: the other is very doubtful. But we will consider of

LETTER VIII.

Many persons approve of this measure respecting Ciceron. He is a very proper companion. But we must previously see about this first payment, for the day approaches, and he travels quickly. Pray write to inform me what news Celer brings of Caesar’s transactions with the candidates; whether he intends to go himself into the Campus Faenecularius, or into the Campus Martius. And I should like to know whether it is necessary to be at Rome at the comitia; for I must needs satisfy both Pilla, and especially Attica.

LETTER IX.

(Grev. x.)

This is sad indeed about Athamas. Your concern is natural, but ought to be moderated. There are many ways of consolation; of which the properest is, to let reason do that which time will do. But let us take care of Alexis, that counter-part of Tiro, whom I have sent back sick to Rome; and if there is any epidemical sickness on the Quirinal hill, let us transfer him with Tisamemmus to my house. All the upper part of the house is unoccupied, as you know. I think this is worth considering.

LETTER X.

(Grev. xi.)

I am sorry for poor Sejus: but whatever happens in the course of nature must be borne with patience. For indeed what are we? Or how long are we likely to regard these things? Let us consider

This probably alludes to some conversation on the foundation of moral duty, held at Cicero’s house during the time of their banishing the sun, as was usual among the ancient Romans. The word abolere seems to imply that Atticus had carried this to a prejudicial extent: the ointments and elegance mentioned are intended to designate Atticus’s politeness compared with Cicero’s drier statement: ointments being often used previous to haking.

This is a verse of Terence.

Cicero, in his piece entitled "Orator," had, it seems, erroneously put Eupoli for Aristophanes.

Atticus had applied to Caesar to spare the estates of the people about Buttrum, which were threatened with confiscation for their attachment to Pompeius.

See letter 1 of this book.

To join Caesar’s army against Pompeius’ sons.

It. About Balbus I had made a memorandum, and think of doing so, as you advise, as soon as he comes back. But if his coming is delayed, I shall at all events wait three days. I omitted to mention also that Dolabella is with me.

Ciceron.

This is uncertain to what this alludes.

It is probable that this may mean Cesar, on his return from the Spanish war.

This may perhaps mean, whether Cesar will appoint the magistrates “in a field of fenels,” that is, in Spain, or suffer them to be regularly elected in the “field of Mars,” or Campus Martius at Rome; for both Plinian and Dioscorides take notice of fenel (vilinum, fenelum) being particularly cultivated in Spain; and Strabo mentions a place in Spain called “the fenel plain,” from this circumstance.

Ciceron the son. It probably relates to his going to Athens to complete his studies. Instead of joining Caesar’s army, which seems to have been returning from Spain.

It appears elsewhere that the son was accompanied to Athens by L. Montanus, who is probably therefore the person here intended. See letter 5 of this book.

Celer, who was a candidate probably for the praetorship, is supposed to have been a relation of Pilia’s, perhaps his brother, whom Ciceron would not fail to support if there should be a free election. For Attica he often playfully professes his affection.

what more nearly concerns ourselves, (yet not much either), what I should do about the senate.
Not to omit anything, Cæsarius has written to me to say that Posthumia, Sulpicius's wife, is come to his house. I have already told you that I have no thoughts at present of Pompeius Magnus's daughter. The other whom you mention, I believe you know. I never saw anything more disgusting. But I shall presently see you : therefore when we meet.
After I had sealed my letter, I received yours. I hear with pleasure of Atticus's cheerfulness, yet partake of your anxiety.

LETTER XI.

(Grav. ix.)

I assure you I am very well pleased with being here, and that, more and more every day, but for the reason I which I mentioned in a former letter. Nothing can be pleasanter than this retreat, if it were not a little interrupted by the son of Amyn tas. What a tiresome loquacity! In other respects, you can imagine nothing more delightful than the house, the coast, the view of the sea, and, in short, the whole together. But even this does not require a long letter, and I have nothing particular to tell you, and am very sleepy.

LETTER XII.

On the subject of the dower I want you so much the more to clear me from all imputation. Balbus's delegation of his authority is quite royal. Make an end by any means. It is incredible for the business to lie in this state of suspense. The isle of Arpinas may be very proper for the deification, but I fear it will not be thought to confer the same degree of honour. It lies out of 8 To avoid either offending Cæsar or acting in a manner unbecoming his former character and connexions.

9 Previous to this time Cicero had divorced his wife Terentia, and was thinking of marrying again, which he soon after did.
1 Probably at Astura. See letters 19 and 40 of this book.
2 To this place Cicero retired after the death of his daughter, who died in childbirth.
3 Perhaps the absence of Atticus. See letter 16 of this book, which may not improbably be the letter alluded to; the order of these short letters (many of them little more than notes, and without a date) having been apparently deranged in many instances. It would be a laborious and fruitless task to endeavour to rectify it.
4 Philippus, so called from Philippus, king of Macedo ga, who was the son of Amyntas. He is mentioned again, letters 16 and 18 of this book.
5 It seems to me most probable that this may relate to the repayment of Terentia's dower upon her divorce.
6 It is quite uncertain to what this alludes; most proba bly to some debt due from Cicero, the care of which Balbus had delegated to some third person. It may be that the discharge of this prevented the immediate payment of the dower.
7 Arpinas was a place inland, but surrounded by a divi sion and re-union of the river Fihrenus before it falls into the Liris.—De Logibus, lib. 3.
8 This must allude to his design of defying his daughter Tulla, who had lately died, though nothing has yet been said of that event. It is probable that the letter may have been misplaced. See letter 18 of this book.
9 Arpinas, though in many respects very proper for the erection of a temple consecrated to his daughter, yet lay the way. My wish therefore is for the gardens; which I will, however, examine on my arrival.
About Epicurus it shall be as you please; though I incline to this latter kind of persons. It is incredible how eagerly some people desire the other. To the ancients therefore; for this is free from invidiousness. I have nothing to tell you: but I have determined, nevertheless, to write every day for the sake of eliciting your answers; not that I expect anything from them, but yet I some how do expect. Therefore, whether you have anything to say or nothing, yet write something; and take care of yourself.

LETTER XIII.

I am not easy about Attica, though I rely upon Craterus's opinion. Brutus's letter is sensible and friendly, but made me shed many tears. This retreat is less worrying to me than that con course of people. I want nobody but you. How ever, I occupy myself in study with the same ease as if I was at home. Yet the same violence of grief presses and hangs upon me; not that I indulge it, but still I do not resist it. Respecting what you mention of Appuleius, I apprehend there is no occasion for any exertion on your part, or on that of Balbus and Oppius, to whom he pledged himself, and desired I might be informed that he would not give me any trouble. Never theless, get me excused from day to day on account of my health. Lænas had promised to do this. Engage C. Septimius and L. Statilius. In short, nobody that you ask will refuse to swear. But if there is any difficulty, I will go up myself, and will swear to a continual sickness. For as I must absent myself from these meetings, I would rather it should appear to be done by law than by grief. I should be glad if you would call upon Cocceius; for he does not perform what he promised. I wish to buy some place to hide and shelter my affliction.

too much out of common observation to do her the honour he desired.
10 The gardens in the vicinity of Rome.
11 Cicero has been shown before to be at this time engaged in his book "De Finibus," in which he discusses in a dia logue the opinions of different philosophers respecting the constitution of moral virtue, and seems to have consulted Atticus upon the person whom he should introduce to support Epicurus's doctrines.
12 By "this latter kind" I conceive to be meant not "more recent," but on the contrary, those who had been some time dead, but whom he had eventually named last among dif ferent descriptions of persons.
13 By introducing only ancient characters he would occasion no ill-will.
14 Craterus was a physician of eminence at Rome.
15 A letter of condolence on the death of Tuilla.
16 At Astura, near Antium.
17 Among his books, in his usual residence at Rome.
18 See letter 42 of this book.
19 This Atticus appears to have been lately incorpo rated into the college of augurs, on which occasion several festivals were held, from which Cicero desired to be ex cused.
20 It seems to have been necessary for three of the college to attest the incapacity of one from attending; he therefore desires Atticus to apply to C. Septimius and L. Statilius, in addition to Lænas. See letter 14 of this book.
LETTER XIV.

I wrote to you yesterday about excusing me to Appuleius. I imagine there is no difficulty. Whomsoever you call upon, nobody will refuse. But speak to Septimius, and Lænas, and Statilius; for there must be three. Lænas promised me to manage the whole. As to what you mention of being called upon by Junius⁵; assuredly Cornificius is a rich man: however, I should like to know when it is that I am said to have been bound; and whether for the father or for the son. Nevertheless, as you say, see Cornificius's agents, and the surveyor⁴ Appuleius. In wishing me to be restored from my affliction, you act as you always do; but you are witness that I have not been wanting to myself. For there is nothing written by anybody on the lessening of affliction, which I have not read at your house. But my grief overcomes all consolation. I have even done what nobody ever did before me, written for my own consolation. I will send the book to you, if the clerges have transcribed it. I assure you, no comfort is equal to it. I write all day long; not that I expect any good from it, but for the time I am pre-occupied; not effectually indeed, for the violence of my grief presses me; but yet I am soothed; and I strive by all means to compose not my mind only, but, if possible, my very countenance. In doing which I sometimes think I am doing wrong, sometimes I think I should do wrong if I omitted it. There is some relief in retirement: but it would be much better if you were here. This is the only reason of my removal. For, in regard to my distress, it suits well. Yet this also is a source of regret; that you can no longer entertain the same regard for me; those qualifications in which you used to take pleasure are gone. I wrote to you before about Brutus's letter to me. It was sensibly written, but afforded me no comfort. What he wrote to you of his coming hither; that I should like; for such appears to be his affection that it could not fail of doing me some good. If you know by your own intelligence, I hope you will write to me, especially to inform me when Tarentum's sets out. I am concerned about Attica, yet I rely upon Craterus. Do not let Pilia despond. Your own accustomed anxiety is enough for everybody.

LETTER XV.

As it is not thought right to make a general excuse to Appuleius, you will take care that it is renewed from day to day. In this solitude I have no intercourse with anybody; but penetrate in the morning into a thick rough wood, from whence I do not go out before evening. Next to you, nothing is more pleasing to me than solitude. There all my conversation is with books. Even this is interrupted by tears, which I resist as much as I can; but hitherto I am unequal to it. I will ⁴ This Junius seems to have called upon Atticus, as Cleero's friend, about some money due from Cornificius, for whom Cleero had been surety.

⁵ This is evidently a different person from that Appuleius mentioned in the beginning of the letter.

LETTER XVI.

I would not have you neglect your own concerns to come to me. I will rather go to some place nearer, if you should be prevented much longer. Though, indeed, I should not have removed out of your sight, unless I had found that nothing was of any use to me; yet if there was any alleviation, it was only in you; and as soon as there can be from anything, it will be from you. Now, however, I cannot bear the very circumstances of being without you: but I do not approve of staying in your house; nor can I stay in my own; nor if I were anywhere near, should I still be with you; for the same cause would prevent your being with me, which prevents you now. As yet nothing has been more agreeable to me than this solitude, which I wish Philippus may not destroy, for he arrived yesterday evening. Writing and study do not assuage my grief, but they interrupt it.

LETTER XVII.

Marcianus has informed me that my excuse has been made to Appuleius by Laterensis, Lænas, Torquatus, and Strabo. I should be glad if you would get letters written to them expressive of my thankfulness. As to what Flavius says of my having been surety for Cornificius more than five-and-twenty years ago, though the defaulter is rich, and Appuleius is a liberal appraiser, yet I should be glad if you would find out from the books of the joint securities, whether it is really so. For previously to my being made I had no intercourse with Cornificius. I do not, however, mean to deny it; but I should like to know the truth. You may also call upon the agents, if you think proper. Though what does it signify to me? Nevertheless⁵—You will inform me of Pansa's departure when you know it. Give my love to Attica, and pray take good care of her. My respects to Pilia.

LETTER XVIII.

Whilst I avoid all recollections which by a certain sting exasperate my pain, I refrain from advising with you; but trust you will excuse me in this matter, whether I am doing right or wrong. For some of those authors, which I now chiefly read, say, that it is a duty to do what I have frequently mentioned to you, and what I would have you approve. I speak of the temple; which I request you to consider in proportion to the affection you bear me. I have no hesitation about the kind of building, being satisfied with Chatus's design; nor about the thing itself, which is deter-

mired; but I sometimes doubt about the situation. I wish therefore that you would think about it. Yes, I will consecrate her, as much as can be done in these learned times, with monuments of every kind, drawn from the best sense of all writers, both Greek and Latin. This may perhaps renew my wound; but I consider myself bound, as it were, by a vow and promise; and that long space of time, when I shall cease to be, influences me more than this short period, which, however, seems to me too long. For, after trying everything, I find nothing in which I can acquiesce. While I was engaged in that treatise about which I wrote to you before, I was, as it were, cherishing my sufferings. Now I reject everything, and find nothing better than solitude; which Philippus has not interrupted, as I apprehended. For after paying his compliments to me yesterday, he immediately set off for Rome. I have sent you the letter which I wrote to Brutus at your recommendation. You will take care to have it transmitted along with yours. I have, however, sent a copy of it to you, that, if you do not approve of it, you may not send it. When you say that my domestic concerns are regularly administered, I should like to know what you allude to. There are some things about which I am suspicious. See that Cocceius does not fail me. For what Libo promises, as Eros writes me word, I consider as certain. Respecting my principal, I trust to Sul- picius and to Egatus. Why should you trouble yourself about Appuleius, when the excuse is so easy? Consider how difficult it is for you to come to me, as you propose. For it is a long journey; and I cannot take leave of you without great pain at your departure, which it may perhaps he necessary for you to make speedily. But all as you please. For whatever you do I shall think to be done for the best, and done for my sake. Having learned yesterday from other letters the circum- stance of Antonius's approach, I was surprised there should be nothing said about it in yours. But it may possibly have been written the day before it was sent. Not that I care about such matters. But I suppose he is come up about his sureties. As to what you mention of Terentius's speaking about the witnesses to my will, in the first place, be assured that I care nothing about it, nor have I room to admit any trifling or new con- cern. But what resemblance is there between the two cases? She would not employ those who she thought would inquire, unless they knew what it contained. Was there any danger of that in my case? However, let her do as I do. I will give my will to be read by whom she pleases: he will find that I could not have behaved more honour- ably towards my grandchild than I have done. For as to not calling upon her to attest it; in the first place, it never entered into my mind; next, it did not for that reason, because it was of no consequence. Yourself know (if only you recol- lect) that I desired you at the time to bring some of your people. For what need was there of many? Indeed I meant your attendants: upon which you suggested that I should send to Silius: whence it arose that I sent to Publilius: but neither was necessary. You will manage this as you think best.

LETTER XIX.

This place is indeed pleasant, and open to the sea, and capable of being seen both from Antium and from Circum; but we must consider how, amongst all the change of possessors, who may be innumerable in an endless posterity (if only this slate of things should last), that which is con- secrated may still subsist. I have now no need of revenue, and can be content with a little. I sometimes think of getting some of the gardens on the other side of the Tiber; for this reason, that I know nothing which would be so much frequented. Which of them it should be, we will consider when we meet; but the temple must be finished this summer. At all events settle with Apella, the Chian, about the pillars. I approve of what you mentioned about Cocceius and Libo; and especially about my judgiship. Respecting the bond, you will let me hear when you have discovered any- thing; yet I should like to know what Cornelian's agents say, but would not have you give yourself much trouble about it while you are so engaged. Respecting Antonius, Balbus also wrote to me in a joint letter with Oppius, and with your concurrence, that I need not be disturbed. I returned my thanks to them: but, as I have before told you, I would have you understand that I neither was dis- turbed at that news, nor shall I now be disturbed at anything. If Pansa has set out to-day, as you supposed, henceforward begin to inform me what you expect about Brutus's arrival; that is, on what day. If you know where he now is, you will easily be able to form a conjecture. Concerning what you mention to Tiro about Terentia, I entreat you, my Atticus, to undertake the whole business. You perceive that some duty on my part is implicated, upon which you are fully informed; and some sup- pose young Cicero's fortune to be concerned. The former consideration weighs far more the most with me, as being more sacred and important; especially as I conceive this latter to be neither well founded nor settled.

LETTER XX.

You seem not yet entirely to understand how indifferent I am about the arrival of Antonius, and about everything of the kind. On the subject of Terentia I wrote to you in the letter I sent yester- day. When you exhort me, and say that others expected it of me likewise, that I should dissemble the excess of my affection; can I do more than spend whole days in study? Though I do it, not for the sake of dissembling, but rather of soothing and healing my mind; and if I do not reap adequate advantage, surely I do enough for appearance. I

1 This being probably a relation of that Pubililia whom he had lately taken to his second wife, may have excited the greater suspicion and indignation in Terentia.

2 Astara.

3 It is uncertain what to this alludes; perhaps some occasion of Cicero's acting as a judge, from which Atticus may have got him excused.

write the less to you, because I am expecting your reply to my letter of yesterday. I am expecting particularly to hear about the temple; and something also about Terentia. I wish you would inform me in your next letter, whether Cn. Ceplio, the father of that Servilia who married Claudius, perished by shipwreck in the lifetime of his father, or after his death; likewise whether Ruttilus died before, or after her son C. Cotta. They relate to the book I have been writing on the moderation of grief.

LETTER XXI.

I HAVE read Brutus’s letter 8, and return it to you. To say the truth, it is not a very civil answer to your questions. But this is his affair. Though one thing shows a shameful ignorance, for he supposes that Cato was the first to propose the sentence of death on the Catilinarian conspirators; whereas everybody had proposed it before except Caesar. And because the sentence of Caesar himself, then speaking in the place of praetor, was so severe, he supposes those of the consular senators to have been more lenient; that is, of Catulus, Servilius, the Luculli, Curio, Torquatus, Lepidus, Gellius, Volcacius, Figulus, Cotta, C. Caesar, C. Piso, and M. Silanus, with Silanus and Munera, the consuls elect. Why then was the decree made according to the opinion of Cato? Because he had said the same thing in more brilliant and copious terms. Me he commends for having brought the affair before the senate, not for having discovered it; for giving encouragement, and for having formed my judgment before I consulted them. It was because Cato had extolled all this to the skies, and had proposed its being entered in the decree, that the vote was carried in favour of his opinion. Brutus seems to think he has done much for me by calling me the excellent consul. What enemy ever spoke in more meagre terms? And how does he reply to your other observations? He only desires you to set him right about the decree of the senate. He would have done as much if he had been told of it by Rutilus. But this again is his own affair. Respecting the gardens, since you approve of it, get something done. You know the state of my affairs. If, besides, anything is received from Faberius, there is no difficulty. But, even without that, I think I am able to manage it. Those of Drusus are certainly to be sold; possibly also those of Lamia and Cassius: but of this when we meet. I cannot write more properly about Terentia than you do. Let my duty be the first thing to be considered. If anything should go amiss, I would rather the fault should lie with her than with myself. A hundred sestertii (800L.) must be procured for Ovia, the wife of C. Lollius. Eros says he cannot do it without me; I suppose, because some valuation 9 is to be accepted and assigned. I wish he had mentioned it to you. For if the business, as he tells me, is ready, and he does not deceive me in this, it might be completed through me. I should be glad if you would inquire into this and settle it. When you call upon me to attend the business of the forum, you call upon me to do that which, even in happier circumstances, I avoided. For what have I to do with the forum, without legal trials, without a senate, and meeting those whom I cannot look upon with patience? As to what you say of people’s requiring of me that I should be at Rome, and not suffering me to absent myself, or suffering it only to a certain extent; know that I have long since esteemed you more than all these together; some you regard for myself too, and would much sooner abide by my own judgment than that of all the rest. Yet I do not go further than the wisest men allow; all of whose writings, so far as they relate to that subject, I have not only read, which is itself a mark of some courage for a sick man to admit of his remedy, but have even transferred into my own compositions, which is certainly no sign of a dejected and broken spirit. From such remedies do not endeavour to recall me into that throng, lest I relapse.

LETTER XXII.

In throwing upon me all the burden of Terentius’s business 4, you do not act with your usual indulgence towards me,—for these wounds are such as I cannot touch without the greatest pain. Manage it therefore, I beseech you, as you can. For I ask nothing more of you, than you can accomplish; and you alone can tell what the truth is about Rutilus 5. As you seem to doubt, you will write to me when you know, and as soon as you can; also whether Clodia was living after the death of the consular D. Brutus, her son. This may be ascertained from Marcellus, or at least from Posthumia; the other from M. Cotta, or Sceyrus, or Sathyros. I entreat you again and again on the subject of the gardens. I must strive with all my own means and those of my friends, who I am persuaded will not desert me; but I shall be able to do it by myself. And I have some property also, which I can easily sell. But without selling, by mortgaging the land for one year to the vendor, I can obtain what I want if you assist me. Those of Drusus are quite ready, for he is willing to dispose of them. The next I think are Lamia’s; but he is absent. However, if you can, find out something about them. Silius also makes no use of his, and will easily be satisfied with that interest. You have 6 your instructions. Consider, not what the present state of my affairs requires, which I regard not, but what is the object of my wishes, and what is the occasion of them?

8 In the indulgence of his grief.
9 This must have some relation to Terentia’s will. See letter 19 of this book.
10 See letter 20 of this book.
11 Notwithstanding my objections to admit conjectural emendations of the text. I have supposed this ought to be habet, which is quite agreeable to Cicero’s manner of writing, while the common reading of habe is both harsh and scarcely intelligible. See book vi. letter 1, and book xvi. letter 2, also book xvi. letters 7 and 16.
LETTER XXIII.

By the beginning of your letter I thought you were going to send me some news; for you say, that although I the other day talked about what was doing in Spain, yet you would write. But in truth you only replied to my letter, as regarded the forum, and the senate. But my house is, you say, the forum. What is my house itself to me without the forum? All is over, all is over, Atticus; I have long seen it, but now I acknowledge it, since I have lost the only tie by which I was held. Therefore I seek retirement. And yet if anything should bring me thither, I will endeavour if possible (and it will be possible) to let nobody besides myself be sensible of my affliction; not even you, if by any means this be practicable. And in truth this is the reason of my not going up. You remember what Aelius asked of you. Even now they tease me: what would be the case if I should go thither? Attend to the affair of Terentius as you mention, and save me from this great addition to my great calamities. That you may know I am not so overwhelmed with grief, as to be quite sunk, your annals mention the year in which Car- nicus arrived with the oblation deposed in Rome; now I want to know, what was the occasion of it; I imagine it was on the business of Oropus; but am not certain; and if it is so, what debates were held about it; besides, what distinguished Epicurean was there at that time, who presided in the gardens; and what illustrious statesmen were then at Athens; which I apprehend you can find out from Apol- lodorus's book. I am sorry about Attica; yet as her illness is slight, I trust that all is going well. I had no doubt about Gamala; for whence should his father Ligus be so fortunate? Not to speak of myself, who am incapable of relief, though everything should happen as I wish. I heard the same valuation of Drusus's gardens which you mention, and I believe I stated it in my letter to you yesterday. But whatever be the price, that is well bought which must needs be had. To me, whatever you may think (for I know what I think myself), it is some discharge, if not of my grief, at least of my bounden duty. I have written to Sica in consequence of his acquaintance with L. Cotta. If nothing should be settled about these gardens across the Tiber, Cotta has some property near Ostia in a very public part, though it is but a little place. For this purpose, however, it is abundantly sufficient. I wish you would think of this; but do not be alarmed at the price of the gardens. I have now no want of plate or of clothes; or of any places of pleasure: this is what I want. I see too from whom I can get assistance. But speak with Silius; for there is nothing better. I have also given instructions to Sica, who sends me word that he has made some appointment with him. Let him therefore write to inform me what he has done; and let be if you shall think proper.

LETTER XXIV.

I am glad that A. Silius has settled his business; for I did not care to refuse him, yet doubted how far it was in my power to serve him. Make an end of Ovidia's affair, as you propose. It seems now to be time to make some arrangement about Cicero. But I wish to know whether the money that he will want at Athens, can be obtained by letters of exchange, or must be carried with him; and should be glad if you would take the whole affair into consideration, respecting both the manner and time. You will be able to learn from Aelius whether Publius is going into Africa, and when. I wish you would inquire, and let me know. And, to return to my own trides, I want you to inform me whether P. Crassus, the son of Venuleus, died in the lifetime of his father the consul, P. Crassus, as I think he did, or afterwards. Likewise, if my memory is correct about Regillus, the son of Lepidus, that he died before his father. You will dispatch these affairs of Cispius, and of Praecius. All seems to go on most favourably with Atticus. Make my compliments to her and to Flilia.

LETTER XXV.

Sica has written to me all the particulars about Silius, and mentioned his having laid the circumstances before you, as you also acknowledge. I am pleased with the thing itself, and with the terms; but should prefer paying in money, rather than by a valuation; for Silius will not want an estate for pleasure. But though I can be content with my present income, I can scarcely do with less. Whence then am I to find the money? You will get six hundred servitaria (4800l.) from Hermogenes, especially as it is a case of necessity: and I find that I have as much in the house. For the rest I can pay interest to Silius, till I discharge it by means of Faberius, or somebody who is indebted to him. There will be something also from other quarters. But you will manage the whole business for me. In truth I greatly prefer these gardens to those of Drusus; nor are they to be compared 7 The Athenians had been accused to the senate of plundering Oropus, and had been condemned in a heavy fine; in mitigation of which they deputed Carneades, Diogenes, and Crisocolus, three philosophers of different schools, to plead their cause. — Au.l. Gell. vi. 14.

2 The schools of Epicurus at Athens were held in gardens.

1 All these inquiries show that Cicero was at this time not so overwhelmed with grief, but that he could apply himself to the composition of some philosophical treatise, to which they relate.

1 Perhaps Gamala, son to Ligus, had lately died; and his own affections taught him to expect that Ligus would suffer the common calamities of humanity, and by such a loss would be unable to enjoy his otherwise happy circumstances.

2 See letter 18 of this book.

3 Clothes made a considerable part of the wealth of great families. They were used not only for their numerous slaves, but as coverings for their couches.

6 About sending the young Cicero to complete his studies at Athens. See letter 8 of this book, note v.

7 See letter 21 of this book, note h.
I have learned no more about Silius from my own conversation with Siciæ, than from his letter: for he wrote very accurately. If therefore anything occurs to you in the communication you may have with him, you will let me know it. Upon the subject, about which you suppose some notice has been sent to me, whether it has been sent or not, I cannot tell; certainly nothing has reached me. Do you therefore proceed as you have begun; and if you can so settle (which, to say the truth I do not expect) as to get her approbation, you may if you please make use of Cicero. It may be of some consequence to him, that he should appear to have wished it for her sake: to me it signifies nothing, excepting so far as you know, which I greatly regard. When you recall me to my usual habits, I must say that I have long since mourned for the republic, though I did it more gently; for I had something on which my mind could repose. Now I am quite incapable of maintaining the same intercourse and way of life. Nor in this do I think that I need trouble myself with the opinions of other people: my own inward sense is of more weight with me than the talk of the world. While I have been consulting myself in study, I have no reason to be dissatisfied with the advantage I have gained. I have lessened my repining; my sorrow I neither could, nor, if I could, should I wish it. You rightly interpret my wishes respecting Triarius. But do nothing without their approbation. I love him even in his death; I am the guardian of his children, and bear affection towards the whole family. With regard to the Castrician business, if Castricius wishes to receive a price for his slaves, and will consent to their being paid in the manner that payments are now made, certainly nothing is more convenient. But if he is determined to take away the slaves themselves, it does not appear to me to be equitable: since you desire me to tell you what I think. I should be sorry that my brother Quintus should have any trouble about it. And I think I understand that you are of the same opinion. If Publius waits for the aquinox, as you say Aedilus told you, I suppose he will soon sail. He told me he should go by way of Sicily. Whether he does or not, when I should like to know. And I wish, at some time when it is convenient to you, that you would visit the little Lentulus, and send him such of my slaves as you think proper. Compliments to Pilia and Attica.

LETTER XXIX.

Silius, you say, is to be with you to-day. Tomorrow therefore, or rather when you can, you will let me know if you have anything to tell me after having seen him. I do not wish to avoid Brutus, yet I do not expect to derive from him any consolation. But there are reasons why I should not like to be at Rome at this time; if these continue, I must devise some excuse to Brutus; and, as things now are, they seem likely to continue. Pray bring this business of the gardens to some conclusion. The chief object is what you know. Another consideration is, that I want something for myself. For I can neither bear to live in the world nor to be at a distance from you. For this my design I find nothing more suitable than that place. Upon this subject I am persuaded of your concurrence; and the more so because I think (and I understand you are of the same opinion) that I am regarded with great affection by Oppius and Balbus. I would have you communicate to them how earnestly, and why, I wish for these gardens; but that it can only be done when that Faberian business is settled. Find out therefore whether they will sanction it; or how far they can be induced, if I forego part of my claim upon early payment; for I despair of getting the whole. In short you will discover if they are disposed to give me any assistance towards this design. If they will, it is a great point gained; if not, let us strive by any means to accomplish it. Consider it as that ancient "repose of old age," as you expressed it, or as my tomb. Nothing more is to be thought of that place at Ostia. If I cannot get this, I must try about Damasippus's. Lamia's I conceive to be unattainable.

LETTER XXX.

I think what I shall say to you; but there is really nothing. The same day after day. I am much obliged to you for going to see Lentulus. Let him have what servants, and what number you think right. Respecting Silius's inclination to sell, and respecting the price, you seem to apprehend, in the first place, that he may not choose it; and, in the next place, that he may not accede to the terms. Sica is of a different opinion; but I agree with you. However, I have written to Egnatius, as he wished. I have no objection to your speaking with Claudius according to Silius's desire; and this is better than that I should write to Claudius, as he asked me to do. With regard to Castricius's slaves, I think it best that Egnatius should manage it: as you mention that you suppose will be done. Pray see that the account is settled with Ovia. Since you say that it was night when you wrote, I shall expect something more in to-day's letter.

Sica will be surprised at Silius's having changed his mind. For my part, I am more surprised at your saying, that if I should suggest a different purchase, (which he will not hear of, having destined it to some other purpose,) you think he may be induced to sell. For he imputes to his son the cause of his refusal; which seems to me not unreasonable, considering that his son is everything he could wish. You ask me what is the highest price I would give; and how much I prefer these gardens to those of Drusus. I have never been there. The Coponian villa I know to be old, and not large, and that it has a noble wood. But I know the produce of neither; which however I think it would be prudent to ascertain: though either of them are valuable to me from my particular circumstances, not from the computation of their real worth. But I would have you consider whether it is in my power to purchase them. If I should sell the Faberian property, I should not hesitate to conclude even on prompt payment for Silius's, if only he can be induced to sell. If he refuses to sell, I would apply to Drusus on the terms which Egnatius told you he demanded. Hermogenes may also be a great assistance to me in making a prompt payment. Do you only admit of my being in the disposition of one who is desirous of purchasing: yet while I am a slave to my wishes and my grief, I am willing to be directed by you. I have received a letter from Egnatius, should he have any conversation with you, you will let me know; for it will be most convenient to negotiate through him; and this I think should be done, for I do not see how it is possible to come to any conclusion with Silius. Compliments to Pilla and Atticus. I have written this with my own hand. Pray think what is to be done.

LETTER XXXII.

PUBLILLIA has written to me to say that her mother, in a conversation with Pubillius, agreed to come with him to visit me; and she adds, that if I would permit her, she would come at the same time. She uses many entreaties for this purpose, and begs me to write in answer. You see how embarrassing this is. I replied that I was even more afflicted, than when I had told her I wished to be alone; and therefore was not disposed to let her come to me at this time. I thought, if I made no reply, that she would come with her mother. Now I do not think she will: for it was evident that the letter was not her own. But I wish to avoid altogether, what I see will happen, that they should come to me. There is only one way of avoiding it; which I do not like; but it is necessary. I now therefore beg you to find out how long I may remain here, without being molested. You will manage this, as you mention, with prudence. I wish you would propose to Cicero, provided it appears to you reasonable, that he should accommodate the expenses of this foreign residence to the rents arising from Argiletus and Aventinus, which would easily have satisfied him, if he had been at Rome, and hired a house, as he thought of doing. And when you have made this proposal to him, I should be glad if you would arrange the rest in such a manner, that I may out of those rents supply him with what is necessary. I will engage that the expenses of neither Bibulus, nor Acidinius, nor Messala, who I hear are to be at Athens, will exceed the receipts from those rents. I wish you therefore first to see who are the people to hire them, and at what rate; then, that there may be somebody who will pay to the day; likewise what provision and equipage is wanted by the way. At Athens there can certainly be no occasion for horses; and I have at home more than can be wanted for his use on the road; as you also observe.

LETTER XXXIII.

I should like, as I told you in my letter yesterday, if Silius prove such as you suppose, and Drusus be unaccommodating, that you should make overtures to Damasippus. He has, I think, allotted portions on the shore, of I know not how many acres, at a fixed price, with which I am not acquainted. Whatever arrangements you make, you will let me know. I am very anxious about my little Attica’s health; and should even fear there was some mismanagement; but that the integrity of the tutor, and attention of the physician, and the regularity of the whole family in every way, forbid me to entertain such a suspicion. Take care then. I can say no more.

LETTER XXXIV.

Here I could remain contentedly for one in trouble, even without Sica; for Tiro is better. But since you say that I must take care I am not molested (by which I understand that you are unequipped with the certain day of their journey) I have thought it more convenient for me to go thither. And I perceive that you are of the same opinion. To-morrow therefore to Sica’s villa near Rome; thence, as you advise, I think of going into the neighbourhood of Piculla. Respecting what you wrote to me, as I am coming up myself, we will see about it together. I am most sensible of your kindness, diligence and prudence, both in the management of my affairs, and in consulting and advising me in the letters you send.

LETTER XXXV.

Should you have come to any understanding with Silius, I shall be glad to be informed of it the very day that I arrive at Sica’s house; and especially what part he wishes to have excepted. For when you mention the boundary, we must take care that it be not the very place, for the sake of which, as you know, I have been led to think of the whole business. I send you a letter from Hirtius, which is both recent and kindly written. Before I last partied from you, it never entered into my mind that a sum was to be distributed to the people, equal to the excess above a certain expense allowed by law to be laid out on a monument. This would not much affect me, but that somehow (perhaps foolishly) I should not like it to be called by any other name, than that of a temple. But however I may wish this, I doubt if I shall be able to attain it without altering the situation. Pray consider how this is. For though I am less impatient, and have nearly collected myself; yet I stand in need of your counsel. Therefore I entreat you again and again more earnestly, than you like, or hear to be entertained by me, to embrace this subject with your whole heart.

LETTER XXXVI.

I wish to have a temple: from this I am not to be diverted. I am anxious to avoid the appearance of a monument; not so much on account of the legal penalty, as that I may accomplish the defacement. This I might do by erecting it near the house; but, as I have often said, I am afraid of a change of possessors. In an open field, wherever I should erect it, it seems probable that it may retain the respect of posterity. You must bear with this weakness of mine; for such I acknowledge it to be. I cannot communicate, not even with myself, so freely as with you. If the thing, the place, the design, meets your approbation, I beg you to read over the law and send it to me. If any method of avoiding it should occur, I shall avail myself of it. If you write to Brutus, unless you think it improper, send him for objecting to be in Cumanum on account of the reason which he mentioned to you: for, to my apprehension, he could do nothing more unciical. If you think it right to proceed in the affair of the temple, as I have begun, I should be glad if you would exhort and quicken Clavius. For, even if another situation appear preferable, I imagine I shall still want his advice and assistance. To-morrow you will perhaps be at your villa.

LETTER XXXVII.

Yesterday I received two letters from you; one by Halaris, dated the day before,—the other by the messenger on the same day. The same day also I received one from Egypt the freed-man, saying that Pilia and Attica were quite well. This last was delivered to me the thirteenth day. I thank you for sending me Brutus's letter. He wrote also to me. This letter I send you, and likewise a copy of my answer to it. Respecting the temple, if you find nothing for me in the gar dens (which you may surely find, if you have that regard for me which you certainly have), I highly approve your proposal about Tusculumum. However judicious you may be in your plans, as indeed you are, yet, unless you took a real interest in my obtaining what I so ardently wish, that idea could never have come so appositely into your mind. But somehow I require notoriety. Therefore you must accomplish for me the possession of these gardens. The most frequented are Scapula's; besides, there is the vicinity to where you are, that it may not occupy the whole day to go thither. For this reason I should exceedingly wish you to confer with Otho, if he is in Rome, before your departure. If there is nothing to he had, though you are used to bear with my folly, yet I shall go on till I make you quite angry; for Drusus at least is disposed to sell. If then there is anything else, it will not be my fault if I do not buy it; but in this I beg you to take care that I commit no error. The surest way of taking care is, if I can accomplish anything about Scapula's gardens. I wish you likewise to inform me how long you will stay in your villa near Rome. I have need of your favour and your influence with Terentia; but you will do as you think right: for I know that where anything concerns me you take more interest in it than I do myself. Hirtius has written to me that Sex. Pompeius has left Cordua and fled into the more northern provinces of Spain, and that Cæsus has fled I know not whither, for it is of little consequence. I know nothing more. He dates his letter from Narbonne, the 18th of April. You wrote to me doubtfully about the shipwreck of Caninius; let me know therefore if any certain intelligence has arrived. With respect to your calling me from my sadness, you will greatly relieve me if you can find a place for the temple. Many things occur to my mind in favour of the dedication; but I am greatly in want of a situation. Again, therefore, see Otho about it.

LETTER XXXVIII.

I have no doubt you were very busy, which was the reason of your not sending me any letter: but he was an idle fellow not to attend your convenience when he was sent for that very purpose. At this time, unless anything has detained you, I imagine you are in your villa, content to write here all day without any relief, but yet with a distraction of attention. Asinius Pollio has written to me on the subject of our unnatural relation. The younger Balbus lately intimated pretty plainly, and Dolabella more reservedly, he has openly declared. I should be deeply concerned if there were any room for new sources of grief. But can anything be more abominable? What a dangerous man! Though for my part—but I will restrain my feeling. Let me hear from you, as you may be at leisure; for there is nothing that presses. As to what you say, that I ought now to show the firmness of my mind,—and some speak of the more severely than either you or Brutus write: if any persons suppose that my mind is broken and has lost its energy, let them know the extent and kind of studies in which I am engaged,—and I conceive, if they are men, they will think either that I do not deserve reproof, having so far roused myself as to bring my mind disengaged to the discussion of difficult questions; or if I have chosen this method of diverting my grief, which is at once the most liberal and the most worthy of a man of learning, that I ought rather to be commended. But while I do everything that I can for my relief, do you effect that, for which I perceive you are not less earnest than I am. I seem to owe this to myself, and to be incapable of ease till I have discharged it, or seen a prospect of discharging it,—that is, till I have a place such as I want. If Scapula's heirs, as you say that Otho told you, mean to have the gardens divided into four parts and valued, there is indeed no room for a purchaser. But if they are to be publicly sold, we will see what can be done. That Publician place, belonging to Trebonius and Cusinius, was offered me: but you know it is a mere barn; and I do not approve of it at all. Clodia's I like; but apprehend it is not to be sold. Though you say you quite revolt from Drusus's gardens, yet I must be content with those, unless you can find something else. The building I do not regard; for I shall build nothing more than I should do otherwise. The 4th and 5th books of Antisthenes's Cyrus please me like the other works of the same author, who is more ingenious than learned.

LETTER XXXIX.

When the messenger arrived without a letter from you, I supposed the reason of your not writing to be that you had written the day before what I answered in that letter. Yet I had expected to hear something relating to the letter of Asinius Pollio. But I measure your leisure too much by my own. However, unless there should be something of importance, I would not have you think it necessary to write till you are quite at liberty. I would do as you advise about the messengers, if there were any letters of consequence, as there were formerly; when, during the shorter days, yet the messengers constantly returned by their trip. And there was something, as Silius, Drusus, and some other matters. Now, if it were not for Otho, there would be nothing to write about: even that is deferred. Yet I find relief when I talk with you in my absence; and still more when I read your letters. But since you are out of town (for so I suppose), and there is no particular occasion for writing, our correspondence may rest till something new occurs.

a Otho might probably be one of Scapula's heirs.

b It was to be expected that Scapula, being lately dead, his heirs would be obliged to sell these gardens in order to divide the property.

c Sextus and Gnaeus Pompeius were the sons of Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus.

d Young Q. Cicero.
LETTER XL.

What will be the nature of Cæsar's censure? in opposition to my commendation, I see from the book which Hirtius has sent me, in which he collects together the faults of Cato, while he speaks very highly of me. I therefore, sent this book to Musca, that he might give it to your librarians,—for I wish to have it made public; and that this may be the sooner done, I should be glad if you would give directions to your people. I often attempt to compose something in the way of advice; but I cannot please myself. In this I am countenanced by the address of Aristocles and of Theopompus to Alexander. But what resemblance is there between the two cases? They wrote what was at once honourable to themselves and agreeable to Alexander. Can you devise anything of such a kind? As for me, I can suggest nothing. When you say that your influence and authority may be lessened by this my grief, I know not what people should either blame or require. Is it that I should not grieve? How is that possible? That I should not sink under it? What sorrow did so long. When I remained at your house, whom did I exclude? Who, that came, could be offended with me? From you I went to Astura. Those lively spirits who find fault with me cannot read so much as I wrote. How well, is nothing to the purpose; but the kind of writing was such as nobody with a broken spirit could execute. I have been thirty days in my gardens. Who ever found a want of access to me, or of free conversation? And now I am so engaged in reading and in writing, that my attendants find it more difficult to bear their leisure than I to bear my labour. If anybody asks why I am not at Rome? Because it is the recess. Why I am not in any of my farms, which are suitable to such a time? Because I could not easily bear so much company. Therefore I remain, where he who possessed that excellent place at Baile used every year to spend this season. When I come to Rome, neither my looks nor conversation will subject me to reproof.

I have lost for ever that gaiety with which I used to season the sadness of these times; but there will be found no want of constancy and firmness either in my mind or speech. Respecting Scapula's gardens, it seems possible, partly by your influence partly by mine, to get them submitted to public auction. Unless this is done I shall be excluded. But if we come to an open sale, my desire of possession will outweigh Otho's wealth: for as to what you mention about Lentulus, it does not rest upon that. Let but the Faberian business be settled, and continue to exert yourself as you do, and I shall get what I want. In answer to your inquiry how long I shall remain here,—it will be a few days; but I am not certain: as soon as I have determined, I will write to you. Do you likewise let me know how long you mean to stay in your villa. The very day on which I send this I have also received, both by letter and by word of mouth, the same account you mention of Pilia and of Attica.

LETTER XLI.

I have nothing to say; yet I wish to know where you are,—and, if you are gone, or going, out of town, when you mean to return. You will therefore inform me. And respecting my movements, which you desire to know, I have determined to be at Lanuvium on the 14th, and from thence to go the day following either to Tusculum or to Rome; which I do, you shall know the same day. You know how querulous misfortune is,—not indeed towards you; but yet I am grown very impatient about the temple: and unless this is, I do not say completed, but unless I see it in progress, I will venture to say (and you will receive it as you are accustomed), my vexation will vent itself upon you, however undeservedly. But you will bear with me in writing this, as you do, and have borne with all my weaknesses. I should be glad to have you collect all your consolations in this one object. If you ask, what it is I wish for? First Scapula's gardens, then Clodia's; afterwards, if Silius refuses and Drusus is unreasonable, those of Cusinius and Trebonius; I believe they belong now to Terentius, but I know they did belong to Rebilus. But if you prefer Tusculum, as you have signified in some of your letters, I shall not object to it. This then is what you must accomplish, if you wish me to be comforted; whom you now accuse more severely than is natural to you; but you do it from your great affection, and overcome perhaps by my foolishness. Yet if you wish me to be comforted this is the greatest comfort; or, if you would know the truth, the only one. If you have read Hirtius's letter,—which I consider as a specimen of the censure that Cæsar has written upon Cato,—I should like you to inform me, at your convenience, what you think of it. To return to the subject of the temple; unless it is finished this summer, which is yet all before us, I shall not think myself free from guilt*.

LETTER XLII.

(Grao. xuili.)

I have determined to sleep at Lanuvium on the 14th, as I mentioned to you before; from thence I shall go either to Rome or to Tusculum. You shall know both beforehand. You do right in taking no notice of the relief which this business may justly afford me; it being such, believe me, as you could not suppose. The thing itself shows how earnestly I desire it, when I venture to confer it to you, who, I suspect, do not very much approve of it: but in this you must bear with my weakness. Bear with it? Nay, you must even forward it. About Otho I dare not hope; perhaps because I wish it. Besides, the purchase exceeds my ability, especially in opposition to one who is both desirous of having it, and rich, and one of the heirs. Next to this I should like Clodia's. But if these cannot be had, conclude what you will. I consider myself bound by a stricter obligation than anybody ever was by that of a vow. You will see, likewise, the Trebonian gardens, notwithstanding the owners are

* In letter 18 of this book he had said that he considered himself as bound by a vow. He alludes to the same thing likewise in letter 42 of this book.
absent; and as I mentioned to you yesterday, you will think also about Tusculanum. The summer must certainly not be suffered to slip away without doing something.

LETTER XLIII.

(Graev. Book xiii. Letter xxvi.)

I entirely approve of what you mention about Virgilius's portion. You will therefore act accordingly. That is my first wish; next to that, Clodia's; and if I can get neither, I fear I may become outrageous and rush upon Drusus. I know no moderation in my desire of that object, which you know. Therefore at intervals I incline to Tusculanum. For anything is better than not to have it finished this summer. In my present state, I have no place where I can be more at my ease than at Astura. But as those who are with me hasten away (I suppose because they cannot bear my sadness); though I should be very well content to remain; yet, as I mentioned to you, I shall go from hence, that I may not appear deserted. But which way? To Lanuvium? I try to go to Tusculanum; but will immediately let you know. You will bring your writing to an end. For my own part, it is not to be believed how much I write in the day; and even in the night; for I get no sleep. Yesterday also I accomplished a letter to Caesar, because you seemed to wish it. And if you thought it expedient, there is no harm in its being written. As things are at present, there is no necessity for sending it; but this shall he as you please. I will however send you a copy of it, perhaps from Lanuvium, unless it happens that I go to Rome. But you shall know to-morrow.

LETTER XLIV.

I am very well pleased that Hirtius should have written to you with sympathy about me, for he has done it kindly; and I am still better pleased that you should not have sent me his letter, for you have done it even more kindly. I wish the book, which he sent me upon Cato, to be published by your librarians for this reason, that his praise may be exalted by the censure of that party. In acting through Mustella you have a person extremely proper, and one who has been kindly disposed towards me ever since the Pontian business. Therefore get something done. What else, but to secure access to a purchaser? This may be done through any of the heirs. And I apprehend Mustella will do it, if you ask him. You will thus

1 Virgilius was one of the heirs of Scapula, together with Otho, Mustella, and Crispus.
2 Scapula's gardens.
3 His difficulty consisted in overcoming his repugnance to visit a place which sadly reminded him of his daughter.
4 Atticus seems to have been engaged in settling his accounts, with which these letters, litteras, were probably connected. Compare this with what he repeats in the following letter, sed quos confice, ut te vacuum redeas notis.
5 Perhaps some person whom Cicero had defended, or otherwise assisted.
6 In finding a place to erect a temple to Tullia.
7 To get Scapula's gardens exposed to public sale.
8 Mustella appears to have been one of Scapula's heirs.

procure for me the place which I wish, for the purpose which I have at heart; and besides, "a hope for which age?" For those of Silius, and of Drusus, do not appear to me sufficiently respectable for a family residence. How would it become one to remain for any length of time in such a villa as that? I should therefore prefer, first, Otho's; and, next to that, Clodia's. If nothing can be done, either some stratagem must be practised upon Drusus, or I must be content with Tusculanum. In shutting yourself up at home, you have acted prudently. But pray use dispatch, and restore yourself to me free from care. I shall go from hence, as I before-mentioned, to Lanuvium on the 14th, and the day following to Tusculanum. For I have subdued my mind, and perhaps conquered it, if only I can persevere. You shall know therefore, perhaps to-morrow, at all events the day after. But pray, how is this? Philotinus affirms that Pompeius is not shut up in Carteia; about which Oppius and Balbus sent me the copy of a letter to Clodius Petavius, declaring that they believe it to be true; but that a great war is still maintained. He is in the habit of being a complete Fulviniaster; but yet, if you have any intelligence, let me know it. I want also to know what is the trust respecting Caninius' shipwreck.

LETTER XLV.

While I have been here, I have completed two long treatises: for I have no other means of deviating, as it were, from the path of wretchedness. Even if you have nothing to say, which I foresee will be the case, yet I wish you to tell me that, if only it is not in these terms. The accounts of Attica are excellent. I am concerned about your languor, notwithstanding you say it is nothing. In Tusculanum I shall have the advantage of more frequently hearing from you, and sometimes seeing you. In other respects things are more supportable at Astura; nor are the objects, which revive my grief, more distressing here than everywhere else; though in truth, wherever I am, they are with me. I wrote to you about your neighbour Caesar, because I had learned

1 In the original is the same Greek word which was explained in letter 25 of this book, note 1.
2 Some artifice to induce him to sell his gardens at a reasonable price. See letter 41 of this book.
3 Forced himself to return to Tusculanum, which he had hitherto avoided, as containing many objects calculated to renew his grief for Tullia. See letters 45 and 46 of this book.
4 In Spain.
5 A partial interpreter of events in favour of his own, that is, of Pompeius's party. (See book x. letter 9.) Such as had been notoriously some person of the name of Flavius or Fulvius.
6 See letter 37 of this book.
7 At Astura.
8 In the original is a Greek word of doubtful significance, but probably meaning a language which created an indifferance towards everything.
9 This I conceive to be the just meaning of the word magiae in this place. On the contrary, at Tusculanum there were many circumstances to remind him of his daughter.
10 A status had lately been created to Cæsar in the temple of Quirinus, near Atticus's house, which was on the Quirinal hill.
it from your letter. I would rather have him commeade with Quirinus than with Publicó Safety. Let Hirtius be made publicó; for I was of the same opinion, which you mention, that while our friend's genius is applauded, his attempt to censure Cato would be derided.

LETTER XLVI.

I have never complained of your not writing; for I perceive what you mention. Besides I suspect, or rather know, that you can have had nothing to say. On the 8th I supposed you to be out of town, and concluded that there was nothing. I shall nevertheless send to you almost every day; for I would rather send in vain than that you should have nobody to take your letters, in case there should be anything with which you think I ought to be acquainted. On the 8th I received your empty letter, as you call it; for what had you to write about? Yet, such as it was, it was not unpleasant to me to know even this, that you had no news. You mentioned, however, something about Clodia. Where then is she? or when will she come? That place pleases me so well, that, next to Otho's, I like nothing better. But I do not suppose either that she will sell; for she takes pleasure in it, and is in no want of money; and as for the other, you are aware of the difficulties. Yet pray let us try, that we may devise some means of gratifying my wishes. I think of leaving this place to-morrow, and going either to Tusculum or home, and afterwards perhaps to Arpinum. When I know for certain, I will write to you. It had occurred to me to remind you of doing the very thing which you are doing; for I thought you could more conveniently transact the same business at home, without suffering yourself to be interrupted.

LETTER XLVII.

(Grae. xlvii.)

I hope to conquer my feelings, and to go from Lanuvium to Tusculum. For I must either renounce for ever that estate (since the same painful sensations will remain, only in a less degree) or I know not what signifies whether I go there now, or ten years hence. Since the being thus reminded, is nothing more than what constantly wastes me day and night. What then, you will say, do your studies afford no relief? In this respect I fear they may even do the contrary; as I might otherwise perhaps be more insensible. For to a cultivated mind nothing is without feeling and interest.

LETTER XLVIII.

(Grae. xlviii.)

Do then, as you mention, so that you put yourself to no inconvenience. For two words will be sufficient. Or I will go up, if it is necessary. This therefore as you can. About Mustella do as you propose; though it is a great undertaking. For this reason I more incline to Clodia. But in either case the Faberian account must be settled; about which there will be no harm in your having some conversation with Balbus; and indeed letting him know, what is the truth, that I am desirous of purchasing, and unable to do it without the discharge of that debt, and do not dare to engage upon an uncertainty. But since Clodia is to be at Rome, and you consider it so desirable, I look wholly that way; not that I should not prefer the other; but it is a great concern, and an arduous contest with one who is eager, who is rich, who is heir. Though in point of eagerness I will yield to nobody: in other respects I am inferior. But of this when we meet. Make public Hirtius's book, as you do. Respecting Philoimenó, I also thought the same. I foresee that your house will become more valuable from having Caesar for your neighbour. I am expecting the return of my messenger to-day. He will bring me an account of Pilia and Attica.

LETTER XLIX.

(Grae. xlviii.)

I can easily believe that you are glad to be at home. But I should like to know how much remains to be done; or whether you have already finished. I am expecting you in Tusculum; and the rather, because you wrote word to Tiro, that you were coming immediately, and added that you thought it necessary. While you were here, I was very sensible how much good you did me; but I am much more sensible of it since your departure. Therefore, as I mentioned to you in a former letter, I will either go wholly to you; or you shall come to me, so far as it will be consistent with your occupations.

LETTER L.

(Grae. xlix.)

Yesterday, not long after you left me I think, some persons of smart appearance brought me despatches, and a letter from C. Marius, the son of Caius, and grandson of Caius; urging me at great length, by the relationship between us, by the poem which I had inscribed with the name of Marius, by the eloquence of L. Crassus, his grandfather, to undertake his defence; and he sent me a detail of his case. I wrote to him in return,

\[a\] Great from the priests.
\[b\] Must be remembered that, previous to the invention of printing, it was a work of great labour to make copies of a book for the use of the public.
\[c\] His intelligence about the war in Spain. See letter 44 of this book.
\[d\] See letter 45 of this book. This may be supposed to be said jestingly.
\[e\] This I take to be a transcript of the title assumed by this man, who was an impostor.
that he had no need of a patron, since the whole power was in his relation Caesar, who was an excellent man, and exceedingly liberal; but that nevertheless he should have my good wishes. What times are these! That it should ever happen that Curtius should think of standing for the consulship! But enough of this. I am anxious about Tiro. But I shall soon know how he does, for I sent a person yesterday to see him; to whom at the same time I gave a letter for you. I send you a copy of my letter to Caesar. I should be glad if you would let me know on what day the gardens are to be sold.

LETTER LI.

In proportion as your arrival cheered me, so your departure afflicted me. Therefore when you can, that is, when you have done with Sextus' sale, you will come to me again. A single day will be valuable to me; I need not say, agreeable. I would myself go to Rome in order to be with you, if I had sufficiently made up my mind on a certain subject.

LETTER LII.

(Grav. li.)

I have got Tiro with me sooner than I had apprehended. Nicias is also arrived; and I heard to-day that Valerius was coming. How many soever they may be, I shall feel myself more solitary than if you alone were here. But I hope to see you after Pedeceus' business. You give some intimation that it may even be sooner: but this as you can. About Virgilius do as you mention. I want however to know when the sale takes place. I see that you approve of my sending the letter to Caesar. To say the truth, I quite agree in the propriety of doing so; and the rather, because there is nothing in it that is unbecoming a good citizen; good at least for the times, to which all writers on government direct us to submit. But you know it was my desire that some of that party should read it first; which I wish you would take care of; and not let it be sent, unless you understand that they quite approve of it. You will easily find out whether they really think so, or only feign. Feigning would be to me a prohibition. But this you will probe. Tiro has informed me of your opinion about Carelia; that it is unbecoming my dignity to remain in debt; and that you think I should give a note of hand——This you fear; of the other you entertain no fear. But these, and many other matters, when we meet. With your leave, however, the payment of the debt to Carelia must be suspended, till I know about Meto and Faberius.

LETTER LIII.

(Grav. liii.)

You know L. Tullius Montanus who went with Cicero. I have received a letter from his sister's husband, saying that Montanus owes Plancus 25 sestertii (2007), as surety for Flaminius; and that something had been requested of you by Montanus respecting this business. If you can assist him, either by speaking to Plancus, or by any other means, I should be truly glad that you would do it: my obligation to him demands it. If, as it may happen, you are better acquainted with the business than I am, or if you think that Plancus should be solicited, I wish you will write to me; that I may know what the case is, and what to ask of him. I am expecting to hear what you have done about the letter to Caesar. I am not very anxious about Silius. You must get me either Scapula's gardens, or Clodia's. But you seem to be in some doubt whether Clodia will come, or when, and whether the gardens will be to be sold. What is it I hear of Spinther's being divorced? You are very confident, you will say, in the copiousness of the Latin language, to undertake such subjects: but they are mere transcripts, and done with less labour than you may suppose. I have only to find words, and in these I abound.

LETTER LIV.

(Grav. lvi.)

Though I have nothing to say to you, yet I write, because I seem then to talk with you. There are with me here Nicias and Valerius. I expect to-day a letter from you written in the morning. There will perhaps be another in the afternoon, unless your correspondence with Epirus prevents you, which I would not interrupt. I send you letter to Marcianus and to Montanus, which I should be glad if you would inclose in your packet, unless that is already gone.

* The same who is before mentioned. See hook ix. letter 6.
* Atticus, being a friend to Sextus Pedeceus, wished to attend the sale of some part of his property.
* From the obscure hint contained in this expression, it is probable he might allude to his conduct in the senate respecting Caesar's authority and administration. See letters 11 and 29 of this book.
* The same who in the preceding letter is called Sextus.
* Virgilius was one of the heirs of Scapula. (See letter 44 of this book.) whose gardens Cicero wished to get. It is to the sale of these gardens that he refers in the subsequent sentence.

a The original is a verse, quoted also elsewhere from some unknown author. Cicero's meaning seems to be, that while Atticus was apprehensive of the debt being left unpaid, he did not advert to the embarrassment which it might occasion to Cicero to pay it, before he was himself sure of being paid by his own creditors, Meto and Faberius.

b To Athens. See letters 8 and 24 of this book.

c Silius's gardens. See letter 44 of this book.

d Philosophical subjects, which, before Cicero, had not been treated in the Latin language. He goes on to say, that he drew his matter from the Greek writers, and had little trouble except in finding Latin expressions. In the conclusion of his treatise "De Finibus," we find it said in the person of Atticus,—"Sei melicercule pergat mihi craticia tun: que enim dici latine posse non arbitror, en dicta sunt a te, nee minus plane, quam diciatur: Greciae."

e Which Atticus was going to send to Buthrotum in Epirus, from whence Cicero's letters would be forwarded to Athens.
BOOK XIII.

[The arrangement of the letters in this book appears to be in several instances incorrect; yet the inconvenience, not to mention the difficulty, of altering it in a way that could be satisfactory, made it to be thought more desirable to preserve the order already established.]

LETTER I.

Nobody could have written more firmly or more temperately than you have done to Cicero, or more entirely as I could wish. Your letters to the Tullii are likewise extremely prudent. So that either these must have an effect, or we must think no more about it. I see that you are using, or rather have already used, all diligence about the money*. If you succeed in this, I shall owe the gardens to you. There is no kind of possession which I should like better, especially for that purpose* in which I am engaged; and about which you prevent my impatience, by the assurance, or rather promise, for the summer*. Besides, for the decline of my life*, and the relief of my sorrow, nothing can be found more suitable. My wish for it sometimes urges me to exhort you; but I check myself; for I do not doubt but that in a matter, which you think I have much at heart, your wishes even exceed my own. Therefore understand this, as if it were really so. I am anxious to know what they think of my letter to Caesar. Nicia is much attached to you, as he ought to be, and is highly gratified by your remembrance of him. On my part I have a great affection for our friend Pedoeceus; and transfer to him all the regard I felt for his father; besides that I value him for his own sake, as much as I valued the other; and am much obliged to you for wishing to produce this mutual attachment between us. When you have examined the gardens, and have informed me about the letter*, I shall have some subject to write upon. But at all events I shall write to you; for there will always be something to say.

LETTER II.

Your early information was more gratifying to me, than the substance of your letter. For what can be more shameful*? But I am now grown callous to such things, and have put off all feeling. I look for a letter from you to-day; not that I expect any news; for how should there be any?

1 The son.
2 Tullius Montanus and Tullius Marcianus. [See book xii. letters 55 and 64] They were with the young Cicero at Athens.
3 His son appears to have been living extravagantly.
4 Collecting the money due to Cicero, that he might make his intended purchase of a site for a temple.
5 The dotation of his daughter.
6 That it should be done in the course of the summer.
7 See book xii. letter 41 and 43.
8 See book xii. letter 45.
10 The letter he had written to Caesar.
11 There is nothing to show certainly to what this alludes; but, on comparison with book xii. letter 38, it is probable that Atticus might have written to Cicero on the subject of young Quintus.

But yet—you will order the letters to be taken to Oppius and Balbus; at the same time if you can meet with Piso, you will speak to him about the gold*. If Faberius arrives, you will see that the assignment is made (if indeed any is made) for as much as is due. You will receive the account from Eros. Ariarathes, Ariobazans' son*, is come to Rome. I imagine he wants to purchase some kingdom from Caesar; for at present he has no place of his own to set his foot in. Our friend Sestius has been beforehand with me as his public attendant; which I do not regret; but as I have a great friendship with his brothers, arising from the important service I rendered them*, I have written* to invite him to my house. As I send Alexander for this purpose, I shall deliver this letter to him. So to-morrow is Pedoeceus' sale: therefore as soon as you are at liberty*; though Faberius may perhaps be an impediment; but however when you can. Our Dionysius makes heavy complaints, and yet without reason, that he is so long kept from his scholars. He has written to me at great length, and I suppose also to you. I apprehend he will absent himself some time longer. I am sorry; for I want the man very much.

LETTER III.

I am expecting a letter from you; though not just yet; for I write this reply to your last early in the morning. I am so well satisfied with these assignments, as to entertain no other question about them, except what arises from your hesitation. For I do not want it to look as if I am so good a part that you should refer to me, who, if I negotiated the business for myself, should do nothing but by your advice. But I understand you to do it rather from the accuracy with which you always act, than because you have any real doubt about their responsibility. For you do not approve of applying to Cælius, and are against selling any more* in both which I agree with you. Therefore I must have recourse to these assignments. Otherwise you must for once* have been made surer, and in these very deeds. But everything shall rest upon me. As to the time of payment being distant, let me but get what I want; I imagine the day appointed by the auctioneer, or at least by the heirs, will likewise be distant. See about Crispus and Mustella; and I should like to know what is the

I hope you may be able to come sooner; but if not, at least let us be together when Brutus comes to Tusculanum. I am very desirous that we should meet. You will be able to learn what day it will be, if you give it in charge to a servant to inquire.

LETTER V.

I had supposed that Sp. Mummius was one of the ten commissioners; but however—for it is natural that he should have been lieutenant to his brother; and he certainly was at Corinth. I send you Torquatus 4. Talk with Sillus, as you propose, and urge him. He objected to the day of payment being in May; to the rest he made no opposition. But you will manage this also with the same care you do everything. About Crispus and Mustella you will inform me as soon as you have settled anything. Since you promise to be with me on Brutus’s arrival, I am satisfied; especially as the intervening days will be employed on my chief concern.

LETTER VI.

You have done properly about the aqueduct. See that I may not have to pay no tax on pillars 4; though I think I heard from Lucullus that the law had been altered. What answer can I make to Piso? more civil, than that Cato 5 is at present.

1 Cato and Cicero were left guardians to the son of the great Lucullus.—De Finibus, iii. 2.

4 He was at this time in Spain, fighting with the sons of Pompeius.

6 It appears to me that Cicero, in his letter before-mentioned, had anticipated this, and wished to prevent it.

9 The same who is called Ephraim. See book xii. letter 55.

10 This answer applies not only to the co-heirs of Herennius, but to other cases, as you know; for you acted with me in the affair of the young Lucullus, respecting the money which his guardian (for that ought to be noticed) had taken up in Greece. But he 4 acts liberally in saying that he will do nothing contrary to my wishes. When we meet, therefore, as you observe, we will resolve how to settle this business. You have done quite right to have a meeting with the other co-heirs. I have no copy of my letter to Brutus, which you ask for; but however it is safe; and Tiro says that you ought to have it; and, as I remember, at the same time with his expository letter I sent you mine also in answer to him. You will take care that I escape the trouble of the judgship 4. I was quite ignorant of that Tuditanus who was great-grandfather to Hortensius, and supposed it to have been the son, who could not have been commissioner at that time. I consider it as certain that Mummius was at Corinth. For this Spurius, who lately died, often used to repeat to me some letters written in comic verses to his friends from Corinth. But I have no doubt he was lieutenant to his brother, and not one of the ten. And I have moreover understood that it was not customary formerly to admit among the commissioners those who were related to the commanders, as we, through ignorance, or rather negligence of their excellent institutions, sent M. Lucullus, and L. Murena, and others nearly allied, as commissioners to L. Lucullus. But it is most natural that he should have been among the first of his brother’s lieutenants. How much trouble you take, while you both attend to these matters, and despatch my business, and are much less careful about your own concerns than about mine!

LETTER VII.

I have had Sextius with me; and yesterday Theopompos arrived. He reported that letters had been received from Cæsar 4, who said that he had determined to remain at Rome; and added the same reason which was mentioned in my letter 4, lest in his absence his laws should be disregarded, as had been the case with the sumptuary law. This is very natural, and what I had suspected 4. But these people must have their way 4; unless you would have me persevere in these same sentiments. He mentions also that Lentulus 4 is certainly divorced from Metella. But all this you know better than I. Write, then, what you will in reply, so that you write something. Though I am at a loss to
LETTER VIII.

I have positively nothing to say to you; for it is not long since you left me; and soon after you returned my triple tablets 1. I shall be obliged to you to let the parcel be taken to Vestorius, and to desire somebody to inquire if any farm belonging to Q. Faberius 2 in the neighbourhood of Pompeii or of Nola is to be sold. I should be glad if you would send me Brutus's epitome of Cælius's history 3, and get from Philoxenus Panetius's treatise on Prudence. I shall see you on the 15th with your family.

LETTER IX.

You had just gone away yesterday, when Trebutius came; and soon after, Curtius; the latter to pay his compliments; but on being invited, he stayed. Trebutius continues with me. This morning Dolabella came. We had a long conversation till the day was far advanced. I can describe nothing more attentive or more affectionate. We came at length to the subject of young Quintus, of whom he related many particulars not to be repeated or named; and one thing of such a kind, that, unless the whole army knew it, I should not only not venture to dictate to Tiro, but not even to write it myself.—But I check myself. Torquatus arrived very seasonably, while Dolabella was with me; and Dolabella in the kindest manner explained the terms I had used in discoursing with him; for I had just been discoursing most urgently, which seemed to be gratefully received by Torquatus. I am longing to know if you have heard anything of Brutus. Though Nicias supposed it to have actually taken place, but that the divorce was not approved: for which reason I am the more anxious, as well as you; that if any offence is taken, this may heal it. I am obliged to go to Arpinum, as it is necessary for me to regulate those small farms; and I am apprehensive that I may not be able to get away, if I wait till Cæsar comes; Dolabella entertains the same opinion which you formed from Messala's letter. When I get there, and find what business is to be done, I will write to inform you about the time of my return.

LETTER X.

I am not surprised that you should be deeply concerned about Marcellus 4, and apprehensive of all kinds of danger. For who would be afraid of what had never happened before, and what human nature seemed incapable of committing? So that everything is now to be feared. But do you of all people transgress the evidence of history, by saying that I am the only consul 4 remaining? What! do you make no account of Servius? Though this has no weight with me, especially as I think the condition of the others 4 no way inferior. For what am I? Or what can I be, either at home or in public? In fact, unless it had occurred to my mind to occupy myself in writing, I should not know which way to turn myself. I think I must do, as you mention, to Dolabella, and take some subject of more common and public interest. I must at all events compose something; for he earnestly desires it. If Brutus has come to any conclusion 4, you will take care to let me know it. I think he should conclude it as soon as possible, if only he has made his determination: for he will thus either extinguish or appase all idle talk. There are some who even talk to me about it. But he will conduct this best himself, especially if he also consults with you. It is my intention to go from hence the 22d. For here I have nothing to do; nor indeed there, nor anywhere; there, however, there is something. I expect Spinther today; for Brutus has sent to inform me. In his letter he exculpates Cæsar on the death of Marcellus. But no suspicion would fall upon him, even if he had been killed insidiously. Now, however, when it is clear that it was done by Magius, is not the whole to be imputed to his insanity? I am at a loss to understand this; therefore you will explain it; though I have no further doubt, excepting about what may have been the cause of Magius's madness; for whom he had even been surety at Sunium. It was perhaps that very circumstance; for he was insolvent. I imagine he may have asked something from Marcellus, and Marcellus may have replied, with that firmness which was natural to him, that "things seen near, and at a distance, have not the same aspect."

1 Bratus had a villa in the neighbourhood of Tusculum, not far from Cicero.
2 The Romans carried about with them little tablets of wood, or ivory, covered with wax, called papyllares, on which they wrote with a stilus. These tablets consisted of two, three, or more leaves, and were accordingly called duplices, triplices, &c. Cicero, it may be supposed, had written to Atticus on one of these consisting of three leaves, which Atticus had returned with his answer.
3 The name of whom mention is made, book xii. letter 55, and elsewhere.
4 Brutus may probably have epitomized several histories. In book xii. letter 6, we read of his epitome of Fanusius's History; and Plutarch has reported, that on the evening previous to the battle of Pharsalia, he was engaged in making an abridgment of Polybius.
5 Dolabella had married Cicero's daughter, whose death he so deplored. It is doubtful whether a divorce between them had taken place or not; at least there seems to have been no ill-will between the parties.

LETTER XI.

I imagined the removal to Arpinum to be a slight matter; but I found it quite otherwise, since I have been separated from you. It was however expedient, both for the sake of relaying the farms, and to avoid imposing on our friend Brutus, so great a burden of civility. Hereafter we shall be able better to cultivate a mutual friendship in Tusculum. But at this time, when he was so good as to visit me daily, and I was unequal to go to him, he was deprived of all comfort in his Tuscan villa. If, then, Servilia is arrived; if Brutus has concluded anything, or even if he is resolved upon it; when they go to meet Caesar; in short, whatever occurs, which I ought to know, you will inform me. Converse with Piso, if you can, to see how ripe the business is. Yet do not put yourself to inconvenience.

LETTER XII.

Your accounts of my dear Atticus have much affected me; yet at the same time they have afforded me comfort. For your own consolation, expressed in the same letters, is a sufficient warrant for the relief of my anxiety. You have famously sold the speeches in favour of Ligarius. Henceforward whatever I publish, I shall employ you to proclaim. As to what you say about Varro, you know that my compositions used formerly to consist of orations, or something of that kind, in which it was impossible for me to introduce Varro’s name. But since I entered upon these philosophical inquiries, Varro has already given me notice of a great and weighty address: two years have elapsed, while that Callipides in his continual course has not advanced a foot. In the mean time I prepared myself, as he desired, to make him a return “according to the same measure”—or better if I could, for so Hesiodus adds. I have now pledged to Brutus, with your approbation, that treatise on the Foundation of Moral Duty, with which I am very well pleased. And you have assured me of his kind acceptance of it. I may as well, therefore, remove from my Academical Disputations the present speakers, who are distinguished characters.

distressed fortunes, which before he did not know, when he engaged to be his surety. Some have supposed this quotation to belong to the following letter; in which case it would mean that Cicero, since his removal to Arpinum, found the actual separation from Atticus more grievous than he had expected in distant contemplation.

1 In calling every day upon Cicero, who had not sufficiently recovered his spirits to walk upon Brutus in return.
2 Brutus, as well as Cicero, appears to have had a residence in the neighbourhood of Tusculum.
3 Brutus’s mother.
4 Relating to his marriage with Pisona.
5 This is generally supposed to mean Brutus: but it seems to me more reasonable to understand it generally of people going to meet Caesar on his return from Spain.
6 About the gold he was to provide in exchange for Cicero’s plate. See book XII. letter 5.
7 The sale of Scapula’s gardens was approaching.
8 His treatise on the Latin Language, which was afterwards published and inscribed to Cicero.
9 This was a proverbial expression taken from some person who was busily employed, but made little progress.
10 The original is part of a verse from Hesiodus.

Indeed, but by no means philosophical, and discourse with too much subtlety, and substitute Varro in their place. For there are the opinions of Antiocbus, to which he is much attached. I can find a place for Catulus and Lucullus elsewhere, if you approve of these persons; and I shall be glad if you will write in answer to me upon this subject. I have received a letter from Vestorius about Brunius’s auction. He says that the business has without any dispute been referred to me, to take place on the 24th of June. For they supposed that I should be in Rome, or Tusculum. You will therefore tell either your friend S. Vettius, my co-heir, or my friend Labec, to defer a little the sale, as I shall not be in Tusculum till about the 7th of July. You have with you Eros, as well as Piso. Let us think, with all our minds, of Scapula’s gardens. The day is at hand.

LETTER XIII.

In consequence of the letter you wrote to me about Varro, I have taken the Academy entirely out of the hands of those distinguished personages, and transferred it to our friend; and from two books I have made it into four. These are longer than the others were, though there are several parts left out. I am very desirous of hearing from you, who understood that he was pleased with my design. I want also to know who it was that you understood excited his envy; unless perhaps it was Brutus. That was the only thing which remained. But yet I should like much to know. In truth, unless my self-love deceive me, those books have come out in such a manner, that there is nothing of the same kind like them even in Greek. You will patiently hear the loss of your copy? having been transcribed to no purpose. This, however, will be far more brilliant, more condensed, and better. I am now in doubt which way to turn. I am desirous of gratifying Dolabella’s wishes; but I can find no proper subject. At the same time I respect the Trojans and if I should find something, I do not see how I can escape reproach. I must either give it up therefore, or I must devise something else. But why do I regard these trifles? How, I beseech you, does my dear Atticus, for whom I am very anxious? But I frequently recur to your letter, and feel satisfaction in it; yet I look for further accounts.

5 As if he had said that the envy excited by the dedication of his former work to Brutus, was the only thing that could be added to enhance the satisfaction he had in his treatise “De Finibus.”
6 Of the “Academica” in the first edition.
7 What work I shall next undertake.
8 The original is from Homer, and has been more than once quoted before. [See book II. letter 5, and book VIII. letter 11.] The meaning is, that he had too much respect for honest citizens to write anything unbecoming the republic.
LETTER XIV.

Brininius's freed-man, my co-heir, wrote to me to say, that, if I pleased, he and Sabinus Albius, two joint heirs, would come to wait upon me. I entirely disapprove of it; the inheritance is not worth it. Besides, they may easily attend the day of the sale, which is the 11th, if they will come to me in Tusculum on the morning of the 8th, the day after my arrival. Or if they wish to put it off longer, they may do it for two or three days, or as long as they please; for it makes no difference. Therefore unless they are already set out, I would have you stay them. Let me know if there is any news of Brutus; or if you have any intelligence of Caesar; or if there is anything else. I should wish you to consider again and again whether you approve of sending to Varro what I have written; though there is something also which concerns yourself; for you must know that you are introduced as a third personage in that dialogue⁵. I think then we should consider, notwithstanding the names are already inserted. But they may either be erased or altered.

LETTER XV.

Pray, how is my Attica? For I have had no letter from you these three days. This is not to be wondered at, as nobody came from Rome, and possibly there was no reason for writing. In consequence I have myself nothing to write about. But the day on which I deliver this to Valerius, I am expecting one of my people, who if he arrives, and brings anything from you, I am persuaded I shall be at no loss what to say.

LETTER XVI.

Though I went in pursuit of streams and solitudes, that I might better be able to support myself, I have hitherto not stirred a foot out of the house; such great and continued rains have we had. I have transferred that whole Academical composition to Varro. It had at first been in the names of Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius. Afterwards, as this appeared unsuitable, owing to these persons being, not indeed unlearned, but notoriously unversed in such subjects, as soon as I got home I transferred those dialogues to Catou and Brutus. Your letter about Varro is just arrived. The opinions of Antiochus could be more fitly supported by nobody. Yet I should wish you to inform me, in the first place, whether you think anything should be inscribed to him; then, if you think so, whether this is the properest thing. What of Servilius? Is she yet arrived? Is Brutus doing anything? or when? What is heard of Caesar? I shall be in Tusculum on the 7th, as I mentioned. You will settle with Piso, if you can.

LETTER XVII.

On the 27th I hope to receive something from Rome; not that I had given any particular direction. Therefore, send something by your own people. I must repeat the same inquiries; what Brutus intends? or if he has taken any steps? and whether there is anything from Caesar? But what are these things? which I care little about: I want to know how my Atticus does. Though your letter, which is already too old, bids me hope the best, yet I look for some recent information.

LETTER XVIII.

You see the advantage of being near. Let us then conclude the purchase of the gardens. While I was in Tusculum I seemed to be talking with you; so frequent was the intercourse of our letters. But that will presently be the case again. In the mean time, at your suggestion, I have completed the books to Varro with some acuteness. Still I wait for your answer to what I wrote to you: first, by what means you understood that he wished it of me; since he, who is himself so great a writer, never addressed anything to me: then, who it is that he envied, unless perhaps Brutus. For if he does not envy him, much less Hortensius, or those who speak upon the republic. I wish you distinctly to inform me in the first place, whether you continue in the same mind, that I should send him what I have written, or whether you think there is no occasion for it. But of this when we meet.

LETTER XIX.

My secretary Hilarns, to whom I had given a letter for you, was just gone on the 28th, when the messenger arrived with your letter dated the day before; in which it was particularly gratifying to me that my Atticus begs you not to be uneasy, and that you say there is no danger. Your authority, I see, has famously recommended the Ligurian oracle. For Balbus and Oppius wrote to me to say that they were extremely pleased with it, and had in consequence sent it to Caesar, as you mentioned to me before. In the case of Varro, I am not moved by any apprehension of appearing vain-glorious⁶; for I had determined to include no living characters in my dialogues; but since you inform me that Varro is desirous of it, and sets a great value upon it, I have composed this work, and completed the whole Academical discussion in four books; I know not how well, but with such care, that nothing can exceed it. In these, what had been excellently collected by Antiochus against the doctrine of incomprehensibility, I have attributed to Varro; to this I reply in my own person, and you are the third in our conversation. If I had made Constantius happy with this dispensation, as I have with others, as you suggest in your last letter, mine would be a mute character. This has a good effect in old people; as Heraclides has done in several books; and I in the six books on Government. I have three books also on Oratory, with which I am much satisfied; and in these likewise the characters are such, that it became me to be silent. For the speakers are, Crassus, Antonius, Catulus the old man, C. Julius brother to Catulus, Cotta, and Sulpicius. The discourse is supposed to be held while I was a boy, so that it was impossible for me to sustain any part in it. But what I have lately written are in the manner of Aristotle, where the conversation is so managed, that he himself has the principal part. I have finished the five books on the Foundation of Moral Duty, so as to give the Epicurean doctrine to L. Torquatus, the Stoical to M. Cato, the Peripatetic to M. Piso; for I considered that their being dead would preclude all jealousy. These Academics, as you know, I had discussed in the persons of Catulus, Lucullus, and Hortensius; but in truth the subject did not suit their characters; being more logical than what they could be supposed ever to have dreamed of. Therefore, when I read your letter about Varro, I seized it as an inspiration. Nothing could be more adapted to that species of philosophy, in which he seems to take particular delight; or to the support of such a part, that I could manage to avoid making my own sentiments predominant. For the opinions of Antiochus are extremely persuasive, and are so carefully expressed, as to retain the acuteness of Antiochus, with my own brilliancy of language, if indeed I possess any. But consider again and again whether you think these books ought to be attributed to Varro. Some things occur to me upon the subject; but these when we meet.

Letter XX.

I have received from Cæsar a letter of condolence, dated April 30th, from Seville. I have not heard what has been promulgated about extending the city; and should be glad to know. I am pleased that my services are kindly received by Torquatus, and shall not fail to increase them. It is impossible for me now to add to my Ligarian oration anything about Tubero’s wife and daughter-in-law; for the speech has been widely disseminated; nor have I any wish to defend Tubero, who is wonderfully fond of accusing people. You have had truly a fine exhibition. Though I am very well satisfied with this place, yet I am distressed of seeing you, and shall accordingly return as I intended. I imagine you have had a meeting with my brother, and I want therefore to know what you have done. I am in no trouble about my reputation, whatever I may foolishly have written to you at that time. There is nothing better (for there is no other just object of care) than this; that everybody through his whole life should not deviate a hair’s breadth from a right conscience. Observe how philosophically I talk. Do you suppose I am engaged in these speculations for no purpose? I should be sorry to have you vexed; for it was nothing. And, to return again to the same point, do you think that I have altogether any other care than that I may not be deficient towards him? Or is this my object forsooth, that I may appear to preserve the public opinion? “For on these things there is no dependence.” I wish I were able to bear my domestic troubles as easily as I can disregard these. But you suppose me to have wished something which has not been accomplished. Is it not allowable, then, to have one’s own opinion? But, however, what was then done I cannot help approving; and yet I can very well lay aside all care about it, as indeed I do. But more than enough of trifles.

Letter XXI.

I delivered a long letter to Hirtius, which I had just written in Tusculanum. To that, which you sent me there, I shall reply at some other time; at present I wish to advert to others. What can I say about Torquatus, till I have heard something from Dolabella? As soon as that happens, you shall immediately know. I expect a messenger from him to-day, or at farthest to-morrow, who shall be sent on to you as soon as he arrives. I am expecting to hear from Quintus; for when I was setting out from Tusculanum on the 24th, as you know, I sent a messenger to him. To return to my business; that expression of yours, which had wonderfully pleased me, now exceedingly displeases; for it is altogether a nautical term, as indeed I knew; but I thought that when the rowers were ordered inbíleré, “to back their oars,” they suspended their motion. Yesterday, however, upon the arrival of a vessel at my villa, I learnt that this was not the case; for they do not suspend them, but move them in another manner. This is quite different from the Greek ἑργοῦ. Therefore 9 Towards reconciling Cicero and Quintus. See the ninth and following letters of book xi.

10 So I understand this passage, which has been variously interpreted by different commentators.
11 I conceive this alludes to some expression fallen from Atticus, probably on the occasion of Quintus Cæcero.
12 This seems to be written under a sense of philosophical propriety, by which he was taught to be anxious about nothing but his own conduct.
13 In the original is a fragment only of a Greek sentence, which, in our ignorance of the remainder, must be supplied by conjecture.
14 Meaning, no doubt, his affliction for his daughter, as well as his concern about Terentia and Quintus.
15 Respecting his conduct towards his brother, who seemed to be engaged in an adventurous voyage to Pompeii, while he suffered Quintus to remain in difficulties. (See book xi. letter 13.) I am aware that the latter part of this letter has been very differently interpreted, and supposed by some able commentators to relate to Cicero’s success in the forum, for which I see no sufficient grounds.
16 On the banks of the Liris, or Garigliano.
let it stand in the book, as it was. Mention this also to Varro, unless he has already altered it. For there is no better word than I had used before, and which is warranted by the authority of Lucullus. Carneades also makes the guard of the boxer, and the action of the charioteer holding in his horses, to correspond with τρώγλα; but the backing the oars is attended with motion, and that a considerable one, while the ship is turned round to the stern. You see how much more I care about this, than either about public rumour 7; or about Pollio: 8 let me hear also about Pansa, if anything certain is known; for I imagine it has been made public; and if there has been any news of Critoionus, or anything ascertained respecting Metelius and Balbinus. Tell me, is it your pleasure to publish my writings first, without my leave? Not even Hermodorus did this, who used to divulge Plato's books; from whence came the proverb, "Hermodorus deals in words." 9 How is this? Do you think it right that anybody should have it before Brutus, whom I addressed at your suggestion 10. For Balbus wrote me word that he had transcribed the fifth book of the Foundations of Moral Duty from you; in which I have not indeed altered much; yet something. But you will do well to keep back the others; that Balbus may not receive them uncorrected, or Brutus when they are stale. But enough of these matters, that I may not seem to be diligent about trifles. Though now these things are the greatest with which I have to do. For what else is there? I am using such dispatch in sending to Varro what I have written at your suggestion, as already to have forwarded it to Rome to be transcribed. You may, if you please, have it immediately; for I have written to my clerks to let yours, if you wished it, have the liberty of copying it; but you will keep it private till I see you; as you always do with great care, when I have desired it. But in consequence of my having omitted to mention this to you, Cercilia, glowing with a wonderful passion for philosophy, copies from your people, and is in the possession of parts of them, and the Foundations of Moral Duty. And I assure you (subject indeed to human fallibility) that she did not receive them from my people; for they were never out of my sight; and they were, besides, so far from making two copies, that it was with difficulty they completed one. I do not however impute any fault to your clerks: and that I would have you understand; for I had omitted to say that I did not yet wish them to get abroad. What! still upon trifles? For upon subjects of importance I have nothing to say. I agree with you about Dolabella. Let the co-heirs, 4 as you mention, come to Tusculanum. Balbus has written to me about Caesar's arrival, that it will not be before the 1st of August. The account of Attica is excellent, that she has less fever, is quieter, and bears her illness with patience. As to what you say upon that subject for our consi-eration, 6 in which I take no less interest than you; so far as I know, I greatly approve of the gentleman, his family, and fortune. What after all is the chief thing, I am not personally acquainted with him; but I hear favourable reports from Scrofa. He likewise lives very near you, if this is anything to the purpose, and is more noble than his father. When we meet therefore — and it will be with a mind disposed to approve. For in addition to what I have said, I have a regard for his father, as I believe you know, and greater than not only you, but than he is aware of; and that, both deservedly, and of long standing.

LETTER XXII.

It is not without reason that I ask so particularly what you think best about Varro. Some things occur to me, which I shall reserve till we meet. I have been very glad to interweave your name, which I shall do frequently; for it was by them last letter that I first understood you did not object to it. About Marcellus 6 I had before heard from Cassius; and Servius sent me the particulars. What a sad affair! To come back to my first subject; there is no place, where I would rather have my writings remain, than with you. But I should like not to have them sent abroad, till we both approve of it. I exempt your clerks from all blame, and do not mean to find fault with you; notwithstanding what I wrote to you, that Cercilla had some, which she could only have had from you. I was aware of the propriety of gratifying Balbus; 9 I only wished that it might not be given to Brutus when it was grown stale, or to Balbus when it was imperfect. I will send the books to Varro, if you think it right, as soon as I have seen you. You shall know the cause of my hesitation when we meet. In calling upon the assignees, you have done quite right. I am sorry you should have so much trouble about your grandmother's estate. The case of our friend Brutus is very vexatious; but it is the condition of human life. The ladies 1 are a little unreasonable in bearing such hostile dispositions, while neither of them are chargeable with dereliction of their duty. There was no occasion to call upon my secretary Tullius. If there had been, I would have sent you word. For nothing has been deposited with him under the title of a vow; though he has some money belonging to me, which I have determined to apply to this purpose. So that both I told you rightly where it was; and he rightly denied having anything under that title. But let us at once enter upon this business 6. For the consecration of men 1, I do not quite approve of a grove, because it is too unrequited; notwithstanding it has a reputation of sanctity. But this also shall be as you think proper; for you are my guide in everything. I shall be at Tusculum, as I appointed; and I wish you could be there the same day. But if anything should prevent you (as many things may); at least the next day, when the co-heirs are to come, by whom it would be cruel to be set at without you. Again another letter without a word about Attica; but this I place among the best signs. I find fault with this; not that you, but that she should not so much as send her compliments. But do you make my very best compliments both to her, and to Flilia; do not however give a hint of my being offended. I send Caesar's letter, in case you should not have read it.

LETTER XXIII.

To the letter which I received from you yesterday in the forenoon, I immediately replied; I now answer that of the afternoon. I wish Brutus had rather sent for me; which was more reasonable, considering the sudden and distant journey upon which he was going; and, to say the truth, under our strong feelings, when we are incapable of enjoying each other's society (for you know in what principally consists the pleasure of living together) I should rarely have acceded to our meeting in Rome, rather than in Tusculum. The books to Varro were no impediment; for they have been re-made, as you have seen; they only wait to have the errors of the clerks corrected. You know my hesitation about these books; but you are answerable. Those which I am to send to Brutus, are likewise in the hands of the transcribers. Get my business settled, as you mention; though Trebatius tells me they all make those deductions. What do you think these people will do? You are well acquainted with the house. Conclude it then in affability. You cannot believe how much I disregard such concerns. I assure you in the most solemn manner, and would have you believe me, that my pultry possessions are more plague than pleasure to me; and that I am more distressed by having nobody on whom I should bestow them, than gratified by having to use them. Trebatius also said that he had mentioned the circumstance to you. But perhaps you were afraid I should be sorry to hear it. That indeed was kindly intended; but, believe me, I do not now care about such matters. Therefore enter into negotiation, and clip it as you will, and make an end of it. Rouse them, call, speak to them, as if you thought you were speaking with that Scæva.

See letter 13 of this book.

Do not suppose that they, who are in the habit of grasping at what does not belong to them, will remit anything of their just dues. Take care only about the day; and even that with civility.

LETTER XXIV.

What is this which I hear from Hermogenes Clodius, that Andromenes had told him he had seen Cicero at Corecyra? For I suppose it must have been known to you. Has he then sent no letter even by him? Or has he not seen him? Let me know how this is. What more should I say to you about Varro? The four books are in your possession, and I shall be satisfied with whatever you do. I am restrained by no "respect for the Trojans!" why should I? I was rather afraid how well he might himself like it. But since you undertake it, I shall rest at ease.

LETTER XXV.

Respecting the deductions I have already replied to your very accurate letter. You will make an end of it therefore, and without any hesitation, or revision. It is proper and expedient that this should be done. About Andromenes, I had supposed it must be as you say, otherwise you would have known it, and mentioned it to me. While you write so much about Brutus, you say nothing of yourself. But when do you suppose he will come to Tusculum? For on the 14th I am going to Rome. What I meant to say to Brutus (but what I perhaps expressed indistinctly, since you mention your having read it) was, that I had understood from your letter, that he wished me not to go up at this time merely for the sake of waiting upon him. But as the appointed time of my going is so near, I beg that you will take care that this may be no impediment to his coming to Tusculum for his own convenience. For I had no intention of calling upon him about the sale, since you alone are quite sufficient in a business of that kind. But I wanted him to attest my will; which I should now prefer executing at another time, that I may not seem to have come to Rome for that purpose. I have accordingly written to Brutus, what I really thought, that there is no danger on the part of the opposite party. The sense seems to require that it be some person of more power than principle.

= Persons who have got money by unjust means, will not relinquish justifiable advantages.

= That the money may be ready at the time it is wanted.

= His son.

= Atticus having possessions in Corecyra, and frequent communication with that country.

= In the original is the same fragment of a verse so often quoted before. [See letter 13 of this book.] The meaning is, that he had no need to fear giving offence.

= Varro.

= See letter 23 of this book.

= See letter 24 of this book.

= That is of your coming to Tusculum, as well as Brutus.

= To attend Brinimus's sale. See letter 14 of this book.

= Wills were anciently performed with great solemnity.

= That Brutus may not imagine I go up now expressly to get his attestation, and should therefore be disappointed if he were not to be there.
was no occasion for his being there on the 15th. I should be glad then if you would manage this whole business so, that I may not in the least interfere with Brutus's convenience. But what is it that you are at length afraid of, because I desire the books to be given to Varro on your responsibility? Even now, if you have any doubt, let me know it. In elegance of style they have not been surpassed; I should like Varro, especially as he desires it; but he is, as you know, a stern man, and one who might easily take exception without just cause." Accordingly I often picture to myself his censure, complaining, it may be, that my part is more copiously defended in those books than his; though you will perceive that this is not the case, if ever you get into Epirus, and have leisure to examine them. For at present I give way to your correspondence with Alexio. I do not however despair of their meeting with Varro's approbation; and after being at the expense of large paper, I shall not be sorry to have that design adhered to. But I say again and again, that it must be on your responsibility. Therefore if you have any hesitation, let us transfer it to Brutus; for he also is an Antiochian. 1 A variable Academy, and like itself; now here, now there. 2 But, pray how did you like my letter to Varro? May I die, if I ever study any work, as I have done this. I have not even dictated to Tiro, who is used to write down whole sentences; but to Spintherus, syllable by syllable. 3

N.B. The 88th letter was before inserted in its proper place, after the 83d of book xii.)

LETTER XXVII.

Respecting the letter to Caesar, 4 I was always of opinion that it ought first to be submitted to his friends. Otherwise I should have been not only wanting in attention to them, but should also have exposed myself to some danger, in case of his being offended with me. They have acted ingenuously; and I take it kindly that they have not censured what I thought. Especially they have done well in suggesting so many alterations, that the writing it affords is more than the occasion demands. On the subject of the Parthian war, however, what ought I to have considered, but what I supposed him to wish? For what other argument could my letter admit, besides flattery? Had I wished to recommend what I thought best, should I have wanted matter? Therefore the whole letter is unnecessary. For where the advantage to be gained cannot be great; and a failure, even if it be not great, may be productive of vexation; what need is there of running the risk? Especially when I consider, that having written nothing before, he would expect that I should write nothing till the whole war was at an end. I am even apprehensive that he may imagine I wished this to be as a soother for my "Cato." 5 In short, I repeated of having written, and nothing could fall out more to my mind, than that my labour was not approved. Besides, I should have exposed myself to the calumnies of Caesar's adherents, and among them to those of your relation. 6 But I return to the subject of the gardens. I would by no means have you go thither but with perfect convenience to yourself; for there is no hurry. Whatever be the result, let us use our endeavours about Faberius. Respecting the day of sale, however, when you know anything, you will inform me. As the messenger, who came from Curiannum, reports that Attica is quite well, and says that he has a letter for you, I send him on to you without delay.

LETTER XXVIII.

As you were to inspect the gardens to-day, I shall hear to-morrow what you have thought of them. About Faberius you will let me know, when he is arrived. Respecting the letter to Caesar, believe me when I swear that I cannot do it. Not that the baseness of it offends me; though it ought exceedingly; for how base is flattery?) since it is base for me even to be alive. But, as I was saying, it is not this baseness that offends me; I wish it was; for I should then be what I ought to be: but nothing occurs to my mind. For with regard to the exhortations of those eloquent and learned men 7 to Alexander, you see on what subjects they are employed. They are addressed to a young man inflamed with the love of the truest glory, and asking for advice in the pursuit of lasting praise. It is easy to speak in an honourable cause. But what can I do? Yet I carved out from my wooden materials something that might look like an image; and in this, because there were some things a little better than what are doing, and have been done, they are censured. But I by no means regret this; for if that letter had been delivered, believe me, I should be sorry for it. What? Do not you see how that very disciple of Aristotle, with all his understanding and all his moderation, after he got the title of king, became haughty, cruel, iotemperate? And do you suppose this man? from amidst his processes, the converse of Quirinus, 8 will be pleased with this temperate letter of mine? But let him rather want what is not written than disapprove what is written. In short, as he pleases. That Archimedian problem⁷, which once stimulated me, and which I referred to you, is past. Now, indeed, I wish for that issue or any issue⁸, much more ardently than I formerly dreaded it. Unless something else prevent you, I shall be very glad to see you here. Nicias has been earnestly sent for by Dolabella, for I read the letter; and though it was against my inclination, yet it was at my instance that he went. This in my own hand.

LETTER XXIX.

While I was inquiring of Nicias different things relating to literary people, I fell, as it were, by chance upon the subject of Talna⁹. He made no great account of his abilities, but said that he was modest and prudent. He added, however, what I did not like, that he said he knew he had lately paid his addresses to Cornificia, the daughter of Quintus, who was an old woman, and had been married several times; but the match was not approved by the ladies, who found out that his property did not exceed 800 sestertia (6400£). This I have thought right you should know. I have learned about the gardens, both from your letter and from Chrysippus*. In the house, with the dulness of which I was well acquainted, I understand there has been little or no alteration. However, he speaks well of the larger bath, and says that out of the smaller may be constructed some winter apartments⁵. A covered place for exercise must therefore be added; which, if it is made as large as that in Tusculum, will not cost much more than half the price, in this place. But for that temple which I want, nothing seems more appropriate than the grove with which I was formerly acquainted; but at that time it was little frequented; now I hear it is very much so: there is nothing that I should prefer to it. On this subject I entreat you to bear with my extravagance. It remains, that if Faberius pays me that debt, I would not have you make a question about the price. I would have you outbid Otho. At the same time I do not suppose he will exceed the bounds of reason; for I think I know the man. But I hear he has been so roughly⁶ treated, that I do not think he will care to be a purchaser. What? Would be suffer?—But why do I reason about it? If you settle this Faberian account, let me have it though at a dear rate: if not, I must not think of it even at a cheap one. Let us try Clodia therefore, from whom I entertain hope, both on account of their being much cheaper, and because Dolabella's debt is on the point of being liquidated, so that I may trust to paying in ready money. Enough about the gardens. To-morrow I hope to see you, unless some business prevent; which I wish may be Faberius's. However, if you can.

LETTER XXX.

I RETURN you Cicero's¹ letter. O hard-hearted man, who are not moved with his dangers!¹ He accuses me also. I should have sent you his letter; for as to the other respecting his achievements, I take it to be a copy of yours. I have sent a messenger to Cumanus to-day, to whom I have entrusted your letter to Vestorius, which was brought by Pharnaces. I had just despatched Demea to you, when Eros arrived. But there was no news in the letter he brought, excepting that the sale² would be in two days. Therefore after that, as you mention; and I wish the Faberian business may previously have been settled. Eros, says he³, will not come to-day; but thinks he may to-morrow morning. You must pay him attention; though such flattery is not far removed from guilt. I shall hope to see you the day after to-morrow. Find out, if you can, who were the ten commissioners sent to Mummius⁴. Polybius does not mention their names. I remember only the consular Albinus, and Sp. Mummius, and think I have heard Hortensius name Tuditana. But in Libo's annals it appears that Tuditana was made pretor fourteen years after Mummius's consulship; which does not accord. I think of writing some political congress, supposed to be held at Olympia, or where you will, after the manner of your friend Dicarchus.

LETTER XXXI.

On the morning of the 28th I received by Demea² a letter dated the day before, by which I might expect you either to-day or to-morrow. But I apprehend that longings, as I do, for your arrival, I shall myself be the occasion of stopping you. For I cannot suppose the Faberian business will be so soon despatched (even if it is in train) but that it will meet with some impediment. When you are at liberty therefore⁵; as you are still likely to be kept. I shall be glad if you will send me the books of Dicarchus, which you mention, and likewise his χειρὰδαιρεῖς⁶. ⁸ It appears by the preceding letter that Cicero had sent this Demea before to Atticus, and it is to be supposed that he brought back a letter from Atticus to Cicero, which is that spoken of. The expression of the text is liable to the same ambiguity as that in the translation.

⁹ The sense is obvious, that he wished Atticus to come to him as soon as he was at liberty. I have thought the conclusion of the sentence was sufficiently clear, without adding to the original.

¹⁰ Meaning his book upon the descent into Trophonius's cave, which was before mentioned. See book vi, letter 2, 3, E.
THE LETTERS OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO

Cæsar I am quite determined. And the very thing which they say he mentions in his letter, that he will not go against the Parthians till affairs at home are settled, is the same that I advised in my letter. But were it otherwise, whichever he chose to do, he might, with my consent. For does he wait he was for this forthwith? And will he do nothing but by my advice? Let us, I beseech you, have done with this, and be at least half-free; which we may yet be by saying nothing, and keeping quiet. But speak to Otho, as you propose; and make an end, my Atticus, of that business. For I can find no other place where I can be with you; and yet not be in the forum. With regard to this price, this has occurred to me. C. Albanus is the nearest neighbour; who bought of M. Pilius 1000 acres, as well as I remember, for 11,500 sextertins1 (92,000l.); and everything is now lower. But my wishes are to be taken into the account; in which I am likely to have no rival besides Otho. Even upon him you will be able to make some impression; and the easier, if you have the assistance of Cænus. O. Silly gluttony! He has more cause to maintain the sternness of a father.2 You will reply to his letter, if there is anything you wish to say.

LETTER XXXII.

Having received a second letter from you to day, I did not care to leave you with only one in return. Do as you mention in regard to Faberius; for on him depends the whole success of my design. Had not this design been in agitation, (believe me in this, as in everything else,) I should not treat myself. Therefore, as you do (for nothing can exceed this) urge, insist, accomplish. I should be glad if you would send me both books of Dicearachus on the Soul, and likewise that on the Descent.3 I do not find his Trithoilicon, or the letter which he sent to Aristonæus. I now particularly want those4 three books; they would be convenient for the subject which I have in contemplation. The "Terquatus"5 is at Rome: I have desired it may be sent to you. The "Catulus" and "Lucullus"6 I imagine you have had before; but I have made new introductions to these books, which I wish you to have, containing an elogium upon each of these persons; and there are some other additions. You have not quite understood what I wrote to you about the ten commissioners; which I suppose was owing to my writing by abbreviations. For I meant to inquire that P. Posthumus, who I heard was a senator, had been one of the ten. But in Libo's annals I see that he was praetor in the consulship of P. Popillius and P. Rupilius. Could he then have been a commissioner fourteen years before he was praetor? Unless indeed he became quaeator extremely late, which I do not think was the case; for I observe that he had no difficulty in taking the curule7 offices at the regular times. I knew that Posthumius was one of them, whose statue you say you remember at the Isthmus. It is he who was with Lucullus; for whom I have to thank you, as a very proper personage at that congress.8 You will find out then the others if you can; that I may have a splendid assemblage of characters.

XXXIII.

Strange negligence! Can you suppose that Balbus and Faberius had ever once told me the declaration9 was given in? Moreover, it was by their direction that I sent up on purpose to make my declaration, which they said it was proper to do. It was made by the freed-man Philostratus. I believe you are acquainted with the clerk10; but you will write to him, and that without delay. I have sent a letter to Faberius, as you advise; and imagine you will have had some communication with Balbus to-day in the capitol. I have no scruple in regard to Virgilius.11 I have no reason for it on his own account; and if I should purchase, of what will he have to complain? But you must take care, that, being in Africa, he does not act the same part as Cælius. You will see about the account with Cripius.12 But if Plancus thinks of it, there may be some difficulty. You and I are both of us desirous that you should come to me; but this business must not be left. This is indeed good news, that you hope Otho may be gained.13 Respecting the valuation, as you say, when we have entered upon the negotiation; though his letter only relates to the quantity of land. Conclude with Piso14 if you can. I have received Dicearchus's book, and expect the saraband.15 Give instructions to somebody about the commissi-sioners. He will find it in the book which contains the decrees of the senate in the consulate of Cn. Cornelius and L. Mummius. Your conception about Puditanus is very probable; that, as he was at Corinth, (for Hortensius did not mention it inconsiderately,) he was then either questor or military tribune; and I rather suppose this to have been the case. You will be able to ascertain this from Antiochus. Learn also in what year he was questor, or military tribune. If neither agrees, then, whether he was in the number of the lieutenant or of the pages; provided he was in that war at all. I was speaking of Varro, and behold the wolf in the fable. For he came to me, and at such a time, that I invited him to stay; but did not use so much violence as to tear his coat; for I remember that expression of yours; and they were a large company, and I was not prepared. Nevertheless, soon after came C. Capito with T. Carrinas. Their coats I scarcely touched; yet they stayed, and it fell out very well. But Capito, by chance, entered upon the subject of enlarging the city; that the Tiber was to be brought from the Mulvian bridge at the foot of the Vatican hills; that the Campus Martius was to be built up, and the Vatican plain to be converted into another Campus Martius. "What do you say?" cried I. "I am going to the auction," says he; "for the law will certainly be carried, as it is Caesar's wish." I heard him very patiently, but should be sorry he have it take place. But what say you? You know Capito's diligence in seeking out news. He is not inferior to Camillus. Let me hear about the business of the 15th; for it is that which brings me up. I had likewise some other affairs, which, however, I can easily transact two or three days later. But I by no means wish you to be harassed with travelling. I also forgive Dionysius. As to what you say about Brutus, I have set him quite at liberty, as far as relates to me; for I wrote to him yesterday to say that I had no occasion for his assistance on the 15th.

LETTER XXXIV.

I came to Astura the 25th, having stopped three hours at Lanuvium to avoid the heat. I should be glad if you could without much trouble get me excused from going to Rome before the 5th; which you can do through Egnatius. But, above all, my principal concern is, that you should complete the arrangement with Publius while I may be considered as absent. Write me word what is said about this. "As if the people cared forsooth." In truth, I apprehend not; for it is an old story. But I wanted to fill the page. Why should I say more? as I shall presently be with you, unless you put it off. For I have already written to you on the subject of the gardens.

LETTER XXXV.

O DISGRACFUL circumstance! Your namesake is enlarging the city, which he never saw till within these two years, and which he thinks too little to hold him. I expect to hear from you upon this subject. You say that you will present the books 2 to Varro as soon as he arrives. He has got them then by this time, and all doubt is at an end. Ah! if you could know what risk you run! unless my letter has perhaps stopped you. But you had not received it when you wrote last. I am anxious to know therefore how the affair stands.

LETTER XXXVI.

THOUGH what you tell me of Brutus's affection, and your walk together, is nothing new, but the very same that I have often heard before; yet the oftener, the more agreeable. And it is the more gratifying to me, because you take pleasure in it; and the more certain because it comes from you.

LETTER XXXVII.

I SEND you this second letter to-day. Nothing can be more convenient or more suitable than what you mention about Xeno's debt, and the forty sesterces (300l) from Epirus 3. The younger Balbus spoke of that business 4 to me in the same manner. There is nothing new, but that Hirtius disputed sharply with Quintus 5 in my behalf; while he continued everywhere, and especially in company, to utter many calumnies first about me, then about his own father. But nothing of what he said was so plausible, as that we were both exceedingly hostile towards Caesar; that we were not to be trusted; and that I was even to be guarded against. It was quite formidable; but that I knew our king was aware of my having no spirit left. He said

This was probably some surveyor, at whose suggestion Caesar may have thought of extending the city.

The "Academica," addressed to Varro. Which, though done at Atticus's suggestion, yet Atticus seems to have been afraid of recommending. See letter 20 of this book.

Said in pleasant mockery of his friend's timidity.

This money due to Atticus from his estates in Epirus, and a debt from Xeno at Athens, [see book v. letter 10,] was proposed to be transferred to young Cicero in Athens, and repaid by his father at Rome.

too that I was severe towards my son Cicero; but of that as he pleases. I am glad I gave to Lepta's messenger my panegyric on Porcia\(^w\) before I received your letter. You will take care, therefore, if you have any regard for me, that if it is sent to Domitius and Brutus, it may be sent in this form.\(^*\) You will continue to give me daily information about the gladiators,\(^8\) and other subjects that are blown about, as you call it. I should be glad, if you think well of it, that you would call upon Balbus and Ophiulus about advertising the sale.\(^1\) I spoke to Balbus myself, who agreed to it. I imagine Ophiulus has written a account of all the property. Balbus has also. But Balbus wished for an early day, and at Rome; if Caesar's arrival should be delayed, the day might be put off. But he seems to be just here. Therefore take the whole into consideration; for Vestorius has signified his acquiescence.\(^4\)

LETTER XXXVIII.

As I was writing before dawn against the Epicureans\(^k\), by the same lamp and labour\(^l\) I scrawled something to you, and sent it before it was light. Afterwards, having slept again, when I got up at sun-rise I received a letter from your sister's son,\(^4\) which I send you. The beginning of it is very reproachful; but perhaps he did it without consideration.\(^6\) It runs thus: "I am sorry for everything that can be said discreetedly of you. Meaning that many things might be said against me, though he professed not to approve it. Can anything be more foul? But you shall read the rest, and judge for yourself; for I inclose it to you. You mentioned sometime since, that he was struck with the daily and continual commendations of our friend Brutus, such as many persons have told me he bestows upon me. He\(^h\) has said something about it to me, and I imagine to you, which you will let me know. What he may have written to his father about me, I cannot tell. But observe how dutifully he speaks of his mother: "In order," says he, "that I might be with you as much as possible, I wished to have a house hired for me, and so I told you; but you have not done it, so that we shall be less together. For I cannot bear to see that house; you know why." The reason

\(^w\) Cato's sister, who had lately died. She was mother to Domitius. See letter 49 of this book, which should have preceded this.

\(^*\) In the corrected form in which Cicero had sent it previously to his hearing from Atticus on the subject.

\(^1\) To be exhibited upon Caesar's return from Spain.

\(^2\) It is not certain what sale is here intended; possibly that of Cluvius's property. [See letter 45 of this book.]

\(^3\) Balbus probably acted as Caesar's agent.

\(^4\) That is, his readiness to have it take place at an early day.

\(^5\) The 26th of his Tusculan Questions, on which he was at this time engaged.

\(^6\) Writing before it was light, he of course wrote by a lamp. The expression "lamp and labour" was familiar to the Romans; and though not so in English, it seemed desirable nevertheless to preserve it in the translation.

\(^k\) Quintus.

\(^l\) I suspect the Greek expression in the original to be taken from some former letter of Atticus, written in examination of his nephew's misconduct.

\(^h\) Quintus the younger.

his father gives, is his aversion to his mother. Now help me, my Atticus, with your advice. "Shall I mount the lofty wall of justice?\(^b\) that is, shall I openly spurn him, and cast him off? Or shall I use the crooked paths of dissimulation?" For I may add with Pindar—\(^*\) to say the truth, my mind is divided. The former is more suitable to my disposition; but perhaps the latter to the times. Whatever be your opinion, be assured that mine is the same. I am most apprehensive of his intruding upon me in Tusculanum. It would be easier managed in a greater concourse. Shall I remove\(^5\) then to Astura? What if Caesar should suddenly arrive? Help me, I beseech you, with your advice. I will do as you determine.

LETTER XXXIX.

O vanity beyond belief! To tell his father that he must abscond from home on account of his mother! How ditful! But his father already relaxes, and says that his son had reason to be angry with him. I will, however, follow your advice; for I see you prefer the crooked\(^k\). I will go to Rome, as you recommend, though against my inclination; for I am deeply engaged in writing. By the same opportunity, you say I shall see Brutus. But were it not for that other reason,\(^1\) this circumstance\(^w\) would not bring me up: for he does not come from whence I could wish; nor has he been long absent, or ever written to me. But yet I want to know how his journey has turned out\(^o\). I should be glad if you would send me the books which I before mentioned to you, especially those of Phaedrus, entitled Nemortes and Eaados.

LETTER XL.

Does Brutus say this, that Caesar brings good tidings to worthy people? But where will be found them? Unless perhaps he hangs himself.\(^l\) But here what support he meets with is? Where then is that device of yours, which I saw in the Parthenon?

\(^b\) Taken from Pindar, and quoted more at length by Pliny in his Republic.

\(^*\) To be out of Quintus's way.

\(^k\) I have supposed it ought to be written incredatilem.

\(^w\) This relates to the crooked paths of dissimulation mentioned in the preceding letter.

\(^o\) To avoid encountering his nephew in Tusculanum.

\(^l\) The meeting Brutus, Cicero did not approve of Brutus's paying court to Caesar by going so far to attend him on his return to Rome.

\(^*\) One object of his journey seems to have been the obtaining the praetorship through Caesar's favour.

\(*\) Commentators are not agreed about the text, and it is in vain to conjecture what these books might be.

\(^4\) This may probably allude to something previously said by Atticus. It appears to be meant of Caesar, who having occasioned the death of so many good citizens, could only find in the regions of the dead any deserving that name.

\(^5\) It seems most probable that this may mean some library, or gallery, belonging to Brutus, so called from the temple at Athens, and in which he might, by the advice of Atticus, have placed statues, or pictures, of his ancestors Brutus and Abala, the ancestors of their country's liberty, the first against Tarquinus, the second against Q. Melfius.
of Ahala said Brutus! But what can he do? I am pleased with what follows, that not even he, who has been the source of all our amenities, thinks well of our nephew. I had feared that even Brutus might entertain affection for him: for, so he intimated in the letter he wrote in reply to mine, I wish he harder had tasted some of his stories. But, as you say, when we meet. Yet what do you advise? that I should go up? or stay? To say the truth, I am both entangled in my books, and unwilling to receive him here. I understand his father is gone to-day to meet him at the Aeronomia race. It is surprising how angry he went; so that I was obliged to check him. But I am myself easily changed. Therefore I must hereafter take care how I conduct myself. But consider what you think of my going up; and, if it can be clearly seen to-morrow, let me be informed of everything early in the morning.

LETTER XLII.
I have sent to Quintus the letter for your sister. Upon his complaining of the quarrel between young Quintus and his mother, (on which account he told his son that he would remove from his house,) I mentioned that he had written a proper letter to his mother, but none to you. He was surprised at the first circumstance; but with regard to you, he said the fault rested with himself, as he had repeatedly written to his son in terms of severity respecting your unkindness towards him. But if Brutus brings anything conciliatory, we shall not be angry with him. For then came on the mention of Cana. And indeed, if that proposal should be adopted, it became necessary. But, as you observe, some attention must be paid to our own dignity; and we ought both to be in the same mind, though his offence towards me is the greater and more notorious. But if Brutus brings anything conciliatory, we must not hesitate. When we meet, however: for it is a thing of some moment, and requires caution. To-morrow therefore, unless I receive from you some further leave of absence.

LETTER XLIII.
I shall certainly avail myself of this delay of a day; and you have done very kindly to let me know it, and in such a manner as to write yourself immediately from the sports, and to let me get your letter at a time when I did not expect it. I have indeed some business to transact in Rome, but I can do it two days later.

LETTER XLIV.
Your letter was most pleasing, however unpleasant the circumstance of the procession. But yet it is not unpleasant to know everything, even that affair of Cotta. The populace indeed behaved

5 He came to me, and was very much deceived; upon which I said, but what makes you so thoughtful? Do you ask, says he, one who has a journey to perform; and a journey to the war, and that a dangerous and a disgraceful one? What then obliges you to go? said I. My debts, he replied; and yet I have not even enough to support me on the road. In this place I borrowed something from your eloquence, and held my tongue. But, he went on to say, I am most of all vexed about my uncle. On what account? said I. Because, says he, he is angry with me. Why do you suffer it? I said. (For I chose rather to say so, than, why do you give occasion for it?) I will not suffer it, says he; for I will remove the cause of it. You do rightly, said I; but if it is not troublesome, I should be glad to know what the cause may be. Because, whilst I was deliberating whom I should marry, I did not satisfy my mother, and so did not satisfy him. But at present there is nothing I so much wish, and am ready to do what they desire. I hope it will turn out well, said I, and I commend you. But how soon? I am indifferent about the time, said he, since I approve of the thing. But I think, said I, that it should be before you set out; for so you will give satisfaction also to your father. I will do, says he, as you advise. So ended this dialogue. But hark you: you recollect that my birth-day is the 3d of January; you will accordingly be with me. Just as I had finished my letter, see here, Lepidus begs me to come up. I imagine the angers have nothing to do in the way of consecrating a temple. But let us go. I shall therefore see you.

in giving no applause even to the statue of Victory, on account of its bad neighbour. Brutus has been with me, and wished me very much to write something to Caesar; to which I agreed; but on con-tdition that he would see the procession. And have you ventured to present the books to Varro? I am anxious to know what he may think of them.
But when will he read them? I quite approve of your conduct about Atticus. It is something to have the mind elevated with the sight, as well as with the awe and celebrity, of the ceremony. I should believe if you would send me Cotta. Libo have with me, and I had Casca before. Brutus has informed me upon the authority of T. Ligarius, that the naming of L. Curdiius in the Ligarian speech is my mistake; but, as they say, an error of memory. I knew that Curdiius was very intimate with the family of Ligarius; but I see that he had died previously. Therefore give instructions to Pharnaces, Antaeus, and Salvius, to erase that name from all the copies.

LETTER XLV.

Lamia was with me after you left me; and he brought me a letter he had received from Caesar, which, though it was dated antecedently to those brought by Diochares, yet plainly declared his intention of coming before the Roman games. At the end of it he desired that Lamia would make every preparation for the games, so that he might not hurry up to no purpose. By this letter there seemed to be no doubt of his arriving before that time; and Lamia said that Balbus upon reading that letter was of the same opinion. I find I have some additional holidays; but how many, do, if you love me, let me know. You will be able to learn from Barbius, or from your other neighbour Egatius. When you exhort me to employ those days in expounding philosophy, you urge one who is already running. But you perceive that I must spend that time with Dolabella. Were I not detained by Torquatus's business, I should be able to run down to Putrethead and return in time.
Lamia, it seems, had heard from Balbus that there was a large sum of money in the house, which ought to be divided as soon as possible; and a great amount of plate, besides the lands; that an auction ought to take place at the earliest time. I wish you would write me word what you think best to be done. For my own part, if I had to choose out of all, I could not easily find anybody more diligent, or more ready, or more friendly towards me, than Vestorius; to whom I have written very particularly, and imagine that you have done the same. This appears to me sufficient. What say you? For the only thing I am afraid of is, that I may seem too negligent. I shall therefore hope to hear from you.

LETTER XLVI.

Pollex told me he would be back by the 13th of August, and accordingly came to me at Lanuvium the 12th. But he is rightly called Pollex, not Index. You will learn therefore from himself. I called upon Balbus; for Lepta, who was anxious about the games, brought me to him by force, in that Lanuvian villa which he has given up to Lepidus. From him the first thing I heard was this—"A little while ago I received that letter, in which he strongly confirms his intention of returnning before the Roman games." I read the letter.
There is a great deal about my "Cato" from the repeated perusal of which he says that he is grown more copious; whilst from the reading of Brutus's "Cato" he appears to himself eloquent. From him I learned the inheritance of Cluvius's property. O negligent Vestorius! A free* inheritance, before witnesses, within sixty days. I was afraid it would be necessary to send for him. Now I must send desire he will accept by my order. This same Pollex may therefore return. I have also had some liberal conversation with Balbus about Clu-vius's gardens, in which he promised to write to Cesar immediately. He said that Cluvius had trapped Titus Hordeonius with a legacy of 50,000 sesterii (400L) to Terentia, with the expense of a monument, and several other things; but that there was no charge upon me. Pray, gently reprove Vestorius. What can be more creditable, than that Plutus the perfumer should so long before have informed Balbus of everything by his slaves; and that he should not have informed me even by my own. I am sorry for Cossinias, for I had a great regard for him. If anything should remain after paying my debts and my purchases, I will send it to Quintus; but I apprehend these will oblige me even to contract new ones. I know nothing about the house at Arpinum.

* This appears to have been one of Cicero's messengers [see book xi, letter 4]; perhaps the same who, in book vii, letter 5, is called Pollex.

a Pollex in Latin signifies the thumb, index the forefinger. Index likewise signifies one who gives information.
Cicero, by saying he was no index, insinuates that he brought little information.

b He wished to have the charge of the games to be celebrated in honour of Caesar's return.

c His panegyric upon Cato. Brutus likewise published something on the subject of his uncle Cato.

d Balbus.

e A free inheritance might probably mean one unim-cumbered with conditions.

f It will not be accepted before witnesses.

g Vestorius.

h To Putrethead.

i Vestorius.
There is no occasion for your accusing Vestorius.
For after I had sealed this letter, my messenger arrived in the night, and brought me a letter from him written with great exactness, and likewise a copy of the will.

LETTER XLVII.

As soon as your servant Agamemnon touched upon the subject, not of my going up, (though I would have done that also, if it had not been for Torquatus,) but of my writing; I immediately stopped my business, laid aside what I had in hand, and have executed what you desired. I shall be glad to have you made acquainted with the account of my expenses through Pollex. For it would not be creditable to me to leave him in distress this first year, whatever may have been his conduct. Afterwards I shall regulate matters more carefully. This same Pollex must be sent back to accept 1 on my behalf. It was impossible for me to go to Puteoli 2, as well for the reasons I mentioned to you 3, as on account of Caesar's approach. Dolabella writes word that he will come to me the 14th. How is it to be subject to a master 4! Yesterday evening Lepidus wrote to me from Antium, where he was staying,—for he has the house which I sold. He requests me with great earnestness to attend the senate on the first; that I should greatly oblige both himself and Caesar. I imagine it is nothing, else Oppius would probably have said something to you,—for Balbus is ill. However, I would rather go up to no purpose, than be away if there should be any real occasion. I should be sorry for it afterwards. Therefore to-day I shall be at Antium; to-morrow before noon I shall reach home 5. If nothing prevents you, I wish you and Pilia would dine with me on the 31st. I hope you have settled everything with Pubillius 6. I shall run back to Tusculanum on the 1st; for I would rather everything should be arranged with them 7 in my absence. I send you my brother Quintus's letter; not a very kind reply to mine, but yet such as may give you satisfaction, so far as I can judge. You will see.

LETTER XLVIII.

Yesterday in the midst of noise 8 I fancy I heard something about your coming to Tusculumnum; which I wish, and wish again; yet with your own convenience. Lepta requests that, if his affairs demand it, I will go up,—for Babullius is dead. Caesar, I believe, inherits one-twelfth, though nothing has yet transpired. Lepta succeeds to a third; but he is afraid he may not be allowed to take possession of the inheritance. There is no reason for this; but, however, he is afraid. If therefore he sends for me, I shall hasten up,—else I shall not go before it is necessary. Send back Pollex as soon as you can. I have sent you the panegyric on Porcia 9 corrected; and I have done it the sooner, that it should happen to be sent to her son Domitius, or to Brutus, it may be sent in this form. If you can conveniently do it, I should be greatly obliged to you to attend to this; and I wish you would send me the panegyric 10 of M. Varro and of Lollius, especially Lollius's, for the other I have read, yet I want to look at it again,—for there are some parts which I hardly recollect.

LETTER XLIX.

I must first send my compliments to Attica 1, who, I suppose, is in the country; then give my best compliments to Pilia likewise. Let me hear of Tigellius 2 of any new; for, as Gallus Fabius informs me, he brings against me a most unjust charge of having deserted Phanes, after undertaking his cause. This I undertook, not with my good liking, against the young Octavius, the sons of Cænus; but I agreed to it out of regard to Phanes. For, if you remember, he had promised me through you, to assist me in my canvass for the consulship, if there should be any occasion, which I looked upon in the same light as if I had actually made use of him. He came to me, and said that the judge had appointed to hear his cause on the very day when it was necessary for me to attend the counsell about my friend Sestius by the Pompeian law: for you know the days for those judgments are fixed. I replied that he could not be ignorant of my obligations to Sestius; that if he had taken any other day whatever, I would not fail him. Upon this he went away angry. I believe I told you about it. However, I did not make myself uneasy, nor did I think it necessary to pay attention to the unmerited displeasure of one with whom I was unconnected. I mentioned however to Gallus, when I was lately at Rome, what I had heard, but without naming the younger Balbus 3. Gallus, as he writes word, had some business of his own. He says that Tigellius suspects me of having injured him from a consciousness of infidelity towards Phanes. I therefore send you this detail, that, if you can, you may learn something about this friend 4 of mine. Do not be in any trouble about me 5: it is well, if anybody be allowed to

1 See letter 37 of this book.
2 Likewise upon Porcia.
3 The particular occasion of this appears, by letter 50 of this book, to have been Attica's recovery from some illness, on which he congratulates both her and her mother.
4 From whom it is to be presumed that Cicero had heard of something said or done unkindly by Tigellius towards him.
5 This seems to me to mean Tigellius, and is to be understood sneeringly. Tigellius was grandson to Phænus.—Ep. Fam. vii. 24.
6 Tigellius was a singer in the train of Caesar. Cicero says that he had nothing to apprehend from his hostility.
hare at his own free-will; it has an appearance of not being entirely slaves. Though indeed, as you perceive, those people are rather slaves to me, if paying attention be the test of servitude.

LETTER LII.

Having been advised in some of your letters to write to Caesar in a more copious manner, and having lately understood from Balbus in Lavinium, that he and Oppius had written to Caesar, and informed him of my having read and greatly commended his book against Cato, I have written a letter to Caesar, on the subject of this book, to be delivered to Dolabella. But I sent a copy of it to Oppius and Balbus, and have desired them not to let my letter be delivered to Dolabella, unless they approve of the copy. They have replied to me, that they never read anything better, and that they ordered the letter to be given to Dolabella. Vestiarius has written to me to direct the Brinnian estate to be surrendered on my part to one Heterius, his servant; in order that he might properly surrender to him. If you approve of this, send that servant to me. I imagine Vestiarius will also have written to you. On the subject of Caesar's coming, I have heard from Oppius and Balbus the same as from you. I am surprised you should yet have had no communication with Tigellinus, if it be only to know how much he has received. I am curious to know, though I care not a farthing. You ask what I think about going to meet him; what think you of my going as far as Asium? I have even written to Munera about receiving me; but I apprehend he is gone forward with Matus. I shall therefore apply to Sallustius. Just as I had written this last line, Eros has informed me that Munera made him the kindest answer. I shall therefore lodge with him,—for Slius has no beds: and Dida, I believe, has his house quite full.

LETTER LI.

I forgot to send you a copy of my letter to Caesar, which was not, as you suspect, because I was ashamed of your seeing it, lest in ridicule I should be called Mihiullus. In faith, I have written no otherwise than to one on a par and equality; for I think well of that book, as I told you in person. I wrote therefore without flattery, and yet so that I think he will read nothing with more pleasure. I am now at length satisfied about Attica: therefore congratulate her again. Tell me all about Tigellinus, and as soon as you can,—for I am in great doubt. I can inform you that Quiatus comes to-morrow; but whether to me or to you I am uncertain. He wrote me word that he should come to Rome the 25th; but I have sent to invite him, though it obliges me to go presently to Rome, that he may not arrive before me.

LETTER LII.

O the troublesome guest! But I had no reason to remove of it: for it turned out very pleasantly. Upon his arrival at Philippus's on the evening of the second day of the Saturnalia, the house was so filled with soldiers, that there was scarcely space left for Caesar himself to dine. There were 2000 people. I was indeed disturbed at thinking what would be the case the next day. Barba Cassius came to my assistance, and set a guard. An encampment was formed in the field; the house was secured. On the third of the Saturnalia, he remained at Philippus's till one in the afternoon, and did not admit anybody. I imagine he was settling his accounts with Balbus: then he walked on the beach. After two o'clock he went into the bath; then he heard about Mamurra; he never changed countenance: he was afoot, and sat down to table, following an emetic course. So he ate and drank without reserve, and in great glee; sumptuously indeed, and with the preparation; and not only that, but "with good conversation well digested and seasoned, and, if you ask, cheerfully." His attendants were besides entertained at three tables very plentifully. Nor was anything wanting for the inferior freed-men and slaves; while those of higher condition were elegantly served. In short, I thought myself a man again. Yet my guest was not one to whom you would say,—"Pray come to me in the same manner when you return." Once is enough. There was nothing of importance in the conversation, but a great deal of liberal learning. In short, he was highly pleased, and enjoyed himself. He said he should pass one day at Puteoli, and one at Baiae. You have here the account of my hospitality or forced entertainment, which was hateful to me, I say, not disagreeable. I shall say more a little while, then go to Tusculum. As he passed Dolabella's villa, the whole body of armed men ranged themselves on each side of his horse, which was done nowhere else. This I heard from Nicias.

In the interval between this and the subsequent book, Caesar had been killed by a conspiracy of dishonored men, jealous of their country's liberty. At the head of these were M. Brutus and C. Cassius the pretor.}

2 This may be considered as spoken by Cicero in anticipation of Caesar's visit.
3 The 21st of December.
4 When Cicero was to receive him.
5 Munurra had realised a great fortune in Caesar's service. It is supposed that Catullus's verses on Munurra may have been read, reflecting also upon Caesar.
6 A course prescribed to such as were using vomits, which seems to have been familiar to the ancient Romans.
7 The preceding sentence is a verse of Lucretius.
8 If put him in mind of former times under a free government.
9 In the original is a Greek word signifying a forced reception for the return of a prince.
10 As Asturn.
11 This was probably intended as a mark of honour.
LETTER I.

I HAVE been to call upon the person about whom I spoke to you this morning. He said nothing could be more ruinous; that the state could never be settled. For if he, with all his abilities, found no way of doing it, who will now find any? In short, he said that all was ruined. I know not if it be so. But he affirmed, with apparent satisfaction, that in less than twenty days there would be an insurrection in Gaul; that, for his own part, since the 15th of March he had conversed with nobody besides Lepidus; in conclusion, that it was impossible things should stop here. O prudent Oppius! who does no less regret Caesar, while he says nothing that can give offence to any honest man. But enough of this. Whatever now occurs (and I expect a great deal), I beg you will not fail to write. Among other things, whether this is certain about Sextus: but above all about our friend Brutus; of whom Caesar used to say (as I heard from him with whom I have been), that it is of great importance what he wishes; for whatever he wishes, he wishes strongly. He took notice of this, when he spoke for Deiotarus at Nice, that he seemed to speak with great vehemence and freedom. Likewise (for I like to write everything as it occurs) very lately, when I was at his house by desire of Sestius, and sat down till I was called, he said: I can doubt of my being greatly hated, when C. Cicero is obliged to wait, and cannot get an audience at his own convenience? Yet if anybody is gracious, it is he; nevertheless I doubt not that he hates me bitterly. This he told me, and much more of the same kind. But to my purpose. Whatever may happen, not only of great, but also of little moment, you will inform me. On my part I will omit nothing.

LETTER II.

YESTERDAY I received two letters from you. By the first I learned the circumstances of the theatre, and Publius; good indications of the concurrence of the populace. The applause, which was given to L. Cassius, has even some pleasantry. The other letter is upon the subject of Bald Cape, which affords however no safe harbour, as you suppose. For I went on, though not so far as I had intended, being detained a long time in conversation. What I wrote to you, obscurely perhaps, was this; he said that Caesar had observed to him, upon the occasion of my being kept waiting, when I went to him at Sestius's request: Can I now he so foolish as to suppose this easy man will be friendly to me, after he has been kept so long waiting for my convenience? You have then a bold cape very unfriendly to tranquillity; that is, to Brutus. I am going to-day to Tusculanum, to-morrow to Lanuvium; thence I mean to proceed to Astura. Everything is ready for Pilia's reception; but I want likewise to see Attica, though I forgive you. My compliments to both of them.

LETTER III.

Your letter is still peaceful. I wish this may last; for Matius said it was impossible. And my workmen, mark you, who went to purchase corn, returned empty-handed, and brought a strong report from Rome that all the corn was taken to Antonius's house. This is certainly a false alarm, or you would have written to inform me. Balbus's freed-man Corunbas has not yet been here. The name is familiar to me; for he is said to be a clever architect. You seem to have been employed to countersign not without reason; for so these people would have us think. I do not know why they should not feel it also in their heart. But what are these things to me? However, scouts out Antonius's real disposition. I suspect him rather of solicitude about his table, than of designing any mischief. If you have anything of importance, let me know it; or if not, tell me the indications of popular feeling, and the sayings of the actors. Compliments to Pilia and Attica.

LETTER IV.

What news do you suppose I can have at Lanuvium? But I imagine that you there must every day receive some fresh intelligence. The times are pregnant with business. For when Matius is so indisposed to peace, what think you of others? I am grieved indeed that (what never tile to Brutus, from whose cause alone tranquillity could be expected.}

The note may read:

a Matius. See letters 3 and 4 of this book.
b Caesar.
c The day on which Caesar had been killed.

d Sextus Pompeius, who had collected a considerable force in Spain.

e Matius.
f Probably some actor, who may have been observed in the theatre for allusion to the downfall of tyranny. See letter 3 of this book.

1 L. Cassius being applauded not for any merit of his own, but because his brother C. Cassius had been one of those concerned in killing Caesar.

2 There is no doubt of Matius being intended under the name of Mædurus, which in Greek signifies bald, the subsequent word φαλάκρωμα signifying a bald head, or naked headland, such as usually protects a harbour. But in this instance it afforded so little hope of tranquillity, that Cicero did not remain there; Matius being evidently hoshappened in any other state) together with liberty, the republic should not have been restored. What is talked of, and threatened, is dreadful. I am afraid also of hostilities in Gaul, and what Sextus may attempt. But whatever happens, this 15th of March is a consolation. Our heroes, as far as lay in them, have acted gloriously and magnificently. What remains to be done, requires supplies and forces, of which we have none. I write this, that if there is anything new, (for every day I expect something,) you may immediately let me know it; and if there is nothing new, yet that, according to custom, our correspondence may suffer no interruption. I will take care it shall not on my part.

LETTER V.

Having used abstention before you were seriously indisposed, I hope that all is now as I could wish; yet I should be glad to know how you do. It is a good sign, that Calvina is uneasy at being suspected by Brutus. But this is no good sign, that the legions are coming with their ensigns from Gaul. What do you think of those which have been in Spain? Will they not make the same demands? What of those which Annius took over? I should have said Casinius, but it was a slip of the memory. There will be great confusion excited by this gamester. For that conspiracy of Caesar's freed-men might easily be put down, if Antonius were right-minded. Mine was a foolish scrupulousness in declining to get an honorary legation before the adjournment, that I might not seem to desert this swell of affairs, from which, if it were possible for me to remedy it, I certainly ought not to withhold my services. But you see the magistrates, if indeed they deserve the name, you see however the minions of the tyrant in authority; you see his veteran troops at our side; all which are unstable things; while they, who ought not only to be protected, but exalted, by the guards of the whole world, are rewarded neither with praise nor love, but confined within their own walls. Yet, after all, it is they that are happy: the state that is wretched. But I should be glad to know what effect the approach of Octavius produces; whether people flock to him; whether there is any apprehension of usurpation. I do not think it; but yet, whatever happens, I wish to know it. I write this to you on the 12th, setting out from Astura.

1 Sextus Pomponius in Spain.
2 Matius, whom he had before called Madarus in letter 2 of this book, both words being indicative of baldness. It is not improbable that Atticus may first have used Madarus, derived from the Greek, which was familiar to him; and that Cicero may have invented the corresponding word Calvena from the Latin.
3 Of what Caesar had promised them.
4 To Greece, preparatory to the war which Caesar was going to wage with the Parthians, which he immediately took up; and that Cicero may have invented the corresponding word Calvena from the Latin.
5 An authoritative leave of absence from the senate, frequently alluded to in the earlier books of these letters.
6 Having lands given them in Campania and other neighbouring districts.
7 Not to be relied upon.
8 The conspirators in Spain.
9 They withdrew from the public ferment excited by Caesar's death.
10 Better known afterwards by the name of Augustus.

LETTER VI.

I received your letter on the 12th at Fundi, while I was at dinner. In the first place therefore I was glad to hear that you were better; then that you made a better report of public affairs; for I did not like that approach of the troops. About Octavius I am very indifferent. I am curious to hear something of Marius, whom I supposed to have been put death by Caesar. That consul of ours seems to have passed off very well for the occasion. It hitherto, however, nothing gives me pleasure besides the 15th of March. Here at Fundi, where I am with my friend Ligur, I am distracted at seeing Sextilus's farm in the possession of that rascal Curtilius; and what I say of him, I say of the whole tribe. For what can be more sad, than to look upon the very things which made us hate him? Are we also to have for two years the consuls and tribunes of the people, which he chose? I am quite at a loss to know what part I can take in public affairs. Nothing was ever so inconsistent, as that the destroyers of the tyrant should be praised to the skies, while the acts of the tyrant are defended. But you see the magistrates; you see the other magistrates (if they deserve the name); you see the want of energy in the good. In the country towns the people are exulting with joy. It cannot be told how much they are delighted, how they flock about me, how eager they are to hear every word relating to that affair. Yet in all this time no decrees are passed. For such is the state of our government, that we are afraid of the very people we have defeated. I write this during my dessert. I will write more fully on public affairs another time. Let me on your part hear how you do, and what is going forward.

LETTER VII.

On the 14th I saw Paulinus in Caetia, who informed me about Marius, and mentioned some other things relating to the republic, which were indeed very sad. There has been nothing from you, for none of my people have arrived. But I hear that our friend Brutus was seen near Lamium. Where does he intend to fix himself? For while I wish to be acquainted with everything else, so particularly with what concerns him. I write this the 15th, on the point of leaving Formia, that from thence in another day I may reach Puteolanum. I have received from Cicero a letter smacking of the ancient style, and of considerable length. The rest may possibly be feigned; but the style of his letter shows that he has acquired some learning. Now I earnestly beg you to take care, as I lately mentioned to you, that he may not be left in want of anything. This concerns my credit and dignity, as well as my duty; and I understand that you are entirely of the same opinion. If then there is an opportunity, I think of going into Greece in the month of July. I hope everything may be more favourable. But the times being such that it is impossible to say certainly what may be proper for me, what allowable, what expedient; pray take care that I may support him honorably and handsomely. You will take into your consideration, as usual, this, and whatever else concerns me; and you will write to me all that is interesting, or, if there is nothing, what comes into your head.

LETTER VIII.

When you wrote, you supposed me to be already in one of my houses on the coast; and I received your letter on the 16th at the little cottage at Sinussa.

About Marius it is quite right, though I must needs grieve for the grandson of L. Crassus. I rejoice also that our friend Brutus is so well satisfied with Antonius. For as to what you say of Junius's having brought a letter written in a temperate and friendly manner; Paulus gave me one that he had received from his brother; at the conclusion of which he mentions that a plot had been formed against him, of which he had certain information. I did not like this, much less did he. I am not sorry for the queen's flight; but I want you to inform me what is become of Clodia. You write that the Byzantians, as about everything else, and will send for Pelops to come to you. As soon as I have seen into the business of Baiae, and that assemblage, about whom you was to be informed, I will write, as you desire, that you may know everything. I am anxiously expecting what the Gaurs, what the Spaniards, what Sextus will do. This you will tell me, who tell me everything. I am glad that the reason of your silence was nothing but a slight indisposition; for I seem, as I read your letters, to feel a temporary case. Always write to me everything that relates to Brutus, where he is, and what are his intentions. I hope he may now safely walk alone over the city. But yet I should like to know.

b Sinussa is on the sea-coast, whither Atticus's letter had been sent. It appears, from book xvi. letter 16, that Cicero had a house there.

c This pretended has been put to death by Antonius. Had he been the person whose name he assumed, he would have been grandson to L. Crassus. See book xli. letter 50.
d Brutus's agreement with Antonius was likely to lead to peace.

This Junia was sister to Brutus, and wife to M. Lepidus, who had the government of Transalpine Gaul. The letter must probably have been from Lepidus, the friend of Caesar, to Brutus. The good understanding of the opposite parties apparent from this letter, would be destroyed by plots, or the suspicion of plots, such as is afterwards mentioned.

L. Emilius Paulus, brother to Lepidus.

Cicopatra, who had followed Caesar to Rome, and now fled upon the event of his assassination.

To what this alludes, or the following mention of the Byzantians, is not known.

When Cicero speaks of "the business" of Baiae, he may be supposed to mean the conversation and idle talk, Baiae being notorious for idleness. And this sense receives confirmation from the word chorus, which I have rendered "assemblage," but which in the original means properly "a troop of dancers or singers." The expressions may probably be borrowed from Atticus, who seems often to have indulged in a little good-humoured bantering, seasoned also with terms newly invented or newly applied. [See book iv. letter 8.] It is to this that Cicero alludes. [See letter 14 of this book] when he says fecit tua plena facielarum.

See letter 5 of this book.

LETTER IX.

I have learned a great deal about the republic from your letters, several of which I received at the same time by Vestorius's freed-man. To your questions I shall reply briefly. In the first place, I am greatly delighted with the Cluvian inheritance; but as to what you ask, why I sent for Chrysippus? I had two cottages in ruins, and the rest were so crazy, that not only the lodgers, but the very rats had left them. Some people would call this a calamity; for my part, I do not think it even a disadvantage. O Socrates, and ye of the Socratic school, I shall never be sufficiently thankful to you. Ye immortal gods! how totally do I disregard such things. But, however, I have got such a plan for building, by the recommendation and assistance of Vestorius, that this loss will be a real gain to me. There is a great concourse here; and, as I am told, it will be still greater. Two, indeed, are the pretended consuls elect. O gracious gods! The tyrant survives, though the tyrant is dead. We rejoice in the death of the victim, whose acts we defend. How severely, therefore, does M. Curtius accuse us, as if it were a disgrace to live! And not without reason. For it had been better to die a thousand times than to suffer such a state of things, which seems likely even to be permanent. Balbus also is here, and is much with me. He had received a letter from Vetus, dated the 31st of December, stating that at the time he was besieging Cecilius, and had almost taken him, Paeorus the Parthian came up with a large army, by which means Cecilius had been snatched from him, and he had lost many of his men; in which affair he accuses Volciatus. Thus a war in that quarter appears imminent. But let Dolabella and Niclas see to this. At the same time Balbus gave me more favourable accounts of Gaul. He had a letter twenty days after its date, saying that the Germani, and those nations, upon hearing about Caesar, had sent deputies to Aurelius, who was left in the command by Hirtius, professing their submission to such orders as they should receive. In short, everything wore the appearance of peace, contrary to what Calvina had said.

b See book xiii. letter 46.
1 An architect, mentioned likewise book xiii. letter 29.
2 Whose philosophy Cicero had adopted.
3 Hirtius and Passus, who had been appointed by Caesar, not elected by the votes of the people according to the laws of the republic.
4 C. Antidius Vetus, one of Caesar's generals.
5 Cecilius was of Pompeius's party; after the battle of Pharsalia he had raised an army in Syria, and was besieged in Apamea.
6 Dolabella was going into Syria to conduct the war against the Parthians, and Niclas accompanied him, being attached by familiarity and friendship.
THE LETTERS OF MARCUS TULLIUS CICERO

should have greater force than if he were himself alive? Do you remember how I demanded, on that very first capitoline day, that the senate should be summoned by the preators into the capitol! Ye immortal gods! What operations might then have been effected; while all good, or tolerably good people were existing; and the rogues were confounded? You lay the blame on the 18th of March. But what could have been done then? We were already ruined. Do you remember exclaiming that the cause was ruined, if he should be buried with funeral honours? Yet he was burned in the public forum, and extolled to excite pity; and slaves and beggars were sent with torches against our houses. What followed? That they dared to say, "Do you oppose the nod of Caesar?" These, and other things of the same kind, I am unable to bear; therefore I think of changing my country for another. But has your windy colic entirely left you? As far as I could judge by your letters, it seemed to be so. I come back to the Tehusii, the Scarabaeoi, the Phragos. Do you imagine that they expect to hold their possessions, while our authority still subsists? For they gave us credit for more valour than they have found. Will these, so farsooth, be lovers of peace, and not rather authors of plunder? But what I said to you about Curtillius and the Sextilian estate, I say about Censorinus, about Messala, about Planecus, about Postumius, about the whole set. It was better to have died when he died (which I wish had happened), than to witness these things. Octavius arrived in Naples the 18th. There Balbus saw him the following morning, and the same day came to me in Cumamum, and said that he was going to enter upon his inheritance. But, as you say, he must have a great continent radical with Antonius. Your Buthrotian affair is, as it ought and shall be, an object of my care. You ask if the Clavian inheritance has already produced a hundred sestertiae (800L). It seems to approach to this; but in the first year I have cleared eighty (640L). Quintus the father has written to me in vexation about his son, principally owing to the kindness he now shows to his mother, towards whom he was before so undeservedly hostile. He has sent me some flaming letters against him. What he is doing, if you know, and have not yet left Rome, I should be glad if you would inform me; and indeed, if there is anything else. I am infinitely delighted with your letters.

LETTER XI.

The day before yesterday I sent you a longer letter. I shall now reply to the contents of your last. I should in truth be very glad to let Brutus occupy Astura. You speak of the intemperance of those people: did you expect it to be otherwise? For my part, I look for yet greater things. When I read the harangue about 's so great a man,' about so 'distinguished a citizen,' I am unable to bear it. Though these things may now make one smile, yet remember, the custom of pernicious harangues is so cherished, that those our gods, not heroes, will live indeed in eternal glory, but not without envy, not even without danger. Yet they have a great consolation in the consciousness of the noblest and most famous deed. But what consolation is left for us, who, when our kios is killed, are yet not free? But let fortune see to this, since reason does not rule. I am pleased with what you tell me of Cicero. I wish all may go on well. The care you take to supply him amply for his use and ornament is very grateful to me, and I beg you to continue it. Respecting the Buthrotians you judge very rightly, and I do not forget that concern. I will also undertake all legal actions which I perceive daily to become easier. With regard to the Clavian inheritance (since the interest you take in my affairs exceeds even my own), the rents amount to a hundred (800L). The downfall has not lessened the property; I do not know if it may not have improved it. I have with me here Balbus, Hirtius, and Pansa. Octavius has lately arrived at the neighbouring house of Philippus. He is entirely devoted to me. Lentulus Spinther is coming to me to-day, and goes away to-morrow morning.

LETTER XII.

O MY Atticus, I fear this 15th of March may be productive of no other issue than a transitory joy, followed by the penalty of odium and grief. What is it that I hear from hence? What do I witness here? A noble deed, indeed, but fruitless! You know how much I am attached to the people of Sicily, and how honourable I esteem that patrocinium. Caesar conferred upon them many benefits, to which I did not object, though their admission to the rights of Latinus was too much. However, let that pass. But see now, Antonius, in consideration of a large sum of money, has promulgated a law, said to have been proposed by the dictator in the comitia, by which the Sicilians are made Roman citizens, of which there was never any mention during his life. Nay, is not the case the same with my friend Deiotarbus? He is worthy indeed of any kingdom; but not through the influence of Rufus. There are six hundred things of the same kind. But I come back to my purpose. In a cause so clear, so well attested, and so just, as that of Brutus; shall we obtain no satisfaction? We may the more expect it, the more he thus dispenses. Octavius conducts himself here in a manner very respectful and friendly towards me. His own people saluted him as Caesar; but Philippus did not, therefore neither did I. I do not think it possible for him to be a good citizen, so many people are about him, who threaten the death of our friends. They say these things are not to be borne. What think you, when this boy shall come to Rome, where our libertators cannot be in safety? Famous indeed they will always be, and happy too in the consciousness of what they have achieved. But we, unless I deceive myself, shall lie in disgrace. I wish, therefore, to get away, where "I may hear nothing of the Pelopidse," as the poet says. I do not like even these consuls elect, who have, however, forced me to declare; so that I am not permitted to be at rest even at this watering-place. This is owing to my too great complaisance. Formerly it was almost necessary; but now, whatever be the state of things, the case is altered. For a good while past I have had nothing to write to you; yet I write, not because I can afford you any pleasure by this letter, but that I may elicit yours. Do you, if there is anything about other matters, but especially whatever occurs relative to Brutus, let me know it. I write this on the 22d, while I am at table at Vestorius's house, a man unused to argument, but sufficiently versed in arithmetic."

LETTER XIII.

Your letter of the 19th was delivered to me on the seventh day after. You ask, and even suppose that I do not myself know, whether I am most pleased with the hills and prospect, or with the walks on the level beach. And indeed, as you say, the beauty of both is such, that I doubt which is to be preferred. But "we have other cares than those of entertainments, and see with dread a prodigious mischief gathering, and stand in doubt whether we shall be saved, or perish." For though you send me great and pleasing intelligence of D. Brutus having joined his troops, in whom my best hopes reside; yet, if a civil war breaks out, as it certainly will if Sextus remains in arms, which I am confident he will, what part I ought to take I know not. For it will not now be allowable, as it was in Caesar's war, to move neither to one side nor the other. But whomsoever this set of scoundrels suppose to have been pleased with Caesar's death (and we have all most openly showed our joy), him they will hold to be in the number of their enemies. And this consideration leads to a most extensive slaughter. It remains for me, then, to join the army of Sextus, or perhaps of Brutus. An odious measure, at once foreign from our age, and exposed to the uncertain issue of war. So that we may in some measure say to each other, "My child, to you are not granted warlike operations; do you rather employ yourself in the lovely works of speech." But this must be left to fortune, which in such circumstances is of more avail than reason. Let us, however, see to that, which ought to be in our own power; that whatever happens we may bear it with fortitude and self-possession, and may remember that it is the condition of humanity: and let us still derive great consolation from literature, and not a little also from the 15th of March. Take now upon yourself the consideration of what constitutes my present solicitude, so many things occur to my mind both ways. I am going, as I had arranged, with a nominal appointment to Greece. I may thus in some measure escape the danger of the impending conflict, but am likely to incur blame for deserting the republic at so difficult a crisis. Should I remain, I foresee that I must be exposed to great risk; but I conceive it may happen that I may be able to be of use to the republic. The following considerations are of a private nature; that I think it may be very advantageous for the confirmation of my son, that I should go thither; nor indeed can it be said I have neglected him in view at the time when I determined to get from Caesar an honorary lieutenance. You will take this whole business, therefore, into your consideration, as you use to do where you think me to be concerned. I come now to your letter, in which you say it is rumoured that I am going to sell the property which I have at the lake; and to couvey to Quintus that little place at an extravagant price, that the rich Aquilla, as young Quintus told you, may be introduced there. But I have no thought of selling it, unless I should find something which I like better; and Quintus has, at this time, no wish to purchase; for he has enough to do in the repayment of his wife’s dowry, in which he is under great obligations to Egennius. And as for taking another wife, he is so far from it, that he declares nothing is more delightful than a single bed. But enough of this. I revert to the wretched, or rather the lost republic. M. Antonius has written to me about the restoration of Sextus Clodius; how honourably, as far as relates to me, you will see by his own letter, of which I send you a copy; how profusely, how basely, how mischievously (so that I sometimes almost wish for Caesar again), you will easily believe. Now things which Caesar would never either have done or suffered, are now brought forward from his forged instructions. I have treated Antonius with all civility; for having once persuaded himself that he was at liberty to do what he chose, he would not the less have done it for my disappointment. Therefore I send you likewise a copy of my answer.

Antonius Consul to Cicero.

It has happened from my occupations, and your sudden departure, that I have been prevented from treating with you, and I know the following business; and in consequence am apprehensive that my absence may lessen the weight I might have with you. But if your goodness corresponds with the opinion I have always entertained of you, I shall sincerely rejoice. I begged of Caesar to restore Sex. Clodius; and I gained my suit. It was my intention, even then, to use his kindness only on the condition of your acceding to it; which makes me the more earnest that you may now be permitted to do it with your consent. But if you show yourself unmoved by his miserable and ruined fortune, I shall not contend against you, however I may seem bound to support Caesar’s will. Yet in truth, if you are disposed to regard me with humanity, with prudence and charity, you will easily be persuaded; and will be glad that P. Clodius, a youth of the fairest hopes, should think that, when it was in your power, you did not persecute his father’s friends. Let it, I entreat you, appear that you engaged in hostility with his father for the republic’s sake; and you will not despise this family. For we more honourably, and more readily, lay aside the quarrels which have been taken up in the name of the republic, than those of private pique. Suffer me then to instil into this youth, even now, these sentiments, and to teach his tender mind that quarrels are not to be transmitted to posterity. Though I know well that your fortune, Cicero, is exempt from all danger; yet I apprehend you would rather pass a tranquil and honourable old age, than one of vexation. Lastly, I ask this favour of you by my own right, having done everything in my power for your sake. Should I not obtain your consent, so far as I am concerned, I shall not give this boon to Clodius; that you may understand how great your authority is with me, and may for that reason be the more easily conciliated.

Cicero to Antonius, Consul.

What you negotiate with me by letter, I should for one reason only have wished to negotiate in person; that you might have perceived not by my words alone, but also by my countenance, and eyes, and forehead, as they say, the affection I bear you. For having always loved you, as indeed I was constrained to do, first by your attention, afterwards also by the favours I received, so in these times the republic has attached me to you in such a manner, that I hold nobody dearer; and the letter you have written full of affection and consideration, makes me feel not that I am doing a kindness to you, but receiving one from you; while in your request you refuse to serve my enemy, though your own relation, against my consent; when you have it in your power to do so without any difficulty. But, my Antonius, I not only concede this to you; but such are the expressions you use, that I consider myself most liberally and honourably treated. And though in any case I should think it right freely to grant this to you, I am glad to do it also in consideration of my own feelings and disposition. For I never entertained any bitterness, or anything that partakes of austereness or severity, beyond what the necessity of the republic demanded. To which I may add, that against Clodius himself I never showed any signs of anger; and have always made it a rule, not to persecute an enemy’s friends, especially those without power; and not to deprive ourselves of the protection they afforded. Respecting young Clodius, I consider it to be your business to imbue his tender mind, as you say, with these sentiments, that he may not suppose any hostility to remain between our families. In my contentions with P. Clodius I supported the public cause; he his own. The republic has passed its judgment upon our struggles. If the were living, I should now have no quarrel remaining with him. Therefore, since you ask this of me in such a manner, that, notwithstanding your power, you refuse to make use of it without my consent, pray give this also to the young man, if you think fit; not that my age has any danger to apprehend from his youth; or that my dignity has to fear any opposition; but that you and I may he mutually united together more than we have hitherto been. For owing to the intervention of these hostilities, your heart has been more open to me, than your house. But enough of this. I have only to say, that I shall always, without hesitation, and with the greatest zeal, do whatever I think will please you, or contribute to your advantage; of which I beg you to be thoroughly persuaded.

LETTER XIV.

Repeat again those same words to me. Has your young Quintus worn a chaplet in the public

6 Sextus Clodius, for whom Antonius had written to him.
7 The text is borrowed from a play of Plautius.
1 The Parilia were celebrated the 21st of April; but Caesar having received the news of a victory gained in Spain on the eve of this annual festival, appointed additional games to be observed ever after in memory of that event. One of these games was a chaplet on this occasion to show his attachment to Caesar.
games? Was he the only one? though you add Lania, which I am surprised at; but I wish to know who there were besides. I am quite sure however there could be nobody who was not a bad citizen. Yet let me hear the particulars. It happened that I had despatched to you my letter of the 26th written at considerable length, about three hours before I received yours full of important matter. I need not tell you how heartily I laughed at your pleasantry and wit on the Vestorius' heresy, and the Puteolan custom of the Phelios. But let us turn to what more immediately concerns the public. You defend the party of Brutus and Cassius, as if I reproached them, whom I cannot sufficiently praise. But I summed up the faults of the times, not of the men. For after the tyrant has been removed, I see the tyranny continue. So that what he would not have done, is now done; as in the case of Ocladius; respecting whom I am confident that he not only would not have done it, but would not even have suffered it. Rufio Vistorianus will follow, (who was never written Victor*) and others. Who will not? We could not bear to be the slaves of the man himself; yet we yield obedience to his memoranda. For on the 18th of March who could absent himself from the senate? But suppose that this might in some manner have been possible; yet, when we had assembled, could we freely deliver our opinions? Was it not necessary by all means to support the veteran soldiers, who were present, and armed, while we had nothing to protect us? How little I was pleased with that session in the capital, you are witness. What then? Was that the fault of the Brutuses? By no means indeed of those Brutuses; but of other Brutuses, who think themselves cautious and prudent; who were satisfied with feeling a secret joy; while some even expressed their congratulations; but none remained firm. But let us omit what is past; let us support these people with every care and protection; and, as you teach us, let us be content to think ourselves happy in the 15th of March; which to our friends indeed, those more than mortal men, has given an access to heaven; but has not given freedom to the Roman people. Recollect your own prediction. Do you not remember how you exclaimed that everything was lost, if he should have a public funeral? You said it wisely; and you see what has flowed from that circumstance. As to what you mention, that Antonius was to bring forward the subject of the provinces on the first of June, of which he was himself to have the two Gauls, with extension of the ordinary time in both; will it be allowed to vote freely? If it is, I shall rejoice at the recovery of our liberty; if not, what do I get by this change of masters, besides the pleasure with which my eyes behold the just fall of the tyrant? You say that the temple of Ops has been plundered; which I foresaw at that time. Verily we have been set free by excellent men, and yet are not free. So the praise is theirs, the blame our own. And do you exhort me to write history? To collect together the wicked acts of these people, by whom we are even now besieged? Can I avoid commending those same persons, who have employed you to counter-sign? Not that the paltry interest weighs with me; but it is hard to visit with reproach people, whoever they are, that are kindly disposed. But about all my designs, as you mention, I think I shall be able to decide more certainly on the 1st of June, on which day I shall be in Rome, and will use my utmost endeavours, with the help of your authority and influence, and the perfect justice of the cause, that a decree of the senate may be obtained in the case of the Buthroans, such as you describe. What you bid me consider, I will consider; though in my last letter I had referred the consideration to you. But you are for restoring to your neighbours, the Marsillians, their property; as if the republic were already re-established. It may perhaps be possible to do this by arms, in which what strength we possess I know not; by authority it is impossible.

LETTER XV.

The short letter, which you afterwards wrote, was indeed very pleasing to me, about Brutus's letter to Antonius, and the other to you. Things wear a better appearance than they have hitherto done. But I must consider where I am, and which way I should ever now proceed. My charming Dolabella! For I now call him mine; before, believe me, I had some doubt. This is an act of deep contemplation. From the Tarpeian rock? On the cross! Throwing down the pillar! Con-

* Alluding to Cicero's 12th letter, in the conclusion of which he speaks of Vistorius as more versed in arithmetic than in philosophical reasoning. What is meant by the Puteolan custom of the Phelios is not so easily explained; but may probably be a witticism of the same kind, drawn from the circumstance of the Phelios being perhaps brokers at Puteoli.

§ Atticus may have erroneously written his name Rufio Victor; but Cicero says he should rather be distinguished by the name of Vistorianus, having been implicated in some dispute with Vistorius, but without obtaining a victory over him, and therefore not entitled to the appellation of Victor.

3 It is probable some deputies from Marseilles might be living in the neighbourhood of Atticus's house at Rome, suing for the restoration of what Cesar had taken from them when they refused to join his party.

4 Atticus had probably so called it in his letter.

5 It having been his intention to pass over to Greece see letter 13 of this book.

6 Dolabella had exerted himself in his capacity of consul to check the forwardness of those who had raised a monument to Cesar, and created a pillar inscribed "To the father of his country." Some he caused to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock (an ancient form of capital punishment in Rome); others, slaves, he ordered to be crucified at the same time throwing down the pillar and monument, and ordering the ground on which they stood to be new paved.
tracting for the new pavings of the ground! In short, it is quite heroic. He seems to have put an end to that affectionate regret, which was already making daily progress, and which I feared, had it continued, would have been dangerous to our deliverers. I now entirely concur with your letter, and hope for better things; though I cannot hear those persons, who, while they pretend to be friends to peace, support his wicked acts. But all cannot be done at once. Things are beginning to go better than I had expected. I shall not, however, go abroad, till you think I can do it with propriety. I will certainly nowhere be wanting to my Brutus. Even if there were no friendship between us, I would do it in acknowledgment of his great and distinguished virtue. I give up to Pilia my whole house, and all that it contains, being myself on my way to Pompeianum this 1st of May. I wish you would persuade Brutus to occupy my house at Asura.

LETTER XVI.

I sent this letter the 3d of May on the point of embarking from the Clavian gardens in a row-boat, after having put our dear Pilia in possession of my house on the Lucrine lake, with the servants and purveyors. The same day I threaten our friend Patus's potted cheese, and proceed in a few days to Pompeianum; whence I shall afterwards return by sea to these royal domains of Puteoli and Cumae. O place! greatly to be desired in all other respects! but from the number of troublesome visitors almost to be shunned. But to come to the point; how noble is this conduct of my Dolabella! What matter it affords for contemplation! For my part, I do not cease to praise and to encourage him. You do well to inform me in all your letters, what you think of the thing itself, and what of the man. Our friend Brutus, I suppose, might now wear even a golden crown in the middle of the forum. For who would dare to insult him, with a cross, or the Tarpeian rock before his eyes? Especially amidst such great applause and approbation of the lowest people. Now, my Atticus, resolve me of my doubts. I should like, when I have fully satisfied Brutus, to make an excursion into Greece. It is of great moment to Cicero, or rather to me, or I may say to both of us, that I should look upon him in his studies. For Leonidas's letter, which you sent me, affords me no great satisfaction. I shall never be content with commendations such as these; "as things are at present." It is the testimony of one who feels no confidence, but rather mistrust. I had desired Herodes to write to me in detail; but I have hitherto heard nothing from him. I fear he may have had nothing which he thought would give me pleasure to hear. I am much obliged to you for having written to Xeno; for my duty and reputation, are both concerned in his having no want un supplied. I hear that Flamma Flaminius is in Rome. I have written to him to say that I had desired you to speak with him about the business of Montanus; and I shall be glad if you will take care that my letter is delivered to him; and will yourself, at your convenience, have some conversation with him. I conceive, if the means have, will provide against the possibility of any expense being incurred on his account. You have acted very kindly towards me in letting me know that Attica was well, before I knew of her indisposition.

LETTER XVII.

I came to Pompeianum the 3d of May, having the day preceding, as I before wrote you word, established Pilia in Cumanaeum. There, whilst I was at dinner, your letter was delivered to me, which you had given to your friend Demetrius, the 30th of last month. In this are contained many things prudently done, yet such that, as you yourself observe, every design appears subject to the control of fortune. Upon these subjects, therefore, we can only speak as occasion offers, and when we are together. Respecting the affair of Bathrotum, I wish I may have an opportunity of seeing Antonius, which will be a great step. But it is not expected that he will deviate from the Capusan road, whether he fear he is gone to the great prejudice of the republic. L. Caesar, whom I saw yesterday at Naples very far from well, was of the same opinion. This business must therefore be entered upon, and completed on the 1st of June. But enough of this. Young Quintus has written a most bitter letter to his father, who received it upon our arrival at Pompeianum. The substance of it was that he would not tolerate Aquilia as his stepmother. That however might perhaps be borne. But what think you of this? That from Caesar he had received everything; nothing from his father; and for what was to come he looked to Antonius. How lost to all sense of honour! But I will think what can be done. I have written letters to our friend Brutus, to Cassius, and to Dolabella; of which I send you copies; not with a view to deliberate about sending them, for I am clearly of opinion they should be sent; but because I doubt not that you will agree with me. I beg you, my Atticus, to supply my son with what you think right, and to allow me to lay this burden upon you. I am very thankful for what you have hitherto done. That unpublished work of mine has not yet been polished, as I designed. What you wish to have interwoven in it requires another separate volume. But, believe me, I think there was less danger in speaking against those wicked practices during the life of the tyrant than since his death. For he somehow bore with me surprisingly. Now,

Cicero to his Dolabella, Consul.

Though I am satisfied, my Dolabella, with the glory you have gained, and derive abundantly great joy and delight from it; yet I cannot help acknowledging that my pleasure is enhanced by the common opinion which supposes me to have a share in your praises. I have seen nobodys—and I meet with numbers every day; for there are a great many excellent men who come into these parts on account of their health, besides many of my friends from the neighbouring towns; all of whom, while they extol you to the skies with the loudest praises, presently return the greatest thanks to me. For they say they cannot doubt but that it is in consequence of my instructions and advice that you show yourself so excellent a citizen, and so distinguished a consul. To whom, though I might most truly reply, that what you do, you do from your own judgment and inclination, and that you need nobody’s advice; yet I neither quite assent, lest I should seem to lessen your praise, if it were all owing to my counsels; neither do I strongly deny it; for, you know, I am more than enough covetous of glory. Besides, it is not unbecoming your dignity (what was thought honourable to Agamemnon himself, the king of kings) to have some Nestor in forming your counsels; while to me it is most glorious that you, a young consul, should flourish in praises as the pupil of my institution. L. Caesar, when I saw him sick at Naples, though he was suffering from pains all over his body, yet, almost before he saluted me, “O my Cicero,” said he, “I congratulate you upon having such influence with Dolabella; which, if I had with my sister’s son, we might already be safe. Congratulations also and thank your Dolabella, who, since your own consulship, is Dolabella’s, and the true consul. He went on to say a great deal about the case, and the part you had taken; and declared that nothing was ever done more noble, nothing more famous, nothing more salutary to the republic: and in this all with one voice agree. I must beg you then to let me enter upon this false inheritance, as it were, of another’s glory, and in some measure to become a partner in your praises. But in truth, my Dolabella, (for hitherto I have been joking,) I would sooner transfer to you all my own praises, if indeed I have any, than draw off any part from yours. For having always had that affection for you, of which you are the best judge; yet with these actions I am so wonderfully inflamed, that no affection ever was stronger. For nothing, believe me, is more becoming, nothing more beautiful, nothing more lovely, than virtue. I have always, as you know, loved M. Brutus for his great abilities, and his exalted disposition, his distinguished probity and firmness; yet the 15th of March pro-dced such an accession to my love, that I wondered there should have been any room for the increase of what seemed already at the full. Who would have thought that any addition could have been made to the love I have you? Yet such is the addition, that I seem to you now to manifest strength to love, before only to have liked. Why, then, should I exhibit you to regard your own dignity and glory? Should I propose to you the examples of eminent men, as they do who use exhortations? I have nobody to propose more eminent than yourself. It is yourself you must imitate; with yourself you must contend. It is not allowable for you now, after such noble deeds, not to be like yourself. Which being the case, exhortation is needless. We ought rather to congratulate you. For that has happened to you which has happened to nobody else, that the utmost severity of punishment has not only been inflicted without exciting ill-will, but has even been popular; and, while it has gratified every good man, it has likewise pleased every one of the lowest class. If this were the effect of chance, I would congratulate your good fortune; but it is the effect of your own greatness of mind, your understanding, and judgment. For I have read your speech, than which nothing can be more prudent. So step by step have you gone back to the cause of what was done, and again returned from it; that the case itself, by the confession of everybody, was ripe for your animadversion. You have saved therefore both the city from danger, and the state from fear; and have conferred a benefit not merely temporary, but of lasting example. You ought, consequently, to understand that the republic reposes on you; and that those persons, from whom it has derived a commencement of liberty, are by you not only to be protected, but rewarded with honours. But on these matters I hope very soon to say more in person. Since it is you who preserve the republic and us, take especial care, my Dolabella, of our own safety.

LETTER XVIII.

You repeatedly attack me because I appear too extravagantly to extol this action of Dolabella’s. But while I certainly approve of what has been done, I have been led by more than one of your letters to this high strain of commendation. Dolabella, however, has wholly forfeited your opinion by the same cause, which has likewise made me very much his enemy. The modest man! He ought to have paid the 1st of January, and he has not paid yet; though he was set free from an enormous debt by the hand of Faberius, and begged from him the assistance of Ops. For it is allowable to jest, that you may not think me too much disturbed. It was early on the 8th that I sent my letter; and I received yours the evening of the same day in Pompeianum, by a quick conveyance.

1 The following part of the sentence being differently turned, there is left a word hiatus in the construction, which is no blench in a letter, even if it be thought one in a more studied composition.

2 The neighbourhood of Haise.

3 Antonius.

4 This Faberius appears to have been a clerk to Caesar, and since made a tool of Antonius to insert in Caesar’s instructions what he thought fit. It is by such means that Antonius got possession of Caesar’s money; with some of which he bought Dolabella’s concurrence in his schemes.

5 Caesar’s treasure had been secured in the temple of Ops; and in Latin the same word signifies also assistance, from whence arises the matter of Cicero’s jest.

of two days. But, as I sent you word the very same day, I wrote a sharp letter to Dolabella; and if this has no effect, yet I apprehend he will not resist my personal application. I imagine you have settled the Alban account. What you have furnished me from the Patulician account is most acceptable, and like everything you do. I thought Eros, whom I had left, was made for settling such affairs, which have got into confusion by his great mismanagement. But I must see about this with you. You will take upon yourself, as I have often mentioned to you, the whole concern of Montanus's business. I am not at all surprised at Servius's desponding conversation with you at the time of his departure; nor do I in any respect yield to him in despondency. If our friend Brutus, that excellent man, does not go into the senate on the 1st of June, I do not understand what he means to do in the forum. But he knows best. By what I perceive to be going on, I judge there has not been much gained by the 16th of March. Therefore I think daily more and more about going into Greece. For I do not see how I can be of any use to my Brutus, who, as you say, is himself thinking of leaving the country. I am not at all satisfied with Leonidas's letter. Respecting Herodes, I agree with you. I should like to have read Saufeius's account. I design to leave Pompeianum the 10th of May.

LETTER XIX.

On the 7th of May while I was in Pompeianum I received two letters from you, one the sixth, the other the fourth day after their dates. I shall reply to them in their order. I am very glad that Barnaevus should have delivered my letter to you so seasonably. You will manage with Cassius as you do everything else. How fortunate that I should have written to him upon the very point you advise four days before, and should have sent you a copy of my letter! But while I was in despair about Dolabella's deficiency, or paylessness (to use your own expression), behold Brutus's letter and yours! He is thinking of quitting the country. But I see a different heaven to one of my age; into which I should like better to be conveyed, while our Brutus is flourishing, and the republic established. But now, as you say, there is no choice. For you agree with me that my age is unsuitable to arms, especially to those of civil wars. Antonius wrote to me only about Clodius; that my gentleness and kindness was gratifying to himself, and would be a source of great satisfaction to me. But Pansa seems to be outrageous on the subject of Clodius, and likewise on that of Delatorius; and uses severe language, if you choose to believe him. This, however, is not so well in my mind; that he vehemently reprobrates this act of Dolabella's. Respecting those who wore chaplets; your sister's son, upon being accused by his father, wrote in answer, that he had worn a chaplet in honour of Caesar; and had put it off on account of his mourning; in short, that he was ready to bear every reproach, for that he loved Caesar even dead. I have written to Dolabella very explicitly, as you wished me to do. I have also written to Sica. I would not put this trouble upon you; and should be sorry to have him angry with you. I know Servius's manner of talking, in which I see more of alarm than of wisdom. But since we are all alarmed, I assent to Servius. Publius's has been trifling with you. For Carelia has been sent hither by these people to negotiate with me. But I soon persuaded her that what she asked was not only not agreeable to me, but not even admissible. If I see Antonius, I will use all diligence about Buthrotum. I come now to your last letter (though on the subject of Servius I have already replied) that I exalt Dolabella's deed. In truth, I think it could not have been better in such a case, and at such a time. But whatever I attribute to him, I do it from your letters. Yet I agree with you that it would be a better deed, if he paid me what he owes. I wish Brutus should occupy Astura. You commend me for making no determination about going abroad till I see how things are likely to turn out; but I have changed my purpose. However, I shall do nothing till I see you. I am pleased with Attica's returnings thanks to me about her mother, to whom I have given up my whole house and stores; and I hope to see her again on the 11th. Give my compliments to Attica; I will take good care of Pila.

1 What is expressed in Latin the third day, is really the next day but one. In this sense it is used in the Gospels on the occasion of our Lord's resurrection; and so in fact it is always used by Roman authors.

LETTER XX.

I went by sea from Pompeianum to my friend Lucullus's on the 10th, where I arrived about 9 o'clock; and upon quitting the vessel I got your letter dated the 7th, which your messenger was said to have carried to Cumanum. The next day I received another through Lucullus about the same hour on which I had received; and I received one on the 9th dated from Lamps. You, hear, therefore, my reply to all of them. In the first place, I am much pleased with what has been done in my concerns respecting both the payment and the business of Albius. But with regard to your Buthrotum, Antonius came to Cumanum while I was in Pompeianum; and he had left it again before I heard of his being there. From thence he went to Samnium; so that I can give you little hope of my meeting him. The business of Buthrotum must therefore be managed at Rome. 1 Antonius's harangue is quite horrible; Dola-bella's excellent. Now let him keep the money to himself if he will but pay it on the 15th. I should be sorry if Tertulla's were to miscarry; for Cassius's need to be reared as well as Brutus's. I should be glad to know what is become of the queen's, and also of the young Caesar's. I have done with your first letter, and come now to the second. About the Quintuses and Bathrovetus, when I come, as you say, I am much obliged for your advances to Cicero. You think I am mistaken in supposing that the republic depends upon Brutus; but so it is. It will either cease to exist, or it will be preserved by him or his party. To your advice of my sending up a written speech, let me, my Atticus, reply by a general maxim on these subjects, in which I am pretty well versed. There never was any poet or orator who thought anybody superior to himself. This is the case even with bad ones. What do you think then of Brutus, who has both genius and learning? Of whom also I have had some experience lately on the subject of his edict. I composed one at your request. I liked mine; he liked his own. Nay, when I had addressed to him my treatise on the best style of oratory, which I was induced to do almost at his earnest solicitation, he wrote word, not to me only, but to you also, that what I recommended he did not approve. Therefore, leave everybody, I beg, to write for himself. "Every one has his own taste, mine for me; every one his own taste, mine for me." I cannot say much for the style of this, being taken from Attilius, a very harsh poet. I wish only that he may be allowed to address the people at all; for if he is allowed to remain in the city in safety, the cause is ours. For either nobody will follow the leader of a new civil war; or those who will follow who may easily be overpowered. I come to the third letter. I am glad that Brutus and Cassius were pleased with my letter; and have in consequence written to them again. With regard to their wish that Hir- tius may be made better through me; I use my best endeavours, and he talks most honourably; but he lives and is domesticated with Balbius, who talks honourably likewise: you must judge what you are to believe. I see you are greatly pleased with Dolabella; I am exceedingly so. I lived with Dolabella; I spared not; I convinced me of his upright sentiments, and his desire of peace; but I see clearly that some people are seeking for an occasion of war. I approve of the proclamation of Brutus and Cassius. You ask me to take upon myself the consideration of what I think they ought to do. But opinions depend upon the time; which fluctuates every hour. That first act of Dolabella's, and this speech in opposition to Antonius, seem to me to have done much. The cause was utterly sinking. Now we appear likely to have a leader; which is the only thing the free towns and all good people want. You speak of Epicurus, and venture to pronounce that one should abstain from politics. Does not the dear look of my Brutus deter you from such language? Q. the son, as you mention, is the right hand of Antonius. Through him therefore we shall easily carry what we wish. If, as you suppose, L. Antonius should bring forward Octavius, I am anxious to know how he will address the people. I write this in haste; for Cassius's mess- 378 ener is setting off immediately. I am doing presently to pay my compliments to Pilia; then by water to feast with Vestorius. Best compliments to Attica.

LETTER XXI.

Soon after I had delivered to Cassius's messenger my letter to you on the 11th, my own messenger arrived, and (what was like a prodigy) without any letter from you. But it presently occurred to me that you must have been at Lanuvium. Bros hastened, that I might get a letter from Dolabella. He did not write about my business 380, for he had not yet received mine; but it was in answer to that of which I sent a copy to you, and was well ex- pressed. As soon as I had despatched Cassius's messenger, I received a visit from Balbus. Gracious gods! how easily might you perceive his dread of quiet! You know the man, how reserved he is; but yet he spake freely of Antonius's designs, who was going round to the veteran soldiers, to secure the ratification of Caesar's acts, and to make them swear to enforce them everywhere; for which pur- pose the Duumvir 5 were to examine them every month. He complained also of his own unpopularity; and his whole conversation showed his attachment to Antonius. In short, there is no relying upon anything 5. To me it is no longer doubtful that affairs tend to war. For that deed 1 has been done with a mannish spirit, but with the prudence of a child. Who did not see that there was left an heir to the kingdom? What could be more absurd? "To fear this; to have no apprehension about the other." Nay, at this very time there are many inconsistencies; as that Pon- tius's Neapolitan villa should be held by the mother 1 of the tyrant-killer. I must read again and again my "Cato the Elder," which I sent you,—for age makes me peevish; I am out of humour with everything; but my life has had its course, 6 and younger men see to it. You will continue to watch over my concerns as you do. I write or rather dictate this while the dessert is upon the table at Vestorius's. I intend to-morrow to be with Hir- tius; and thus forsooth I hope to bring over to the honest party one of the five that are left 1. It is a great delusion. There is no one of them who does not dread a state of quiet. Let me then put wings to my feet; for anything is better than to engage in war. Pray give my best compliments to Attica. I am eager for Octavius's speech, and anything else there may be,—particularly whether Dolabella's money begins to chink, or if he has altogether cancelled my account.

LETTER XXII.

Having understood from Pila that a messenger was to be sent to you on the 15th, I have immediately scrawled something. In the first place, then, I wish you to know that I go from hence to Arpinum the 17th of May,—so that hereafter you will direct thither if there is anything, though I shall myself presently be at Rome. But I wish, before I arrive, to find out more accurately what is likely to happen; though I fear my conjectures may prove too true: for it is sufficiently clear what they aim at. My pupil's, who dines with me to-day, is greatly attached to him whom our Brutus stabbed; and, if you ask me, I plainly perceive they dread a state of quiet. This position they hold and openly maintain,—that he who has been killed was a most distinguished man, and that the whole state is thrown into disorder by his death; that what he peet that many of these words are borrowed from Atticus, who may possibly have designated by the appellation of πεντελεούριοι some five principal supporters of Caesar's party, one of whom might be Hirtius. From πεντελεούριοι Cicero may humorously have derived πεντελεούριον.

If he is preparing to pay me.

did would be without effect as soon as we lay aside our fears; that his own clemency was his ruin, without which nothing of the kind could have happened to him. What occurs to me is, that if Pompeius comes up with a firm army, which is probable, there will certainly be war. The very idea and thought of this disturbs me: for what was formerly allowed to you 8 will not now be allowed to me. I have not concealed my joy! besides, they are fond of charging me with ingratitude. So that what was formerly allowed to you and many others will on no account be allowed. Must I declare myself then, and go into the field? It is better to die a thousand times, especially at this age. The 15th of March, therefore, is not so great a consolation as it was, because of the great blunder that it embraces. Still those young men "by their other well-doings put out this reproach." But if you have any better hope, since you both hear more and are admitted to their counsels, I wish you would write to me, and at the same time consider what I should do about a votive legation. Many people in these parts warn me not to attend the senate on the first, as soldiers are said to be secretly engaged for that day, and expressly against the conspirators, who, I apprehend, will be safer anywhere than in the senate.

LETTER I.

Sad news of Alexion. It is not to be believed how much I am afflicted; and that, not on account of what most persons suggest, asking what physician I should employ. For what have I now to do with a physician? Or if I should want one, is there such a scarcity! What I have lost is his affection towards me, his kindness and gentleness. This consideration also affects me; what is not to be feared when so temperate a man, so consummate a physician, is unexpectedly carried off by the violence of disease? For all this the only consolation is, that it is the condition of our birth that we should submit to whatever is incident to humanity. Respecting Antonius, I have already written to say that I had not met with him; for he came to Misenum while I was in Pompeianum, and was gone again before I knew of his arrival. But it happened that Hirtius was with me in Puteolanum when I read your letter. I read it to him, and entered upon the subject. In what re-did not appear very solicitous\footnote{About Cicero’s taking back Pulililla. See book xiv. letter 19.}; and if she were, assuredly I should not be so. I am surprised you should have listened at all to the lady\footnote{Pulililla’s mother.}, who you say was so troublesome to you: for as to my having spoken well of her before her friends, in the hearing of her three sons and her daughter, “the same person does not always utter the same thing.”\footnote{The original is in Greek, and seems to be quoted as a proverbial sentence. It means that there is now no reason why he should disguise his real sentiments, although he may have done so before. Old age is bad enough, without making it worse by assuming a false character.} What is this? What is it that should make me walk about in an assumed character? Is not old age itself a character sufficiently disgusting? What Brutus requests, that I would go to him previously to the first, he has mentioned also in a letter to me, and I may probably do so; but I cannot at all tell what he wants: for what counsel can I give him who am in need of counsel myself? While he has consulted his own immortalisation better than our tranquillity. The report about the queen\footnote{The first of June, on which day he designes to go to Rome, where the senate was summoned.} will soon be extinguished. Pray remember about Flamma\footnote{Cleopatra. What was the report alluded to, is uncertain.}, if there is anything you can do. Yesterday I sent you a letter as I was going from Putroelian; and I turned aside toCumænum, where I saw Pilia almost well: I saw her besides at Baulos near Cumæ; for she had come to attend a funeral, at which I likewise assisted. Cn. Lucullus, my intimate friend, was carrying his mother to her grave. That day, therefore, I staid in Sinuessaun, and the next morning setting out for Arpium I cast this letter. I have nothing new, however, to tell you, or to ask you; unless, perhaps, you think what follows to be of any consequence. Our Brutus has sent me the speech he delivered at the meeting in the capitol, and has desired me to correct it (but not with a view to excite applause) before he publishes it. The speech is written with great elegance of sentiments and expression, so that nothing can exceed it. Yet, if I had had the same cause to conduct, I should have treated it with more warmth; you see what the subject is, and who is the person that speaks. I have, therefore, been unable to correct it; for in the style which our Brutus prefers, and agreeably to his judgment of the best method of speaking, he has so well succeeded in this oration that nothing can be more elegant. But I alone, whether rightly or not, am of a different opinion. I wish, however, that you should read the speech—unless you have read it already,—and would let me know what you think of it; though I fear you may be misled by your name, and may be over-attic in your judgment: but if you will call to mind the thunders of Demosthenes, you will understand that what is consummately attic may be strongly expressed. But of these things when we meet. I did not care to let Metrodorus go to you either without a letter, or with a letter that contained nothing.

LETTER II.\footnote{On the 18th, on my way from Sinuessaun, after I had sent my letter to you and had proceeded from Cumæ to Viscianum, I received yours from the messenger. There was more than enough in it about Butrotum. For you do not, nor can you, take a greater interest in that business than I do. It is thus proper for you to attend to my concerns and me to yours. I have accordingly undertaken this so, that I shall esteem nothing of superior obligation; I learned from your letter, and from others, that L. Antonius had made a scurvry harangue; but what was the nature of it I do not know, for you said nothing. About Menodemus I it is quite right. Quintus must assuredly be dictating what you write. I am glad you approve of my reason for declining to compose what you asked of me, and you will approve it still more when you have read the speech, about which I wrote to you this morning. What you mention about the legions is perfectly true; but you do not seem sufficiently to have considered what you can hope to have done by the senate in the air of our Butrotchians. As far as my opinion goes (for I see so much), I do not think we shall long subsist: but even if we are disappointed of this resource, you will not be disappointed about Butrotum. I feel as you do on the subject of Octavius’s speech; and am not pleased with the preparations for his games, and the appointment of Matius and Postumius to conduct them. Saseorn is a fit colleague for them. But all these people, as you perceive, are as much afraid of peace as we are of war. I should be glad if I could relieve Balbus from the odium he has incurred; but he does not himself believe it to be possible: therefore he turns his attention elsewhere. I am glad that you derive comfort from the first Tuscan Disquisition; for there is no resource either better or reader. I am not sorry that Flamma speaks so fairly. What may be the case of the Tyndaritani, in which you are so earnest, I know not; yet I will give them my support. These transac-} tions seem to move this one-of-the-five⁷, especially the expenditure of the money⁴. I am sorry for Alexander; yet having fallen into so severe an illness, I think that he has been kindly dealt with. I should like to know who are his heirs in the second degree⁷, and what is the date of his will.

LETTER III.

I received two letters from you on the 22d in Atinas, in answer to two of mine. One was dated the 18th, the other the 21st. To the earliest therefore first. Pray come to Tusculum, as you propose. I mean to be there the 27th. When you say that we must submit to the conquerors, I do not agree with you; for many things appear to me preferable. As to what you recollect to have been done in the temple of Apollo during the consulsion of Lentulus and Marcellus%; neither the case nor the time is similar; especially as you mention that Marcellus and others are taking their departure. I must therefore find out and determine on the spot, whether I can safely follow him again in Rome. These new meetings alarm the inhabitants; for we are placed in great straits. But let these things be disregarded; I can look upon still greater with unconcern. I have been made acquainted with Calva's will, a base and sordid fellow. I thank you for the care you take about Demonicus's accounts. I have already written very particularly to Dolabella about Marius, if only my letter has been delivered. For his sake I wish him success, and I ought to come now to the more recent letter. I have learned what I wanted about Alexium b. Hirtius is in your interest c. I wish Antonius were worse than he is d. You mention Quintus the son. A volume of evils! Of the father we will speak when we meet. I am desirous of assuring Brutus in everything I can. I see you entertain the same opinion of his speech that I do. But I do not quite understand what you wish me to write, as if it were a speech delivered by Brutus; when he has himself published his own. How can this be? Would you have it as against a tyrant, who had been justly killed? I shall have much to say, and much to write; but it must be in another manner and time. The tribunes have done well about Caesar's chair e. And excellent the fourteen rows of knights. I am glad Brutus has been at my house; provided he was pleased, and staid as long as he liked.

LETTER IV.

On the 23d about two o'clock a messenger arrived from Q. Fufus with a letter containing something about my restoring myself to him²; as silly as usual; unless, perhaps, whatever we dislike is apt to appear silly. I replied in a manner that I think you would approve. He brought me two letters from you, one of the 22d, the other the 23d. I shall answer the latter first. "And the legion?" I applaud the circumstance. And if Carfulenus too; the streams, as they say, will run upwards b. You take notice of the factions counsels of Antonius. I wish he may act through the populace, rather than through the senate; and I imagine this is likely to be the case. But to me all his measures have a warlike tendency. If indeed Decimus Brutus's province is snatched away, whatever I may think of his strength, it seems impossible to be done without a war. But for this I do not wish, now that assurance is given to the Buthrotians. You may smile; but I am sorry that this should not rather have been accomplished by my attention, diligence, and influence. When you say that you do not know what is to become of our friends, the same doubt has long since given me concern; so that the consolation I derived from the 15th of March already appears foolish. For we have shown a manly spirit, but, believe me, a childish prudence. The trop has been cut down, not torn up by the roots; and you see accordingly it sprouts. Let us have recourse then to the Tusculan Disquisitions, since you often appeal to them. We must endeavour to conceal this from Saufius; for my part I will never tell. You say that Brutus has written to inquire on what day I should go to Tusculum. As I before mentioned to you, the 27th; and I hope to see you there as soon as possible; for I apprehend I shall be obliged to proceed to Lanuviumc, where there will be a great deal of talking. But I shall see about it. I revert now to the earlier letter, of which I am speaking over that first part relative to the Buthrotians, which is lodged in my inmost soul; if only, as you say, there is any opportunity of acting. You seem quite earnest on the subject of Brutus' speech, by urging it again so copiously. Should I then support the same cause for which he has written? should I write without his invitation? No interference can be more disrespectful. But,

⁷ This expression may probably be copied from Fufus's letter.

² This is copied from Atticus's letter, and no doubt alludes to the military legion under the command of Carfulenus, which deserted from Antonius at this time.

b The original is a Greek proverbial expression, signifying that it would be beyond all expectation; for Carfulenus had been a firm friend to Caesar. In fact he did not join Brutus, but did nothing.

¹ May not this refer to the unwarranted assertion of some foolish person saying that he would be answerable for the safety of the Buthrotians? which Cicero pleasantly ridicules. Had a war broken out, it might be expected that Antonius would be otherwise employed than in settling soldiers in Buthrotum.

J The conspirators.

k This is said in jest, with reference to Saufius's attachment to the seat of Epiuerus; while the Tusculan Disquisitions are conducted upon principles totally opposite. It will be remembered that Atticus was also an Epicurean.

you, pray write. Cassius strongly begs and entreats me to make a good citizen of Hirtius. Do you think he is in his senses? "Tis the fuller and the coals. I send you his letter. What you say respecting a decree of the senate for the provinces of Brutus and Cassius, is repeated by Balbus and by Hirtius; and the latter purposes himself to bring it in; for he is already in Tusculanum. He strongly advises me to keep away. He does this on account of the danger, which he says threatened him also. But for my part, even if there were no danger, I am so far from caring to prevent Antonius' suspicions of my dissatisfaction at his success, that the wish of avoiding him is of itself a reason why I am unwilling to go to Rome. Our friend Varro has sent me a letter, which he received from I know not whom (for he had erased the name), in which it was mentioned, that those veteran soldiers, whose claims were rejected, (for some of them were dismissed,) talked very sedulously; so that whoever was thought to have opposed their interests, would be in great danger at Rome. Besides, how should I manage my going, my returning, my countenance, my step, amongst that party. And if, as you say, L. Antonius is to go against Decimus, the rest against our friends; what should I do? or how should I conduct myself? I have therefore determined, as matters now stand, to absent myself from that city in which I have not only flourished with the highest dignity, but have enjoyed some share of it even under subjection. Yet I am not so much resolved to go out of Italy, (upon which I must deliberate with you,) as not to go up thither.

LETTER VI.

Our friend Brutus has written to me, and likewise Cassius, that I might use my authority to secure Hirtius, whom they knew to have been hitherto well affected, though they could not entirely depend upon him. For I apprehend he is displeased with Antonius, but still attached to that cause. However, I wrote, recommending to him the dignity of Brutus and Cassius; and wish you to be acquainted with his answer, in case you should draw from it the same conclusion as I do, that the opposite party are even now afraid of our friends' possessing more spirit than they really have.

"Hirtius to his Cicero.

"You ask if I am yet returned from the country; or whether, at a time when everybody is in activity, I am amusing myself in idleness. I likewise have quitted the city; for I thought it more useful to absent myself. I write this setting off to Tusculanum. And I would not have you suppose me so strenuous as to return on the 5th; for I see nothing that demands my attention, the appointments being provided for so many years. As Brutus and Cassius may obtain anything of me through you, so I wish that by you they may as easily be induced to enter into no intermate counsels. For you say that, at the time they wrote to you, they were retiring. Whither? or wherefore? Stop them. I beseech you, Cicero; and suffer not all these things to perish, which must be utterly ruined by plunder, by fire, by slaughter. Only, if they have any cause of fear, let them be upon their guard; but let them attempt nothing more. In good truth they will gain no more by violent counsels than by gentle ones, provided they are prudent. For this state of things, which is passing on, is not of a nature to last; but by opposition it presently assumes a power of doing mischief. Write to me in Tusculanum, and let me know what hopes you have of them."

This is Hirtius's letter; to which I replied, that they entertained no intermate designs; and this I confidently affirmed. This, such as it is, I wished you to know. Since sealing my letter I have heard from Balbus that Servilia had returned, and confirmed the opinion that they would not go out of the country. I am now expecting a letter from you.

LETTER VII.

I thank you for the letters you sent me, which indeed gave me much pleasure; especially that of our friend Sextus. You will say, "because he commends you," I think indeed that may be one reason; but yet before I came to that part, I was exceedingly pleased both with his sentiments in regard to the republic, and with the accuracy of his writing. The peace-maker Servius, with his little clerk, seems to have acted as an ambassador, and to be afraid of any capacious proceeding. But he ought to have considered, that "it was no struggle of right," but what follows. Let me hear also from you.

LETTER VIII.

After you left me I received two letters from Balbus; no news. Also one from Hirtius, who represents himself to be highly offended with the conduct of the veteran troops. I am anxious to know what they will do about the first of March. I have therefore sent Tito, and several others with him, that whatever happens you may write to me by one of them. I have besides written to Antonius about an honorary legation, lest being an irritable man, he might be offended had I applied only to Dolabella. But as he is said to be difficult of access, I have written to Eutrapalus to present my letter to him, as having occasion for such an appointment. A votive legation is more honourable; but I may make use of both. Again and again I beg you to take care of yourself. I wish you could come to me; but if you cannot, we will attain the same end by letter. Gracchus sends me word, that C. Cassius had informed him there were men provided to be sent armed to Tusculanum. This does not appear to me probable; but yet it is right to be upon one's guard, and to go about from one villa to another. To-morrow will produce something to direct us in the consideration of this business.

LETTER IX.

On the evening of the third I received a letter from Balbus, saying that the senate was to meet on the 5th, for the purpose of appointing Brutus in Asia, Cassius in Sicily, to purchase corn for the use of the city. Wretched business! first, that they should receive any commission from these people; then, if any, that it should be such a lieutenant's commission. I know not if it is better than sitting by the Eurotas. But these things chance must govern. He says that at the same time a decree is to be passed for the allotment of the provinces to them, and to the rest of pretorian rank. This certainly is better than that Persic portico. For I would not have that distant Lacedaemon supposed to mean Lanuvium.

Do you laugh, you will say, in such a state of affairs? What should I do? I am tired of weeping. Immortal gods! how the first page of your letter disturbed me! But what was that collision of arms in your house? I am glad however that this storm soon passed over. I am anxious to know what you have done with your commission, at once so sad and difficult of consultation. For it is indeed quite inextricable; so beset are we by all the troops. As for me, Brutus's letter, which you say have read, has so disturbed me, that though I was before at a loss, yet I am become duller than over through

2 To avoid being surprised. It should be mentioned, however, that the text in this place is very doubtful. In the Epist. ad Fam., xi. 20. D. Brutus admissenex Cicero to be upon his guard—cantum, et interiori iter.---De Leg. ii.

3 During the time of their pretorship it is probable they could not be sent abroad by some commission of this kind, which may have been devised by the friends of peace.

4 The Eurotas was a river of Lacedaemon. The expression is probably a proverbial one, signifying, "to remain inactive," as Brutus and Cassius were doing at Lanuvium. The Romans used to give great names to their canals—

5 ductus aquarum isti Nilos et Europeres vocant.— De Leg. ii.

6 Having previously applied the name of Eurotas to the stream that flowed by Lanuvium, he goes on in the same figure of speech to call the portice of Lanuvium by the name of a portico at Lacedaemon; and concludes ironically, that he would have Atticus suppose him to mean Lanuvium; thus humorously giving the true interpretation of his own metaphor.

7 Atticus appears to have been solicited to go to Lanuvium for the purpose of advising with his friend Brutus in the present difficult situation. See letter 10 of this book.
distress of mind. But I will write more when I am informed of what has been done. At present I have nothing to say, and the less, because I am doubtful if you will get this letter. For it is uncertain whether the messenger will see you. I am very anxious to hear from you.

LETTER X.

How affectionately is Brutus's letter written! How unlucky this time, when you are prevented from going to him! But what can I write? Should I advise him to accept the offer of these people? What more disgraceful? To attempt any thing? They dare not, neither can they. Come then, should I advise them to remain quiet? Who can answer for their safety? And if any violent measures are adopted with regard to Decimus, what will become of our friends, even if nobody offers to molest them? Not to celebrate the games? What more dishonourable? To exact corn! How does it differ from that appointment of Dion? Or what office in the state is more contemptible? In such a situation of things, counsel is not safe even for the person who gives it. This however I might disregard, if I were doing any good. But to enter upon it without any prospect of advantage; while he listens to the advice or even the entreaties of his mother, why should I interfere? I will however think what kind of letter I can write; for I cannot bear to be silent. I will presently send therefore either to Antium or to Circei.

LETTER XI.

I came to Antium on the 26th. Brutus was glad to see me. Afterwards in the presence of several persons, and of Servilia, Tertulla, and Portia, he asked what I thought. Pompionius also was there. I had meditated upon this as I went along, and gave it as my opinion that he should accept this corn commission in Asia; that nothing now remained for us to do but to secure ourselves; in which was involved the protection also of the republic itself. After I had entered into this discourse, Cassius came in; upon which I repeated the same sentiments. At this place Cassius with animated looks (you would say Mars himself was breathing) declared he would not go into Sicily.

"Shall I accept an offer which is intended as an insult?" I said. "Then do you propose to do?" said I. To which he replied, that he would go into Greece. "And what?" I said. "Will you do, Brutus?" "I will go to Rome," said he, "if you advise it." "But I do by no means advise it, for you will not be safe." "But if I could be safe, would you then approve it?" So much so that I would not have you go away at all, neither at this time, nor into a province after your praetorship. But I do not advise you to trust yourself in the city." I added what will readily occur to you, why he would not be safe. A great deal was then said, and especially by Cassius, complaining of the opportunities which had been lost; and he heavily accused Decimus. I said we ought not to dwell upon what was past; though at the same time I agreed with him. And having entered upon the consideration of "what ought to have been done; without however saying anything new or anything more than is said every day; (for I did not touch upon the subject of having omitted to strike anybody else") but only that the senate ought to have been assembled, and the people more powerfully excited while their affections were yet warm: "It is taking the management of the whole republic," excises your female friend; "this I never heard anybody advance." I checked myself. At length Cassius seemed disposed to go into Sicily; (for Servilia engaged that the mention of the corn should be expunged from the decree;) and our friend was soon driven from that idle talk; for he said that he acquainted. He determined therefore that the games should be celebrated in his name, but without his being present. And he appeared willing to proceed into Asia from Antium. Not to tire you; I had no satisfaction in that visit, besides the consciousness of having done my duty. For it was not easy to be suffered that he should leave Italy without my seeing him. Excepting for this debt of affection and kindness, I might say to myself—"What is the use of your coming hither, O prophet?" I found the vessel shattered, or rather gone to pieces. Nothing was done with wisdom, nothing with prudence, nothing with regularity. So that if I before did not hesitate, yet still less do I now hesitate to fly away from hence; and that as soon as possible; "where I may hear neither of the deeds nor the name of the Pelopidas." But while I think of it, let me inform you that Dolelhaba has appointed me his lieutenant from the 2d of April. I was told of it yesterday evening. A votive appointment you did not like; and indeed it was absurd, that having bound myself by vows "if the republic should subsist," I should now discharge them when it is overturned. Besides, the hate very legations have, I think, a defined period by the Julian law; and it is not easy to a legation of this kind to add leave to go in and out when you please; which is now granted to me. And the right which this licence gives me for five years is charming. Though why should I think of five years? The business appears to me to be contracted within a little space. But let me not utter ill omens.

LETTER XII.

This is good news about Buthrotum. But I had already sent Tiro with a letter to Dolabella as you desired. What harm? I thought I had written sufficiently distinctly about our friends at Antium, that you needed not to doubt of their remaining quiet, and accepting Antonius's insulting offer. Cassius scorned the business of the corn, which Servilia engaged to get expunged from the decree of the senate. But our friend, with all his dignity, said he would go into Asia, after he had agreed with me that he could not safely reside in Rome. For he thought it better to exhibit the games without being present. He was collecting vessels, and preparing for his passage. In the mean time they designed to remain in the same neighbourhood. Brutus talked of going to Astura. L. Antonius kindly indeed by letter desires me not to make myself uneasy. I acknowledge this as one favour received; and may perhaps receive a second, unless he should come to Tusculanum. How intolerable are these negotiations! which however are tolerated. Which of Brutus's party is to blame for this? There is, I am persuaded, no want of sense, no letter of opinion in Octavius; and he seemed to be affected as we could wish towards our heroes. But it is matter of deep consideration what reliance can be placed on his age, his name, his succession, his education. His stepfather, whom I saw at Astura, thought he was not to be trusted. But he must be cherished however, if for no other reason, that he may be dissuited from Antonius. It is well done of Marcellus, if he directs his own's own; who seemed to me to be much attached to him. He did not place much reliance on Pansa and Hirtius. They have a good natural disposition, if it is but firm.

On the 24th I received two letters from you. I shall reply to the earliest first. I agree with you that I should neither take up time, nor close the rear; but I have nevertheless favour them. I have sent you my speech, and leave the keeping and the publication of it to your discretion. But when shall we see the time that you will think it may be produced? I do not understand how the truce you mention can possibly take place. It is better to use no opposition; which is the policy I mean to adopt. When you say that two legions have arrived at Brundisium, you get all information first; write me word therefore of everything you hear. I am expecting Varo's Dialogue. I now approve of undertaking something in the manner of Heracleides, especially as you anticipate it with so much delight: but I wish to know of what kind you would have it. As I mentioned to you before, or formerly, (since you prefer this expression,) you have, to tell you the truth; made me the more desirous of writing, by adding to your own opinion, which was well known to me, the authority of Pseudoceus, which is always great, and of the first weight with me. I will endeavour therefore to prevent your charging me either with idleness, or want of attention. Vvectenus and Faberius I cherish, as you advise. I suspect Ciclius of no evil design, although—But what has he done? On the subject of maintaining our freedom, than which assuredly nothing is sweeter, I agree with you. Behave so to Galius Caninius? The wicked man! What else can I call him? Should I call him the cautious Marcellus? Such would I call myself; yet not so very cautious. I have now replied to your longer and earlier letter; but what shall I reply to the shorter and more recent one, except that it was most delicious? The news from Spain is excellent. Might I but see my Baalillus safe, the support of my old age. I may say the same of Annius, considering the attention I receive to my health. But these things are subject to the lot of human nature. You say that you know nothing of Brutus; but Selicia informs me that M. Scaptius is arrived, and that he is to come to her, not with any display, but privately; and that I should know everything; which I will immediately communicate to you. In the mean time you mention, in the same letter, that a servant of Bassus is come, who brings intelligence of the Alexandrian legions being in arms; that Bassus is sent for, and Cassius is expected. What say you?

LETTER XIII.

The party of Brutus and Cassius. Though Cicero was now in the neighbourhood of Puteoli, and consequently much nearer to Brundisium, yet news from thence had arrived at Rome before it reached him.

The text has been variously tortured. I would point it thus—Ad er narrationem, dicere tibi vere, fecisti me scrieri, &c. i.e. ut possim dicere tibi vere.

This appears to me to relate to Marcellus, whatever he may have done; otherwise I see not how the following expression, cautum Marcellum, should come to be in the accusative case, unless indeed it be copied from Atticus.

I apprehend the word Baalillus is but a diminutive from Balbus, and so afterwards Annius for Annius.

This must be some relation of Annius.

See book vi. letter 91.

To put himself at the head of the Alexandrian legion
The republic seems to be recovering its rights. But we must not presume beforehand. You know the unsteadiness of these troops, and their habits of plunder. Dolabella is the best of men. Though while I am writing at my dessert, I hear that he is come himself to Baiae, yet he wrote to me from Formianum a letter, which I received upon quitting the bath, saying that he had done everything to the utmost about the payment. He accuses Vecte from shuffling, as such people are accustomed to do; but adds that my friend Atticus has taken the whole business upon himself. He is an excellent man, and very much attached to me; yet I want to know what Sestius should be able to do in this affair more than any one of us. If however there should be anything beyond my expectation, you will take care to inform me. But if, as I imagine, it is a lost case, you will nevertheless write; for such a circumstance will not affect me. Here I amuse myself with philosophical speculations, (for what else can I do?) and copiously explain what relates to our duty, addressing myself to Cicero. For on what subject can a father more properly speak to his son? Afterwards I shall proceed to something else. In short, there shall remain some fruit of this excursion. Varro was expected to-day or to-morrow. But I am hastening away to Pompeianum; not that anything can he more beautiful than this place; but there I shall be less molested by visitors. Pray let me know what accusation is brought in the case of Myrtius, who I hear has suffered punishment; and whether it is quite clear by whom he was corrupted. While I write this, I imagine the speech will just have been delivered to you. I am almost afraid to hear what you may think of it. Though how does it concern me, if it is not to come out till the republic is restored? About which what are my hopes? I dare not write.

LETTER XIV.

On the 26th I received a letter from Dolabella, of which I send you a copy. In this he says that he has done everything that you could wish. I immediately wrote to him in return with the fullest expression of my thanks. But that he might not be surprised at my writing twice on the same subject, I gave it as a reason, that I had not before been able to have any personal communication with you. Not to detain you, the following is a copy of my letter:

"Cicero to his Dolabella, Consul.

"Having before heard by letter from my friend Atticus of your great liberality and extreme kindness towards him; and having also under your own hand, you that had done what we desired, I wrote to express my thanks to you in such terms, that you might understand you could not have conferred upon me a greater favour. But Atticus having since come himself to me at Tusculum for this single purpose of returning you his thanks, through me, for the extraordinary attention and great kindness he had experienced from you in the Buthrotian affair; I could not refrain from repeat-ng the same to you more distinctly in this letter. For of all the marks of your affection and civility towards me, my Dolabella, which are very great, let me assure you that I esteem this the highest and most grateful, by letting Atticus see my regard for you, and yours for me. For the rest, though the settlement of Buthrotum has been your work, and we are naturally inclined to support the fruits of our own exertion, yet I wish again and again to recommend both the cause and the city to your patronage, that you be pleased to cover it with your authority and assistance. You will confer a lasting security on the Buthrotians; and will save Atticus and me from much trouble and anxiety, if for my honour's sake you will let them always remain under your protection. Which again and again I earnestly entreat you to do."

Having finished this letter, I devoted myself to my compositions, which I fear may in several places call for your little red marks, so discomposed am I, and occupied with deep thoughts.

LETTER XV.

CONFUND L. Antonius! If he molest the Buthrotians. I have drawn up my attestation, which you may countersign when you please. If L. Fadius the edile demands the money belonging to the people of Arpinum, deliver up even the whole of it. (I wrote to you in a former letter about the 10 sestertia (900L) which were to be provided for Statius.) If therefore Fadius asks for it, I wish it to be given to him; but to nobody besides Fadius. I think there is some other deposit at my house, which I have written to Eros to give back. The queen, I hate. Ammonius, the voucher of her promises, knows that I am justified in what I do. They were all connected with learning and becoming my character, so that I should not mind declaring them in the public assembly. Sara, independently of my knowing him to be a bad man, was besides insolent to me. For once only I saw him in my house, when asking him civilly what he wanted, he said he came to look for Atticus. But the haughtiness of the queen herself, when she was in the gardens on the other side of the Tiber, I cannot speak without great pain. Let me, then, have nothing to do with such people, who seem to think not so much that I have no spirit, as that I have scarcely common feeling. Eros's mismanagement, as I conceive, is an obstacle in the way of my going abroad. For while I ought to have abundance, from the position which he drew the fifth of April, I am under the necessity of borrowing. And what was received from the produce of my estate, I supposed to have been laid by for that temple. But I have given instructions about these matters to Tiro, whom I have sent to Rome on that account. I did not care to trouble you, who had already trouble enough. The more modest my Cicero is, the more I feel for him. For upon this subject he mentioned nothing to me, to whom he ought particularly to have written; but he wrote to Tiro to say, that since the first of April, when the year ends, he had received nothing. You were always of opinion, agreeably to your natural disposition, and thought also that it concerned my dignity, that he should have from me not only a liberal, but also a handsome and ample allowance. Therefore I wish you would manage (what I can transact through nobody else, or I would not trouble you), that there may be paid by exchanges at Athens what is sufficient for his yearly expenses. Eros will furnish the money for this purpose. I send up Tiro; therefore you will be so good as to take care about it, and write me word if anything occurs to you upon the subject.

LETTER XVI.

At length a messenger is arrived from Cicero with a letter written, in good truth, after the ancient manner, which of itself shows some degree of proficiency. Other people likewise give me good accounts. Leonidas, however, still uses the same expression of "hitherto?" But Hercules gives him the highest commendations. What think you? Though these should prove mere words, I am gratified to receive them on this subject, and gladly become a credulous hearer. If you have heard anything from Statius that concerns me, I should be glad to be informed of it. I assure you this place is beautiful, and quite retired; and, if you wish to write anything, free from interruption. But I know not how it is, "Sweet home?" Accordingly my steps revert to Tusculanum. For, after all, this rude scene would soon grow tiresome. I am besides afraid of the rains, if my prognostics are true; for the frogs are exercising their rhetoric. I beg you to let me know where, and on what day, I can see our friend Brutus.

LETTER XVII.

I received two letters on the 14th, one dated that day, and one the day before. Therefore to the earliest first. You will inform me about Brutus, when you know yourself. I had heard of the pretended alarm of the consuls for Sica, very affectationally indeed, but with unnecessary agitation, brought me an account of that suspicion. But what is it you say, "that we must be content with what is offered?" For not a word has been mentioned by Siregius. I am not pleased with this. I have been vexed about your neighbour Pletorius, that anybody should have heard it before me. You have acted quite right in the case of Syrus. I imagine you will easily stop L. Antonius through his brother Marcus. I forbade the money to be given to Antro, or to anybody, except L. Fadius the saddler; but you had not then received the letter. It cannot, either safely or properly be done otherwise. With regard to the deficiency of 100 sestertia (800L.) to be provided for Cicero, I should wish you to inquire of Eros what is become of the rest of the houses. I am not displeased with Arabio's conduct in the affair of Sittius. About my journey I think nothing, till I have settled my accounts; in which I believe you agree with me. I have replied to your first letter: now hear what I have to say to the other. You act as you always do, in assisting Servilia, that is Brutus. I am glad you do not trouble yourself about the queen, and especially that you approve of my conduct. I have been informed by Tiro of the state of Eros's accounts, and have sent for him. I am much obliged by your engaging that Cicero shall be in no want. I hear great things of him from Messala, who called upon me on his return from them at Lanuvium. And indeed his own letter is so affectationally and classically written, that I might think he reads the more indulgence. Sestius, I imagine, is not sorry about Buclianus. If Tiro comes to me, I think of going to Tusculum. But I beg you to inform me without delay whatever happens which it may concern me to know.

LETTER XVIII.

Though I thought I had sufficiently explained to you on the 15th what I wanted, and what I wished you to do if it was convenient to you; yet after I had set out, and was passing over the lake, I determined to send Tiro to you, that he might be present at the transactions which were in agitation. And I have also written to Dolabella to say, that, if be thought fit, I should be glad to set off; and I have asked him about the mules of burden for the journey. Let me beg that in these matters (since I understand you are very much occupied, partly about the Buthrotans, partly about Brutus, the providing for whose games I suspect devolves wholly upon you, and in great measure also the conduct of them) that therefore in an affair of this kind you will give me a little of your assistance; for much will be requisite. Things appear to me to tend to slaughter, and that at no great distance. You see the men; you see the arms that are collected. I do not think myself by any means safe. If you think otherwise, I wish you would write to me; for I would much rather remain at home, if I can do it with propriety.

LETTER XIX.

What further attempt is to be made in the case of the Buthrotans? For you mention that you have been sitting in vain. And what does Brutus say of himself? I am truly sorry you should be so detained; for which we may thank the ten men. It is a troublesome business, but must be borne, and is most acceptable to me. Respecting the employment of arms, I never saw anything more open. Let me be off, then; but, as you say, we will talk of it together. What Theophrases wants I cannot tell: for having written to me, I answered him as I could; but he says he wishes to come to me, partly about his own affairs, and partly about something that concerns me. I am impatient to hear from you. Pray see that nothing is done rashly. Status has written to me to say that Q. Cicero had strongly affirmed to him in conversation that he could not bear these proceedings, and that he was resolved to go over to Brutus and Cassius. I want now to understand this; for what it means I am unable to explain. He may design something in a fit of passion against Antonius; he may aim at some new glory; it may be all a sudden impulse; and assuredly so it is. But yet I have my fears; and his father is much disturbed; for he knows what that person formerly

LETTER XX.

I have returned my thanks to Venticus,—for nothing could be more kind. Let Dolabella's despatches be what you please; only let me have something, or at least a message to Nicia: for who, as you say, did not before understand this arrangement? Do you suppose that any sensible man now entertains a doubt but that it is a journey of despair, not of business? You say that men, and good ones too, already speak of the republic being in extremity. For my part, the very day on which I heard that tyrant called in the assembly "a most eminent man," I began to distrust. But when I was with you at Lamuvium, and saw that our friends had only so much hope of life as Antonius had been engaged to accord them, I quite despairs. Therefore, my Atticus, I would have you receive this with the same firmness with which I write it: that species of destruction, by which you are likely to fall; you will esteem disgraceful, and almost denounced against us by Antonius. From this snare I have determined to withdraw, not for the purpose of flight, but in the hope of a better death. The fault rests wholly with Brutus. You say that Pompeius has been received at Carthage. Now therefore they must send an army against him. To which camp then should I betake myself? for Antonius cuts off any middle course. That camp is weak; this is wicked. It is time therefore to hasten away. But help me with your advice, whether I should go from Brundiusium, or from Futeoli. Brutus adopts a haughty but prudent counsel: I am much concerned; for what shall I see him again? But we must bear the afflictive incident to humanity. You are yourself unable to see him. The gods confound this man who is dead; for having ever molested Buthrotum! But, leaving what is past, let us consider what is yet to be done. Though I

LETTER XXI.

Going in the capacity of lieutenant to the consul, he was entitled to a supply of mules.

This must be understood, upon which the following sentence depends.

Relating to the settlement of his affairs previous to quitting the country.

This may either mean an attempt on the part of L. Antonius and others to molest the Buthrotans, [see letter 15 of this book,] or an attempt on the part of Atticus to secure them. I incline to the former explanation. The letter being in answer to one from Atticus, several particulars in it are rendered obscure from our ignorance of the circumstances to which they allude.

This expression is probably a humorous one, taken from the decemviri, or ten persons, by whom the laws of Rome were framed; and applied, perhaps by Atticus in the first instance, to some ten people distinguished by their disregard for the republic, who at this time, it may be, threatened to divide and appropriate Cicero's property. See letter 9 of this book.

Probably said in relation to the designs of evil-minded persons on Cicero's property.

Perhaps Dolabella. See book xiii. letter 9, where the very same Greek expressions are applied to young Quintus's conduct.

said of him to me; things not to be revealed. In short, I do not know what he is at. I am to receive from Dolabella such despatches as I please; that is, none at all. Tell me; did C. Antonius wish to be made a septemvir? He was undoubtedly worthy of it. It is, as you mention, with regard to Menedemus. You will let me know everything.
have not yet seen Eros, yet from his letter, and from what Tiro has ascertained, I am pretty well master of his accounts. You say that I ought to borrow two hundred sestertia (1600L) for five months,—that is, to the first of November. The payment of the money due from Quintus will fall upon that day. I should be glad therefore (as Tiro assures me you would not wish me to go up to Rome expressly for this purpose) that, if you do not object to such a letter, you would find out from whence the money can be procured, and contract for it on my behalf. This is what is wanting for the present. I must inquire more particularly about the balance from himself; and in this, about the rents of the dowry estate, which, if they are regularly paid to Cicero, though I wish him to have a liberal allowance, yet will be nearly sufficient for him. I am aware that I must also have money for my journey; but the former may be paid out of the estates as it becomes due; what I want for myself must be had at once. And though I apprehend that he who is afraid of mere shadows is driving on to slaughter, yet I shall not set off till my accounts are cleared. But whether they are unravelled or not, I will examine with you. I have thought it proper to write this with my own hand, and have accordingly done so. About Fadius, as you mention: but to nobody else. I shall hope to have an answer from you to-day.

LETTER XXI.

I HAVE to acquaint you that Quintus, the father, is exulting with delight; for his son has written to say that he had wished to go over to Brutus for this reason; that Antonius having pressed him to get him made dictator, and to occupy some fortress, he had refused to do it; and he refused from fear of vexing his father, from which time Antonius had been his enemy. But afterwards, says he, "I recollected myself, being apprehensive that in his anger towards me, he might do some injury; therefore I have pacified him; and indeed have received from him a promise of four hundred sestertia (1200L), and the prospect of the rest." Statius writes word that he is desirous of living with his father; and, what is surprising, he is also glad of it. Did you ever know a more confirmed profligate than he is? I quite approve of your hesitation in the affair of Canus. I had suspected nothing about the debts; but supposed the dower to have been entirely repaid. What you defer, that you may speak with me personally, I shall be anxious to hear. You may keep the messenger as long as you please; for I know you are busy. About Xeno you have managed admirably. I will send you what I am writing, as soon as it is finished. You mentioned to Quintus that you had written to him; but nobody brought the letter. Tiro says that you do not now approve of Brundisium; and that you talked something about soldiers. But I had already fixed upon Hydruntum. I was influenced by your five hours’ passage. But what a long voyage is this! However, we will see about it. I received no letter from you on the 21st; for now what news is there? You will come then as soon as you are able. I hasten my departure, that Sextus may not first arrive, whom they report to be on his way.

LETTER XXII.

I rejoice with you upon the departure of young Quintus. He will give us no further trouble. I am ready to believe that Pansa talks favourably; for I know that he has always united himself with Hirtius. I suppose he may be very friendly towards Brutus and Cassius, if he can find his advantage in it; but when will he go near them? Likewise an enemy to Antonius; but when? or why? How long are we to be trifled with? I mentioned that Sextus was on his way, not as if he were just at hand; but because he certainly acts with that view, and will on no account lay down his arms. If he persists, war must be the consequence. But here our Cytherius declares that nobody but the conqueror shall live. What will Pansa say to this? And if war takes place, as it seems probable, which will he join? But of these and other matters which we meet; to-day, as you intimate, or to-morrow.

LETTER XXIII.

I am wonderfully distracted, yet without any particular uneasiness; but a great number of things occur to me both ways on the subject of my journey. "How long is this to last?" you will say. As long as there is room for hesitation, which will be till I am fairly embarked. If I hear from Pansa, I will send you both my letter and his, as I am expecting Silnius, to whom I will give the memoir I have drawn up. If there is any news, you will acquaint me with it. I have sent a letter to Brutus. If you know anything about his progress, I shall be obliged to you to inform me.

j See book xlix, letters 41 and 42, where Cana may probably be the daughter of Canus here mentioned. It will be recollected that she was proposed as a wife for young Quintus.
LETTER XXIV.

The messenger which I sent to Brutus returned from his journey the 26th. Servilia informed him that Brutus had set out that day at ten o'clock. I was sorry my letter had not been delivered. Silius did not come to me. I drew up that statement, and have sent the account to you. I want to know on what day I may expect you.

LETTER XXV.

There is great variety of opinions about my going abroad, for I have many visitors. But let me beg you to take this matter into consideration. It is a thing of some importance. Do you approve it, if I think of returning by the 1st of January? My mind is evenly balanced, yet so that I incline to go, provided my conduct gives no offence. And you have also ably pointed out the day, that was formerly held sacred; that is, the mysteries*. But however this may be, accident must regulate my determination about the journey. Let me therefore continue to doubt. For a winter voyage is an odious thing; which was the reason of my asking you about the day of the mysteries. I think, as you say, that I shall see Brutus. I mean to go from hence the last day of the month.

LETTER XXVI.

I see that you have done everything about Quintus' business: yet he is uneasy and doubtful whether he should humour Lepta, or shake Silius' credit. I have heard say that L. Piso wishes to get away on some appointment under a forged decree of the senate. I should like to know if there is any truth in it. The messenger, whom I told you I had sent to Brutus at Anagninum, returned on the night previous to the first of the month, bringing me a letter, in which there was one thing inconsistent with his consummate good sense; that is, that he wanted me to attend his games*. I replied, that in the first place I was already set out, so that it was no longer in my power; in the next place, that it would be very strange for me, who have never gone to Rome at all since this assumption of arms, and that, not so much in consideration of my danger, as of my dignity, suddenly to come up to the games. For at such a time to exhibit the games is quite right for him,—it is part of his duty; but as it is an part of my duty to see them, so neither is it becoming. I am indeed exceedingly desirous that they should be exhibited, and should be well received, which I trust will be the case; and I entreat you to let me know from the very beginning how they go off, and afterwards to pursue the detail through each succeeding day. But enough about the games. The rest of his letter sometimes inclines one way, sometimes another; yet emits occasional sparks of vigour. That you may judge for yourself what to think of it, I send you a copy of the letter, though my messenger informed me that he had also brought a letter from Brutus for you, which had been forwarded to you from Tusculanum. I have so arranged my journey as to be at Puteoli the 7th of July; for I wish to embark as soon as I can, yet so as to use all human precaution in my voyage. You may relieve M. Aelius from all further care. He wants permission to make some excavations at the extremity of his property, which are to pass under ground, and to be subject to certain service*. Let him know that I have long since objected to it, and that nothing would be an equivalent to me. But, as you say to me, let it be expressed with all gentleness; and so as rather to relieve him from all further care, than to let him suppose that I am at all offended. I beg you likewise to speak freely with Casselius upon that subject of Tullius*. It is a small concern*; but you have very properly adverted to it. It was conducted with too much craftiness. If he had any way imposed upon me, which he was not doing, unless you had ill-naturedly* stepped in, I should have been very angry. However it may be therefore, I wish the business to be stopped. Remember b You will take care to give possession to the person for whom Corellia applies, at the highest price which was offered at the sale. I think this was three hundred and eighty sestertia (3000L). If there is any news, or if you foresee anything that is likely to happen, I should wish you to write to me as often as possible. Remember to make my excuse to Varro, as I desired you, for my backwardness in writing. I hope Mundus will trim his opponent*. Let me know (for you are curious about such things) what M. Ennius has done respecting the will. From Apiraeus, July 2d.

LETTER XXVII.

I am pleased that you should persuade me to do what I had already done of my own accord the day before. For by the same messenger who took my letter to you on the 2nd, I wrote also to Sextius in terms of great regard. He does kindly to follow me to Puteoli, but his complaint is unreasonable. For it was not so much my business to wait for a See the conclusion of book V., also the last sentences of book VI. letter 1. It was perhaps deemed a profanation to travel, or to transact any unnecessary business, at the time of this solemn festival, which I conceive must be the same that in the passage referred to in the sixth book is called "the Roman Mysteries."

c See letters 18 and 19 of this book.

x I have given what appeared to me the most natural interpretation of this passage, which is very obscure and probably much corrupted.

y By comparison with letter 29 of this book, there is reason to suppose that this relates to some interest of money due to Cicero.

z After the sentence relating to Tullius; which seems to be inserted without any other connexion with the preceding, than what may have arisen from its place in Atticus' letter; he seems here to revert to the subject of M. Aelius' request, which Atticus may have been the first to mention.

a This I understand to be said in jest; the notice which Atticus had taken of the business having thwarted Aelius' design.

b The text is too much corrupted to be intelligible.

c The text is here likewise either deficient, or too concise to admit of any certain interpretation in our ignorance of the circumstances. The name occurs again in letter 29 of this book.
him on his return from Cosanum, as his, either not to go till he had seen me, or to come back sooner. For he knew I was anxious to set off, and had written to say that he would come to me at Tusculumum. I am troubled at the tears you shed upon leaving me. If you had done so in my presence, I might possibly have changed altogether my resolution of going. But I like the hope, with which you cooled yourself, of our soon meeting again, which expectation is indeed my greatest support. You shall have no want of letters. I will inform you of everything relating to Brutus. I shall very soon send you my treatise upon Glory, and I will make out something in the manner of Heralclides, which may lie by in your closet. I remember about Plancus. Attica has reason to complain. Your information about Bacchis, and about the chaplets on the statues, was highly acceptable; and I trust you will hereafter omit nothing, not only of so great, but of ever so little interest. I shall not forget Herodes and Mettius, and everything, which I can but suspect will be agreeable to you. O disgraceful son of your sister! He arrived as I was writing this, about sunset, while we were at dinner.

LETTER XXVIII.

As I wrote you word yesterday, I have settled to get to Puteolium on the 7th. There I shall hope to hear daily from you, especially upon the subject of the games; of which you must also send an account to Brutus. I sent you yesterday a copy of a letter I had from him, which I was hardly able to understand. Make my excuses to my Attica, so that all the blame may rest upon you; and assure her that I have by no means "brought away with me all my affection."!

LETTER XXIX.

I send you Brutus's letter. Good gods! What a want of resource! You will see when you read it. Respecting the celebration of Brutus's games I agree with you. You need not go to M. Aelius's house; but speak to him when you meet him. About the six per cent. from Tullius you may employ M. Axianus, as you mention. Your transaction with Cosianus is well managed; and it gives me pleasure to find that you attend to your own concerns as well as mine. I am glad my lieutenant is approved. May the gods accomplish what you promise! For what is there that I prefer to my friends? Though I have my fears about her, whom you except. When I have seen Brutus, I will write you a full account. I wish it may be true about Plancus and Decimus. I do not like Sextus's throwing away his shield. Tell me if you know anything about Mundiun. I have replied to all your observations; now hear mine. Quintus the son is come to conduct me to Puteoli. A famous citizen! you might call him Favorius, or Asinius. He did it for two reasons; to attend me, and to make his peace with Brutus and Cassius. But what say you? For I know you are well acquainted with the Othos. He says that he is going to take to himself Julia's: for a divorce is settled. His father asked me what was said of her. I replied, that I had heard nothing (for I did not know why he asked), excepting what related to her features, and to her parentage. But why? said 1. Upon which he told me that his son wished to marry her. Then I, notwithstanding my abhorrence, yet said that I did not suppose the reports to be true. It is his object (for this is it) to give our nephew nothing. She will have him without regarding his father. I suspect however that the young man dreams as usual. But I should be glad if you would make inquiry, which you can easily do, and let me know.

I beseech you, what is this? After I had sealed my letter, some persons from Formiae, who were dining with me, told me they had seen Plancus, him who is engaged about Bruturn; the day previous to my writing this, that is, on the 5th, dejected and without his trappings; and that the servants said, that he and his colleagues had been turned out by the Buthrotians. Well done! But I beg you to write me an account of the whole business.

* See letter 80 of this book.
* See letter 11 of this book.
* Probably that he would see him in Greece.
* This may mean Pilia, or Attica, whose health might prevent them from travelling.
* Plancus and Decimus Brutus had been nominated by Caesar consuls elect for the year after Hirtius and Pansa. They now commanded one the further, the other the nearer Gaul. It is probable that at this time Plancus had declared his determination to join Decimus Brutus against Antonius. It was proverbially disgraceful for one to "throw away his shield;" which means here "giving up the cause." [See book xvi. letter 1.] It is not unlikely that the expression may have been borrowed from Atticus.
* It is to be supposed that she was married to one of the Others.
* To make a distribution of lands in Epirus. See Appendix. He is so distinguished, as being a different person from that Plancus, who was before mentioned in this letter.

LETTER I.

I ARRIVED at Puteolana the 7th of July, and write this the following day on my way to Brutus at Nabis. 1 But while I was at dinner the day I got here, Eros delivered to me your letter. Is it so? In the edict for proclaiming the games, is the month, instead of Quintilis, called July, according to the new name given to it in honour of Caesar? 2 May the gods confound those 3 people! But we may storm the whole day. Can anything be more disgraceful than the adoption of the term "July" by Brutus? I turn therefore to my own duty, and "let us leave this," as it is said 4, for I see no help. But pray, what is it I hear about the settlers of Buthrotum being cut to pieces? 5 And what is the meaning of Plancus's going in such haste (for so I heard) day and night? I want much to know the truth. I am very glad that my going is approved. It is no wonder if the Dyneans, 6 after being driven from their possessions, should infect the sea; but it does not follow that my staying here would be thought proper. 7 There may be some security in sailing in company with Brutus; but I apprehend his vessels are very small. However, I shall presently know, and will write to you to-morrow. I imagine it was a false alarm about Ventidius. 8 With regard to Sextus, 9 it is held for certain that he does not take up arms. If this is true, I see that without a civil war weare to be made slaves. How then? The first of January affords us hope in Pansa. Mere illusion! In the wine and indolence of these people? From the 210 sestertia 10 (1690l.) Cicero's accounts may very well be liquidated. For Ovius is recently come from thence, and details many circumstances which give

1 A small island not far from Puteoli, where the younger Lucullus, a relation of Brutus, had a villa.
2 The Casarian faction, by whom this date is supposed to have been inserted in the proclamation.
3 This text has been variously tortured. Without altering the reading of the manuscript, I understand "&quot; to be taken from Homer II. ii. 236, where Thersites says—"Let us leave this man." Nothing is more common in these letters than such partial quotations. The et preceding the Greek word, I take to be part of the Latin text.
4 See book xii. letter 29.
5 These were pirates subdued by Pompeius, and planted at Dyne in Greece; from whence they had subsequently been expelled by Caesar.
6 This seems to be the meaning; which a literal translation would hardly have conveyed.
7 That he was advancing with troops to support Antonius.
9 This may perhaps be the sum borrowed, which, book xv. letter 20, was in round numbers called 300 sestertia.

LETTER II.

(Aug. v.)

BRUTUS is already expecting to hear from you. What I told him of Attica's "Terror" was not new; but he supposed it to have been the "Brutus." However, some rumour had reached him that the exhibition of the Grecian games 1 had not been well

1 See book xii. letter 29.
3 The mother of some lady proposed as a match for the young Cicero.
4 Probably some freed-man of large estate belonging to this lady.
5 This is probably the letter which was taken by young Quintus, and which I have thought fit to place the second in this book, having apparently been written on the evening of July 8, after his visit to Brutus in company with young Quintus. The behaviour of both parties at that visit, may have given Cicero additional confidence in his nephew's professions, which afterwards proved to be sincere.
6 See the next letter.
7 Another play by the same author.
8 The people were entertained for several days together, during which time there were a variety of exhibitions, and, among the rest, what are here denominated Grecian games, which were probably the contests of the Athlete borrowed from the Greeks.
attended; which did not surprise me; for you know my opinion of them. Now hear what is better than all. Quintus has passed several days with me; and if I wished it, would even have staid longer: but, while he was here, you cannot believe how much he delighted me in every respect; particularly in that wherein I was least satisfied. For he is so entirely changed by means of some writings which I had in hand, and by repeated conversation and instruction, that he will in future be disposed towards the republic as we could wish. Having not only assured me, but persuaded me of his sincerity, he has been very earnest with me to vouch to you for his conducting himself in a manner honourable both to you and to me. And he does not ask you immediately to trust him; but when you are thoroughly satisfied, then to give him your affection. Unless he had convinced me, and I had believed what I tell you to be certain, I should not have done what I am going to mention. For I took the young man with me to Brutus, who was so well satisfied with what I relate, that he gave full credit to it himself, and refused to accept me as a voucher; but commending him, spake most kindly of you; and upon taking leave of him, embraced and kissed him. Therefore, though I have more reason to congratulate you than to ask you, yet I do ask that if heretofore he appears to have been guilty of some indiscretions owing to the infirmity of youth, you will believe that he has renounced them; and trust me when I add, that your authority will have great, or rather the greatest, effect in confirming his resolution. Having several times thrown out to Brutus my design of sailing in his company, he did not seem to catch at it, as I had expected. I thought him absorbed; which indeed is the case, particularly on the subject of the games. But on my return home, Cn. Luccicicus, who sees a great deal of Brutus, informed me that he delayed his voyage, not from irresolution, but waiting if any chance should arise. I therefore doubt whether I should go to Venusia, and there wait to hear about the troops. If they are not in the neighbourhood, as some suppose, I may go to Hydruntum. If nearer to safe, I shall return to Rome. Do you think I am jesting? May I die if anybody keeps me besides you. For only look round—But I blush to say it before your face. How charmingly are the days pointed out in Lepidus’s suspense; and how conveniently for the purpose of my return! I derive from your letter a great encouragement to set out. And I wish I may see you there. But as you shall think most advantageous. I am expecting Nepos’s letter. Is he desirous to possess my writings, who considers as unfit to be read those subjects of which I am most proud? And you say, ‘after him, who is irreproachable’; but it is you who are ‘irreproachable,’ while he is ‘divine.’ There is no collection of my letters; but my Tiro has about seventy, some of which may be got from you. These I must look over and correct, and then they shall be published.

LETTER III.

(Gran. ii.)

On the 10th I received two letters, one by my own messenger, the other by Brutus’s. We had here a very different report respecting the Buthro-tians. But to this among many other things we must submit. I send back Eros sooner than I had intended, that there may be somebody to attend to Hortensius; and also because he says he has made an appointment with the knights. Hortensius however is very unreasonable; for there is nothing owing to him excepting from the third instalment, which becomes due the 1st of August; and of this very instalment the greater part has been paid him some time before the day. But Eres will see about it. In the case of Publius, I think there ought to be no delay in making the proper assignment. Yet when you consider how far I have receded from my right, by paying at once 200 out of the 400 sestertia (3200L.) and giving a bill for the remainder, you may mention to him, if you please, that he ought to wait my convenience after the loss I have sustained in my just claims. But I entreat you, my dear Atticus, (do you observe how I eax?) as long as you remain in Rome, manage, regulate, govern all my concerns, without waiting to hear from me. For though the balance is quite sufficient to discharge all demands, yet it frequently happens that our own debtors are not punctual to their time. If anything of this sort should occur, let my credit be of the first consideration with you: so as to support it by borrowing, or even by selling, if circumstances render it necessary. Brutus was much pleased with your letter. For I was with you several hours in Nesis soon after I had received it. He seemed to be delighted with ‘Teresus,’ and to feel himself under greater obligation to Acctius than to Antonius. For myself, the more I am pleased with the account, the more it excites my indignation and vexation, that the Roman people should employ their hands, not in defending the republic, but in applauding it.

1 Philosophical inquiries.

2 This, which is no doubt copied from Atticus’s letter, and there applied to Cicero, as likewise the subsequent expressions, are taken from Homer.

3 It is supposed that Atticus had solicited him to publish a collection of his letters.

4 It is uncertain who are meant.

5 Should not this be written Hordeniucus, who was before stated to have succeeded to part of Cluvius’s estate? [See book xiii. letter 45.] Whoever he was, Cicero appears to have purchased his interest on condition of paying for it by three instalments.

6 Brother to Cicero’s second wife, to whom, upon his divorce, he was to repay her fortune. See book xiii letter 54.

7 The title of one of Accius’s or Atticus’s plays, in which the expressions in favour of liberty called forth the plaudits of the populace.
The minds of those men appear to be inflamed to such a pitch as to unmask their wickedness. But however, if they do but smart, let them smart for what they may. I am glad of what you say, that my determination is every day more approved; and was anxiously expecting what you might write to me about it; for I meet with a variety of opinions. Indeed it was on that account I protracted my stay, in order to leave it open as long as possible. But now that I am driven out with a pitchfork, I think of proceeding to Brundisium; for it will be easier and more practicable to avoid the troops than the pirates, who are reported to be seen abroad. Sextius was expected on the tenth, but he is not come, so far as I know. Cassius has arrived with his little fleet. As soon as I have seen him, I mean to go on the 11th to Pompeianum, thence to Acclanum, and so on. It is as I supposed about Tuttia. The report of Abutius I do not believe; I do not however care about it any more than you. I have written to Plancus and Oppius because you desired me; but do not think it necessary to deliver the letters, unless you choose it. For after having done for you everything in their power, I am afraid they will think my recommendation superfluous; especially Oppius, whom I know to be entirely in your interests. But, as you like. Since you write word that you shall winter in Epirus, it will be a great kindness to me if you go thither before the time that I must by your advice return into Italy. Let me hear from you as often as possible; if about things of little moment, by any messenger you may find; but if there is anything of more importance, send somebody from your house. If I get safe to Brundisium, I shall set about my Heraclidean work; I have sent you the treatise upon Glory. You will keep it locked up, as usual; but let select passages be marked, which Salvius may read to your guests, when he has a good audience. These books please me much; I would rather hear that they pleased you. Again and again farewell.

LETTER IV.

(Gran. iii.)

You have done wisely (for I am now writing in answer to the letter which you sent me after meeting Antonius at Tibur). Wisely I say in giving way to him, and even being forward to thank him. For as you rightly observe, we can more easily hear the loss of our public rights than of our private ones. When you say that you are more and more pleased with "O Titus," &c., you give me fresh spirits to write. In your expectation of seeing Eros, and not empty-handed, I am glad that you have not been disappointed. But what I have sent you is the same treatise retouched; and indeed it is the original itself in many places interpolated and amended. When it has been transcribed on large paper, you may read it in private to your guests. But try yourself cheerful and entertain them well, lest they vent upon me the displeasure they may feel towards you. I wish that what I hear of Cicero may be true. I shall know about Xeno, when I am there; though I cannot suppose that he would do anything either inattentively or illiberally. Respecting Herodes, I will do as you desire; and what you mention, I will learn from Scauneius and Xeno. On the subject of Quintus the son, I am glad the letters which I sent by my messenger, was delivered to you previously to that which he took himself; though you would not have been deceived. Nevertheless—but I am anxious to know what he said to you and you to him; yet I have no doubt that each behaved in his own manner. I hope to receive the account by Curius; who, anable as he is himself and beloved by me, yet derives a great additional regard from your recommendation. I have replied to your letter. Now hear what I am persuaded is unnecessary to be written, but yet I write. Many considerations affect me on my departure, and most of all, that I am separated from you. Besides, I dislike the trouble of a voyage, unsuitable not only to my age, but also to my character. And the time of my departure has something absurd in it; for I leave a state of peace, to come back to war; and the interval that might be spent among my small estates, in convenient and sufficiently pleasant houses, I am going to waste. My consolation is that I shall either be of service to Cicero, or shall be able to judge what advantage is to be expected. Then you, as I hope, and as you promise, will presently be there. If this happens, everything will go better with me. But I am much vexed about the balance of my accounts. For though it is all clear, yet Dolabella's debt being entered among them, and his assignees total strangers to me, I feel anxious about it; so that among all my troubles nothing vexes me more. Therefore I do not think I have done wrong in having written to Balbus more openly, that if anything of the kind should happen, and the payments should not correspond, he might assist me; likewise in having desired you in the event of such an accident to communicate with

1 Antonius may have agreed to acknowledge Atticus's payment in exemption, or partly in exemption, of further demands upon Buthrotum. With this the following sentence very well agrees; meaning, that he did right to thank Antonius for his private services, notwithstanding the public wrongs entailed upon the state. Res publica et res familiaris, are here opposed to each other.

2 These words are the beginning of Cicero's treatise upon "Old Age."

him; which you will do if you see occasion, more especially if you go into Epirus. I write this on the point of embarking from Pompeianum with three small vessels of ten oars each. Brutus is still in Nesis, Cassius at Naples. Are you pleased with Deiotarus, and are you not pleased with Hieras? who having been directed at the time that Blesamius came to me to do nothing without consulting our friend Sextus, made no communication to him nor to any of us. I long to kiss my Attica for the sweet salutation she sent me through you. You will return therefore my kindest compliments to her, and present them likewise to Pilia.

LETTER V.
(Grav. iv.)

As I told you in the letter you would receive yesterday or perhaps to-day (for Quintus said the next day), I went to Nesis the 8th. Brutus was there. How he was vexed about the 7th of July! He was wonderfully disturbed, and said that he should write to desire that the fights with the wild beasts, which were to take place the day after the Apollinary games, might be proclaimed for the 13th of Quintilis. Libo came in and said that Philo, Pompeius' freed-man, and his own freed-man Hilarus, had arrived from Sextus with a letter to the consuls, or whatever else they are to be called. He read us a copy of it. I said what I thought, that some few things were irrelevant; but otherwise it was sufficiently digested and not disrespectful. I only wanted to have added that what was inscribed to the consuls alone, should have been to the prætors, tribunes of the people and senate, lest they should not produce what had been sent to themselves. They say that Sextus was at Catanghena with only one legion; and that he received the account of Caesar the very day on which he had taken the town of Bores; that after taking the town there was a wonderful expression of joy, a change in men's minds, and a concourse from all parts; but that he returned to the six legions which he had left in the further part of Spain. To Libo himself he had said the name word, though he could be no accommodation unless he was permitted to resume his own house. The sum of his demands was, that all the armies should be dismissed wherever they might be. So much for Sextus. Respecting the Bruthtions, after every inquiry I hear nothing certain. Some report that the settlers were cut to pieces; some, that Plancus, upon receiving a sum of money, had run away and left them. So that I do not see how I can ascertain what the truth of it is, unless you presently write to me. The going to Brundisium, about which I doubted, seems to be at an end; for the legions are said to be approaching. But this voyage has some suspicion of danger. Therefore I determined to sail in company with Brutus. I found him better prepared than I had understood. For Domitius has himself some good vessels; and there are besides some distinguished ones belonging to Sextus, Bocchanius, and others. For upon Cassius' fleet, which is quite a fine one, I cannot make a comment. But the straits. It is rather unpleasant to me that Brutus seems to be so little inclined to hasten his voyage. He waits first to hear the issue of the games; and afterwards, as far as I can learn, means to proceed slowly and stop at several places. Yet I think it is better to sail slowly than not to sail at all; and if, when we have made some way, the passage appears clear, I shall take advantage of the Etesian winds.

LETTER VI.

HIPPHERTO (for I am got as far as Sica's at Vibo!) I have sailed rather conveniently than expeditiously; for a great part of the way has been performed by rowing; there being none of the winds which usually precede the Etesian. It happened also very opportunely that we passed over the two bays of Peustum and Vibo, which must be passed with an even course*. I got to Sica's the eighth day after I left Pompeianum, having stayed one day at Vaisa, where I was much at my ease at my friend Thalasa's. I could not have been received more hospitably, especially in his absence. I arrived at Sica's on the 24th, where I was quite at home; therefore I stayed over the next day. But I mean when I get to Rhegium, before I undertake my longer passage, to consider whether I shall go in a heavy vessel to Patras, or in a light one to the Tarentine Lencopretia1, and from thence to Corcyra; and if I go in a ship of burden, whether I shall at once cross over from the straits or go by way of Syracuse. Upon this subject I will write to you from Rhegium. In truth, my Atticus, I often ask myself what is the purpose of this voyage? Why am I not with you? Why am I not visiting my own villas, those dear spots of Italy? But it

8 I have supposed with some commentators that the original ought to be written peditus egoque, and I understand it to mean that the ropes, which fastened the sails on each side, were equally stretched, so that the ship passed with an even course. It is well known that the word peditus is applied to many different things. So Homer in the construction of Ulysses' ship, πέδιτας ἐκ τῶν πληθυνθέν ἀντίτοιχον ἀναβολήν, Od. v. 260.
9 There seems reason to believe this may be the same as Leuc, near Hydramuntum, the word Tarantine being added to distinguish it from another place of the same name near Rhegium, of which mention is made in the next letter.
enough, and more than enough, to be away from you. And from what am I fleeing? From danger? At present, unless I am mistaken, there is none; but to this very danger your authority calls me back. For you write word that my going is applauded to the skies; but on condition that I return before the first of January, which I certainly shall endeavour to do. For I would rather be at home even with the apprehension of danger, than in perfect security at your Athens. But see how things are likely to go; and either write to me, or, what I should like much better, bring me word yourself. So we shall take it in good part, if I urge you to a thing, in which I am persuaded you already take more interest than I do myself. Clear up, I entreat you, and settle my accounts. I left a fair balance; but there is need of some exertion, that my co-heirs may be paid in full for the Chuvian estate on the first of August. You will see what is to be done with Publlius. He ought not to press me, since I do not avail myself of my right; yet I wish him also to be fully satisfied. But what shall I say to Terentius? Her I would have you pay even before it is due, if you can. But if, as I hope, you will quickly go to Epirus, I request you previously to provide for the entire extrication and discharge of this debt, for which I am pledged. But enough of these affairs; I am afraid you will think it too much. Now hear my negligence. I sent you my treatise on Glory; but it has the same preface as that to the third book of the Academics. It arose from hence, that I have a whole volume of prefaces, from which I am in the habit of selecting one when I begin any new composition. So lately in Tusculanum, not recollecting that I had before used that preface, I introduced it into the book which I sent you. But upon reading over the Academics in the ship, I found out my error. I therefore immediately wrote a new preface, which I have sent you. You will accordingly cut off the former, and glue on this. Give my compliments to Pila, and to Atticus, my delight and darling.

LETTER VII.

On the 6th of August, having set out from Leucopetra, from whence I meant to pass over to Greece, when I had proceeded about forty miles I was driven back by a violent south wind to the same port of Leucopetra. There while I was waiting for a fair wind, at the house of my friend Valerius, so that I was altogether at my ease and very comfortable, there arrived some Rhegians of distinction, who had recently come from Rome,— and among them one who had been staying with our Brutus at Naples. They brought with them the proclamation of Brutus and Cassius, and said there was to be a full senate on the 1st of September, and that Brutus and Cassius had written to the cousinal and praetorian members to request their attendance. They reported that great hope was entertained of Augustus giving way, either to the accommodation, and of our friends returning to Rome. They added also that my absence was regretted, and in some degree blamed. Upon hearing this, I did not hesitate to lay aside all thoughts of my voyage, which, to say the truth, I never much liked: but when I read your letter I confess I was surprised that you should so vehemently have changed your opinion,—though I concluded it was not without good reason. Yet if you were to return to Augustus and promote our cause, at least you were an approver of it provided I returned to Rome by the 1st of January. Thus I should have been away, while the danger was likely to be less, and should have come into the very flame. But if this was not so prudent, I have however no cause to be displeased; for in the first place it was done by my own judgment; and in the next place, even if it had been by your advice, what is expected of one who gives advice, besides integrity? I cannot sufficiently, and with the following expressions in your letter:— "Come then, you who prefer an honourable death, come; will you desert your country?" Did I desert it? Or did I then appear to you to desert it? You not only did not prevent it, but you even approved of it. The rest was still more severe; "I wish you would draw up for me some note to prove that you have done right." So then, my Atticus, does my conduct stand in need of defence, especially before you who so strongly approved it? Yes, I will compose an apology; but it shall be to some one of those who disliked and dissuaded my going. Though what need now of "a note?" If I had persevered there might have been need: but this very want of consistency may be objected to me. No philosopher, among the many things that have been written on questions of this kind, ever called a change of opinion by the name of inconsistency. Afterwards you go on thus: "for if this had been done by my friend Phaedrus, there would be a ready excuse; but what are we to say now?" So then, what I have done is of such a nature that I cannot approve it to Cato, being full of guilt and infamy. I wish it had appeared so to you from the beginning; you should have been my Cato, as you always arc. This last is the most galling of all, "for our Brutus says nothing;" that is, he does not venture to admonish a person of my age. I can put no other interpretation on these words; and assuredly so it is: for on the 16th of August, when I had arrived at Velia, Brutus heard of it, being with his ship off the river Heles, three miles east of Velia. He immediately came on foot to me. Immortal gods! What satisfaction did he show at my return, or rather my coming back! He then poured forth everything that he had suppressed,—so as to make me recollect that expression of yours, "for our Brutus says nothing." He particularly regretted my absence from the senate on the 1st of August. Piso he extorted to the skies. He said that he was glad that I had avoided two heavy imputations; one of despondency and

b These expressions show the way practised by the ancient Romans in regard to their books, which consisted of a long scroll of parchment divided transversely into pages, and fixed upon rollers.

1 It appears by the note of Philippus that Cicero passed over from Leucopetra near Rhegium to Syracuse, August 1, and the day following set sail for Greece, but was driven back to Leucopetra. Hence he made a second attempt to cross the sea to Greece, but was again obliged to return.

1 This seems to refer to what Cicero had said, book xv. letter 30.

of 500 denarii (187). He thinks of going through the other colonies. He plainly aims at making himself the head of an army to be brought against Antonius. Accordingly, I see that in a few days we shall be in arms. Whom then should I follow? Consider his name, consider his age; and he requests to have first some conversation with me secretly either at Capua or not far from Capua. But it is childish to suppose that this can be done secretly. I informed him by letter that this was neither necessary nor possible to be done. He sent to me one Cessina of Volaterra, a friend of his, who brought word that Antonius was advancing towards Rome with the legion of Alaudans,6—that he demanded contributions from all the free towns,—and was conducting a legion6 with military ensigns. He consulted me whether he should march to Rome with 3000 veterans, or should maintain the post of Capua, and prevent Antonius's approach,—or should go to meet the three Macedonian legions which are advancing along the upper coast, and which he hopes are in his interest. They refused to receive Antonius's bounty, as this person relates, and bitterly insulted him, and left him whilst he was haranguing them. In short, he assumes the command, and thinks that he ought to support him. I, for my part, advised him to go to Rome; for I thought he would have with him both the city populace, and, if he could gain their confidence, likewise the most respectable citizens. O Brutus, where are you? What a fine opportunity do you lose! I did not foresee exactly this; but I fully expected something of the kind. Now I want your counsel. Shall I go to Rome? or shall I remain where I am? or shall I retire to Arpinum? For that place possesses great security. To Rome I think; in case I should be wanted if anything decisive occurs. Resolve me this, therefore: I never was in greater perplexity.

LETTER IX.

I RECEIVED two letters in one day from Octavius. He now wants me to go immediately to Rome, and says that he is desirous of acting by the authority of the senate; to which I replied, that the senate could not meet before the first of January, which I believe to be the case.7 But then he adds, "by your advice." In short, he presses hard, and I try to excuse myself. I cannot trust his youth; I do not know his real intentions; I do not care to do anything without your friend Pansa.8 I am afraid of Antonius's power, and

LETTER VIII.

WHEN I know what day I shall arrive,7 I will let you know. I must wait for my heavy goods, which are coming from Aegina; besides which, several of my family are sick. On the evening of the first I received a letter from Octavius. He is attempting great things; he has gained over to his party all the veterans who are at Cassinum and Cadala,9—and no wonder; for he gives a bounty

That is, it is right for me to be near Rome, where I must soon expect to be buried.

4 At Baeno. In the interval between the time of writing the preceding letter and this, Cicero had gone up to Rome, where he arrived August 31, and was received with great compliments and congratulations. The following day, Sept. 1, he was solicited by Antonius to attend the senate; but excused himself on the pretence of fatigue; but really because he knew it was fruitless to resist the proposal of Antonius to decree divine honours to Caesar. Antonius in rage threatened to pull down his house. Thereupon, on Sept. 2, Cicero pronounced his first Philippus against Antonius; and before the end of the month he retired to the neighbourhood of Naples, where he composed his second Philippus, distinguished for the free exposure of Antonius's character. He still continued in the same neighbourhood when he wrote the present letter in the month of November.

unwilling to go from the coast, and at the same time should be sorry to be out of the way upon any great occasion. The proceedings of this young man displeases Varro more than me. He has steady troops; he may have Brutus; and he acts openly, arranging and mustering his army at Capua. Already I see war. Write in answer to this. I am surprised that my messenger should have left Rome on the first without a letter from you.

LETTER X.

I arrived at my house in Sinuessa the 7th of November; and it was generally reported that Antonius was to sleep at Casilinium the same day; which made me alter my plans. For I had intended to go straight to Rome by the Appian road, in which case he would easily have overtaken me; for they say that he travels with the speed of Caesar. I therefore turned aside from Minturnae towards Arpinum, where the design of sleeping on the 9th either at Aurinum, or in Arceum. Now, my Atticus, enter into my present concern with your whole mind, for it is a thing of great moment. There are three parties to choose: whether I should remain at Arpinum, or should approach nearer, or should go to Rome. Whatever you advise I will do. But as soon as possible, I anxiously look for a letter from you. The 8th, in the morning at Sinuessa.

LETTER XI.

On the 5th I received two letters from you, one dated the 1st of this month, the other the day before. First then for the earliest. I am glad that you approve of my work; wherein the brilliant passages which you have selected derive additional brilliancy from your judgment; for I was afraid of those little red marks of yours. Your observation about Sica is very just; but it is with difficulty that I restrain myself. I will however mention it without any disrespect to Sica or to Septimia; only so, that children’s children may know, without any Lucilian fence, that he has had children by the daughter of C. Fadus. And I shall be glad to see the day when this speech may circulate so freely as to find its way even into Sica’s house. But we have need of that time, when those triumvirs lived. May I die if it is not wittily said. I would have you read it to Sextus, and tell me what he thinks of it. He alone is as good as ten thousand to me. But take care that Calenus and Calvina do not come in. When you say you are afraid of tiring me; you tire me. Nobody less. For as Aristophanes said of Archilocho’s Iambics, so may I of your letters, that I like the language, but detest the matter. But I must not grumble. Even if you were finding fault with me, I should not only bear it patiently, but should be pleased, as long as good sense and kindness are mingled with reproof. Accordingly I shall readily adopt your corrections, and put “the same right as Rubius’s,” instead of “as Scripio’s;” and in the matter of Dolabella’s praises I will lessen their heap. Yet I think there is in that place a fine irony, when I represent him to have been in three engagements against Roman citizens. I like better too that expression. “It is most unfit that this man should live,” than “what is more unfit.” I am glad you like Varro’s Pergophoria. I have not yet got from him that Heraciulan work. In exhorting me to write, you show your friendship; but let me assure you that I do nothing else. I am sorry for your cold, and beg you to apply to it your usual attention. I rejoice to think that “O Titus” has been of use to you. The Augustans are, Mustella the captain of the gladiators, and Laco, who is a great drinker. I will polish up, and send you the book you desire. What follows is in reply to the latter of the two letters. The treatise on Duties, as far as Panemus has gone, I have comprised in two books. There are three of his. But having in the beginning divided the consideration of duties into three kinds; one, when we deliberate whether anything is honourable or base; the second, whether it is useful or prejudicial; the third, how we are to judge when these clash together (as in the case of Regulus, it was honourable to return, and useful to remain); he has treated admirably of the two first; respecting the third he promises hereafter, but has written nothing. The subject has been prosecuted by Posidonius, whose book I have sent; and have written to Athenodorus Calvis to give me the heads of it, which I am expecting. I wish you would urge him, and request him to do it as quickly as he can. In this

1 This is apparently copied from some letter of Atticus. But what three people or what time is meant is uncertain. A. LETTER XII.

I send you the copy of a letter I have received from Oppius, because it shows his kindness. Respecting Ocella, though you hesitate and send me no answer, I have adopted a counsel of my own, and think of going to Rome on the 12th. I considered that it was better for me to be there on purpose at a time when it was not necessary, than, if I should be wanted, to be absent. Besides, I have some fear of being intercepted; for he may arrive presently; though there are various reports, and some that I should like to have verified. But there is nothing certain. Yet whatever happens, I would rather be with you than remain at a distance, in anxiety both about you and about myself. But what can I say to you? Be of good courage. This is a finely sally on the subject of Varro's Heraclidum. Nothing ever amused me so much. But of this and other greater matters when we meet.

LETTER XIII.

What a strange chance! On the 8th having left Sinissaenum before it was light, and got by the dawn of day as far as the Tiberina bridge at Minerva, where the road turns to Arpinas, I met the messenger just as I was entering upon my long course.

I immediately cried out, "If you have anything from Atticus, give it me." But I was not yet able to read; for I had sent away the torches, and the light was insufficient. But as soon as I could see, I first began to read the former of your two letters. It is elegant beyond everything. As I hope to be saved, I say nothing different from what I feel. I never read anything more kind, more tender, more delightful than what you call me, provided you assist me. But at first I thought nothing could be so irreverent to that letter, in which I had asked for your advice, as this answer; till I found another, in which you direct me, in the words of Homer, "to pass by the stormy Minas to the island of Psyras," keeping the Appian road on the left.

That day then I slept at Aquinum, rather a long journey, and a bad road: I deliver this as I am setting out from thence the next morning.

LETTER XV.

(Grev. xiv.)

I have positively nothing to tell you. While I remained at Puteoli there was every day something new about Octavius, and many false reports of Antonius. But in answer to what you mention, (for I received three letters from you on the 11th,) I perfectly agree with you. If Octavius acquires influence, the acts of the tyrant will be established much more firmly than in the temple of Tellus, which will be unfavourable for Brutus. But if he is beaten, you see how insupportable Antonius will be. So that it is difficult to choose between them. O this sad fellow, Sextus's messenger! He promised to be at Rome the day after he left Puteoli. When you admonish me to proceed gently, I assent, though I think differently from you. Neither Philippus nor Marcellus have any weight with me; for theirs is a different case; or if it is not, at least it appears to be so. But this young man, though he does not want spirit, wants authority. However, if I can prudently be at Tusculum, consider whether that or this would be better when Antonius arrives. I shall be there with more satisfaction, because I shall know all that takes place. But, to pass from one subject to another, I have no doubt that what the Greeks call ἀθωσία, we call "duty." Why should you doubt about its being rightly applied to the state? Do we not say "the duty of the consul?" "the duty of the senator?" It suits admirably; or give me a better word. This is sad intelligence about Nepos's son. In truth I am much concerned, and sorry for it. I did not know that there had been such a boy. I have lost Canninius, a man, as far as regards me, always very kind. There is no occasion for your speaking to Athenodorus, for he has sent me a very handsome abstract. Pray take every precaution about your cold. Quintus, the great-grandson of your grandfather, has written to my father's grandson, that after the 5th of that month on which I distinguished myself, he will lay open the state of the temple of Ops, and that before the people. You will see, therefore, and write word, I am anxious to know Sextus's opinion.

LETTER XVI.

(Grev. xv.)

Do not suppose it is from idleness that I decline writing with my own hand; yet in truth it is from idleness, for I have nothing else to allege. However, in your letters likewise I think I can trace Alexis. But to come to my purpose: if Dolabella had not used me shamefully, I might perhaps have doubted whether I ought to relax or to contend for my utmost right. But now I am even glad that an opportunity is offered to me, by which he and everybody else may know that I have withdrawn my affection from him; and I may publicly declare, that, both on my own account, and that of the republic, I hold him in aversion. For after having at my instance undertaken the defence of the republic, he has not only been bribed with money to desert it, but, as far as was in his power, he has contributed to ruin it. In answer to your question, how I mean to proceed when the day arrives: in the first place I should like it to be so, that there may be no impropriety in my being at Rome; about which, as about everything else, I will do as you think right. But upon the whole, I am disposed to act vigorously and sternly. And though it may seem to be in some measure discredit able to call upon the sureties, yet I would have you take this under your consideration; for I may introduce agents for this purpose; and the sureties will not resist the claim. Upon this I am confident the sureties will be relieved. But I think it will be disgraceful in him, especially as he has pledged himself in the debt, not to redeem his agents; and it becomes my own character to prosecute my right without exposing him to extreme ignominy. I should be glad if you would inform me what is your opinion about this; and doubt not but you will be able to settle the whole in some gentler manner. I come now to the republic. I have on many occasions experienced your prudence in political matters; but nothing was ever more prudent than the observation contained in your last letter. "For though at present this boy nobly resists Antonius, yet we must wait for the issue hereafter."

Yet what an harangue! For it has been sent to me. He swears "by the hope of attaining his father's honours;" and at the same time extends his hand towards the statue. But let me not owe my safety to one like him. As you say, however, the surest test will be the tribunate of our friend Casca; about which I told Oppius, when he was exhorting me to support the young man, and his whole cause, and hand of veteran soldiers, that I could by no means do it, till I should be satisfied that he would not only not be an enemy to the tyrants, but would even be a friend to them. Upon his assurance that he would be so, why, said I, should we be in a hurry? For I can be of no use to him before the 1st of January; and we shall see his intentions before the middle of December in the case of Casca. He readily assented. So much, then, for this. I have only to add, that you shall have messengers every day; and I imagine you will every day also have something to tell me. I send you a copy of Lepta's letter, by which that Stratonax appears to me crest-fallen. But you will read it, and judge for yourself.

After I had sealed my letter, I received yours and Sextus's. Nothing could be more agreeable or more friendly than Sextus's letter. For yours was very short, having written so fully before. It is indeed with prudence and kindness that you advise me to remain in this neighbourhood, till I hear the event of the present commotions. But, my Atticus, the republic does not at this time affect me. Not that anything is or ought to be dearer to me; but even Hippocrates forbids giving medicine when all hope is past. Therefore I lay aside such considerations. It is for my private affairs that I am now concerned. Say I so? Yes, for my reputation. For though there is so great a balance, yet I have not actually received enough to pay Terentia. Tarentia do I say? You know that some time ago I engaged to pay twenty-five sestertia (200£) on the part of Montanus. Ciceron

Atticus, who was anxious to save the city, paid the money out of his own property. Upon this we went to Caesar, and spoke in behalf of the Buthrotians, and brought back a most liberal decree, signed by persons of the first distinction. After this had been done, I confess I was surprised that Caesar should permit the assembling of those who wished for the Buthrotian land; and should not only permit it, but should appoint you to superintend that business. There is nobody more friendly, or more agreeable, or dearer to me, than Atticus. Before, his property only was concerned, though that was to a large amount; now his reputation is likewise implicated; that what he gained by great solicitation and favour, both in the lifetime and after the death of Caesar, he may effectually obtain by your assistance. Should this be granted by you, I would have you believe that I shall entertain such a sense of your kindness, as to consider myself under the greatest obligation. I shall make it a point to attend with zeal and diligence to whatever I think will please or interest you. Take care to preserve your health.

APPENDIX.

LETTER I.

M. Cicero to L. Plancus, Prator elect.

I know the great regard you bear to my friend Atticus, and to me your zeal is such, that in truth I consider myself to have few equally attentive and affectionate. For to the great, and long, and just friendship between our families, a great accession has been made by your disposition towards me, and mine towards you, equal and mutual. The case of Buthrotum is not unknown to you; for I have often conversed with you about it, and detailed the whole affair to you. It happened in this manner:—As soon as we found that the Buthrotian land was proscribed, Atticus became alarmed, and drew up a statement, which he gave me to present to Caesar; for I was to dine with him that day. Upon this we went to Caesar, and spoke in behalf of the Buthrotians, and brought back a most liberal decree, signed by persons of the first distinction. After this had been done, I confess I was surprised that Caesar should permit the assembling of those who wished for the Buthrotian land; and should not only permit it, but should appoint you to superintend that business. Accordingly I spoke to him, and that repeatedly, so that he even accused me of want of confidence in his word. He likewise bid M. LETTER II.

Cicero to Plancus, Prator elect.

I have already petitioned you by letter in behalf of the Buthrotians; that, as their case had been approved by the consuls, (who had legal authority to inquire, determine, and pass judgment on Caesar's acts,) you would promote that object, and would relieve my Atticus (for whom I know your regard), and me, (who am not less earnest), from our present anxiety. For everything being at length arranged, after great care, and much exertion and trouble, it remains with you to enable us as soon as possible to put an end to our solicitude. And indeed I know your prudence to be such, that you must see what great confusion will arise, if those consular decrees, which have been made respecting Caesar's acts, are not observed. On my part, though I disapprove many of Caesar's decisions, (which was unavoidable among such a multiplicity of business), yet for peace and quiet's sake I think it right to support them; and I believe that you strenuously maintain the same opinion. But the purpose of my letter is not to persuade, but to ask. I ask you therefore, my Plancus, and beg you, with all the zeal and ardour of which I am capable, so to undertake, so to manage, so to conclude this whole affair, that what we have without any hesitation obtained from the consuls by the extreme goodness and justness of the cause, you will not only permit us to enjoy, but will take pleasure in it, considering the disposition you have often evinced towards Atticus, both in his presence and in mine. By so doing you will confer the greatest obligation on me, who have always been united to you both by inclination and family connexion. That you will do this, I ardently request of you again and again.
LETTER III.
Cicero to his Capito.

I never expected to come before you as a suppliant; but am not sorry that an opportunity is offered me of making trial of your affection. You know my regard for Atticus. I beg you therefore to grant me this; forget, for my sake, the part he once took in behalf of a friend, your adversary, when his character was at stake. In the first place, it is becoming your humanity to pardon this; for everybody is bound to support his friends: then, if you love me (to say nothing of Atticus), grant this wholly to your Cicero, for whom you profess so much esteem; that what I have always believed, I may now fully know, the reality of your affection. After Caesar by his decree (which I, with many persons of the first dignity, countersigned) had exempted the Buthrotians, and assured me that as soon as the claimants had crossed the sea he would write to assign them some other lands, it happened that he was suddenly cut off. Upon this, as you know, (for you were present when the consuls were appointed by a decree of the senate to take Caesar's acts into consideration,) the business was put off to the 1st of June. The decree of the senate was confirmed by a law passed on the 26 of June, giving to the consuls the cognizance of those matters, which Caesar had purposed, decreed, and enacted. The cause of the Buthrotians was laid before the consuls. Caesar's decree was recited, and besides, several documents of Caesar's were produced. The consuls by the judgment of their council decreed in favour of the Buthrotians, and appointed Plancus to carry it into execution. Now, my Capito (for I know the influence you possess wherever you are, especially with a man of Plancus's easiness and humanity, strive, labour, or rather coax and persuade Plancus, who, I hope, is well disposed, to be still better disposed through your means. Indeed it seems to be a thing of such a kind, that without favour to anybody, Plancus would of himself, agreeably to his own disposition and prudence, not hesitate to maintain the decree of the consuls, to whom the inquiry and determination was referred both by the law and by the decree of the senate; especially us, if this sort of cognizance were invalidated, the acts of Caesar would seem to be called in question; which not only those who are interested, but also those who disapprove them wish, for tranquillity's sake, to confirm. Nevertheless, it is of consequence to me that Plancus should do this cheerfully and freely, which he certainly will if you exert that gentle spirit which I have often experienced, and that sweetness, in which nobody equals you. I earnestly request you to do so.

LETTER IV.
Cicero to C. Cupiennius.

I had a great esteem for your father, and he always showed me extraordinary attention and kindness; nor indeed have I ever doubted of your affection towards me. I, on my part, have not been deficient in cultivating it. I therefore request of you the more urgently to aid the city of Buthrotum, and to exert your influence that our friend Plancus may lose no time in confirming and carrying into effect the decree of the consuls, which they made in favour of the Buthrotians, agreeably to the authority given them both by the law and by the decree of the senate. This, my Cupiennius, I earnestly request of you again and again.

LETTER V.
Cicero to Plancus, Praetor elect.

Excuse me, if after I have written to you in detail about the Buthrotians, I address you again upon the same subject. It is not, my Plancus, that I have any distrust either of your liberality, or of the friendship between us; but in an affair of such moment to my Atticus, (in which now even his reputation is concerned,) that it may be seen he is able to secure that to which Caesar consented, and which we, who were present at the decrees and rescripts of Caesar, witnessed and countersigned,—especially as the whole power of execution rests with you; that, what the consuls decreed agreeably to the decrees and rescripts of Caesar, I say not, you should execute, but should execute with zeal and readiness; this will be so grateful to me, that nothing can be more so. Though I hope that by the time you receive this the request I had made in a former letter may be already granted, yet I shall not cease to importune you, till I hear that it is done; to which I look forward with great hope. Then I trust I shall write in a different strain, and shall have to return you thanks for your important favour. Should this be conferred, I would have you believe not so much that Atticus, (who is deeply interested,) as that I (who am not less earnest than he) shall be obliged by it. Farewell.

LETTER VI.
Cicero to Capito.

I doubt not you will be surprised, and even displeased, that I should address you again upon the same subject; but an affair is at issue of great moment to Atticus, my intimate friend, to whom I am bound by every tie. I know your zeal for your friends, and theirs too for you, and it is in your power to render me essential service with Plancus. I am well acquainted with your kindness, and know the influence you have with your friends. Nobody can do us more service, on this occasion, than you. And the cause is as good as one ought to be which the consuls have decreed on the judgment of the council, having taken cognizance of it agreeably to the law and the decree of the senate. But I consider everything to rest in the liberality of your friend Plancus; who I think, while for your friendship's sake, and for the republic's sake, he will carry into effect the decree of the consuls, so for my sake will be glad to do it. Assist me then, my Capito; for which again and again I earnestly entreat you. Farewell.
